The Muslims unanimously decided that the treaty should be fulfilled with regard to those who had stayed and had refrained [from fighting the Muslims]; their being overwhelmed would only improve their position. Those who made a claim which was accounted genuine or who fulfilled [the conditions of their treaty] would have the status of the former group.[522] If their claim is considered false, the treaty will be revoked and the Muslims will make a new peace treaty with them. [They also decided] that the matter of those who migrated should be decided at the discretion of the Muslims. If they wish, they will make a treaty with them and [the migrants] will become ahl al-dhimmah; if the Muslims wish [otherwise], they will persevere in preventing them from returning to their land and offer them nothing except war. Those who have stayed and have surrendered will be offered the choice between paying the poll tax and exile. The same applies to the peasants. [2370]

ʿUmar wrote a reply to the letter brought by Anas b. al-Ḥulays, saying:

> Now, then, God the Exalted has granted in certain cases a dispensation (rukhṣah)[523] in every matter, except in just conduct and in the remembrance of God (dhikr). As for the remembrance of God there can be no dispensation with regard to it in any event, and only abundance of it is satisfactory.[524] As for justice, there can also be no dispensation with regard to it, neither for relative nor for stranger, neither in adversity nor in prosperity. Even if justice seems to be lenient, it is stronger and more effective in suppressing injustice and falsehood than injustice, even if it seems harsh. It is [also] more effective in uprooting infidelity.
>
> Those inhabitants of sawād who held fast to their treaty and did not help the enemy against you in any way have the protection (dhimmah) and must pay the poll tax. As for

522. Those who claimed that they had been forcibly recruited but had otherwise fulfilled the conditions of their treaty will be treated in the same way as those who stayed on their land and did not fight the Muslims.

523. For the concept of rukhṣah in early Islam, see Kister, "Concessions."

524. Alluding to Qur'ān 33:41: "Oh those who believe, remember God in abundance." The dhikr later became an important ritual of Muslim mystics. See *EI*², s.v. "Dhikr" (L. Gardet).

those who claim that they were forced [to leave the land] and did not come to you after the Persians had gone or migrated, do not believe what they have claimed, unless you wish to. If you do not so wish, revoke the treaty and escort them to a place which is secure for them.[525]

ʿUmar replied to the letter brought by Abū al-Hayyāj, saying:

As for those who stayed and did not migrate without having a treaty, they will have the same rights as those who have a treaty because they stayed for your sake and refrained from fighting you, in response to your call. The same applies to the peasants, if they behaved in the same manner. Those who have claimed [to have been forcibly evicted or recruited] will have protection if their claim is considered true. If it is considered false, their treaty will be revoked. As [2371] for those who assisted [the Persians] and migrated, this is a matter placed by God at your discretion. If you wish, invite them to stay on their land for your sake. They will have protection and will be obliged to pay the poll tax. Should they dislike this, divide among yourselves their property which God has restored to you.[526]

When ʿUmar's letters reached Saʿd b. Mālik[527] and the Muslims, they made offers to those who had migrated from the areas close to them and left the sawād to return: They would have protection and would be obliged to pay the poll tax. They returned and became ahl al-dhimmah like those who had stayed and held fast to their treaty, but their land tax (kharāj) was made heavier. The Muslims gave the same status to those who claimed to have been forcibly evicted and fled; they made a treaty with them, giving those who stayed the status of those who had treaties. The same applied to the peasants.

The Muslims did not include in the peace conditions the property of the royal family, of those who had left [the sawād] with them and had not accepted the alternative offer of embracing Islam or paying the poll tax. This property became immovable booty (fayʾ) of those 525. Alluding to Qurʾān 8:58 and 9:6.

526. Cf. note 471, above.
527. He is Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ; cf. note 16, above.

to whom God had restored it. This and the first state domains [ṣawāfī][528] became the property of those to whom Allāh had restored them.

The rest of the sawād [inhabitants] became ahl al-dhimmah. The Muslims imposed upon them the land tax [kharāj] which had previously been levied by the Persian king. It was to be paid by every man,[529] proportionately to the property and the land which he possessed. The property that God restored to the Muslims included the property of the Persian royal family and of those who had gone with them, the families of those who had fought on the side of the Persians and their property, the property of the fire temples, the thicket, the marshes, the property of the mail service,[530] and the property of the Persian royal family.[531] It was not feasible to divide the booty that had belonged to the Persian king and to those who had gone with him because it was scattered all over the entire sawād. It was administered for those who were entitled to it [ahl al-fayʾ] by [2372] people whom they trusted and agreed upon. This is what was debated between the ahl al-fayʾ, not the greater part of the sawād. When the ahl al-fayʾ were in dispute among themselves, the administrators deemed its division between them easy. This is what made the ignorant people confused about the affair of the sawād, and, if the intelligent people had supported the ignorant who asked the administrators to divide the fayʾ, they would have divided it between them. But the intelligent ones refused [to support the idea], and the administrators followed [the advice of] the intelligent and neglected the views of the ignorant. ʿAlī [b. Abī Ṭālib] and everyone who was asked to divide the fayʾ acted in the same way, followed [the advice] of the intelligent, and neglected the views of the ignorant. They said: "[We refrain from dividing the fayʾ] so that you do not hit each other in the face."[532]

---

528. See Løkkegaard, Taxation, index; Duri, "Taxation," 139. It is not clear what is meant by the "first" ṣawāfī.

529. Literally "The kharāj of Kisrā was [imposed] on the heads of men...."

530. Mā kāna li-ʾl-sikak should be understood in light of a parallel passage in Ṭabarī, I, 2468: mā kāna... li-sikak al-burūd. Cf. Løkkegaard, Taxation, 168, 224.

531. In this form the last part of the sentence is redundant: The property of the royal family has already been mentioned. As de Goeje pointed out in his notes, some description of this property seems to be missing.

532. In order to get the better portion. The question whether it was more advisable to divide the conquered lands of Iraq between the warriors or to keep them as a per-

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad b. Qays — ʿĀmir al-Shaʿbī: I (Muḥammad b. Qays) said to ʿĀmir al-Shaʿbī:[533] "What is the status of the sawād?" He replied: "It was conquered by force (ʿanwatan) and so was the entire land except for the fortresses. The inhabitants migrated and were then invited to make peace and receive protection. They responded, returned, and became ahl al-dhimmah. They are obliged to pay the poll tax, and they enjoy protection. This is the sunnah, and this is what the Messenger of God did in Dūmah."[534] The property of the Persian royal family and of those who migrated with them remained the fayʾ of those to whom God had restored it.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Ṭalḥah — Sufyān — Māhān: God conquered the sawād by force; the same applies to the entire land between the sawād and the river of Balkh,[535] except for the fortresses. The inhabitants were invited to make peace and became ahl al-dhimmah, and their land remained in their possession. The property of the royal family and of their followers was not included [2373] in this arrangement; this became the fayʾ of those to whom God had restored it. Nothing of the conquests becomes fayʾ until it is divided,[536] as is meant by His saying: "Whatever booty you take,[537] i.e., of what you divide among yourselves.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Ismāʿīl b. Muslim — al-Ḥasan b. Abī Ḥasan: Most of what the Muslims conquered is land taken by force (ʿanwah); then they invited the inhabitants to return and receive protection. They made them the offer of paying the poll petual source of income for the community was debated between ʿUmar and leading Muslims. The view of ʿUmar, who opposed the division, prevailed. See Abu Yūsuf, Kharāj, 67–72, 86–87; Ibn Sallām, Amwāl, 57–59.

---

533. Cf. Ṭabarī, I, 2062 l. 1.

534. See note 541, below. For the issue of the status of the sawād lands, see also Ṭabarī, Ikhtilāf, 220.

535. Nahr Balkh is the Oxus, in Arabic Jayḥūn. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 713; Le Strange, Lands, 434.

536. Those parts of the sawād that were not divided among the Muslims but remained the property of the original inhabitants, who were subject to the payment of the poll tax, were therefore not considered part of the fayʾ.

537. The first words are part of Qurʾān 8:41, which reads: "Whatever booty you take, one-fifth of it is God's and the Messenger's. . . ." The verse is adduced because it speaks about the division of the booty; it is taken to be a proof that only things that are divided among the Muslims can be considered fayʾ. In his commentary on the Qurʾān Ṭabarī also maintains that the verse speaks about booty that is being divided. See Ṭabarī Tafsīr, X, 3 ll. 10–11.

tax, and when the inhabitants agreed to this, they extended protection to them.

According to Sayf — ʿAmr b. Muḥammad — al-Shaʿbī: I said to him: "Some people claim that the people of the sawād are slaves."[538] He replied:

> On what basis would poll tax be taken from slaves? The sawād was taken by force. The same applies to all the land you know, except some fortresses on the mountains and the like. The inhabitants were invited to return, they came back, the poll tax was accepted from them, and they became ahl al-dhimmah. Whatever was taken as spoils can be divided, but that which was not taken as spoils whose owners had agreed to pay the poll tax beforehand belongs to them. This is the sunnah with regard to it.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Abū Ḍamrah — ʿAbdallāh b. al-Mustawrid — Muḥammad b. Sīrīn: All lands were taken by force, except a few fortresses whose inhabitants concluded a treaty before they were allowed to leave. They — meaning the people who were conquered by force — were invited to return and to pay the poll tax, and they became ahl al-dhimmah, both the people of the sawād and those of the mountains. This was the way in which the ahl al-fayʾ were treated.[539] ʿUmar and the Muslims acted with regard to the poll tax and protection according to the custom enacted by the Messenger of God in this matter. He sent Khālid b. al-Walīd from [2374]
Tabūk[540] to Dūmat al-Jandal and conquered it by force. He took its king Ukaydir b. ʿAbd al-Malik captive. He invited him to receive protection and pay the poll tax, after his land had been conquered by force and he himself had been taken prisoner.[541] Khālid did the same 538. In Ṭabarī's Ikhtilāf, 225, this view is attributed to the jurisprudent Sharīk b. ʿAbdallāh al-Nakhaʿī; for information about him, see Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 333–37; and Schmucker, Untersuchungen, 149.

539. If the text is correct, it means that those entitled to the booty were consistently treated in this way; the land was left in the possession of the inhabitants and not divided among them.

540. Tabūk is a city in the northern part of the Arabian peninsula. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 824–25; and EI², s.v. "Tabūk" (F. Buhl).

541. Dūmat al-Jandal is located in the northwestern part of the Arabian peninsula, at the head of Wādī Sirḥān. See EI², s.v. "Dūmat al-Djandal" (L. Veccia Vaglieri); and EI¹, s.v. "Djawf al-Sirḥān" (H. von Wissmann et al.); for its geographic location, see also EI², s.v. "Badw" (J. Schleifer), map. According to one tradition, the Prophet sent with the two sons of ʿArīḍ, after they had been captured and claimed to be Ukaydir's friends. He concluded a treaty with them, stipulating payment of the poll tax and protection. In the same way he handled the affair of Yuḥannah b. Ruʾbah, the ruler of Aylah.[542] [The things which are customarily done are not according to the traditions transmitted by the few. Whoever relates things other than those done by the just imāms and the Muslims is lying about them and staining their honor.]

According to Sayf — Ḥajjāj al-Ṣawwāf — Muslim, the client of Ḥudhayfah: The Emigrants and the Helpers married women from the sawād who belonged to the People of the two Books. If the people of the sawād were slaves, the Muslims would not have been permitted to do this. It would not have been permissible for them to marry slave girls belonging to the People of the Book, because God the Exalted says: "Those of you who do not have the means [to marry free, believing women, let them marry your believing slave girls who have come into your possession]."[543] He did not say "their slave girls" [which would mean slave girls] from among the People of the two Books.[544].

According to Sayf — ʿAbd al-Malik b. Abī Sulaymān — Saʿīd b. Jubayr: After ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb appointed Ḥudhayfah to be gover-

---

Khālid b. al-Walīd on an expedition against it in the year 9/630–31. The town was ruled by Ukaydir b. ʿAbd al-Malik, who was a Christian from the tribe of Kindah. Khālid won the battle, took Ukaydir prisoner, and brought him before the Prophet. The Prophet spared his life, concluded with him a treaty stipulating payment of the poll tax, and set him free. See Ṭabarī, I, 1702–3; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/i, 119–20; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 626. Ukaydir was then killed after an attack launched against Dūmat al-Jandal by Khālid b. al-Walīd in 12/633–34. See Ṭabarī, I, 2065–66, 2077.

It should be noted, however, that, according to another tradition recorded by Balādhurī (Futūḥ, 61–62, quoted by Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 627) and Ibn Saʿd (Ṭabaqāt, I/ii, 36), Ukaydir embraced Islam; in that case his story would be irrelevant to the issue at hand.

542. For Aylah, see note 498, above. Muslim historians are not aware of any fighting that preceded the conclusion of a treaty and the imposition of the poll tax on Yuḥannah b. Ruʾbah. Ṭabarī himself says (I, 1702) that, when the Prophet reached Tabūk, Yuḥannah b. Ruʾbah came to him, concluded a treaty, and agreed to pay the poll tax. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 59; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I/ii, 28–29, 37.

543. The part of the verse that is in parentheses is not quoted by Ṭabarī.

544. See Qurʾān 4:24. The commentators are not in agreement on whether the verse really forbids Muslims to marry Jewish and Christian slave girls. See Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, V, 12–13. Ṭabarī's own view in favor of this interpretation is on p. 13 ll. 9–17. Ṭabarī mentions the legality of marriages between Muslims and the sawād women in order to prove that the inhabitants of the sawād were free dhimmīs and not slaves.

nor of al-Madā'in and the number of (unmarried) Muslim women increased, he sent him a message saying: "It came to my knowledge that you have married a woman from al-Madā'in, belonging to the [2375] People of the Book. Divorce her." Ḥudhayfah wrote back to him: "I shall not do it until you inform me whether it is permissible or forbidden, and what is the intention of this [order]." ʿUmar wrote to Ḥudhayfah: "It is indeed permissible, but the non-Arab women are captivating, and if you draw near to them they will wrest you from your wives." Ḥudhayfah said: "[I shall do it] now," and he divorced her.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Ashʿath b. Siwār—Abū al-Zubayr—Jābir: I participated in the battle of al-Qādisiyyah with Saʿd. We married women from the People of the Book, as we did not find many Muslim women. When we returned, some of us divorced them and some of us kept them.

According to Sayf—ʿAbd al-Malik b. Abī Sulaymān—Saʿīd b. Jubayr: The sawād was conquered by force. The inhabitants were invited to return and became ahl al-dhimmah, but the property of the royal family and of their followers became booty of those who were entitled to it (fayʾ li-ahlihi). This was what the people of al-Kūfah understood; when this understanding was forgotten, their view was taken as referring to the entire sawād. But the status of their sawād is like that.[545]

According to Sayf—al-Mustanīr b. Yazīd—Ibrāhīm b. Yazīd al-Nakhaʿī: The sawād was taken by force. The inhabitants were invited to return, and those who responded were obliged to pay the poll tax and received protection, while the property of those who refused became fayʾ. It is not permissible to sell anything of this fayʾ between al-ʿUdhayb and the Mountains (al-jabal), neither in the sawād nor in the Mountains.[546]

According to Sayf—Muḥammad b. Qays—al-Shaʿbī: The same tradition: It is not permissible to sell anything of this fayʾ between the Mountains and al-ʿUdhayb. [2376]

According to Sayf—ʿAmr b. Muḥammad—ʿĀmir: al-Zubayr,

545. If the text is correct, it probably means that, in contradistinction to the property of the royal family, which became fayʾ, most of the sawād remained in the possession of its inhabitants, in the way described (see, e.g., p. 2372, below).

546. Meaning the province of Jibāl ("the Mountains"), situated to the east of the Iraqi lowlands. See Le Strange, Lands, 185ff.

Khabbāb,[547] Ibn Masʿūd,[548] Ibn Yāsir,[549] and Ibn Habbār received fiefs in the days of ʿUthmān. If ʿUthmān committed an error, then those who accepted the error from him committed a greater one; they are the people from whom we have received our religion.[550] ʿUmar gave a fief to Ṭalḥah,[551] to Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh, and to al-Ribbīl b. ʿAmr. He gave the Dār al-Fīl[552] to Abū Mufazzir and to others from whom we took [our religion]. All the fiefs were freely divided from out of the fifth of the fay'.

ʿUmar wrote to ʿUthmān b. Ḥunayf[553] [sending the letter] with Jarīr: "Now, then, give Jarīr a fief sufficient for his sustenance, no less and no more." ʿUthmān wrote to ʿUmar: "Jarīr brought to me a letter in which you allocated to him a fief sufficient for his sustenance. I did not want to put it into effect before I could contact you in this matter." ʿUmar wrote to him: "Jarīr spoke the truth. Carry out my instructions, but you did well to consult me." ʿUmar [also] gave a fief to Abū Mūsā.[554] ʿAlī gave al-Kurdūsiyyah to Kurdūs b. Hāni' and gave a fief to Suwayd b. Ghafalah al-Juʿfī.[555]

---

547. Khabbāb b. al-Aratt beloned to the tribe of Tamīm. A blacksmith and sword maker by trade, he was taken prisoner in the Jāhiliyyah and was sold into slavery in Mecca. He was one of the first Muslims and is said to have been severely tortured by the Meccans because of his conversion. After the hijrah he participated in the early battles of Islam. He died as a rich man in al-Kūfah in 37/657–58. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, III, 116–18; [ʿI.] Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 106–8; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 258–59 no. 2212; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 133–34; Goldziher, Introduction, 118.

548. See *EI*², s.v. "Ibn Masʿūd" [J. C. Vadet].

549. ʿAmmār b. Yāsir was born in Mecca to his father [who belonged to the tribe of Madhḥij and had moved to Mecca from the Yemen] and Sumayyah, a slave girl, or mawlāt attached to the clan of Makhzūm. After embracing Islam, he was tortured by the Meccans, who tried to force him to renege on his new religion. Tradition makes him the first man to build a mosque in Islam. Having emigrated to Medina with the Prophet, he participated in the battles of nascent Islam. He was killed in the battle of Ṣiffīn at the age of ninety-three. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, III/i, 176–89; VI, 7–8; [ʿI.] Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, IV, 43–47; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 575–76 no. 5707; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 408–10.

550. It was therefore their responsibility to act properly and not to accept fiefs in a way incompatible with the rules mentioned above.

551. See *EI*², s.v. "Ṭalḥah" [G. Levi della Vida].

552. Balādhurī [Futūḥ, 358] mentions a place called Dār al-Fīl in al-Baṣrah.

553. ʿUthmān b. Ḥunayf belonged to the tribe of Aws and was one of the Helpers [anṣār]. ʿUmar put him in charge of the sawād lands. He is said to have imposed the poll tax and the land tax on its inhabitants. He died during the reign of Muʿāwiyah. See [ʿI.] Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, III, 371; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, 483; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 449 no. 5439; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 112–13.

554. For Abū Mūsā al-Ashʿarī, see *EI*², s.v. "al-Ashʿarī, Abū Mūsā" [L. Veccia Vaglieri].

555. Suwayd b. Ghafalah belonged to the tribe of Madhḥij. He embraced Islam and

According to Sayf—Thābit b. Huraym—Suwayd b. Ghafalah: "I asked ʿAlī for a fief. He said: Write the following: This is a fief given by ʿAlī to Suwayd: the land of Dādhawayhi[556] between this and that point and what God has willed."

According to Sayf—al-Mustanīr—Ibrāhīm b. Yazīd: ʿUmar said: [2377] "If you conclude a peace treaty with a people, state that you are not responsible to them for the excesses committed by the troops without authorization." So they were writing to those with whom they concluded a peace treaty: "We are not responsible to you for the excesses committed by the troops without authorization."[557]

Al-Wāqidī said: The battle of al-Qādisiyyah and its conquest took place in the year 16/37–38. Some of the people of al-Kūfah say that the battle of al-Qādisiyyah took place in the year 15/636–37. [Al-Ṭabarī] has said: The correct version in our view is that it occurred in the year 14/635–6. Muḥammad b. Iṣḥāq said: It took place in the year 15/636–37. His account of this has been related.

The Building of al-Baṣrah

Abū Jaʿfar [al-Ṭabarī] has said: According to al-Wāqidī's account, ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb ordered the Muslims in the year 14/635–36 to worship during the nights of Ramaḍān in the mosques of Medina. He wrote to the newly established garrison towns (al-amṣār) and ordered the Muslims to do the same.

In this year—meaning the year 14/635–36—ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb dispatched ʿUtbah b. Ghazwān to al-Baṣrah and ordered him to encamp in it with those who accompanied him and to cut off the supplies of the Persians in al-Madāʾin and the vicinity. This is according to the version of al-Madāʾinī. Sayf maintained that al-Baṣrah was es-paid the poor tax during the lifetime of the Prophet but came to Medina only after his death. He participated in the battles of Yarmūk and al-Qādisiyyah and was ʿAlī's supporter in the battle of Ṣiffīn. He claimed to have been born in the "Year of the Elephant" (ca. A.D. 570) and is said to have died more than 120 years old in 80, 81, or 82/699–702. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 45–46; ('I.) Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 379–80; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 270 no. 3723; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 278–79.

---

556. Dādhawayhi al-Iṣṭakhrī was of Persian extraction and an inhabitant of the Yemen (cf. note 470, above). In the Islamic tradition he is mentioned as one of the killers of al-Aswad al-ʿAnsī, the Yemeni claimant to prophethood. He was killed by Qays b. Makshūḥ during the riddah rebellion. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 390; Ṭabarī, I, 1990–91 and index; ('I.) Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 129.

557. For this meaning of maʿarrat al-juyūsh see Lane, Lexicon, s.v. ʿ-r-r; Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, al-ʿArab, s.v. ʿ-r-r (IV, 556b); and Blachère et al., Dictionnaire, s.v. b-r-ʾ.

tablished in the spring of the year 16/637–38 and that ʿUtbah b. Ghazwān set out for al-Baṣrah from al-Madāʾin after Saʿd had finished [the battles] of Jalūlāʾ,[558] Takrīt,[559] and al-Ḥiṣnān.[560] He was sent there by Saʿd according to ʿUmar's orders.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb: according to ʿUmar b. Shabbah; according to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad — Abū Mikhnaf — Mujālid — al-[2378] Shaʿbī: Mihrān[561] was killed in the month of Ṣafar in the year 14/March–April 635. ʿUmar said to ʿUtbah — meaning Ibn Ghazwān:

> God the Exalted has conquered at the hand of your brethren al-Ḥīrah and its vicinity. One of the chieftains of al-Ḥīrah was killed. I do not feel safe that their Persian brethren will not help them. I therefore wish to send you to [al-Ubullah, known as] "the land of India"[562] in order that you may prevent the people of that area from assisting their brethren against your brethren and in order to fight them; it may be that God will grant you victory. So go with the blessing of God. Fear God as much as you can, rule with justice, perform the prayer at the appointed time, and remember God frequently.[563]

ʿUtbah set off with three hundred and ten odd men and was joined by some Bedouins and inhabitants of the desert. He reached al-Baṣrah with five hundred men, more or less, and encamped there in the month of Rabīʿ al-Awwal or Rabīʿ al-Ākhir of the year 14/635–36. At that time al-Baṣrah was called "the land of India,"[564] and there

---

558. See note 480, above.

559. On Takrīt and its conquest in the year 16/637–38, see EI[1], s.v. "Takrīt" (J. H. Kramers); Ṭabarī, I, 2474–77; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 861–63.

560. The conquest of al-Ḥiṣnān is mentioned in conjunction with that of Takrīt (see Ṭabarī, I, 2476–77, 2481–82). The exact location of al-Ḥiṣnān is not given by Yāqūt (Muʿjam, II, 275), who devotes his entry to the grammatical form of the nisbah of al-Ḥiṣnān. See, however, (ʿI.) Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 408 (and cf. Juynboll, Conquest, 55 n. 188), where al-Ḥiṣnān ("the two fortresses") are said to be Nīnawā (= Nineveh) and al-Mawṣil.

561. Mihrān b. Bādhān al-Hamadhānī was a commander in the Persian army. According to another account, he was killed in the battle of Buwayb in the year 13/634–35 (see Ṭabarī, I, 2192, 2199, and index).

562. See Ṭabarī, I, 2223 l. 11, where al-Ubullah is called farj al-Hind; cf. note 57, above. For arḍ al-Hind as an epithet for al-Ubullah, see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 641.

563. Cf. Qurʾān 33:41.

564. See note 57, above.

were white, coarse stones in it.[565] ʿUtbah encamped in al-Khuraybah.[566] [In the area of al-Baṣrah] there were seven villages (dasākir): in al-Zābūqah,[567] in Khuraybah, in the area of Banū Tamīm, and in the area of al-Azd. Two were in al-Khuraybah, two in the area of al-Azd, two in the area of Banū Tamīm, and one in al-Zābūqah. ʿUtbah wrote to ʿUmar and described for him the area in which he had encamped. ʿUmar wrote back to him: "Gather the people together in one place and do not scatter them." ʿUtbah stayed there for several months without making any raids and without confronting anyone.

According to Muḥammad b. Bashshār—Ṣafwān b. ʿĪsā al-Zuhrī—ʿAmr b. ʿĪsā Abū Naʿāmah al-ʿAdawī—Khālid b. ʿUmayr and Shuwaysh Abū al-Ruqqād: ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb dispatched ʿUtbah [2379]
b. Ghazwān and said to him: "Set out, you and those who are with you. When you reach the farthest part of the Arab land and the closest part of the non-Arab land, then halt." They marched out. When they reached al-Mirbad,[568] they found soft stones (kadhdhān) and said: "What are these soft stones (al-baṣrah)?"[569] Then they moved on and reached a place in front of a small bridge. There were tall grass and sprouting reeds. They said: "This is the place where you were ordered (to halt),"[570] so they halted short of [crossing into the territory of] the governor of the city of al-Furāt (ṣāḥib al-Furāt).[571] Some people came to the governor and said: "A group of men with a banner are here. They are heading toward you." The gov-

---

565. This is a reference to one of the etymologies of the name al-Baṣrah. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. b-ṣ-r; Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-ʿArab, s.v. b-ṣ-r (IV, 66–7); Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 636–37.

566. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 429–31.

567. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 905.

568. Al-Mirbad, situated to the west of al-Baṣrah, was the town market. Later it became a large residential area of the city, where poets and orators used to have their assemblies. Numerous political meetings were also held there. Yāqūt (Muʿjam, I, 484) says that in his day al-Mirbad was three miles from al-Baṣrah and was a separate town. The area between al-Baṣrah and al-Mirbad, which had been inhabited in the past, was in ruins in Yāqūt's days. For a history of al-Mirbad, with extensive bibliography, see S. A. ʿAlī, "Khiṭaṭ," 282–86; cf. *EI*², s.v. "al-Mirbad" (Ch. Pellat).

569. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 637, where al-Kadhdhān and al-Baṣrah are glossed by each other. See note 565, above.

570. The vegetation indicated that they had reached the boundary between the desert land of the Arabs and the fertile land of the Persians, as commanded by ʿUmar. See above; and p. 2384, below.

571. A city in the vicinity of al-Ubullah, on the eastern bank of the Euphrates. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 341–42; and Donner, Conquests, 159–60 and index.

ernor moved out with four thousand horsemen. He said: "They are nothing except what I see.[572] Tie their necks with ropes and bring them to me." ʿUtbah raised his voice and said: "I have participated in warfare together with the Prophet."[573] When the sun declined, ʿUtbah gave the order: "Attack!" They attacked the Persians and killed them all; nobody survived except the governor of al-Furāt, whom they took prisoner. ʿUtbah b. Ghazwān said: "Seek for us a halting place more salubrious than this." It was a hot and humid day. A pulpit was erected for ʿUtbah. He stood up to deliver a sermon and said:

> This world is coming to an end, quickly turning back and passing away. Nothing but a small part of it remains, like a small quantity of water in a vessel.[574] You are about to move from it to the Abode of Permanence.[575] Move with the best things in your possession.[576] I was told that if a rock were to > [2380] be hurled from the brink of Hell, it would be falling for seventy years. [Nevertheless,] Hell will be filled.[577] Do you wonder at it? I was also told that a walk between two of the gates of Paradise would take forty years, but a day will come when it will be crammed full. In a dream I saw myself as one of seven men in the company of the Prophet. We did not have anything to eat except for leaves of acacia trees, so that our mouths became ulcerated. I picked up a mantle and shared it with Saʿd. There was none among us who has not become

572. Apparently meaning that the Muslims are nothing but ordinary people and the Persians should not be intimidated by them.

573. The rest of ʿUtbah's speech seems to have been omitted.

574. A slightly different version of these sentences is quoted and explained in Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-ʿArab, s.v. ḥ-dh-dh. See also Blachère et al., Dictionnaire, s.v. ḥ-dh-dh, but the meaning given there does not seem to be correct.

The sermon reflects the feeling that the end of the world and the Day of Judgment are imminent. This feeling is frequently expressed in the literature describing the early period of Islam. One of the most widely quoted prophetic traditions that reflects this feeling reads: "I and the Hour have been sent like . . . these two—and he joined his index and middle fingers (buʿithtu anā wa-al-sāʿah . . . ka-hātayni—wa-qarana bayna al-sabbābah wa-al-wusṭā). See Bukhārī, Ṣaḥīḥ, III, 473 (Kitāb al-ṭalāq, 25).

575. Cf. Qurʾān 40:39: "The Hereafter is the Abode of Permanence" (inna al-ākhirah hiya dār al-qarār).

576. Meaning the best deeds that one performed in this world and that would serve him well in the Hereafter.

577. With the infinite numbers of infidels and sinners. See Qurʾān 7:17: "I shall fill Hell with all of you."

amīr of a newly established garrison town (miṣr). The people will have experience of the amīrs who will follow us.[578]

According to Sayf — Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Muhallab, and ʿAmr: When ʿUtbah b. Ghazwān al-Māzinī [from the Banū Māzin b. Manṣūr] set out from al-Madāʾin to the "opening of India" (farj al-Hind),[579] he halted at the shore, facing the Arabian peninsula. He stayed there for a while, then moved elsewhere. The people then complained about this until finally, after three attempts at settlement, ʿUmar ordered him to halt in the desert because they disliked the clayey ground. At the fourth time they halted in a stony tract (al-baṣrah) (al-baṣrah is used for any land of which the stones are gypsum). He ordered them to dig a canal through which water could be made to flow from the Tigris, so they dug a canal for drinking water to al-Baṣrah. The people of al-Baṣrah settled where al-Baṣrah is today, and the people of al-Kūfah settled where al-Kūfah is today, in the same month. As for the people of al-Kūfah they stayed in al-Madāʾin [2381] before settling in al-Kūfah. As for the people of al-Baṣrah they stayed on the bank of the Tigris but then moved several times until they settled in the desert.[580] Then they went back the distance of a farsakh[581] and dug a canal; then they repeated this until they reached the desert and extended the canal [as far as the site of al-Baṣrah].[582] Al-Baṣrah was planned in the same way as al-Kūfah. Abū al-Jarbāʾ ʿĀṣim b. al-Dulaf, of the Banu Ghaylān b. Mālik b. ʿAmr b. Tamīm, was in charge of the settlement of al-Baṣrah.

According to ʿUmar [b. Shabbah?] — al-Madāʾinī — al-Naḍr b. Is-

578. The Leiden text reads wa-sa-yujarrabūna al-nāsa baʿdanā. I have translated al-nās as "amīrs" in light of a version of ʿUtba's sermon recorded in Muslim, Ṣaḥīḥ, IV, 2278–79 (Kitāb al-zuhd wa-al-raqāʾiq, 14). The relevant portion reads there: wa-sa-takhburūna wa-tujarribūna al-umarāʾa baʿdanā. Another, and much longer, version of the sermon is recorded by Ibn Saʿd (Ṭabaqāt, VII/i, 2), whose text reads: wa-sa-tujarribūna al-umarāʾa baʿdanā wa-tujarrabūna fa-taʿrifūna wa-tunkirūna; ll. 27–28. ʿUtbah expresses the idea that the way in which the Muslim community is governed will deteriorate. Prophecy will disappear and will be replaced by kingship (mulk). The Muslims will in the future experience rulers worse than those of the early period.

579. An epithet for al-Ubullah. See note 57, above.

580. Reading badaw with the Cairo edition, instead of badaʾū of the Leiden text.

581. A farsakh is approximately 6 kilometers; see Hinz, Masse, 62.

582. Literally "Then they went back another farsakh and extended the canal; then another farsakh and extended the canal; then another farsakh and extended the canal; then they reached the desert and extended the canal [to al-Baṣrah]."

ḥāq al-Sulamī — Quṭbah b. Qatādah al-Sadūsī: Quṭbah b. Qatādah[583] was raiding the vicinity of al-Khuraybah, which was a part of al-Baṣrah, just as al-Muthannā b. Ḥārithah al-Shaybānī was raiding the vicinity of al-Ḥīrah. Quṭbah wrote to ʿUmar informing him of his location and telling him that, if he had a small number of men at his disposal, he would defeat the Persians who were in front of him and banish them from their land. The Persians of the area dreaded him because of the battle which had been fought by Khālid (b. al-Walīd) at Nahr al-Marʾah.[584] ʿUmar wrote to him: "I have received your letter saying that you were raiding the Persians in front of you. You did the right thing and have been vouchsafed success. Stay in your place and take good care of your companions until you [2382] receive my orders." ʿUmar sent Shurayḥ b. ʿĀmir, who belonged to the tribe of Saʿd b. Bakr, to al-Baṣrah and said to him: "Reinforce the Muslims in this area." He came to al-Baṣrah, left Quṭbah there, and set out for al-Ahwāz.[585] When he reached Dāris,[586] which was a Persian garrison, he was killed. Then ʿUmar dispatched ʿUtbah b. Ghazwān.[587]

According to ʿUmar (b. Shabbah?)—ʿAlī—ʿĪsā b. Yazīd—ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ḥudhayfah and Muḥammad b. al-Ḥajjāj—ʿAbd al-Malik b. ʿUmayr: ʿUmar (b. al-Khaṭṭāb) said to ʿUtbah b. Ghazwān when he dispatched him to al-Baṣrah:

> O ʿUtbah, I have appointed you to rule "the land of India,"[588] which is a stronghold of the enemy. I wish that God would spare you the trouble of having to deal with what is around it and that He would help you to overcome it. I wrote to al-ʿAlāʾ b. al-Ḥaḍramī[589] asking him to reinforce you with ʿAr-583. See ([ʿI.] Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, IV, 206; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, V, 445–46 no. 7125.

584. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 242; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 484; Donner, Conquests, 179, 329.

585. Ahwāz refers both to the whole province of Khūzistān and to the city the full name of which is Sūq al-Ahwāz. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 410–14; Le Strange, Lands, 232–34; *EI*², s.v. "Ahwāz" (L. Lockhart).

586. See Donner, Conquests, 213.

587. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII/i, 1–3; ([ʿI.] Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, III, 363–65; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, 438–39; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 100.

588. An epithet of al-Baṣrah; see Ṭabarī, I, 2378; cf. note 57, above.

589. Al-ʿAlāʾ b. al-Ḥaḍramī was an early convert to Islam. The Prophet sent him to govern al-Baḥrayn and to collect the poor tax there. He participated in the suppression of the riddah rebellion in this region. ʿUmar appointed him governor of al-Baṣrah, but al-ʿAlāʾ died on his way to Iraq. The date of his death is variously given as 14/

fajah b. Harthamah.[590] ʿArfajah is a man who knows how to fight the enemy and how to use stratagems against him. When he comes, consult him and let him be your close associate.[591] Summon the people to God; those who respond to your call, accept it from them,[592] but those who refuse must pay the poll tax out of humiliation and lowliness.[593] If they refuse this, it is the sword without leniency. Fear God with regard to what you have been entrusted. Beware lest your soul lures you into haughtiness which will render your brethren[594] disaffected toward you. You have been a companion of the Messenger of God, and through him you became noble after you had been lowly, and through him you became strong after you had been weak until you became an amīr to whom governmental power is entrusted and a ruler to whom obedience is due. Whatever you say is listened to; you command and your order is obeyed. This is, indeed, a blessing if it does not cause you to overstep your limits and does not cause you to behave insolently with those who are inferior to you. Beware of ease of circumstances as you would beware of sin. In my view, the former is, indeed, the more fearful of the two; it may lead you astray and deceive you. As a result, you may fall into error and end up in Hell. I invoke the protection of God from this upon you and upon myself. People hasten to God, but when this world comes into their view, they seek after it. Seek God, do not seek the world, and beware of the places into which the wrongdoers are hurled down. [2383]

According to ʿUmar b. Shabbah — ʿAlī — Abū Ismāʿīl al-Hamdānī and Abū Mikhnaf — Mujālid b. Saʿīd — al-Shaʿbī: ʿUtbah b. Ghaz- [2384]

635–36 or 21/641–42; the earlier date is incompatible with the tradition regarding his appointment as governor of al-Baṣrah. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, IV, 76–79; (ʿI.) Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, IV, 7–8; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 541 no. 5646.

590. For ʿArfajah b. Harthamah (or b. Khuzaymah) see (ʿI.) Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, III, 400; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, V, 271 no. 6781.

591. Reading wa-qarribhu for wa-farribhu, an evident typographical error.

592. This is to say, accept their conversion as genuine and refrain from fighting them.

593. Cf. Qur'ān 9:29.

594. A possible emendation would be ākhirataka, instead of ikhwataka: "... which will ruin your Hereafter." Cf. Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, VII, 48 l. 18.

wān came to al-Baṣrah with three hundred men. When he saw a field of reeds and heard the croaking of frogs, he said: "The Commander of the Faithful ordered me to halt at the most distant edge of the Arab desert land and at the nearest point of the cultivated Persian land. This is the place where we must obey the orders of our imām." So he halted at al-Khuraybah. At that time, five hundred Persian horsemen (asāwirah) were in al-Ubullah defending the city. Al-Ubullah was a port for ships from China and from less distant places. ʿUtbah moved forward and halted before al-Ijjānah[595] and stayed there for about a month. Then the garrison of al-Ubullah came out to [fight] him, and ʿUtbah stood up against them. He put Quṭbah b. Qatādah al-Sadūsī and Qasāmah b. Zuhayr al-Māzinī[596] in charge of ten horsemen and said to them: "Stay behind us, drive back those (Muslims) who run away, and ward off those [Persians] who may attack us from our rear." Then the two armies confronted each other. They did not fight longer than is necessary to slaughter a camel and divide it; God routed the Persians;[597] they took to flight and withdrew into the city. ʿUtbah returned to his camp and stayed there for a few days. God put fear in the hearts of the people of al-Ubullah; they left the city, carried their light belongings with them, crossed [the Tigris] to the city of al-Furāt, and abandoned al-Ubullah. The Muslims entered the city, captured various goods, weapons, prisoners, and money. They divided the money between them, [2385] and every man received two dirhams. ʿUtbah put Nāfiʿ b. al-Ḥārith[598] in charge of the spoils of al-Ubullah; he set aside the fifth[599] and divided the rest among those to whom God restored it.[600] He wrote about it [to ʿUmar, sending the letter] with Nāfiʿ b. al-Ḥārith.

According to Bashīr b. ʿUbaydallāh: Nāfiʿ b. al-Ḥārith killed nine men in the battle of al-Ubullah, and Abū Bakrah[601] killed six.

---

595. Al-Ijjānah was a lagoon (qhawr) at the end of a natural canal (khawr) leading to al-Baṣrah from the Tigris estuary. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 356–57; and Le Strange, Lands, 43–44.

596. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, V, 527 no. 7291; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 378.

597. For manaḥahum Allāh aktāfahum, see Dozy, Supplément; and WKAS, s.v. k-t-f.

598. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 372; (ʿI.) Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, V, 8.

599. See note 463, above.

600. See note 472, above.

601. Abū Bakrah was a slave in al-Ṭā-'if and embraced Islam when the Prophet laid siege to the city. He died in al-Baṣrah in 51 or 52/671–72. See Ibn Saʿd, According to Dāwūd b. Abī Hind: The Muslims seized in al-Ubullah six hundred dirhams. Each man took two dirhams, and ʿUmar allocated to the men who took two dirhams at the conquest of al-Ubullah a stipend of two thousand dirhams; these numbered three hundred men.

The conquest of al-Ubullah took place in the month of Rajab or in the month of Shaʿbān of this year.

According to al-Shaʿbī: Two hundred and seventy men participated in the conquest of al-Ubullah. Among them were Abū Bakrah, Nāfiʿ b. al-Ḥārith, Shibl b. Maʿbad,[602] al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah, Mujāshiʿ b. Masʿūd,[603] Abū Maryam al-Balawī, Rabīʿah b. Kaladah b. Abī al-Ṣalt al-Thaqafī, and al-Ḥajjāj.

According to ʿAbāyah b. ʿAbd ʿAmr: I participated in the conquest of al-Ubullah with ʿUtbah. ʿUtbah sent Nāfiʿ b. al-Ḥārith to ʿUmar with the news of the conquest. The people of Dast-i Maysān[604] gathered [an army] against us. ʿUtbah said: "I think that we should march against them." We marched and confronted the governor (marzubān) of Dast-i Maysān. We fought him; his companions were defeated and he was taken prisoner, his mantle and belt being seized. ʿUtbah sent him [to ʿUmar] with Anas b. Ḥujayyah al-Yashkurī. [2386]

According to Abū al-Malīḥ al-Hudhalī: ʿUtbah sent Anas b. Ḥujayyah to ʿUmar with the belt of the governor of Dast-i Maysān. ʿUmar said to him: "What is the condition of the Muslims?" Anas said: "The [wealth of this] world has engulfed them, and they are dripping with gold and silver." The people became attracted by al-Baṣrah and came to live there.

According to ʿAlī b. Zayd: When ʿUtbah finished with al-Ubullah, the governor of Dast-i Maysān gathered an army against him. ʿUtbah marched against him from al-Ubullah and killed him. Then he sent Mujāshiʿ b. Masʿūd to the city of al-Furāt. ʿUtbah went to ʿUmar and ordered al-Mughīrah to lead the prayers until Mujāshiʿ returned from al-Furāt. Upon his return, Mujāshiʿ was to be the amīr. Mujāshiʿ defeated the people of al-Furāt and returned to al-Baṣrah.

Ṭabaqāt, VII/i, 8–9; [ʿI.] Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, V, 38, 151; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, VI, 467–j68; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 469–70; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, 628–29.

602. See [ʿI.] Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 385; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 377–79 no. 3961.

603. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII/i, 19; [ʿI.] Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, IV, 300; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, VI, 325 no. 8499; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 38.

604. For the district of Dast-i Maysān, situated on the lower Tigris, see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 714–15; Morony, Iraq, 159ff.

Faylakān, a chieftain of Abazqubādh,[605] gathered an army against the Muslims. Al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah set out against him, confronted him at al-Marghāb,[606] and defeated him. He wrote to ʿUmar about the victory. ʿUmar asked ʿUtbah: "Whom did you appoint as governor of al-Baṣrah?" He replied: "Mujāshiʿ b. Masʿūd." ʿUmar said: "You are appointing a bedouin (rajul min ahl al-wabar) to rule over town dwellers (ahl al-madar)? Do you know what has happened?" ʿUtbah said: "No." ʿUmar informed him of the affair of al-Mughīrah and ordered him to return to his city.[607] ʿUtbah died on his way, and ʿUmar appointed al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah [in his stead].

According to ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Jawshan: ʿUtbah went away after he killed the governor of Dast-i Maysān, sent Mujāshiʿ to the city of al-Furāt, and appointed him to govern [al-Baṣrah] in his place; after he ordered al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah to lead the prayers until the return of Mujāshiʿ from al-Furāt; and after the people of Maysān gathered an army, al-Mughīrah confronted them, defeated them before the coming of Mujāshiʿ from al-Furāt, and informed ʿUmar of the victory.

According to al-Ṭabarī's isnād—Qatādah: The people of Maysān gathered an army against the Muslims. Al-Mughīrah set out against them, leaving the heavy luggage behind. He confronted the enemy on [2387] this side of the Tigris. Ardah bint al-Ḥārith b. Kaladah said: "I wish we could join the Muslim men and be with them," and she made a banner of her veil. The other women [also] used their veils as flags and set out in the direction of the Muslims. When they reached the Muslims, the polytheists were fighting them. But when the polytheists saw the approaching flags, they thought that reinforcements were coming to the Muslims and took to flight. The Muslims pursued them and killed many of them.

According to Ḥārithah b. Muḍarrib: Al-Ubullah was taken by force, and then ʿUtbah distributed white bread (kakkah)[608] to the troops. The same tradition was transmitted by Muḥammad b. Sīrīn.

Al-Ṭabarī has said: Among the prisoners taken at Maysān were

---

605. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 90–91; and Morony, Iraq, 188–89.

606. A canal in the vicinity of al-Baṣrah; see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 499 [deals also with other places bearing the same name]; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 364.

607. The text has ʿamal, which denotes any area under a governor, ʿāmil.

608. See Glossary, s.v. and Dozy, Supplément, s.v. kaʿk, and the sources quoted there.

Yasār, the father of Ḥasan al-Baṣrī,[609] and Arṭabān, the grandfather of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAwn b. Arṭabān.

According to al-Muthannā b. Mūsā b. Salamah b. al-Muḥabbiq—his father—his grandfather: I participated in the conquest of al-Ubullah. A copper pot fell within my share [of the spoils]. When I looked at it closely, I suddenly noticed that it was of gold and contained eighty thousand *mithqāl*s.[610] A letter concerning this was sent to ʿUmar, who replied: "Let Salamah swear by God that on the day when he took it he thought that it was of copper. If he takes the oath, the pot will be given to him. If not, it will be divided among the Muslims." I took the oath and the pot was given to me. Al-Muthannā said: "This is the source of the property which we own today."

According to ʿAmrah bint Qays: When the Muslims set out to fight the people of al-Ubullah, my husband and my son went with them. They took two dirhams and a makkūk[611] of raisins each. They marched and when they came opposite al-Ubullah they said to the enemy: "Shall we cross to your side, or will you cross to ours?" The enemy said: "Cross to our side." They took pieces of wood from the ʿushar[612] tree, tied them together, and crossed to the enemy side. The [2388] polytheists said: "Do not take on the first of them until the last makes the crossing." When the Muslims reached land, they proclaimed "God is most great!" Then they proclaimed it for the second time, whereupon their mounts rose on their feet. Then they proclaimed it for the third time, and the mounts [of the Persians] began to throw their riders to the ground. We saw heads falling, but we did not see who was striking them off. God granted victory to the Muslims.

According to al-Madāʾinī: Ṣafiyyah bint al-Ḥārith b. Kaladah was the wife of ʿUtbah, and her sister Ardah bint al-Ḥārith was the wife 609. Ḥasan al-Baṣrī [21–110/642–728] was one of the most famous mystics of early Islam. See *EI*², s.v. "Ḥasan al-Baṣrī" [H. Ritter].

610. The mithqāl is a unit of weight, used for gold and other precious metals. See Hinz, Masse, 1–8.

611. The makkūk is a measure of weight. According to Ibn Manẓūr [Lisān al-ʿArab, s.v. m-k-k], it was best known among the people of Iraq. The weight of the makkūk was not fixed; it changed according to the usage agreed upon in each area [yakhtalifu miqdāruhu bi-ʾkhtilāfi iṣṭilāḥ al-nās ʿalayhi fī al-bilād]. See Hinz, Masse, 44; *EI*², s.v. "Makāyīl" [E. Ashtor], at VI, 118b, 119b.

612. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v.

of Shibl b. Maʿbad al-Bajalī. When ʿUtbah was appointed governor of al-Baṣrah, the relatives of his wife—Abū Bakrah, Nāfiʿ, and Shibl b. Maʿbad—came with him. Ziyād (b. Abī Sufyān) also joined them. When they conquered al-Ubullah, they did not find anyone who would divide [the spoils] between them, and eventually Ziyād divided the spoils between them. He was fourteen years old and possessed nobility.[613] They allocated for him two dirhams a day.

It was said: The governorship of ʿUtbah in al-Baṣrah was in the year 15/636–37. According to another version, it was in the year 16/637–38, but the first version is more correct. His governorship of al-Baṣrah lasted six months. [Then] ʿUmar appointed al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah as governor of al-Baṣrah. He remained two years in this position, and then certain accusations were directed against him[614] and ʿUmar then appointed Abū Mūsā (al-Ashʿarī). According to another version, ʿUmar appointed after ʿUtbah Abū Mūsā, and after him al-Mughīrah.

In this year, meaning the year 14/635–36, ʿUmar flogged his son ʿUbaydallāh and his companions because they drank wine, and he flogged Abū Miḥjan as well.[615]

In this year ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb led the Muslims in pilgrimage. The governor of Mecca was, according to one version, ʿAttāb b. al-Asīd;[616] Yaʿlā b. Munyah was governor of the Yemen; Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ was governor of al-Kūfah; Abū ʿUbaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ was [2389] governor of Syria; ʿUthmān b. Abī al-ʿĀṣ[617] was governor of Baḥrayn, although according to another version it was al-ʿAlāʾ b. al-Ḥaḍramī; and Ḥudhayfah b. Miḥṣan was governor of ʿUmān.

---

613. For lahu dhuʾābah see note 426, above.

614. Al-Mughīrah was accused of fornication. For ʿUmar's investigation, which resulted in al-Mughīrah's acquittal and in the punishment of his three accusers, see Ṭabarī, I, 2529–33.

615. See Ibn al-Jawzī, Manāqib, 240–43.

616. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 330; ['I.] Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, III, 358–59; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 429–30; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 89–90.

617. ʿUthmān b. Abī al-ʿĀṣ, of the tribe of Thaqīf, was appointed governor of al-Ṭāʾif by the Prophet and confirmed in his position by Abū Bakr and ʿUmar. He is said to have been instrumental in keeping his tribe loyal to Islam during the riddah rebellion. He served also as governor of ʿUmān. The date of his death is given variously as 50/670–71, 51/671–72, or 55/672. See ['I.] Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, III, 371–73; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 451–52 no. 5445; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 128–29.

The Events of the Year

15

(FEBRUARY 14, 636–FEBRUARY 1, 637)

Ibn Jarīr (al-Ṭabarī) has said: Some traditionists said that in this year Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ established al-Kūfah. Ibn Buqaylah[618] led the Muslims there and said to Sa'd: "I shall lead you to a land free of mosquitoes[619] and beyond the desert."[620] He then led them to the place where al-Kūfah is located today.

---

618. For Ibn Buqaylah, see note 201, above.

619. Cf. Ṭabarī, I, 2360, where it is related that Sa'd abandoned an attempt to establish a city at Kuwayfat 'Umar b. Sa'd because the area was infested with flies.

620. Literally "a land higher than [where] the mosquitoes [live] and lower than the desert." This phrasing can be understood in view of the Arabic linguistic usage in which travel from the Ḥijāz to Iraq, Syria, and 'Umān is considered descent (inḥidār), whereas movement in the direction of Najd, Ḥijāz, and Yemen is considered ascent (iṣ'ād). See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-'Arab, s.v. ṣ-'-d (III, 253). The place suggested by Ibn Buqaylah is therefore "higher," to the south of the mosquito-infested Iraqi lowlands, and "lower," to the north of the Arabian desert. It is another expression of the idea that the Muslims should establish themselves at the beginning of their northward expansion in the borderland between Iraq and the desert. Cf. Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 276.

The Battle of Marj al-Rūm[621]

In this year the battle of Marj al-Rūm took place. It so happened that Abū ʿUbaydah set out with Khālid b. al-Walīd from Fiḥl[622] to Ḥimṣ. He marched together with men from al-Yarmūk who had joined them.[623] All of them halted at the camp of Dhū al-Kalāʿ.[624] The news of this reached Heraclius, who dispatched Theodore the Patricius, who established his camp on the plain of Damascus and to the west of the city. Abū ʿUbaydah attacked first Marj al-Rūm and this Byzantine army. The winter took its toll on the Byzantines and many were wounded. When Abū ʿUbaydah established his camp near the Byzantines in Marj al-Rūm, he was opposed on the day of his arrival by Shanas al-Rūmī, who had cavalry similar in size to that of Theodore; it was to serve as a reinforcement to Theodore and as assistance to the people of Ḥimṣ. Shanas established a separate camp, but [2390] when night descended, the camp was deserted by Theodore. Khālid stood opposite Theodore and Abū ʿUbaydah opposite Shanas. Khālid was informed that Theodore had gone to Damascus, so Khālid and Abū ʿUbaydah agreed that Khālid should pursue him. Khālid pursued him that night with light cavalry. Yazīd b. Abī Sufyān was informed of what Theodore had done and confronted him, and they fought each other. Khālid caught up with them while they were fighting and attacked the Byzantines from the rear so that they were killed from all directions[625] and only those who escaped survived. The Muslims seized whatever they wanted: mounts, weapons,[626] and clothes. Yazīd b. Abī Sufyān divided this among his companions and the companions of Khālid. Then Yazīd set out for Damascus and Khālid returned to Abū ʿUbaydah after he had killed Theodore. Khālid recited:

We have killed Theodore and Sheodore,

---

621. See Donner, Conquests, 134, 138.

622. Fiḥl, or Pella, was a town on the east bank of the Jordan, across from Baysān (Bet Sh'an, Scythopolis). See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 853; and Donner, Conquests, 130 and index.

623. See Donner, Conquests, 138.

624. See Donner, Conquests, 136, 138, 367 no. 58.

625. Literally "from the front and from the rear."

626. Adāt could mean any instrument or tool but is probably used here in the sense of adāt al-ḥarb "tools of war."

And before him we killed Ḥaydar,[627]
And made Ukaydir meet his death.[628]

After Khālid set out to pursue Theodore, Abū ʿUbaydah confronted Shanas. They fought in Marj al-Rūm, and Abū ʿUbaydah killed a great number of the Byzantines, also killing Shanas, and the valley was filled with fallen Byzantines. The ground was stinking because of them. Some Byzantines fled, but Abū ʿUbaydah did not let them escape and pursued them to Ḥimṣ.[629]

The Conquest of Ḥimṣ

Al-Ṭabarī has related according to Sayf (in his book) — Abū ʿUthmān: When the news about the rout of the Byzantines at Marj al-Rūm reached Heraclius, he ordered the commander of Ḥimṣ to march upon Ḥimṣ[630] and said to him: "I have been informed that the food of the Arabs is camel meat and that their drink is camel milk. It is winter now. Do not fight them except on cold days, for none of [2391] those whose principal food and drink is this will survive until the summer." Heraclius set out from his camp to al-Ruhāʾ[631] and ordered his governor to defend Ḥimṣ.[632] Abū ʿUbaydah drew near and encamped around Ḥimṣ, and Khālid came after him and encamped around it as well. The Byzantines attacked the Muslims on every cold day, in the morning and in the afternoon. The Muslims experienced severe cold and the Byzantines experienced a long siege. The Muslims stood firm in their positions; God inspired them with endurance[633] and rewarded them with victory when the winter had lost its grip. The Byzantines on the other hand held fast to the city, hoping that the winter would destroy the Muslims.

---

627. Shūdhara is an artificial name, created in order to rhyme with Tūdhara. Although Ḥaydar is a real (Arab) name, it is also used here only for purposes of rhyme.

628. Translating fayḍa instead of ghayḍa, accepting de Goeje's conjecture in Glossary, s.vv. z-w-r, and f-y-ḍ. About the killing of Ukaydir, see Ṭabarī, I, 2077, cf. note 541, above.

629. For rakiba aksāʾahum, see WKAS, I, 169, s.v. kus'un.

630. It is not clear where the amīr was at the time.

631. This is Arabic for Edessa; see Le Strange, Lands, 103–4.

632. For this meaning of akhadhahu bi-, see de Goeje's Glossary, p. CVIII; and his Glossary to Balādhurī, Futūḥ, s.v. a-kh-dh.

633. For the expression afragha ʿalayhim al-ṣabra, cf. Qurʾān 2:250, 7:126.

According to Abū al-Zahrā' al-Qushayrī — a man from his tribe: The people of Ḥimṣ enjoined each other: "Hold fast, because they are barefooted. When the cold afflicts them, their feet will be cut; this in addition to their (meager) food and drink." The situation of the Byzantines worsened; the feet of some fell off in their shoes. As for the Muslims, not even a toe of theirs was hurt, though they were wearing sandals.[634]

When the winter was over, an old man stood up among the Byzantines and called upon them to make peace with the Muslims. They said: "How can we do this while the king (Heraclius) is powerful and glorious? There is nothing between us and between them."[635] The man left them alone. Then another stood up among them, saying: "The winter is over and hope is lost. What are you waiting for?" They said: "We are waiting for the inflammation of the brain (al-birsām),[636] which is latent in the winter and appears in the summer." He said: "These are people who will receive [divine] help. It is better to come to them with an agreement and a covenant than to be taken by force. Accept my suggestion [now] and be praised for it, before you [will have to] accept it and receive blame." But they said: "He is a senile old man, having no knowledge of warfare."

According to elders from Ghassān[637] and Balqayn,[638] God rewarded the endurance of the Muslims during the battle days of Ḥimṣ by sending an earthquake which struck the people of the city. This is how it happened. The Muslims confronted them and proclaimed [2392] "God is most great!," whereupon the Byzantines in the city were struck with an earthquake. The walls cracked, hence the Byzantines fled in fear to their leaders and men of judgment and to those who called upon them to make peace and had been rejected and humili-

634. For khuff (pl. khifāf) "shoe" and naʿl (pl. niʿāl) "sandal," see Dozy, Vêtements, 155–59, 421–24.

635. Probably meaning that no fighting that obliges the Byzantines to sue for peace has occurred. In the account of Ibn Kathīr (Bidāyah, VII, 52), the Byzantines say here: "Are we to make peace while the king is near to us?" (a-nuṣāliḥu wa-al-malik minnā qarīb!)

636. This seems to be the meaning intended here; see Rufus, Krankenjournale, 121. I am grateful to Professor Ullmann for his communication on this matter. For other meanings of birsām, see Ullmann, Medizin, 245 (pleurisy); and Blachère, et al., Dictionnaire, s.v. (I, 542b; pleurisy or sunstroke). In Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-ʿArab (s.vv. b-r-s-m, m-w-m), it is glossed by mūm, which may mean a kind of smallpox.

637. See *EI*², s.v. "Ghassān" (I. Shahīd).

638. See *EI*², s.v. "Ḳayn" (J. Chelhod).

ated because of this. The Muslims then proclaimed "God is most great!" for the second time. As a result many buildings and walls caved in and the Byzantines fled in fear to their leaders and men of judgment, saying: "Do you not see the punishment of God?" The leaders replied: "Only you can sue for peace." They looked [toward the Muslims] and called out: "Peace, peace!" The Muslims were not noticing what had happened among the Byzantines. They complied and agreed to make peace on the condition that they would receive half of their houses,[639] that they would let the Byzantines retain their property and [the rest of] their buildings[640] and would not occupy them. The Muslims left the buildings for the Byzantines. Some of them made peace according to the conditions included in the peace treaty of Damascus: to pay one dīnār and to provide [to the Muslims a certain quantity of] food for every jarīb[641] forever, whether they were prosperous or poor. Others made peace [and agreed to pay] according to their ability. If their property should increase, their payment would grow; if it should decrease, the payment would decrease as well. The peace treaty with Damascus and al-Urdunn was the same; some of them agreed to pay a fixed amount whether they were prosperous or poor, while others agreed to pay according to their ability. They were allowed to take over the area which their rulers had abandoned.

Abū ʿUbaydah dispatched al-Simṭ b. al-Aswad[642] with the Banū Muʿāwiyah, al-Ashʿath b. Miʾnās[643] with the tribe of Sakūn [Ibn ʿĀbis was also with him], al-Miqdād[644] with the tribe of Balī, Bilāl[645] and Khālid with the army, and al-Ṣabbāḥ b. Shutayr, Dhuhayl b.

---

639. A very literal translation of anṣāf dūrihim would read "half of each of their houses."

640. ʿAlā an yatruka al-muslimūna amwāl al-Rūm cannot mean "and that they handed over the treasure of the Greeks"; pace Hill, Termination, 66 no. 141.

641. Jarīb is a measure of land. For its various uses, see Sauvaire, "Matériaux," 485–88; Hinz, Masse, 65–66.

642. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 264 no. 3703.

643. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 201 no. 465.

644. Al-Miqdād b. ʿAmr was an early convert to Islam. After the hijrah he participated in the battles of the Prophet. In the battle of Badr he earned the reputation of being the first Muslim to fight on horseback. He died near Medina in 33/653–54 at the age of 70. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, III/i, 114–16; [ʿI.] Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, IV, 409–11; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, VI, 202–4 no. 8189; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 285–87.

645. For Bilāl b. Rabāḥ, best known as the muʾadhdhin of the Prophet, see *EI*², s.v. "Bilāl b. Rabāḥ" [W. ʿArafat].

ʿAṭiyyah, and Dhū Shamistān. They were inside the city of Ḥimṣ. Abū ʿUbaydah stayed in his camp and wrote to ʿUmar, informing him of the victory, sending fifths of the booty with ʿAbdallāh b. Masʿūd. After [2393] Abū ʿUbaydah had sent him, he was informed that Heraclius had crossed the river into the Jazīrah and was in al-Ruhāʾ and was alternating between going into hiding and coming out of it. Ibn Masʿūd came to ʿUmar, who ordered him to return and then sent him to Saʿd in al-Kūfah. Later he wrote to Abū ʿUbaydah: "Stay in your city and summon the strong and sturdy Arabs in Syria. God willing, I shall not neglect sending to you men who will help you."

The Story of Qinnasrīn[646]

According to Abū ʿUthmān and Jāriyah: After the conquest of Ḥimṣ, Abū ʿUbaydah sent Khālid b. al-Walīd to Qinnasrīn. When he camped in the populated area [around it],[647] the Byzantines lead by Mīnās marched against them. Mīnās was a Byzantine chieftain, the greatest man among them after Heraclius. They confronted each other in this area and Mīnās and his companions were killed; they had never suffered a defeat like this.[648] All the Byzantines died together following the death of Mīnās,[649] with none of them surviving. As for the people who lived around Qinnasrīn, they sent a message to Khālid, saying that they were Arabs and had been [forcibly] recruited;[650] it was not their idea to fight Khālid. Khālid accepted this and left them alone.[651] When this came to ʿUmar's knowledge, he said: "Khālid has made himself amīr! May God have mercy on Abū 646. A town in northern Syria, south of Aleppo. See *EI*², s.v. "Ḳinnasrīn" (N. Elisséeff); Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 184–87.

647. For al-ḥāḍir, see Lane, Lexicon, s.v.; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 173 l. 3; 144 l. 2; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 184.

648. The Arabic text reads fa-qutila Mīnās wa-man maʿahu maqtalatan lam yuqtalū mithlahā. Although the text states that all Byzantine troops were killed in the battle, the second part of the sentence evidently refers to defeat rather than killing. In the sentence there is a shift in the meaning of qatala from "kill" to "subdue." Cf. de Goeje's Glossary, s.v. q-t-l.

649. For mātū ʿalā damīn wāḥidin, see Dozy, Supplément, s.v. d-m-w.

650. For this meaning of ḥashara, see note 516, above.

651. Ibn al-ʿAdīm (Zubdat al-ḥalab, I, 26) reports this tradition in a significantly different version, which ends with the words: "[Khālid] killed some of them and left the rest alone (qatala minhum wa-taraka al-bāqīn). I tend to prefer Ṭabarī's version; qabila minhum is frequent in similar contexts, whereas qatala minhum, without an object for the verb, sounds awkward.

Bakr! He had better understanding of people than I have."[652] ʿUmar had dismissed Khālid and al-Muthannā when he assumed office[653] and had said: "I have not dismissed them because of suspicion, but the people venerated them excessively and I was afraid that they would put their trust in them."[654] ʿUmar changed his opinion after the conduct of Khālid at Qinnasrīn.[655]

Khālid marched to Qinnasrīn and encamped there. The people of Qinnasrīn fortified themselves against him. He said: "[Even] if you were in the clouds, God would carry us to you or would bring you down to us." [2394]

The people of Qinnasrīn considered their situation. They remembered the treatment meted out to the people of Ḥimṣ and wanted to make peace on the conditions of Ḥimṣ, but Khālid agreed only on the condition that the city be destroyed, so he destroyed it. Both Ḥimṣ and Qinnasrīn were leveled to the ground.

This time Heraclius retreated. The reason for his retreat was the following: Khālid killed Mīnās and all the Byzantines died with him. When he made an agreement with the people who lived around Qinnasrīn and left the city, ʿUmar b. Mālik appeared from the direction of al-Kūfah and Qarqīsiyā,[656] ʿAbdallāh b. al-Muʿtamm from the direction of Mosul, and Walīd b. ʿUqbah[657] from the land of the 652. The reference is to Abū Bakr's defense of Khālid b. al-Walīd against ʿUmar's criticism. See Ṭabarī, I, 1926.

653. For the dismissal of Khālid b. al-Walīd, see Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 116, 178; Ṭabarī, I, 2148, 2526–27.

654. Rather than in God, as de Goeje correctly observed in Mémoire, 126. See a slightly different version of this tradition in Ṭabarī, I, 2528.

655. See Ṭabarī, I, 2527.

656. A town near the confluence of the Khābūr river and the Euphrates. See Le Strange, Lands, 105 (read "on the left bank of the Euphrates") and index; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 65–66.

657. Al-Walīd b. ʿUqbah belonged to a leading Qurashī family. His father fought against the Muslims at Badr and was killed after the battle on the Prophet's orders. Al-Walīd embraced Islam after the conquest of Mecca. He served as a collector of the poor tax under the Prophet and under ʿUmar, but the tradition maintains that he did not discharge his duties wholeheartedly. ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān, who was his half-brother, appointed him governor of al-Kūfah in 25/645–46 but had to dismiss him after he was accused of drunkenness. In addition to his participation in the conquest of Syria, he led an expedition to Ādharbayjān in 28/648–49 (or 24/644–45 or 26/646–47). When the struggle between ʿAlī and Muʿāwiyah erupted, he did not take an active part in it and retired to al-Raqqah in the Jazīrah. Some traditions maintain, however, that in his poems and letters he incited Muʿāwiyah to fight. He died in al-Raqqah during Muʿāwiyah's reign. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 15; VII/ii, 176–77; Ṭabarī, in-

Banū Taghlib with [men from] Taghlib and Arabs from the Jazīrah.[658] They passed by the cities of the Jazīrah, avoiding the direction of Heraclius. The people of the Jazīrah from[659] Ḥarrān,[660] al-Raqqah,[661] Naṣībīn,[662] and neighboring towns could not know[663] their intention without returning to their people [in the Jazīrah]. The Muslims left in the Jazīrah al-Walīd b. ʿUqbah so that they were not in danger of being attacked from the rear.[664]

Khālid and ʿIyāḍ (b. Ghanm) penetrated the Byzantine territory from the direction of Syria, and ʿUmar (b. Mālik) and ʿAbdallāh (b. al-Muʿtamm) penetrated it from the direction of the Jazīrah. This had never been done before. Then they returned. This was the first penetration of the Byzantine territory in Islamic times; it took place in the year 16/637–38.

Khālid returned to Qinnasrīn and settled in it, and his wife joined him. When [ʿUmar] dismissed him, he said: "'ʿUmar put me in charge of Syria. When it became wheat and honey, he dismissed me."[665] dex; [ʿI.] Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, IV, 90–92; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, VI, 614–18; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 142–44.

---

658. Al-Jazīrah, "the island," was a term used for the area between the upper courses of the Euphrates and the Tigris. See Le Strange, Lands, 86ff.; EI², s.v. "Djazīra" (M. Canard).

659. Reading min instead of fī; see note 664, below. The sentence refers to troops from the Jazīrah who participated in the Byzantine siege of Ḥimṣ. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 73 ll. 19–20.

660. For the city of Ḥarrān in the Jazīrah, see Le Strange, Lands, 103; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 230–32.

661. For al-Raqqah, see Le Strange, Lands, 101–2; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 802–4.

662. For Naṣībīn, see Le Strange, Lands, 94–95; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 787–89.

663. Lam yuqhriḍu gharaḍahum is difficult; see a parallel passage in Ṭabarī, I, 2500 l. 13: lam yadrū al-Jazīrah yurīdūna am Ḥimṣ "they did not know whether they [i.e., the Muslim troops from al-Kūfah] were heading for al-Jazīrah or for Ḥimṣ." A possible emendation of the text could be lam yaʿrifū gharaḍahum.

664. Ṭabarī's text of the last two sentences is dubious, and our translation is based on comparison with some parallel passages. Ibn al-ʿAdīm (Zubdat al-ḥalab, I, 31) says that the Byzantine troops besieging Ḥimṣ were reinforced by 30,000 men from the Jazīrah, belonging to Tanūkh and other tribes. They inflicted heavy losses on the Muslims. Anxious to alleviate the pressure on the town, ʿUmar instructed Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ to dispatch Muslim troops into the Jazīrah in order to divert the attention of the Jazīrah contingent in the Byzantine army from the people of Ḥimṣ. When information about this troop movement reached Ḥimṣ, the men from the Jazīrah left Ḥimṣ and returned to defend their hometowns. See also Ṭabarī, I, 2500; [ʿI.] Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 381; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 73; Donner, Conquests, 150. This interpretation of our passage necessitates an emendation of the text; see notes 659, 663, above.

665. Bathaniyyah was a place in Syria, known for its wheat. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 493–94; Blachère et al., Dictionnaire, s.v. b-th-n. An extensive discussion of ḥattā

Then Heraclius set out for Constantinople. There is disagreement concerning the date of his arrival there and of his departure from Syria; Ibn Isḥāq said that it had been in the year 15/636–37 whereas Sayf said that it had been in the year 16/637–38.

The Departure of Heraclius for Constantinople [2395]

According to Sayf — Abū al-Zahrā' al-Qushayrī — a man from Qushayr: When Heraclius set out from al-Ruhā' and asked its inhabitants to follow him, they said: "We are better off here than with you," and they refused to follow him and separated themselves both from him and from the Muslims.

The first man to cause the dogs of al-Ruhā' to bark and its fowls to be scared[666] was Ziyād b. Ḥanẓalah,[667] who was a Companion of the Prophet. [In this expedition?] he was with ʿUmar b. Mālik; they were taking turns in commanding the troops.[668] Ziyād was a confederate of Banū ʿAbd b. Quṣayy.

Before [this incursion] Heraclius set out for Shimshāṭ.[669] When the Muslims reached al-Ruhā', he entered the Byzantine territory and moved toward Constantinople.[670]

A man of the Byzantines who had been a prisoner of the Muslims caught up with Heraclius. Heraclius said to him: "Inform me about these people." The man said: "I shall tell you, and it will be as if you yourself were looking at them. They are horsemen during the day and monks at night.[671] In the area under their responsibility they do not eat except for a price and do not enter a house except with a greeting of peace. They stand up to those who fight them until they idhā ṣārat bathaniyyatan wa ʿasalan can be found in Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-ʿArab, s.v. b-th-n.

---

666. Meaning the first Muslim to make an incursion into this region.

667. Ziyād b. Ḥanẓalah of the tribe of Tamīm was a Companion of the Prophet. Muḥammad sent him to fight against Musaylimah and al-Aswad al-ʿAnsī, the prophetic claimants in al-Yamāmah and the Yemen. Later he participated in the battle of Yarmūk, in the incursions into Syria, and in the battles waged by ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib. He is also known for several poems in which he described the wars against the ahl al-riddah and against the Byzantines. See [ʿI.] Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 213; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 583; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 83, 137; II, 525.

668. Cf. note 173, above.

669. A city on the Arsanas, or eastern Euphrates. See Le Strange, Lands, 116–17; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 319–20.

670. See Donner, Conquests, 150.

671. Meaning that they fight during the day and pray at night.

destroy them." Heraclius said: "If you have spoken the truth, they will, indeed, inherit the land on which I stand."

According to ʿUbādah and Khālid: Whenever Heraclius made the pilgrimage to Jerusalem, left Syria behind [on his way back], and entered into the land of the Byzantines, he used to turn back and to say: "Peace be upon you, O Syria! This is the farewell of a man who takes leave of you without fulfilling his desire and will return." When the Muslims moved on Ḥimṣ, he crossed the Euphrates and camped at al-Ruhāʾ. He remained there until the people of al-Kūfah appeared, Qinnasrīn was conquered, and Mīnās was killed. When this happened, he retreated to Shimshāṭ. When he left Shimshāṭ in order to cross into the Byzantine territory, he ascended to an elevated place, [2396] turned back, looked in the direction of Syria, and said: "Peace be upon you, O Syria! This is a farewell after which there will be no reunion. No Byzantine man will ever return to you except in fear until the ill-fated one is born; would that he would not be born! How sweet will be his deeds and how bitter will be their outcome with regard to the Byzantines."[672]

According to Abū al-Zahrāʾ and ʿAmr b. Maymūn: When Heraclius left Shimshāṭ and entered the Byzantine territory, he turned back toward Syria and said: "I used to greet you in the manner of a traveler. Today I am greeting you in the manner of one who departs. No Byzantine man will ever return to you except in fear until the ill-fated one is born; would that he would not be born!" Heraclius moved onward and reached Constantinople, taking with him the people of the fortresses located between Alexandretta and Tarsus so that the Muslims should not be able to move within any populated territory between Antioch and the Byzantine land. He laid the fortresses waste[673] so that the Muslims would not be able to find anyone there. At times Byzantines lay in ambush near the fortresses and launched surprise attacks on those who were lagging behind, and the Muslims had to take precautions against this.

672. The "ill-fated one" (al-mashʾūm) is the eschatological figure al-Dajjāl, the false Messiah. His appearance is one of the miraculous events expected in the Muslim tradition to take place before the Day of Judgment (ashrāṭ al-sāʿah). In some traditions it is related to the defeat of the Byzantines. See, for instance, Ibn Mājah, Sunan, II, 1370 (Kitāb al-fitan, bāb 35 no. 4091): "The Dajjāl will not emerge until the Byzantines are defeated (fa-mā yakhruju al-dajjāl hattā tuftaḥa al-Rūm). On al-Dajjāl in general see *EI*², s.v. "al-Dadjdjāl" (A. Abel).

The Dajjāl's deeds will be sweet with regard to the Byzantines because he will fight the Muslims; their outcome will be bitter because he will lose the fight.

673. For this meaning of shaʿʿatha, see de Goeje's Glossary to Balādhurī, Futūḥ, s.v. sh-ʿ-th. See also a similar description of these events in Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 163–64.

The Conquest of Caesarea[674] and the Siege of Gaza[675]

According to Sayf—Abū ʿUthmān and Abū Ḥārithah—Khālid and ʿUbādah: When Abū ʿUbaydah and Khālid departed from Fiḥl on their way to Ḥimṣ, ʿAmr (b. al-ʿĀṣ)[676] and Shuraḥbīl (b. Ḥasanah)[677] [2397] camped at Baysān and conquered it. The province of Jordan (al-Urdunn)[678] made peace with them. The Byzantine army gathered at Ajnādayn,[679] Baysān, and Gaza. ʿAmr and Shuraḥbīl wrote to ʿUmar that the Byzantines had divided their forces, and ʿUmar wrote to Yazīd (b. Abī Sufyān) asking him to send them reinforcements[680] and to dispatch Muʿāwiyah to Caesarea. He also wrote to ʿAmr commanding him to confront Arṭabūn,[681] and he wrote to ʿAlqamah b. Mujazziz[682] to confront al-Fīqār.[683] The following is the text of the letter of ʿUmar to Muʿāwiyah:

---

674. See *EI*², s.v. "Ḳaysāriyya" (M. Sharon).

675. See *EI*², s.v. "Ghazza" (D. Sourdel).

676. For ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀs, whose fame is based mainly on his conquest for Egypt, see *EI*², s.v. "ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ" (A. J. Wensinck).

677. Shuraḥbīl b. Ḥasanah belonged to the tribe of Kindah and was a confederate of the Qurashī clan of Banū Zuhrah in Mecca. He was an early convert to Islam and took part in the early battles of the Prophet. He served as governor over a part of Syria on behalf of ʿUmar. According to one tradition, he had been sent by the Prophet as his envoy to Egypt, where he died. According to another, he died in the plague of ʿAmwās in 18/639–40. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII/ii, 118; ('I.) Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 390–91; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 328–29; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 324–25.

678. For the province of al-Urdunn, roughly corresponding to northern Palestine, see *EI*², s.v. "al-Urdunn, ii" (Fr. Buhl).

679. For a discussion of the possible location of Ajnādayn, see *EI*², s.v. "Adjnādayn" (H. A. R. Gibb).

680. Literally "to warm their backs with men"; cf. de Goeje's Glossary, s.v. d-f-ʾ.

681. A commander in the Byzantine army. For the derivation of Arṭabūn from tribunus, see de Goeje, Mémoire, 62; and Jawālīqī, Muʿarrab, ed. Sachau, 11; see also ed. Shākir, 74, where arṭabūn is glossed with al-muqaddam fī al-ḥarb. Butler (Arab Conquest, 195, 215) maintains that the correct reading is Aretion.

682. In addition to his role in the conquest of Palestine, ʿAlqamah b. Mujazziz was sent by ʿUmar on a naval expedition to Abyssinia, an expedition that ended in disaster. Other traditions maintain that it was the Prophet who had ordered ʿAlqamah to raid Abyssinia in 9/630–1 and describe the raid as successful. See Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 983; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/i, 117–18; ('I.) Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, IV, 14; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 559–61.

683. For the derivation of al-fīqār from vicarius, see de Goeje, Mémoire, 62.

> Now, then, I have appointed you to govern Caesarea. Go there and ask God's help against them. Say frequently 'There is no power nor strength except in God.' God is our Lord, our trust, our hope, and our Master; how excellent is the Master and how excellent is the Helper!

The two men reached the places where they were commanded to go. Muʿāwiyah with his soldiers established camp near the people of Caesarea, who were led by A—B—N—Y.[684] He defeated the latter and besieged him in Caesarea. Then the people of Caesarea began to fight Muʿāwiyah, but whenever they fought him he defeated them and compelled them to retreat into their fortress. Finally they attacked him again, emerged from their fortifications, and fought with zeal and self-sacrifice. The number of their fallen during the fighting reached eighty thousand; at the time of their defeat Muʿāwiyah increased the total to one hundred thousand. He sent the news of victory [to ʿUmar] with two men from the Banū al-Ḍubayb, but then he became apprehensive that they would be weak[685] and sent ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlqamah al-Firāsī and Zuhayr b. al-Ḥilāb al-Khathʿamī to follow the first two and to overtake them. [Ibn ʿAlqamah and Zuhayr] caught up with them and passed them while they were asleep. Ibn ʿAlqamah repeatedly recited the following verses:

The two Judhāmīs have made my eye sleepless;
how can I sleep while they are ahead of me,
Traveling in the heat of midday,
the brother of Ḥushaym and the brother of Ḥarām?[686]

[2398] ʿAlqamah b. Mujazziz set out and laid siege to al-Fīqār in Gaza. He began corresponding with him but received no satisfaction. Eventually ʿAlqamah came to al-Fīqār pretending to be ʿAlqamah's messenger. Al-Fīqār ordered a man to wait for him on the way and to kill him when he passed by, but ʿAlqamah became aware of it and said: "I have with me a number of men who share my view. I shall go and bring them to you." Al-Fīqār sent a message to that man in-

684. I am unable to vocalize this name.

685. And unable to make the trip to Medina.

686. These verses are quoted in a slightly different—and better—arrangement in Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 142. See also Hitti, Origins, 218. According to Balādhurī's version, the first two messengers belonged to the tribe of Judhām, which tallies better with the first verse.

structing him not to attack ʿAlqamah. ʿAlqamah departed and did not return, doing the same thing which ʿAmr did with al-Arṭabūn.[687]

The messengers (al-barīd) of Muʿāwiyah brought the news to ʿUmar, who assembled the people and made them spend the night joyfully. He praised God and said to them: "Praise God for the conquest of Caesarea!" Muʿāwiyah kept the Byzantine prisoners with him before the conquest and after it and said: "Whatever Mikhāʾīl[688] does to our prisoners, we shall do to theirs." He thereby dissuaded Mikhāʾīl from molesting the Muslim prisoners until Caesarea was conquered.

The Conquest of Baysān[689] and the Battle of Ajnādayn[690]

When ʿAlqamah moved to Gaza and Muʿāwiyah to Caesarea, ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀs went to confront al-Arṭabūn and passed in front of him. Shuraḥbīl b. Ḥasanah set out with him, commanding the vanguard. ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ appointed Abū al-Aʿwar to govern [the province of] Jordan in his stead. He put the two wings of his army in charge of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr and Junādah b. Tamīm al-Mālikī [of the tribe of Mālik b. Kinānah]. He set out and camped near the Byzantines at Ajnādayn. The Byzantines were in their fortifications and trenches, with al-Arṭabūn, the most cunning of the Byzantines, the most far-sighted, and the most harmful, as their commander. He placed a large army in al-Ramlah[691] and a large army in Jerusalem. ʿAmr (b. al-ʿĀṣ) informed ʿUmar of the news. When ʿAmr's letter reached him, he said: "We have sent the Arṭabūn of the Arabs to confront the [2399] Arṭabūn of the Byzantines. Let us see what the outcome will be!"

At this time, ʿUmar began to dispatch the amīrs of Syria and to provide each commander with reinforcements. When he received ʿAmr's letter informing him that the Byzantines had divided their 687. See p. 2400, below.

688. For a discussion of Mikhāʾīl's identity, see de Goeje, Mémoire, 168.
689. See *EI*², s.v. "Baysān" (J. Sourdel-Thomine).
690. See *EI*², s.v. "Adjnādayn" (H. A. R. Gibb).
691. Al-Ramlah was founded only at the beginning of the eighth century C. E. by Sulaymān b. ʿAbd al-Malik, and the statement in our passage is anachronistic.

forces,[692] he wrote to Yazīd (b. Abī Sufyān) to send Muʿāwiyah with his cavalry to Caesarea. He wrote to Muʿāwiyah, appointing him to lead the fighting against the people of Caesarea, and to tie down their forces in order to prevent them from fighting ʿAmr. ʿAmr appointed ʿAlqamah b. Ḥakīm al-Firāsī and Masrūq b. so-and-so al-ʿAkkī[693] to fight the people of Jerusalem. They confronted the people of Jerusalem and prevented them from fighting ʿAmr. ʿUmar sent Abū Ayyūb al-Mālikī[694] to al-Ramlah, which was ruled by al-Tadhāriq. He confronted the two of them.[695]

When the reinforcements reached ʿAmr one after the other, he sent Muḥammad b. ʿAmr to reinforce ʿAlqamah and Masrūq and sent ʿUmārah b. ʿAmr b. Umayyah al-Ḍamrī[696] to reinforce Abū Ayyūb. ʿAmr stayed in Ajnādayn, without being able to cause al-Arṭabūn to make a mistake. Nor did the envoys bring him satisfaction (either), so he took the matter upon himself and entered upon al-Arṭabūn as if he were an envoy. He told al-Arṭabūn what he wanted, listened to what he said, and looked at his fortifications until he knew what he wanted to know. Arṭabūn said to himself: "By God, it is ʿAmr or a man whose advice ʿAmr follows. Nothing I could do would harm the Muslims more grievously than killing this man." Then he called in a member of his guard and secretly spoke to him about killing ʿAmr. He said: "Go out and stand in such-and-such a place, and when he passes near you, kill him." ʿAmr became aware of this and said:

> You have heard from me and I have heard from you, and I have been impressed by what you have said. I am one of ten men whom ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb sent with this governor in 692. Meaning that the Byzantine army was divided between Ajnādayn, Baysān, and Gaza. See p. 2397, above.

693. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, VI, 92–93 no. 7940.

694. Abū Ayyūb al-Mālikī, better known as al-Anṣārī, was a Companion of the Prophet from the Medinan tribe of Khazraj. His fame is based mainly on his participation in the siege of Constantinople during the reign of Muʿāwiyah and on his reported burial there. See *EI*², s.v. "Abū Ayyūb . . . al-Anṣārī" (E. Lévi-Provençal et al.).

695. Al-Tadhāriq is said to have been the brother of the emperor Heraclius. See Ṭabarī, I, 2086, 2107.

It is not clear who the two men whom al-Tadhāriq confronts are. One is clearly Abū Ayyūb al-Mālikī; the other may be ʿUmārah b. ʿAmr b. Umayyah al-Ḍamrī, who is mentioned in the following paragraph.

696. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 586 no. 5730.

order that we might assist him and he might make us aware of his affairs. I shall return and bring them to you forthwith. [2400] If they view what you suggested as I do, then the members of the army and the amīr will view it in the same way. If they do not view it so, you will allow them to return to safety and you will be able to start your affair.[697]

Al-Arṭabūn said: "Agreed." He called a man, spoke to him secretly, and said: "Go to so-and-so and send him back to me." The man came back, and al-Arṭabūn said to ʿAmr: "Go and bring your companions." ʿAmr went away and decided not to come back. The Byzantine understood that ʿAmr had deceived him and said: "The man has deceived me; he is the most cunning of creatures." ʿUmar came to know about it and said: "ʿAmr got the better of him! How excellent is ʿAmr!"

ʿAmr moved against al-Arṭabūn after he came to know where he could be attacked and what would be his end. They confronted each other, and al-Arṭabūn did not have any other choice. The confrontation took place at Ajnādayn, and the two armies fought a heavy battle, like the battle of Yarmūk, in which many were killed. Arṭabūn was defeated with his men and took refuge in Jerusalem, while ʿAmr camped at Ajnādayn. When Arṭabūn came to Jerusalem, the Muslims did not stand in his way and enabled him to enter the city. Then ʿAmr moved the Muslims to Ajnādayn, and ʿAlqamah, Masrūq, Muḥammad b. ʿAmr, and Abū Ayyūb joined ʿAmr at Ajnādayn.

Arṭabūn wrote to ʿAmr saying: "You are my friend and opposite number; the position you hold among your people is comparable to my position among mine. By God, you will not conquer any part of Palestine after Ajnādayn. Go back and do not be deceived, lest you be defeated like those before you." ʿAmr summoned a man who spoke Greek, sent him to Arṭabūn, and ordered him to behave like a stranger and to disguise himself. He instructed him: "Listen to what he says so that you can give me the information about it when you come back, God willing," and he wrote to Arṭabūn, saying: "I have received your letter. You are my opposite number among your people. If you were not in possession of excellent qualities, you would not be aware of my virtues; but you do know that I am the man destined to conquer this land. I am seeking against you the help of so-and-so and so-and-so and so-and-so (he mentioned some of Arṭabūn's aides); read my letter to them and let them look into what is between me and you."

697. Probably meaning that he will be able to start the battle, having exhausted all other options.

[2401] The envoy set out in accordance with ʿAmr's orders. He came to Arṭabūn and gave him the letter in the presence of some people, and Arṭabūn read the letter aloud. They laughed and wondered; then they approached Arṭabūn, saying: "From what source do you know that he is not the man destined to conquer this land?" Arṭabūn said: "The name of the man destined to do it is ʿUmar. It is written with three letters."[698] The envoy returned to ʿAmr, who understood now that the man was ʿUmar. He wrote to ʿUmar, asking his help and saying: "I am conducting a difficult and fierce war and [struggling for] a land that has been held and preserved for you. I desire your opinion." When ʿAmr wrote to ʿUmar about this, ʿUmar knew that he was speaking out of knowledge. He summoned the people, set out with them, and camped at al-Jābiyah.[699]

All in all ʿUmar went to Syria four times. The first time he rode a horse; the second time he rode a camel; the third time he failed to reach Syria because the plague was raging, and the fourth time he entered Syria on a donkey.

ʿUmar appointed [ʿAlī to govern Medina in his stead].[700] At the [2402] time of his departure [from Medina] for the first time he wrote to the amīrs of the provinces and instructed them to meet him at al-Jābiyah on a day which he specified for them. He instructed them to come with light cavalry (mujarradah)[701] and to appoint deputies to govern their provinces. They met him where al-Jābiyah came into view. The first man to meet him was Yazīd, then Abū ʿUbaydah, and then Khālid. They were riding on horses and were clad in brocade and silk. ʿUmar dismounted, took stones in his hand, and pelted them. He said: "How quickly were you turned away from your senses! Is it me that you are coming to meet in this attire?[702] You 698. The name ʿUmar consists of three letters in the Arabic script, whereas the name ʿAmr consists of four.

699. See note 487, above.

700. I have augmented Ṭabarī's cryptic text here, in light of (ʿI.) Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 389, and the tradition adduced in note g to this page in the Leiden edition.

701. See note 63, above.

702. Knowing ʿUmar's austere demeanor. For a different description of ʿUmar's meeting with his silk-clad commanders, see Kūfī, Futūḥ, I, 295.

have been eating well for two years. How quickly has gluttony led you astray! By God, if you did this at the head of two hundred men, I would have replaced you with others." They replied: "O Commander of the Faithful, these are coats, and we have our weapons with us." ʿUmar said: "It is all right, then," and he rode on till he entered al-Jābiyah. ʿAmr and Shuraḥbīl were at that time in Ajnādayn and did not move from their place.

The Conquest of Jerusalem

According to Sālim b. ʿAbdallāh: When ʿUmar reached al-Jābiyah, a Jew said to him: "O Commander of the Faithful, you will not return to your country before God has granted you victory over Jerusalem." While in al-Jābiyah ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb saw an approaching detachment of horsemen. When they came close, they drew their swords, but ʿUmar said: "These are people who are coming to seek an assurance of safety. Grant it to them." They drew near and it became clear that they were people from Jerusalem. They made peace with ʿUmar on the condition that they would pay the poll tax and opened up Jerusalem for him. When ʿUmar was granted victory over Jerusalem, he summoned that same Jew, and it was said to him: "He is, indeed, in possession of knowledge." ʿUmar asked the Jew about the false Messiah, for he was wont to ask about him a great deal. The Jew said to him: "What are you asking about him, O Commander of the Faithful? You, the Arabs, will kill him ten odd cubits in front of the gate of Lydda."[703] [2403]

According to Sālim: When ʿUmar entered Syria, a Jew from Damascus met him and said: "Peace be upon you, O Fārūq! You are the master of Jerusalem. By God, you will not return before God conquers Jerusalem!"[704]

---

703. For the killing of al-Dajjāl in the eschatological struggle between him and the true Messiah near the gate of Lydda, see Ibn Mājah, Sunan, II, 1361 (Kitāb al-fitan, bāb 36).

704. For a very different version of the prediction of the conquest of Palestine by the Muslims, see Kūfī, Futūḥ, I, 296–97. For an analysis of the differences between the two versions, see Crone, Slaves, 207–8 n. 60.

Regarding ʿUmar's epithet al-Fārūq, the Sunni Muslim tradition maintains that ʿUmar was so named because he knew the distinction between truth and falsehood (farraqa bayna al-ḥaqq wa al-bāṭil). See Ibn al-Jawzī, Manāqib, 19. See also now S. Bashear, "The Title 'Fārūq.'"

[The people of Jerusalem] caused distress to ʿAmr and he caused distress to them, but he could not conquer Jerusalem, nor could he conquer al-Ramlah.

While ʿUmar was camping in al-Jābiyah, the Muslims seized their weapons in alarm. ʿUmar asked: "What is it?", and they replied: "Do you not see the horsemen and the swords?" ʿUmar looked and saw a detachment of horsemen brandishing their swords. He said: "They are seeking an assurance of safety. Do not be afraid, but grant it to them." They granted them an assurance of safety and [it became clear that] these were people from Jerusalem. They gave to ʿUmar ... [705] and asked him to give them in writing [the peace terms] for Jerusalem and its region and for al-Ramlah and its region. Palestine was divided into two parts: one part was with the people of Jerusalem, and the other with the people of al-Ramlah. The people of Palestine were [organized in] ten provinces, and Palestine was equal to Syria in its entirety.

The Jew witnessed the conclusion of the peace treaty. ʿUmar asked him about the false Messiah. The Jew said: "He is from the sons of Benjamin. By God, you Arabs will kill him ten odd cubits from the gate of Lydda."

[2404] According to Khālid and ʿUbādah: The peace treaty concerning Palestine was concluded by the populace of Jerusalem and al-Ramlah. The reason for this was that Arṭabūn and al-Tadhāriq had left for Egypt when ʿUmar came to al-Jābiyah; they were subsequently killed in one of the summer expeditions.

It was said that the reason for ʿUmar's coming to Syria was the following: Abū ʿUbaydah besieged Jerusalem. Its people asked him to conclude peace with them on the conditions of the Syrian cities and asked that ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb be responsible for the treaty. Abū ʿUbaydah wrote to ʿUmar about it, and ʿUmar made the journey from Medina.

According to ʿAdī b. Sahl: When the Muslims of Syria asked ʿUmar to help them against the people of Palestine, he appointed ʿAlī as his deputy and set out to reinforce them. ʿAlī said: "Where [2405] are going by yourself? You are heading toward a rabid enemy." ʿUmar said: "I hasten to fight the enemy before the death of al-ʿAbbās. If you lose al-ʿAbbās, evil will untwist you like the ends of a rope." ʿAmr and Shuraḥbīl joined ʿUmar in al-Jābiyah when the peace [with the people of Palestine] was concluded. They witnessed the writing [of the treaty].

705. The object of the verb is missing. The Leiden editor's suggestion is that a word like "obedience" (ṭāʿah) or "poll tax" (jizyah) was omitted.

According to Khālid and ʿUbādah: ʿUmar made peace with the people of Jerusalem in al-Jābiyah. He wrote for them the peace conditions. He wrote one[706] letter to all the provinces [of Palestine] except to the people of Jerusalem:[707]

> In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. This is the assurance of safety (amān) which the servant of God, ʿUmar, the Commander of the Faithful, has granted to the people of Jerusalem. He has given them an assurance of safety for themselves, for their property, their churches, their crosses, the sick and the healthy of the city,[708] and for all the rituals that belong to their religion. Their churches will not be inhabited [by Muslims] and will not be destroyed. Neither they, nor the land on which they stand, nor their cross,[709] nor their property will be damaged. They will not be forcibly converted. No Jew will live with them in Jerusalem. The people of Jerusalem must pay the poll tax like the people of the [other] cities, and they must expel the Byzantines and the robbers.[710] As for those who will leave the city, their lives and property will be safe until they reach their place of safety; and as for those who remain, they will be safe. They will have to pay the poll tax like the people of Jerusalem. Those of the people of Jerusalem who want to leave with the Byzantines, take their property, and abandon [2406]

706. In the sense of "identical"; see the phrase introducing the letter to the people of Lydda, p. 2406, below.

707. The people of Jerusalem received a different letter, which follows here.

708. See note 225, above.

709. Busse ("ʿOmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb," 114–15) suggests that this is a reference to the "true cross," taken by the Persians during their invasion of 614 and returned to Jerusalem by Heraclius in 629; cf. Ostrogorsky, History, 95, 104; de Goeje (Mémoire, 153) and Fattal (Le statut, 45) translate as if ṣalīb were in the plural, like ṣulbān above.

710. Ṭabarī has luṣūt (sg. liṣt) for the usual Arabic luṣūṣ (sg. liṣṣ). According to Ibn Manẓūr (Lisān al-ʿArab, s.v. l-ṣ-t), this is the form of the word in the dialect of Ṭayyiʾ. For the connection between liṣṣ and the Aramaic liṭim, see Fraenkel, Fremdwörter, 284.

their churches and their crosses will be safe[711] until they reach their place of safety. Those villagers (ahl al-arḍ) who were in Jerusalem before the killing of so-and-so[712] may remain in the city if they wish, but they must pay the poll tax like the people of Jerusalem. Those who wish may go with the Byzantines, and and those who wish may return to their families. Nothing will be taken from them before their harvest is reaped. If they pay the poll tax according to their obligations, then the contents of this letter are under the covenant of God, are the responsibility of His Prophet, of the caliphs, and of the faithful. The persons who attest to it are Khālid b. al-Walīd, ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣī, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf,[713] and Muʿāwiyah b. Abī Sufyān. This letter was written and prepared in the year 15/636–37.

The rest of the letters were identical to the letter of Lydda [which follows]:

In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. This is what the servant of God, ʿUmar, the Commander of the [2407] Faithful, awarded to the people of Lydda and to all the people of Palestine who are in the same category. He gave them an assurance of safety for themselves, for their property, their churches, their crosses, their sick and their healthy, and all their rites. Their churches will not be inhabited [by the Muslims] and will not be destroyed. Neither their churches, nor the land where they stand, nor their rituals, nor their crosses, nor their property will be damaged. They will not be forcibly converted, and none of them will be harmed. The people of Lydda and those of the people of Palestine who are in the same category must pay the poll tax like the people of the Syrian cities. The same conditions, in their entirety, apply to them if they leave (Lydda).

He then sent to them [an army] and divided Palestine between two

711. I have omitted here the words ʿalā biyaʿihim wa-ṣulubihim, "their churches and crosses [will be safe]"; this does not make sense in this place. Cf. de Goeje, Mémoire, 153 n. 2.

712. The meaning of these words is not clear; cf. de Goeje, Mémoire, 153 n. 3. They are missing in the text of the letter included in Suyūṭī, Itḥāf, I, 233.

713. See note 4, above.

men; he put ʿAlqamah b. Ḥakīm in charge of one half and stationed him in al-Ramlah, and he put ʿAlqamah b. Mujazziz in charge of the other half and stationed him in Jerusalem. Each of them stayed in his province with the soldiers who were with him.

According to Sālim: [ʿUmar] appointed ʿAlqamah b. Mujazziz governor of Jerusalem and appointed ʿAlqamah b. al-Ḥakīm governor of al-Ramlah. He placed the soldiers who were with ʿAmr (b. al-ʿĀsī) at their disposal. He ordered ʿAmr and Shuraḥbīl to join him in al-Jābiyah. When they reached al-Jābiyah, they found ʿUmar riding. They kissed his knee, and ʿUmar embraced them, holding them to his chest.

According to ʿUbādah and Khālid: Having sent the assurance of safety to the people of Jerusalem and having stationed the army there, ʿUmar set out from al-Jābiyah to Jerusalem. He saw that his horse had injuries on its hooves. So he dismounted, and a jade was brought to him and he rode it. The jade shook him, however, so ʿUmar dismounted, hit the jade's face with his mantle, and said: "May God make ugly him who taught you this!" Then he called for his horse to be brought to him, after he had left him unridden for a few days, and treated his hooves. He mounted his horse and rode until he reached Jerusalem.

According to Abū Ṣafiyyah, an elder from Banū Shaybān: When ʿUmar came to Syria, he was brought a jade and rode it. The jade moved in an unstable manner, inclining from side to side. ʿUmar dismounted, hit the jade's face, and said: "May God not teach him [2408] who taught you this sort of pride!" He had not ridden a jade before that or after that.

Jerusalem and its entire region were conquered by ʿUmar, except for Ajnādayn, which was conquered by ʿAmr (b. al-ʿĀṣi), and Caesarea, which was conquered by Muʿāwiyah (b. Abī Sufyān).

According to Abū ʿUthmān and Abū Ḥārithah: Jerusalem and its region were conquered in the month of Rabīʿ al-Ākhir of the year 16/May 637.

According to Abū Maryam, the client of Salāmah, who said: I witnessed the conquest of Jerusalem with ʿUmar: He set out from al-Jābiyah, leaving it behind until he came to Jerusalem. He then went on and entered the mosque.[714] Then he went on toward the miḥrāb of David,[715] while we were with him; he entered it, recited the prostration of David,[716] and prostrated himself, and we prostrated ourselves with him.

714. Al-masjid refers in this context to the Temple Mount, in keeping with the

According to Rajāʾ b. Ḥaywah—persons who were present at the event: When ʿUmar came from al-Jābiyah to Jerusalem and drew near the gate of the mosque,[717] he said: "Watch out for Kaʿb on my behalf!"[718] When the gate was opened for him, he said: "O God, I am ready to serve you in what you love most." Then he turned to the miḥrāb, the miḥrāb of David, peace be upon him. It was at night, and he prayed there.[719] It was not long before dawn broke, and then ʿUmar ordered the muʾadhdhin to sound the call for prayer.[720] Then he moved forward, led the prayer, and recited Sūrat Ṣād[721] with the people. During the prayer he prostrated himself. Then he stood up and read with them in the second (rakʿah) the beginning of Sūrat Banī Isrāʾīl.[722] Then he prayed another rakʿah and went away. He said: "Bring Kaʿb to me." Kaʿb was brought to him. ʿUmar said: "Where do you think we should establish the place of prayer?" Kaʿb most current interpretation of Qurʾān 17:1, which identifies al-masjid al-aqṣā, "the farthest mosque," with Jerusalem. Cf. Busse, "ʿOmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb," 83.

---

715. For a discussion of the possible meanings of miḥrāb Dāwūd, the citadel of David near the Jaffa gate, on the northwestern corner of the old city of Jerusalem or a place on the Temple Mount itself, see Busse, "ʿOmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb," 79–83; Busse, "ʿOmar's Image," 165–66.

716. Qurʾān 38:21–25, where David prostrates himself, repents, and asks God to forgive him.

717. Masjid is used here in the sense of the whole ḥaram area; a mosque was not yet in existence. I am indebted to my colleague Dr. A. Elʿad for this note.

718. Kaʿb al-Aḥbār was a Yemenite Jew who converted to Islam during the reign of Abū Bakr or ʿUmar and was considered an important transmitter of Jewish traditions into Islamic lore. See Wolfensohn, Kaʿb al-Aḥbār. Numerous traditions transmitted by him have been assembled and analyzed in Kister, "Ḥaddithū ʿan banī Isrāʾīl." See also *EI*², s.v. "Kaʿb al-Aḥbār" (M. Schmitz).

719. Busse maintains that, in this tradition, miḥrāb Dāwūd refers to the citadel of David. He suggests that ʿUmar's night prayer is a reflection of a Christian custom of praying there at night. See "ʿOmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb," 84; Busse, "ʿOmar's Image," 166.

720. The tradition uses the word iqāmah, which signifies the second call to prayer, pronounced in the mosque immediately before the service begins. See *EI*², s.vv. "Adhān" (Th. W. Juynboll), "Iḳāma" (Th. W. Juynboll).

721. Qurʾān 38.

722. Qurʾān 17, known also as Sūrat al-isrāʾ, "the nocturnal journey." The "further mosque" in the first verse of this sūrah is usually understood as referring to Jerusalem. The verse reads "Glory be to Him, Who carried His servant by night from the Holy Mosque to the Further Mosque the precincts of which We have blessed, that We may show him some of Our signs." (Arberry's translation) said: "Toward the Rock."[723] ʿUmar said: "O Kaʿb, you are imitating the Jewish religion! I have seen you taking off your shoes." Kaʿb said: "I wanted to touch this ground with my feet." ʿUmar said: "I have seen you. Nay, we shall place the qiblah in the front of it; the Messenger of God likewise made the front part of our mosques the qiblah.[724] Take care of your own affairs; we were not commanded to venerate the Rock, but we were commanded to venerate the Kaʿbah."

ʿUmar made the front part of the mosque its qiblah. Then he stood up from his place of prayer and went to the rubbish in which [2409] the Romans buried the temple (bayt al-maqdis) at the time of the sons of Israel. (When he came to the Byzantines, they had uncovered a part but left the rest [under the rubbish].) He said: "O people, do what I am doing."[725] He knelt in the midst of the rubbish and put it by the handful into the lower part of his mantle.[726] He heard behind him the proclamation "God is most great!" He disliked improper behavior[727] in any matter and said: "What is this?" The people said:

---

723. The tradition as it appears in Ṭabarī is not very clear and has to be understood in light of a fuller version which can be found in Suyūṭī, Itḥāf, I, 236–37. It reads: "Umar said to Kaʿb: 'Where do you think we should place the mosque?' Or he said: '... the direction of prayer?' Kaʿb said: 'Place the mosque behind the Rock, so that the two directions of prayer—that of Moses and that of Muḥammad—merge with one another'" (fa-qāla ʿUmar li-Kaʿb: ayna tarā an najʿala al-masjida? aw qāla: al-qiblata. fa-qāla: ijʿalhu khalfa al-ṣakhrati fa-tajtamiʿu al-qiblatāni qiblatu Mūsā wa-qiblatu Muḥammad...) In our version Kaʿb responds to ʿUmar's question about the direction of prayer, which is not mentioned in Ṭabarī's text.

See additional sources for this tradition in Wāsiṭī, Faḍāʾil, 45–46. See also Kister, "Three Mosques," 194, for another tradition forbidding the combination of the two directions of prayer. It has to be kept in mind, however, that Muslim tradition has also preserved material that treats the Rock in a much more positive way; see, for instance, Wāsiṭī, Faḍāʾil, 67ff.

It is noteworthy that the idea of combining the qiblah of Jerusalem with that of Mecca can be found also in the traditions describing the customs of the Prophet himself. While still in Mecca, before the hijrah, he is said to have prayed "facing Syria, placing the Kaʿbah between himself and Syria" (wa-kāna idhā ṣallā istaqbala al-Shām wa-jaʿala al Kaʿbah baynahu wa-bayna al-Shām). See Ibn Hishām, Sīrat, 228 (= Guillaume, Life of Muḥammad, 157–58), Maqdisī, Faḍāʾil, 54. For the qiblah in general, see *EI*², s.v. "Ḳibla. i" (A. J. Wensinck).

724. The front part of the mosque seems to mean here the southern part of the Temple Mount. The believers pray facing the south, with their backs toward the Rock.

725. Cf. Busse, "ʿOmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb," 87–88.

726. For this meaning of farj, see de Goeje's Glossary, s.vv. farj, birka. Al-Wāsiṭī (Faḍāʾil, 78) has mala'a asfala thawbihi min al-mazbalah.

727. The impropriety seems to lie in proclaiming God's greatness while dealing with rubbish.

"Kaʿb proclaimed 'God is most great!' and the people proclaimed it following him." ʿUmar said: "Bring him to me!" Kaʿb said: "O Commander of the Faithful, five hundred years ago a prophet predicted what you have done today." ʿUmar asked: "In what way?" Kaʿb said:

> The Byzantines (Rūm) attacked the sons of Israel, were given victory over them, and buried the temple. Then they were given another victory, but they did not attend to the temple until the Persians attacked them. The Persians oppressed the sons of Israel. Later the Byzantines were given victory over the Persians. Then you came to rule. God sent a prophet to the [city buried in] rubbish and said: "Rejoice O Jerusalem (Ūrī shalam)![728] Al-Fārūq[729] will come to you and cleanse you." Another prophet was sent to Constantinople. He stood on a hill belonging to the city and said: "O Constantinople, what did your people do to My House? They ruined it, presented you as if you were similar to My throne and made interpretations contrary to My purpose.[730] I have determined to make you one day unfortified (and defenseless).[731] Nobody will seek shelter from you, nor rest in your shade. [I shall make you unfortified] at the hands of Banū al-Qādhir, Sabā, and Waddān."[732]

By the time it was evening nothing remained of the rubbish.

An identical tradition was transmitted according to Rabīʿah al-Shāmī. He added: "Al-Fārūq came to you with my obedient army. They will take revenge upon the Byzantines on behalf of your people." Regarding Constantinople he said: "I shall leave you unforti-

---

728. The use of this unusual form, rather than the common Iliyā or Bayt al-Maqdis, is intended to enhance the air of authenticity that the tradition seeks to infuse into this prophecy.

729. See note 704, above.

730. This meaning of taʾawwalū ʿalayya, which is close to that suggested by Busse ("ʿOmar b. al-Khaṭṭab," 92), seems better than that in Blachère et al., Dictionnaire, I, 307b.

731. Ibn Manẓūr (Lisān al-ʿArab, s.v. j-l-ḥ) quotes a different version of this tradition and explains jalḥāʾ as "having no fort." The basic significance of the root is baldness; hence it came to mean a bull without horns that he can use to defend himself, thus qaryah jalḥāʾ, a city without a fort as means of defense.

732. See Ezekiel 27:19–22. Busse ("ʿOmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb," 92 n. 72) suggests reading Dedan, mentioned in Ezekiel together with Qedar and Sheva, instead of Waddān.

fied and exposed to the sun; nobody will seek shelter from you, and you will not cast your shade on anyone."[733]

According to Anas b. Mālik:

> I was present in Jerusalem with ʿUmar. While he was giving food to the people one day, a monk from Jerusalem came to him without knowing that wine had been prohibited. The monk said: "Do you want a drink which will be permissible according to our books [even] when wine is prohibited?" [2410]

ʿUmar asked him to bring it and said: "From what has it been prepared?" The monk informed him that he had cooked it from juice until only one-third of it remained. ʿUmar dipped his finger into it, then stirred it in the vessel, divided it into two halves, and said: "This is syrup (ṭilā')." He likened it to resin (qaṭirān), drank from it, and ordered the amīrs of the Syrian provinces to prepare it. He wrote to the newly established garrison towns (amṣār), saying: "I have been brought a beverage cooked from juice until two-thirds of it were gone and one-third remained. It is like syrup. Cook it and provide it to the Muslims."[734]

According to Abū ʿUthmān and Abū Ḥārithah: Arṭabūn went to Egypt when ʿUmar came to al-Jābiyah. Those who rejected the peace agreement and wanted [to go with him] joined him. Then, when the people of Egypt made a peace agreement [with the Muslims] and defeated the Byzantines, he took to the sea and survived afterward. He commanded the summer expeditions of the Byzantines and con-

---

733. Cf. Wolfensohn, Kaʿb al-Aḥbār, 27–28.

734. In this tradition ʿUmar is described as giving legitimacy to a beverage that may be problematic because of its affinity with wine. Although the method of preparation does not indicate that the beverage contained alcohol, it is noteworthy that the Muslim tradition preserved prophetic utterances in which ṭilā' is understood as a euphemism for wine. See Abū Dāwūd, Sunan, III, 450 (and Ibn Ḥanbal, Musnad, V, 342): "'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ghanm entered upon us, and we discussed ṭilā'. He said: Abū Mālik al-Ashʿarī told me that he had heard the Prophet saying: 'People from my community will drink wine, calling it by another name.'" For a more outspoken version, see Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-ʿArab, s.v. ṭ-l-y: "'People from my community will drink wine and call it by another name,' meaning that they will drink intoxicating cooked date wine (nabīdh) and call it a 'syrup' (ṭilā'), because of their unwillingness to call it 'wine' (khamr)."

For traditions stating that two-thirds of the juice must evaporate in cooking before it becomes permissible for the Muslims, see Nasā'ī, Sunan, VIII, 328–31, Kūfī, Futūḥ, I, 298. See also Mālik b. Anas, Muwaṭṭa', II, 847 (Kitāb al-ashribah, 14), for a tradition very similar to that reported by Ṭabarī.

fronted the commander of the Muslim summer expeditions. Arṭabūn and a man from the tribe of Qays, whose name was Ḍurays, exchanged blows,[735] and Arṭabūn cut the Qaysī's hand.[736] The Qaysī killed him and recited:

Though Arṭabūn of the Byzantines maimed my hand, there is still some use to it, praise be to God.
Two fingers and a stump,[737] with which I hold straight the front part of the spear when people are struck with fear.[738]
Though Arṭabūn of the Byzantines cut my hand,
 I left his limbs cut to pieces, in return.

Ziyād b. Ḥanẓalah recited:

I remembered the long wars against the Byzantines, when we spent a year full of journeys.
[2411] When we were in the land of Ḥijāz and a month's journey separated us,[739] with anxieties in between;
When Arṭabūn of the Byzantines defended his country,
 a noble chieftain tackled him here and struggled with him;
When al-Fārūq saw that the time [was right] for the conquest of Arṭabūn's land, he brought forward God's soldiers to attack him.
When they became aware of al-Fārūq and feared his assault, they came to him and said: "You are of those whom we shall befriend."
Syria threw its buried treasures at his feet,[740]

---

735. Ṭabarī has fa-yakhtalifu huwa wa-rajulun mim Qays. I have translated according to a parallel version of the story in Tibrīzī's commentary on Abū Tammām, Ḥamāsah, I, 239, where the Muslim warrior is ʿAbdallāh b. Ṣabrah and the text reads: fa-'khtalafa huwa wa-ʿAbdallāh ḍarbatayni. See also Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, V, 11–12 no. 6177, 89 no. 6327. For another occurrence of this idiom, see Sarakhsī, Sharḥ al-siyar, I, 174.

736. The rest of the story and the following poem indicate that he cut off only three fingers.

737. Reading judhmūr instead of jurmūz. This version of the verse, attributed to ʿAbdallāh b. Ṣabrah, can be found in Tibrīzī's commentary on Abū Tammām, Ḥamāsah, I, 239. See also Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-ʿArab, s.v. j-dh-m-r. On ʿAbdallāh b. Ṣabrah, who is counted among the "brigands" (futtāk) of Islam, see Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, V, 89; Ibn Ḥabīb, Muḥabbar, 222–26.

738. Meaning that he is still capable of defending his people despite the injury that Arṭabūn inflicted upon him.

739. Presumably from the Byzantines.

740. It is noteworthy that similar descriptions of the earth's throwing up its buried as well as a life of abundance with countless gains.[741]

He put whatever was between east and west at our disposal, as inheritance for posterity, gathered by his two-humped camels.[742]
Many a beast of burden that had been unable to carry its load, [now] carried a burden while being well into pregnancy.[743]

Ziyād b. Ḥanẓalah also recited:

When ʿUmar received the letters,[744] he rose like a proud, young chieftain defending the property of the tribe.
The land of Syria was bursting with people, desiring the most courageous of men.
When he received (the information) that he received, he responded with an army to which dissensions bowed their heads.[745] Spacious Syria brought what Abū Ḥafṣ[746] wanted, and even more.
He allotted among them the poll tax, and every pleasant and commendable gift.

The Introduction of the Pay System (ʿaṭāʾ)[747] and of the Military Register (dīwān)[748]

In this year ʿUmar assigned payments to the Muslims and established the [military] registers. He determined the payments accord-treasures can be found in the chapters of Muslim tradition dealing with the miraculous events expected to occur immediately before the Day of Judgment: "Earth will throw up oblong pieces of gold and silver, having the size of a column" (taqīʾu al-arḍ aflādha kabidihā amthāl al-usṭuwān min al-dhahab wa al-fiḍḍah). See Muslim, Ṣaḥīḥ, II, 701 (Kitāb al-zakāt, bāb 18:62); Tirmidhī, Sunan, IV, 362 (Kitāb al-fitan, bāb 36:2209). See also Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-ʿArab, s.v. th-q-l, where aflādh kabidihā is glossed by kunūz. Although one should not read too much into this similarity, it is an indication of the tremendous impression that the newly acquired wealth made on the early Muslims.

---

741. For this meaning of maʾkal, pl. maʾākil, see Jawharī, Tāj al-lughah, III, 1365, who glosses maʾkal by kasb.

742. I am translating according to de Goeje's suggestion in Glossary, s.v. qarmal: thabathā instead of banathā.

743. The translation of this verse is tentative and uncertain.

744. Probably meaning letters that bear the news of victory.

745. While de Goeje's suggestion in Glossary (s.v. sh-b-k), on which my translation is based, is not very convincing, I am at present not able to provide a better one.

746. This is ʿUmar's kunyah; cf. Ibn al-Jawzī, Manāqib, 9.

747. See *EI*², s.v. "ʿAṭā" (Cl. Cahen).

748. See *EI*², s.v. "Dīwān i" (A. A. Duri).

ing to seniority [in Islam].[749] He gave to Ṣafwān b. Umayyah,[750] al-[2412] Ḥārith b. Hishām,[751] and Suhayl b. ʿAmr[752] with the people of the conquest (ahl al-fatḥ)[753] less than what those who had preceded them received. They refused to accept it, saying: "We do not acknowledge that anybody is more noble than we are." ʿUmar replied: "I have given to you according to your seniority in Islam, not according to your ancestral nobility." They said: "It is all right, then," and they accepted the payment. Al-Ḥārith and Suhayl left for Syria with their families and continued to wage jihād until they were killed in one of the frontier points there; but according to another tradition, they died in the plague of ʿAmwās.[754]

---

749. Meaning that the payments were determined according to the date on which the person in question embraced the new religion: Those who joined Islam at the earliest date received the largest amount.

750. Ṣafwān b. Umayyah was a prominent member of Quraysh. His father was killed in the battle of Badr, fighting on the side of the Meccans. Ṣafwān also fought in skirmishes against the Muslims and embraced Islam only after the conquest of Mecca. He was given a share in the spoils of the battle of Ḥunayn and became one of the mu'allafah qulūbuhum "those whose hearts have been reconciled" (i.e., to Islam, by means of gifts). According to some traditions, Ṣafwān participated in the battle of Yarmūk; according to others, there is no evidence that he ever took part in any battle on the side of the Muslims. He died in Shawwāl 36/March–April 657 (or in 41/661–62, or 42/662–63). See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 332 and index; (ʿI.) Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, III, 22–23; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 432–34; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 424–25.

751. Al-Ḥārith b. Hishām was a prominent member of the Qurashī clan of Makhzūm. He fought against the Muslims in the battles of Badr and Uḥud. He embraced Islam after the conquest of Mecca, participated in the battle of Ḥunayn, and received a share in the spoils. Later he took part in the battles of Fiḥl and Ajnādayn against the Byzantines. According to some traditions, he was killed in the battle of Yarmūk; according to others, he died in the plague of ʿAmwās in 18/639–40. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 329; VII/ii, 126; (ʿI.) Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, I, 351–52; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 605–8 no. 1506; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 161–62.

752. Suhayl b. ʿAmr was a leading member of Quraysh. He fought against the Muslims in the battle of Badr, was taken prisoner, and was ransomed by his tribe. He was the person who negotiated the treaty of Ḥudaybiyyah with the Prophet. After the conquest of Mecca he switched sides; he took part in the battle of Ḥunayn on the side of the Prophet, though he was still a polytheist. He embraced Islam after this battle and became one of the mu'allafah qulūbuhum. After the Prophet's death he urged Quraysh to embrace Islam. Despite his late conversion, he became a pious and devout Muslim; he fought against the Byzantines in Syria and died in the plague of ʿAmwās (or in the battle of Yarmūk). See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 335 and index; (ʿI.) Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 371–73; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 212–15 no. 3575; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 264–5.

753. Those who embraced Islam only after the conquest of Mecca in 8/630 and did not join the Prophet in the earliest and most difficult period of his activity.

754. A notorious plague that struck Syria and Palestine in the year 18/639–40. See EI², s.v. "ʿAmwās" (J. Sourdel-Thomine); Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 139; Donner, Conquests, 152.

When ʿUmar intended to establish the military register, ʿAlī and ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf[755] said to him: "Begin with yourself!" He said: "No, I shall rather begin with the uncle of the messenger of God, then the next and the next."[756] First he determined the share of al-ʿAbbās. Then he allotted to the participants in the battle of Badr[757] five thousand [dirhams] each. Then he allotted to those [who embraced Islam] after the battle of Badr and till al-Ḥudaybiyyah[758] four thousand each. Then he allotted to those [who embraced Islam] after al-Ḥudaybiyyah and up to the time when Abū Bakr finished the war with the people of apostasy (ahl al-riddah) three thousand each. Among them were those who participated in the conquest of Mecca, those who fought for Abū Bakr, and those who participated in the battles (of Iraq and Syria) before al-Qādisiyyah. All these received three thousand each. Then he allotted to the people of al-Qādisiyyah and to those who fought in Syria [after the battle of al-Qādisiyyah] two thousand each. To the people of outstanding bravery from among them he allotted two thousand and five hundred each. It was said to him: "Would you make the people of al-Qādisiyyah equal to those who had fought in the previous battles?"[759] He replied: "I am not in a position to make them equal with those whose rank they had not attained." It was also said to him: "But you have already made those who live far [from the battlefield] equal to those who live close and fought in defense of their homes." He replied: "Those who live close deserve more because they provided assistance in pursuit and constituted an obstruction for the enemy. And did the Emigrants not say the same when we made them equal with the Helpers? The assistance provided by the Helpers was near their homes, and the Emigrants came to them from far away." [2413]

ʿUmar allotted to those [who embraced Islam and joined the Muslim army] after al-Qādisiyyah and al-Yarmūk[760] one thousand [dirhams] each. Then he allotted to the second group of latecomers[761]

755. See note 4, above.

756. In kinship with the Prophet.

757. The first and victorious battle of the Prophet against the Meccans in 2/634. See *EI*², s.v. "Badr" (W. Montgomery Watt).

758. A famous treaty that the Prophet concluded with the Meccans in 6/628. See *EI*², s.v. "al-Ḥudaybiyya" (W. Montgomery Watt).

759. See p. 2343, above.

760. For the battle of Yarmūk, see Donner, Conquests, 129ff.

761. Rawādif, sg. rādifah. For a discussion of this concept, see Donner, Conquests, 231ff.

five hundred each; and to the third group[762] three hundred each. Members of each group received equal payment, whether they were strong or weak, Arabs or non-Arabs. To the fourth group he allotted two hundred and fifty dirhams. He allotted to those who came after them, i.e., the people of Hajar[763] and the Christians of al-Ḥīrah (al-ʿIbād),[764] two hundred dirhams. He made four persons who had not participated in the battle of Badr equal to the participants: al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn,[765] Abū Dharr,[766] and Salmān. He allotted to al-ʿAbbās twenty-five thousand dirhams, but according to another tradition, twelve thousand.

He gave to the wives of the Prophet ten thousand dirhams each, except those who were slave girls.[767] The Prophet's wives said: "The Prophet did not prefer us to them in the division of his time; make us all equal!"[768] ʿUmar agreed. He gave ʿĀ'ishah two thousand dirhams more than to the others because the Prophet loved her,[769] but she did not accept that. He allotted to the wives of the participants in the battle of Badr five hundred dirhams each; to the wives of those who came after them, till al-Ḥudaybiyyah, four hundred each; to the wives of those who came after them, till the battles of Iraq and Syria,

---

762. Omitting baʿdahum "who came after them."

763. Hajar was a town in Baḥrayn, in eastern Arabia. See EI[1], s.v. "Hadjar" (Fr. Buhl); EI[2], s.v. "al-Ḥasā" (E. S. Vidal). For the emigration from Hajar to Iraq, see EI[2], s.v. "ʿAbd al-Ḳays" (W. Caskel); Morony, Iraq, 241.

764. Presumably after they embraced Islam. For another interpretation of al-ʿibād, see Donner, Conquests, 233 n. 65.

765. Al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn were the sons of Fāṭimah and ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib and grandsons of the Prophet.

766. Abū Dharr al-Ghifārī was a Companion of the Prophet and is considered in the tradition to be one of the first believers. See EI[2], s.v. "Abū Dharr" (J. Robson).

767. Man jarā ʿalayhā al-milk has to be understood in light of Qur'ān 4:4: "Marry such women as seem good to you, two, three, four; but, if you fear you will not be equitable, then only one or what your right hand owns" (aw man malakat aymānukum). This phrase is normally understood as a reference to slave girls taken captive in war. Balādhurī (Futūḥ, 455) records a tradition according to which ʿUmar allotted to Juwayriyyah (bt. al-Ḥārith) and Ṣafiyyah bt. Ḥuyayy b. Akhṭab only 6,000 dirhams (as against 12,000 for the free wives) because they were "part of the booty that God had restored to His prophet" (mimmā afāʾa Allāh ʿalā rasūlihi). Cf. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 83 l. 22, 153 l. 14, 158 l. 3, where these and other slave girls whom the Prophet married are described in similar terms.

768. The question of how the Prophet divided his time among his wives is discussed in Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 121–24.

769. Cf. Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 454; on the Prophet's relationship with ʿĀ'ishah, see Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 39ff.

three hundred each; to the wives of the people of al-Qādisiyyah two hundred each. He made the women after that equal, and he allotted to the boys one hundred dirhams each, equally.[770] Then he gathered sixty poor people and gave them bread to eat; they calculated what they ate and found that it was more than two jarības.[771] ʿUmar [2414] allotted to each of them and to his family two jarības per month. ʿUmar said before his death: "I planned to make the payments four thousand dirhams each: a man would give one thousand to his family; one thousand he would take with him [while traveling]; for one thousand he would equip himself;[772] and for one thousand he would equip his home (yataraffaqu bihā)."[773] But ʿUmar died before he could implement this.

Abū Jaʿfar al-Ṭabarī has said: According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Muhallab, Ziyād, Mujālid, and ʿAmr — al-Shaʿbī; and Ismāʿīl — al-Ḥasan and Abū Ḍamrah — ʿAbdallāh b. al-Mustawrid — Muḥammad b. Sīrīn and Yaḥyā b. Saʿīd — Saʿīd b. al-Musayyab and al-Mustanīr b. Yazīd — Ibrāhīm and Zuhrah — Abū Salamah: When ʿUmar allotted the payments, he allotted them to the people entitled to share in the immovable booty (ahl al-faʾ) to whom God had restored it. These were the people of al-Madāʾin who moved to al-Kūfah, al-Baṣrah, Damascus, Ḥimṣ, Jordan, Palestine, and Egypt. He said: "The booty belongs to the people of the newly established garrison towns (amṣār) and to those who joined them, gave them assistance and stayed with them. It was not allotted to others. Is it not true that the cities and the villages were populated by them, that the peace treaties were administered by them, the poll tax was paid to them, that they made the frontier safe and that they subdued the enemy?" Then ʿUmar wrote a letter instructing that the payments be given to those who were entitled to them in one sum, in the year 15/636–37. Somebody said: "O Commander of the Faithful, would you leave in the treasury provisions for some [unexpected] eventuality?" ʿUmar said: "This is a sentence which Satan

770. Probably meaning that the allottment for the boys was determined without regard to the time when their fathers had embraced Islam and joined the Muslim army.

771. See Hinz, Masse, 38.

772. Presumably with military equipment.

773. Cf. Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 451, where the 4,000 dirhams are divided as follows: for traveling, for weapons, for the family, and for the horse and the shoes.

threw into your mouth. May God protect me from its wickedness! It [2415] would be a temptation to those who will come after me. Nay, I shall prepare for them[774] what God and His Messenger have commanded us [to prepare]: obedience to God and to His Messenger. These are our provisions, and by virtue of these we attained to what you see. If this money is the price of your religion, you will perish."[775]

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad, al-Muhallab, Ṭalḥah, ʿAmr, and Saʿīd: When God granted victory to the Muslims, Rustam was killed, and the news of the victory in Syria reached ʿUmar, he assembled the Muslims and said: "How much of this property can the leader legally keep?" All of them said:

> As for his private needs, his livelihood, and the livelihood of his family, neither more nor less; their garments and his garments for the winter and the summer; two riding beasts for his jihād, for attending to his needs, and for carrying him to his pilgrimage (ḥajj) and to his ʿumrah. Equitable distribution means giving to the valiant people according to their bravery. He will put the people's affairs right, and he will take care of the people at the time of misfortunes and calamities, until these are over. He will deal with those entitled to the immovable booty[776] first.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad — ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿUmar: When ʿUmar received the news about the conquest of al-Qādisiyyah and Damascus, he assembled the people in Medina and said: "I was formerly a merchant, and God provided sufficiently for my family by means of my commerce. Now you have made me preoccupied with your affair. What do you think, how much of this property can I legally keep?" The people suggested a large amount, while ʿAlī (b. Abī Ṭālib) remained silent. ʿUmar said: "What do you say, O ʿAlī?", and ʿAlī replied, "[You can have] what will keep you and your family in a moderately good condition,[777] but you have no [2416] right to this property beyond that." The people said: "The [right] words are the words of Ibn Abī Ṭālib."

---

774. Meaning his successors in the leadership of the community.

775. If your religion is so weak that it depends on leaving this money in the treasury, you will perish.

776. Ahl al-fayʾ, meaning the warriors who seized enemy property in battle.

777. Cf. Ṭabarī, I, 2142–43, where Abū Bakr's income is discussed in similar terms.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad—ʿUbaydallāh—Nāfiʿ—Aslam: A man approached ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb and said: "How much of this property can you legally keep?" ʿUmar replied: "What will keep me in a moderately good condition: a garment for the summer and a garment for the winter, a riding beast to take ʿUmar for his pilgrimage and the ʿumrah, and a riding beast for his needs and his jihād."[778]

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Mubashshir b. al-Fuḍayl—Sālim b. ʿAbdallāh: When ʿUmar assumed power, he was receiving the living allowance which had been allotted to Abū Bakr. He lived in this condition, but his needs kept increasing. A group of Emigrants, which included ʿUthmān, ʿAlī, Ṭalḥah, and al-Zubayr got together, and al-Zubayr said: "We should speak to ʿUmar about increasing his income." ʿAlī said: "We have wanted to do it before. Let us go." ʿUthmān said: "This is ʿUmar.[779] Let us try hard to find out what he really thinks. Let us go to Ḥafṣah[780] and ask her in confidence." They entered into her presence and ordered her to inform ʿUmar [of the proposal] in the name of the group, but not to identify anyone of them to ʿUmar until he should agree. Then they left the house. Ḥafṣah met ʿUmar concerning this matter and discerned anger in his face. He said: "Who are they?" She said: "You have no way to know it before I know what you think." ʿUmar said: "If I knew who they were, I would harm them. You stand between me and them. I implore you by God, what was the best garment which the Messenger of God acquired for himself in your house?" Ḥafṣah said: "Two dyed garments in which he used to meet delegations[781] and deliver sermons to the assembled people." ʿUmar said: "And what was the most sumptuous food which he received in your house?" She said: "We baked barley bread. While it was hot, we poured over it [the contents of] the humblest skin,[782] and we made it soft and [2417]

778. The tradition shifts from direct speech by ʿUmar to wording in which ʿUmar is referred to in the third person.

779. Meaning, probably, that, in view of ʿUmar's austere way of life, one cannot speak to him directly about the proposed increase.

780. Ḥafṣah was the daughter of ʿUmar and one of the wives of the Prophet. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 56–60.

781. The reference is to delegations of tribal groups that came to meet the Prophet and embrace Islam, especially in the year 9/630–31, which came to be known as "year of the delegations," sanat al-wufūd.

782. ʿUkkah is a small skin used to hold clarified butter or honey. See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-ʿArab, s.v. ʿ-k-k.

fatty. He tasted it and found it good." ʿUmar said: "And what blanket which he used to spread in your house was the softest?" Ḥafṣah said: "We had a coarse cover which we used to spread in the summer and put under us. When winter came, we spread half of it, and covered ourselves with the other half." ʿUmar said:

> O Ḥafṣah, tell them on my behalf that the Messenger of God was frugal, put the surplus in its proper place, and contented himself with the bare necessities. By God, I am (also) frugal; I shall put the surplus in its proper place and shall content myself with the bare necessities. I and my two companions[783] are like three men who traveled on a road. The first one set out, took his provisions, and reached his destination. The second one followed him, traveled the same road, and reached him. Then the third one went in his footsteps. If he sticks to their road and is content with their provisions, he will reach them and be in their company; but if he travels another road, he will not [be able to] join them.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — ʿAṭiyyah — his companions and al-Ḍaḥḥāk — Ibn ʿAbbās: When al-Qādisiyyah was conquered and certain people of the sawād entered into peace agreements, and when Damascus was conquered and the people of Damascus entered into peace agreements, ʿUmar said to the Muslims: "Assemble and let me know your views on the spoils which God has restored to those who fought in al-Qādisiyyah and in Syria." ʿUmar and ʿAlī agreed to follow the Qur'ān and said: "'Whatever God has given to His Messenger from the people of the cities' (meaning the fifth) 'belongs to God and His Messenger' ... li-Allāhi wa-li-al-rasūli means ilā Allāhi wa-ilā al-rasūli; this means that God commands and the messenger is obliged to divide [the spoils] '... and to the near kinsman, the orphans, the needy [and the traveler, so that it may not be a thing taken in turns among the rich of [2418] you ...].'"[784] Then they interpreted this in the light of the verse that follows: "It is for the poor Emigrants [who were expelled from their habitations and their possessions, seeking bounty from God and good pleasure]."[785] They took the four-fifths [and divided them] in the same way as the fifth had been divided among those who received it in the first three divisions. The four-fifths belong to those to whom God gave the spoils. They found proof of this in the verse "Know that, whatever booty you take, the fifth of it is God's and the messenger's."[786] The [four] fifths were divided according to this. ʿUmar and ʿAlī agreed upon this and the Muslims after them implemented it [as well]. ʿUmar began with the Emigrants, then with the Helpers, then with those who followed them, and with those who participated with them in battles and helped them.

783. Meaning the Prophet and Abū Bakr, the first caliph.
784. Qur'ān 59:7.
785. For interpretations of these verses, see Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, XXVIII, 25.

ʿUmar then allotted the stipends from the poll tax which was imposed on those who entered [willingly] into peace agreements or were called upon to do so. The poll tax was restored to the Muslims in moderate sums. The poll tax is not to be divided into fifths. It belongs to those who protect the ahl al-dhimmah, fulfill the obligations toward them, and to those who join them and assist them, unless they willingly share the surplus [of the poll tax] with others who were not eligible to receive from it what they themselves had received.

Al-Ṭabarī has said: In this year, meaning the year 15/636–37, there were battles according to the report of Sayf b. ʿUmar. According to the report of Ibn Isḥāq, this was in the year 16. We have already mentioned the account of this on his authority. The report of al-Wāqidī is the same.

---

786. Qur'ān 8:42.

The History of al-Ṭabarī

VOLUME XIII

The Conquest of Iraq, Southwestern Persia, and Egypt

TRANSLATED BY GAUTIER H. A. JUYNBOLL

The Events of the Year

15 (cont'd)

(FEBRUARY 14, 636–FEBRUARY 1, 637)

Now we will enumerate the reports about those battles, that is the battles that took place until the end of the year. As I mentioned, scholars differed about what took place.[1] [2419]

According to al-Sarī[2]—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, al-Muhallab, 'Amr and Sa'īd: 'Umar enjoined Sa'd, when he ordered him to march on al-Madā'in, to leave the women and children in al-'Atīq[3] and to station an army contingent with them. This Sa'd did. 'Umar also charged him to let these soldiers share in whatever booty there was, as long as they followed the Muslims with the latters' families. They said: After the conquest Sa'd stayed two months in al-Qādisiyyah, corresponding with 'Umar concerning the measures he had to take. He dispatched Zuhrah to al-Lisān, that is to Lisān al-Barr, which is like a tongue of land laid down in the countryside.[4] Al-Kūfah is situated there nowadays; previously the main city there was al-Ḥīrah. Al-Nakhīrajān was encamped there. However, he left when he heard that Zuhrah was on his way, and he then joined his companions.

1. From here up to and including the battle at Jalūlā' (p. 2470), the account has been summarized in Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 72 ff, and Morony, Iraq, 191–4.

2. For an appraisal of the isnāds in this volume, see the translator's foreword.

3. According to Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 71, this is a canal of the Euphrates near the place where al-Kūfah was later built.

They continued: Among the songs that the children chanted in the camp and the women sang out to them while on the riverbank of al-'Atīq,[5] was something the women also sang in Zarūd,[6] Dhū Qār[7] and other watery places.[8] That was when they were ordered to march again to al-Qādisiyyah[9] in the month Jumādā II. This cryptic song, which the women sang, was like a nonsense verse, because there is no time between the months Jumādā and Rajab (in rajaz):

O wonder of all wonders!
Between Jumādā and Rajab
[2420] There's something that needs doing.
Have seen it those who've perished.
Buried in dust and clamor.[10]

The Battle of Burs

The transmitter said: After concluding the operations at al-Qādisiyyah and sending Zuhrah b. al-Ḥawiyyah forward at the head of the vanguard to al-Lisān, Sa'd set off. Then he dispatched 'Abdallāh b. al-Mu'tamm after Zuhrah, next Shuraḥbīl b. al-Simṭ after 'Abdallāh, and finally Hāshim b. 'Utbah after all these. Sa'd had appointed the last-named as his deputy in the area in which Khālid b. 'Urfuṭah was commander. Khālid was given command of the rearguard. Then, in late Shawwāl (November 636), Sa'd set out himself, together with all the Muslims, mounted and well-equipped, God having made available to them all the weapons,

4. This "tongue of land" was formed by two arms of the Euphrates, one leading along al-Ḥīrah, the other was more to the east, see Le Strange, Lands map II, and also Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 355, see also WKAS, II/1, 625, right column, penult.

5. There used to be a village, 'Atīq al-Sājah, which disappeared in the Tigris, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 613.

6. See ibid., II, 928.

7. See ibid., IV, 10.

8. This specification seems to indicate that all these villages were (partly) surrounded by water.

9. Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 74, n. 1, probably correctly, suggests reading al-Madā'in here, as above in line 6 of the Arabic text. See also Glossarium, p. DCXIX.

10. See Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 74, n. 1. For some introductory remarks on how I have translated the poetry in this volume, see Appendix I.

mules and riches found in the Persian camp. Zuhrah marched until he stopped at al-Kūfah. A kūfah is a place wholly covered with pebbles mixed with red sand. Then 'Abdallāh and Shuraḥbīl arrived, and Zuhrah set out for al-Madā'in. When he reached Burs, Buṣbuhrā confronted him at the head of a troop of soldiers. They engaged him in a skirmish and Zuhrah routed them. Buṣbuhrā and those men with him fled to Bābil, where those who had escaped from al-Qādisiyyah had gathered together with the rest of their commanders, al-Nakhīrajān, Mihrān al-Rāzī, al-Hurmuzān and their peers. They stayed there, choosing al-Fayruzān to command them. Buṣbuhrā arrived there also, but, having escaped with a spear wound, he died thereof.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Naḍr b. al-Sarī—Ibn al-Rufayl—his father: Zuhrah speared Buṣbuhrā at the battle of Burs. He fell into the river and then died of his wound after [2421] reaching Bābil. When Buṣbuhrā was routed, Bisṭām, the dihqān of Burs, approached Zuhrah and entered into an agreement with him. He made pontoon bridges for Zuhrah and brought him news of those who had assembled at Bābil.

The Battle of Bābil

They said: When Bisṭām brought Zuhrah the news about those who had escaped from al-Qādisiyyah and were now gathered at Bābil, Zuhrah took the time to write[11] this news to Sa'd. When Sa'd stopped with those who were staying with Hāshim b. 'Utbah at al-Kūfah and the news from Zuhrah reached him that the Persians were gathered under the command of al-Fayruzān at Bābil, he sent 'Abdallāh (b. al-Mu'tamm) ahead, followed by Shuraḥbīl and Hāshim. Then he departed with the remaining troops. When he arrived at Burs, he sent Zuhrah ahead, followed by 'Abdallāh (b. al-Mu'tamm), Shuraḥbīl and Hāshim. Then Sa'd followed them. They descended upon al-Fayruzān at Bābil, having said, "We will fight them in strength,[12] before we disperse." Thus they fought at 11. The Arabic has aqāma wa-kataba, which may mean "camped and wrote." If we substitute qāma for aqāma, we might translate "he wrote forthwith."

12. That is the meaning of dast, suggested by Glossarium. On the basis of the connotations given in Lane, it is feasible to translate also "with cunning." Dozy, Supplément, s.v., suggests among other meanings "a round of wrestling," which seems to fit too. But not one of these possibilities can be substantiated.

Bābil and routed the Persians in a shorter time than (required for) taking off one's cloak. The Persians fled in all directions, nothing else mattered to them. Al-Hurmuzān set off toward al-Ahwāz, seized the province and taxed[13] it as well as Mihrijān Qadhaq.[14] Al-Fayruzān moved out with him and then turned up at Nihāwand, where the treasures of the Persian king were stored. Thus al-Fayruzān took Nihāwand and taxed the two regional centres Māhān.[15] Al-Nakhīrajān and Mihrān al-Rāzī retreated toward al-Madā'in until, after they had passed Bahurasīr,[16] they crossed to the other bank of the Tigris; then they cut the pontoon bridge. For several days Sa'd remained in Bābil, where the news reached him that al-Nakhīrajān had deputed Shahriyār, one of the dihqāns of the Gate,[17] over Kūthā with a troop of men. So Sa'd sent [2422] Zuhrah ahead followed by the main army. Zuhrah marched on until he came upon Shahriyār in Kūthā, having first killed Fayūmān and al-Farrukhān in the region between Sūrā and al-Dayr.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Naḍr b. al-Sarī—Ibn al-Rufayl—his father: Sa'd had sent Zuhrah ahead from al-Qādisiyyah. Zuhrah marched with his soldiers and warriors[18] divided in different formations. Every band of men he met, who had been pursuing the fleeing enemy, was sent ahead. Zuhrah ordered his own men to follow; they were not to pass by any (Persian) whom they caught up with without killing him. Sometimes Zuhrah would stay put until, this time, when he was sent ahead from Bābil, he sent Bukayr b. 'Abdallāh al-Laythī ahead and also Kathīr b. Shihāb al-Sa'dī, the brother of al-Ghallāq. This was 13. This rendering was suggested by Glossarium. It seems to me that the translation "he consumed (everything in) it" may not be ruled out.

14. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 698.

15. That is Nihāwand and al-Dīnawar; see Ibid., IV, 405.

16. Bahurasīr is the name of one of the seven "cities" (in Arabic al-madā'in) situated on the west bank of the Tigris which, together with six other "cities" (such as Sābāṭ) situated on the east bank, make up the city of al-Madā'in, see ibid., I, 768; Le Strange, Lands, 34; see also p 12 below.

17. It is tempting to assume that these are the Persian forerunners of the later Muslim functionaries (guards, chamberlains) the ḥujjāb (sing. ḥājib), see Morony, Iraq, 79–83.

18. This is a meaningless distinction, of course. The Arabic has two terms jund and ḥarb. One senses that the two groups may constitute specific military units such as "occupation forces" and "assault and defense units." This hunch is based on the contexts in which these words mostly figure, but these connotations are not borne out by evidence from the standard dictionaries.

when Zuhrah crossed the Ṣarāt, so that they would catch up with the rest of the enemy, among whom were Fayūmān and al-Farrukhān; the former was from Maysān, the latter from al-Ahwāz. Bukayr killed al-Farrukhān and Kathīr killed Fayūmān at Sūrā. Then Zuhrah marched on until he passed through Sūrā. He then made camp. Hāshim drew near until he alighted there too. Sa'd also came that way and made camp there. Then Zuhrah was sent ahead and caught up with some men who had been waiting for him between al-Dayr and Kūthā. Al-Nakhīrajān and Mihrān had deputed Shahriyār, the dihqān of the Gate, over their armies and they themselves went to al-Madā'in. Shahriyār remained a while among his troops.

When the Arabs encountered the army of Shahriyār and the vanguard of his cavalry in the neighborhood of Kūthā, Shahriyār came forward and shouted, "Let any man or rider from among you big and strong enough come forward to me in order that I may [2423] teach him a lesson." Zuhrah retorted, "A moment ago I had in mind to meet you in combat, but now that I have heard what you said, I won't send anyone but a mere slave out to you; if you wait for him, he will kill you—God willing—, because of your effrontery. If you flee from him, you flee from a slave!" Thus he baited Shahriyār. Then he ordered Abū Nubātah Nā'il b. Ju'shum al-A'rajī, a courageous Tamīmī, to go out and face his adversary. Each had his spear. Both were of sturdy build, except that Shahriyār was (tall) as a camel. When he saw Nā'il, he flung his spear down in order to grab him by the neck. Nā'il did likewise. They drew their swords and hacked at each other. Then they took each other by the throat and crashed down from their mounts. Shahriyār fell on top of Nā'il like a ton of bricks and held him down under one thigh. He drew his dagger and started to undo the fastenings of Nā'il's coat of mail. Shahriyār's thumb happened to land in Nā'il's mouth and Nā'il crushed the bone in it (with his teeth). He noticed a (momentary) slackening (in his opponent's assault) and, attacking him furiously, whipped him off onto the ground, sat on his chest, drew his own dagger and tore Shahriyār's coat of mail from his belly. Then he stabbed him in his abdomen and side until he died. Nā'il took his horse, his bracelets[19] and his spoils. The dead man's companions withdrew and fled in all di-[2424] rections and Zuhrah stayed on in Kūthā until Sa'd arrived there.

19. Bracelets were part of the Persian nobility's distinctive accessories, see Morony, Iraq, 186.

Nā'il was brought before Sa'd, who said, "I have taken the following decision with regard to you, Nā'il b. Ju'shum: After you have put on this Persian's bracelets, cloak and coat of mail, I want you to mount his horse." Thus Sa'd assigned to him all that as his booty. Nā'il went aside, put on the captured armor and then came forward to Sa'd, carrying Shahriyār's weapons while riding his mount. Sa'd said to him, "Do not don bracelets except when you are actively engaged in a war; wear them only then." Thus Nā'il was the first Muslim in Iraq to wear bracelets.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Muhallab, 'Amr and Sa'īd: Sa'd stayed in Kūthā for some days. He went to the spot where Abraham used to sit in Kūthā and alighted at the place of the people who used to preach (the religion of) Abraham.[20] Sa'd came to the house in which Abraham had been kept prisoner, he inspected it, invoked God's blessing upon His Messenger, upon Abraham and God's Prophets, and recited, "Those days which we send down alternatively upon the people."[21]

The Story of Bahurasīr in the Month Dhū al-Ḥijjah of the Year 15 (January 637) as Related by Sayf

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Muhallab, 'Amr, Sa'īd and al-Naḍr—Ibn al-Rufayl: Then Sa'd sent Zuhrah ahead toward Bahurasīr. Zuhrah left Kūthā at the head of the vanguard until he arrived at Bahurasīr, having had a meeting at Sābāṭ with Shīrazādh, who offered him a truce and the payment of the jizā'.[22] Zuhrah sent Shīrazādh to Sa'd and went with him,

---

20. This is what it says in the text. Although emending the text should be resorted to only when no other solution seems to present itself, it is indeed tempting to reconstruct this particular passage in such a way that it reads ". . . people to whom Abraham used to preach." Instead of . . alladhīna kānū yubashshirūna Ibrāhīma, the Arabic should then read . . . alladhīna kāna Ibrāhīmu yubashshiruhum.

21. The Qur'ānic verse III, 140, pertains allegedly to the successes and adversities of, respectively, the Muslims and the Meccans at the battles of Badr (2/624) and Uḥud (3/625). The verse may be thought of as conveying how Abraham's initial bad luck (see Ṭabarī, II, 263) took a turn for the better later in life.

22. Jizā' is a plural of jizyah, the tax paid by non-Muslims in exchange for "protection" (in Arabic dhimmah). Sayf seems to distinguish between the singular and the plural.

followed by the wings of the army.[23] Hāshim went forth, followed by Sa'd. In the meantime, the contingent formed by Queen [2425] Būrān[24] had fled from Zuhrah in the vicinity of al-Muẓlim. Hāshim arrived finally at Muẓlim near Sābāṭ and waited for Sa'd to join him. That coincided with the return of al-Muqarraṭ, a tamed lion belonging to the king. Al-Muqarraṭ was chosen from the lions of al-Muẓlim. In al-Muẓlim there were several detachments of (a former) Kisrā, a woman called Būrān. Everyday they used to swear by God, "The kingdom of Fārs shall never perish as long as we live." When Sa'd arrived, Al-Muqarraṭ rushed toward the Muslim forces. Hāshim jumped down from his mount and killed it. Therefore his sword was named the Strong One.[25] Sa'd kissed Hāshim on the head; Hāshim kissed Sa'd's foot. Then Sa'd sent him ahead to Bahurasīr. Hāshim camped at al-Muẓlim and recited, "Had you not sworn previously that you would never perish?"[26] When a part of the night had passed, Sa'd departed and marched against the enemy at Bahurasīr. Every time the cavalry advanced on the way to Bahurasīr, the Muslims staying behind would stop what they were doing and shout, "God is great." They continued in that manner until the last warrior accompanying Sa'd had passed by. In all, he stayed with the army, attacking Bahurasīr for two months, and they crossed the river in the third.

'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb led the people on the pilgrimage that year. His governor over Mecca was 'Attāb b. Asīd. Al-Ṭā'if was governed by Ya'lā b. Munyah, al-Yamāmah and al-Baḥrayn by [2426]
'Uthmān b. Abī al-'Āṣ. 'Umān was governed by Ḥudhayfah b. Miḥṣan, and the districts of Syria by Abū 'Ubaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ. Al-Kūfah and its environs were given to Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ, with Abū Farwah[27] in charge of the judiciary there, while al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah had charge over al-Baṣrah and its environs.

---

23. Or, conceivably, "horses," see Lane, II, 408.
24. See immediately below and also Morony, Iraq, 193.
25. In Arabic, al-Matn; a variant reading has the sword called al-Matīn, which means the same.
26. Q. XIV, 44.
27. Glossarium, p. DCXIX, suggests reading Abū Qurrah; this is confirmed by Wakī', Akhbār al-quḍāt, II, 397.

The Events of the Year 16

(FEBRUARY 2, 637–JANUARY 22, 638)

Al-Ṭabarī said: In this year the Muslims entered the city of Bahurasīr and conquered al-Madā'in from which (king) Yazdajird b. Shahriyār fled.

The Remainder of the Account of the Muslims' Entering the City of Bahurasīr

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah and al-Muhallab: When Sa'd descended upon Bahurasīr, he deployed his cavalry, which raided the people, who lived between the Tigris and those of the people along the Euphrates, who had concluded a treaty. These horsemen came upon 100,000 peasants who were duly counted. Each horseman gained control over one peasant, the situation being that everyone living near Bahurasīr was of Persian origin. The peasants dug protective trenches for them. Shīrazādh, the dihqān of Sābāṭ, said to Sa'd, "Do not maltreat them, they are only underlings of the Persians, and would never undertake anything against you. Leave them to me, until you find a (better) solution. So Shīrazādh wrote down their names for Sa'd, whereupon Sa'd handed them over. Then Shīrazādh told them, "Go back to your villages."

Sa'd wrote to 'Umar, "We have (finally) arrived in Bahurasīr after what has happened to us on the way from al-Qādisiyyah to here. No one has engaged us in combat. I have deployed the cavalry (in all directions) and I have brought together the peasants from the villages and marshes.[28] Give me your opinion." 'Umar replied, "Whoever of those peasants comes over to you, if they stay put (and) do not assist (your enemies) against you, then that constitutes their guarantee of safety. But whoever flees and you catch him, do with him as you think fit." When this letter reached Sa'd, he let the peasants go. The dihqāns sent messengers to him, whereupon he invited them to embrace Islam and then to return (to wherever they came from) or to pay the jizā', as a consequence of which they would enjoy full protection. One after the other they opted for the latter proposition. But no one entered into the same covenant who belonged to the entourage of the Persian king or his family. There did not remain (in the countryside stretching) from the west (bank) of the Tigris to the country of the Arab tribes one single person who did not live in guaranteed safety or who was not satisfied with the sovereignty of Islam. The Arabs received the kharāj. They laid siege to Bahurasīr, bombarding its people with catapults, closing in on them with armoured siege devices and fighting them with all available gear. [2427]

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Miqdām b. Shurayḥ al-Ḥārithī—his father: The Muslims descended upon Bahurasīr. The city was protected by trenches, guards and all sorts of military gear. The Muslims bombarded them with catapults and smaller mangonels.[29] Then Sa'd asked Shīrazādh to build catapults, so he set up twenty such devices against the people of Bahurasīr; in this way they kept them busy. [2428]

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Naḍr b. al-Sarī—Ibn al-Rufayl—his father: When Sa'd arrived at Bahurasīr, the Arabs lay in a circle around it with the Persians secure inside. Occasion-

28. That is how I interpret ājām, (lit. "thickets," "brushwoods") in this context; it could conceivably also be interpreted as the plural of ujum ("fortress"), but that does not seem to fit here, see Morony, Iraq, 189.

29. In this translation, I summarize the explanation of this word given in the margin of the Berlin manuscript of Ibn Ḥubaysh used for the edition.

ally, the Persians would venture outside, walking across the dams overlooking the Tigris in armed platoons, ready to wage battle with the Muslims, but they did not stand up to their besiegers. Finally they (all) came out, infantry and archers, fully resolved to wage battle, and having promised one another not to yield. So the Muslims fought with them and the Persians were not able to stand their ground. They failed in their attempt, turned around and fled. Zuhrah b. al-Ḥawiyyah was wearing a coat of mail with a gash in it. Some people said to him, "If you give the order, you could have this hole stitched up." Zuhrah said, "Why should I?" They answered, "On account of this gash we fear for your safety." Zuhrah replied, "I am a noble man in the eyes of God. Do you think that one Persian arrow from their entire army could be shot in such a way that it actually hits me through this crack and lodges in me?[30] He, Zuhrah b. al-Ḥawiyyah, was the first of the Muslims to be killed that day by an arrow, which lodged in him through that very gash. Some people said, "Pull the arrow out of him." But he said, "Leave me be; I may stay alive as long as it remains there. Perhaps I can make a victim on the other side with a spear thrust, a blow with my sword, or with an arrow."[31] So he rushed forward toward the enemy and, with his sword, he struck Shahrbarāz,[32] a man from Iṣṭakhr, killing him. Then he was surrounded and killed himself.[33] Thereupon his killers withdrew.[34]

[2429] According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿīd b. Thābit—ʿAmrah, the daughter of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Asʿad—ʿĀʾishah, the mother of the believers: When God had granted victory and Rustum and his men were killed in al-Qādisiyyah and their multitudes dispersed, the Muslims pursued them until they dismounted at al-Madāʾin. In the meantime, groups of Persians had scattered and reached their mountain regions. Their soldiers and cavalry spread in all directions except for the king, who stayed in their city with those Persians who had remained under his orders.

30. This is a tentative rendering of a seemingly corrupt text.

31. I have adopted Wellhausen's reading ḥaẓwah, "arrow," see Glossarium, p. DCXX, and Nöldeke, in ZDMG, XXV (1871):257.

32. Ibn al-Athīr, II, 397: Shahriyār.

33. Below on p. 20, Zuhrah will emerge again, alive and well

34. In Ibn al-Athīr, II, 397, this final phrase is negated ". . . and they did not withdraw." Another interpretation might be ". . . were defeated."

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Simāk al-Hujaymī—his unknown father and Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh—Anas b. al-Ḥulays: While we were besieging Bahurasīr after their sally and subsequent retreat, a messenger appeared (on the battlement) above us who said, "Thus speaks our king to you. Will you agree to a peace agreement that entitles us to (our side of) the Tigris and our mountain and you to your side as far as your mountain; will you not be satisfied with this? (If not), may God never satisfy your appetites!" Then Abū Mufazzir al-Aswad b. Quṭbah, to the surprise of the people, (answered back), God making him utter words of which he did not know the meaning, nor we, for that matter. So the man withdrew (from the battlements) and we saw the Persians crossing the river back to al-Madā'in. "What did you say to him, Abū Mufazzir?," we asked. He replied, "By Him who sent us Muḥammad with the true message. I do not know what it was except that a divine tranquility[35] had come over me; I hope that I, [2430] one day, will be made to speak even better words." So the people continued firing questions at him, until Sa'd heard about this. He came to us and said, "Abū Mufazzir, what did you say? By God, the Persians have all fled!" Abū Mufazzir gave Sa'd the same explanation he had given us.

Then Sa'd rallied the people and marched with them (toward the enemy) while our catapults rained projectiles upon them. Nobody appeared on the city ('s walls) and no one came out toward us except the one man who called out to us that his life be spared. This we granted. He said, "There is no one left, what is holding you back?" Then our men scaled the walls. Thus we conquered the city. We did not find anything or anyone in it except some prisoners whom we brought outside the city in fetters. We interrogated them, as well as that man, as to why the Persians had all fled. They answered, "The king sent a messenger to you, offering you a peace agreement, but you replied to him that there never would be peace between you and us until we would eat honey of Ifrīdhīn[36] mixed with citrons of Kūthā. Then the king said, "Woe unto us, only angels, speaking with their [2431] tongues, descending upon us, would answer us (in this way) on behalf of the Arabs! If this is not as I say (, I'll be damned[37]). This cannot be anything other than words put into the mouth of this man, (i.e., by someone or something else) so that we give up the struggle." Then they fell back upon the other not yet conquered section of the city (of al-Madā'in on the other bank of the river).

35. The Arabic word sakīnah used here has an equivalent in the Hebrew shekhinah.

36. This is perhaps identical to Ifrandīn, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 324, a region between al-Rayy and Naysābūr.

Al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Sa'īd b. al-Marzubān—Muslim gave more or less the same account as that of Simāk; and according to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Muhallab, 'Amr and Sa'īd: When Sa'd and the Muslims entered Bahurasīr, he made the people settle there and the base camp of the army was moved to it. When they attempted to cross the river, they found that the Persians had concentrated all the ships (on the other bank and tied them up all the way) between al-Baṭā'iḥ and Takrīt.[38]

When the Muslims entered Bahurasīr, in the middle of the night, they saw something white. Ḍirār b. al-Khaṭṭāb exclaimed, "God is great, this white thing there must be the palace[39] of the king, as God and His messenger have promised us." The people never stopped shouting "God is great!" until dawn. Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah added: That was in the night when they descended upon Bahurasīr.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-A'mash—Ḥabīb b. Ṣuhbān Abū Mālik: We pressed forward toward al-Madā'in, that is Bahurasīr, that part of the city nearest (to us on the west bank of the Tigris) and we besieged their king and his followers until they ate dogs and cats. The report goes on: The Muslim army did not enter (the city), however, until a Persian called out, "By God, there is no one here." Then they moved in and, indeed, there was no one inside.

The Report Concerning al-Madā'in al-Quṣwā, That Is, That Part (on the East Bank of the Tigris) in Which the King Had His Residence

Sayf added: That was in Ṣafar of the year 16 (March 4–April 1, [2432] 637). The transmitters said: When Sa'd arrived in Bahurasīr, that

37. This elided apodosis was suggested by Prym (. . . nihil intelligo).

38. This elaborate interpretation seems to be suggested by the Arabic terms ḍammū al-sufun.

39. My hunch that the White Palace may be meant here is prompted by the mention of al-qaṣr al-abyaḍ on p. 16 below; see also p. 20.

is, that part of the city (of al-Madā'in on the) near (west bank of the Tigris), he looked for boats to cross with his men to the city (on the eastern or far side of the Tigris). But he did not find any. He found that the Persians had concentrated all the boats (on the eastern bank).[40] So the Arabs stayed in Bahurasīr for several days of that month of Ṣafar, urging Sa'd to make the crossing. Concern for the lives of the Muslims prevented him from making the crossing, until some local people came to him.[41] It was they who showed him a place where one could wade through onto terra firma. Sa'd was disinclined at first, and hesitated to do that, when suddenly a rise of the water surprised them. Now, Sa'd had had a dream describing how the horses of the Muslims rushed into a river to cross it, advancing against the rising water (as if spurred) by a gigantic force. Also, in order to have this dream explained, he had set his mind on crossing the river, and that in a year of uninterrupted summer rain! So Sa'd assembled the people, praised God and extolled Him, and said, "Your enemy has taken refuge from you across this river, so you cannot get at them,[42] whilst they can get at you if they want, and engage in skirmishes with you from their boats. Behind you there is nothing, however, that you have to fear an attack from. The veterans of our past battles[43] have protected you against them, wrecked their frontier garrisons and annihilated those who protected them. I think it would be the proper course to embark upon a holy war against the enemy aided by your strong intentions, before unforeseen circumstances prevent you from doing so.[44] Therefore I have decided to cross this river towards them!" Thereupon they all said, "May God decide

40. The crossing of the Tigris depicted here induced Wellhausen to compare it with a miraculous crossing of a large stretch of seawater during the riddah campaign in al-Baḥrayn, see Skizzen, VI, 23, 72. I do not think that that is called for; the admittedly risky crossing described in the following pages seems in my opinion perfectly plausible and need not be seen as Auflockerung der Berichterstattung, as Noth calls such a device.

41. In Arabic, a'lāj, plural of 'ilj, "non-Arab."

42. I cannot find a suitable rendering for ma'ahu in this sentence; if we decide to read minhu instead of ma'ahu, which does not seem to be substantiated by the available manuscripts, we can render it "across it," that is "across the river."

43. In Arabic, ahl al-ayyām; this points to warriors who had been present at battles preceding that of al-Qādisiyyah.

44. Literally, "before the world encircles/besieges you." Some variants listed in the apparatus "to break," "to harvest" and "to arrive at" do not make much sense either. It must be obvious that any rendering is tentative.

to give right guidance to us as well as you. Do as you say you will!"

Sa'd ordered the men to cross, saying, "Who will go first to (take possession of and) keep occupied the city's loading quays for us [2433] (on the bank of the river[45]), until the (other) warriors can join him, lest the enemy prevent them from reaching the other bank[46])?" So 'Āṣim b. 'Amr, the valiant, volunteered and, after him, six hundred men of tested steadfastness.[47] Sa'd made 'Āṣim their commander, who marched in their midst until he came to a halt on the bank of the Tigris. Then 'Āṣim said, "Who will volunteer to go with me so that we may keep the city's loading quays free from the enemy and give you protection until you have all crossed?" Sixty people showed their willingness, among them Aṣamm from the Banū Wallād and Shuraḥbīl, as well as several equally valiant others. 'Āṣim divided them into two squadrons of cavalry, one consisting of only mares and one of only stallions so that they might be more tractable when urged to swim. Then they plunged into the Tigris with the rest of the six hundred on their heels.

The first to advance on their own, ahead of those sixty, were Aṣamm al-Taym, al-Kalaj, Abū Mufazzir, Shuraḥbīl, Jaḥl al-'Iǰlī, Mālik b. Ka'b al-Hamdānī and a young lad from the Banū al-Ḥārith b. Ka'b. When the Persians saw them and realized what they were doing, they made for the same horses as those used against Sa'd. Having mounted them, they also plunged into the Tigris, urging them to swim toward the Muslims. They came face to face with 'Āṣim among his vanguard, who had almost come abreast with the loading quays of the city. 'Āṣim shouted, "Use your spears, use your spears! Point them at those horses, aim at their eyes!" Then they became engaged in man-to-man combat, going for one another with their spears, the Muslims aiming at their enemies' eyes. The latter retreated toward the shore with [2434] the Muslims on their heels, urging their mounts at them, and the

45. In modern military terms this might be called "establishing a beachhead."

46. I have opted for Ibn al-Athīr's reading 'ubūr instead of khurūj (II, 398).

47. In Arabic, ahl al-najadāt; according to the Tāj, najdah is not the sort of courage that urges a warrior to surge recklessly forward into battle, but rather shows his composure in times of shiddah, "hardship." Donner (344) interprets "champions"; this does not seem entirely satisfactory.

Persian horsemen unable to withstand the attack. So the Muslims caught up with them on the shore and killed most of them, while some of them got away having lost an eye in the process. Their horses staggered away with them until the loading quays were vacated.

None the worse for wear, the six hundred caught up with those sixty vanguard. When Sa'd saw 'Āṣim in control of the loading quays, he gave permission to his men to take the plunge themselves, calling to them, "Say aloud: We ask God for support, we rely on Him; He suffices us, an excellent guardian is He; there is no power nor strength except in God, the exalted, the great!" Thus the main force of the army followed closely, riding the waves, the otherwise dark colored water of the Tigris throwing up spume. Indeed, the men kept on talking to one another while they swam across, in close-knit groups, without a care, conversing as if they were on the march on dry ground. Thus they surprised the Persians in a way the latter had not thought possible. They were quickly driven (out of the city), leaving behind the bulk of their possessions. The Muslims entered the city in Ṣafar of the year 16 (March 637) and confiscated all that had remained in the royal quarters: three billion (dirhams' worth) and what Shīrōē and those who had come after him had amassed.

Abū Bujayd Nāfi' b. al-Aswad composed the following poem on this event (in khafīf):

We urged (our) horses to Madā'in,
    Its waters like its dry land fruitful.
We cleansed the coffers of this Kisrā,
    They fled that day, like he, despairing.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Walīd b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Ṭaybah—his father: When Sa'd camped at the Tigris, a local man came to him and asked, "Why do you stay here? Before three days have passed, Yazdajird may have fled with all his possessions from al-Madā'in." That is what incited Sa'd to sound the call to make the crossing. [2435]

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—a certain man—Abū 'Uthmān al-Nahdī (who reported on) how Sa'd stood up among his men calling upon them to make the crossing in more or less similar terms. Then he said: We covered the Tigris with men, horses and (other) animals to such an extent that, standing on the bank, you could no longer see the water. Our horses carried us to the enemy, shaking their manes, whinnying. When the Persians saw this, they ran away, no longer concerned with anything. We finally arrived at the White Palace, in which some people had fortified themselves. One of them looked out and addressed us. We called out to them and made them various propositions. We said, "There are three possibilities, from which you may choose whatever you want." They asked, "What are they?" We answered, "Islam first of all; if you embrace our religion, you will have the same privileges and obligations as we. If you reject this, then you may pay the jizyah. And finally, if you reject that too, you will have to do battle with us until God decides between us and you." A spokesman for them replied, "We have no use for the first or the last proposition, but we will accept the middle one." Al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Aṭiyyah reported a similar account, adding that their ambassador who negotiated with the Persians was Salmān (al-Fārisī).[48]

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Naḍr b. al-Sarī—Ibn al-Rufayl: When they had routed the Persians in the water and chased them onto the loading quays, from which they subse-[2436] quently expelled them too, they took away all their treasures except those which the Persians had been able to send ahead. Three billion (dirhams worth) had been in the king's treasure chambers (in all), and this three times over;[49] half of this had been sent away with Rustum, the other half they left in the treasure chambers.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Badr b. 'Uthmān—Abū Bakr b. Ḥafṣ b. 'Umar: On that day, before asking the bulk of his army to take the plunge, looking at the advance party[50] battling on the loading quays, Sa'd stood up and spoke, "By God, had those 48. Of Persian origin, he is alleged to have gone from his native country to seek out the Prophet. Captured and sold as a slave, he embraced Islam and was manumitted, see Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 141.

49. Whether or not these last few words belong to the text seems dubious, see Glossarium, p. DCXX.

50. Literally, "the protectors," to wit, of a safe landing site for their fellow warriors.

fighters over there been the Kharsā' brigade,[51] the detachment in which were enlisted al-Qa'qā' b. 'Amr, Ḥammāl b. Mālik and al-Ribbīl b. 'Amr, and had the Kharsā' fought those Persian horsemen in exactly the same manner as those out there, then that would (also) have been amply sufficient.[52] Now, 'Āṣim's detachment was known as that of al-Ahwāl;[53] Sa'd simply compared the Ahwāl brigade with that of the Kharsā'[54] because of the struggle he witnessed in the water as well as on the beachhead."

The report goes on: Then, after they had taken a series of simple measures against the enemy and at the same time improved their own position, the "beachhead" party shouted across the water,[55] so the Kharsā' brigade[56] moved out and joined up with them. When they and the whole Ahwāl detachment had safely reached the loading quays, Sa'd ordered the rest of the men to plunge into the water. The one who crossed the water alongside Sa'd was Salmān al-Fārisī. While the horses swam the men across, Sa'd said, "God suffices us; an excellent guardian is He; by God, may He grant victory to His agent and may He render His religion victorious and defeat His enemy; if there are no offenders or sinners in His army, their merits alone will defeat the enemy." Then Salmān said, "Islam generates good fortune. By God, crossing [2437] rivers has become as easy for them as crossing the desert. By Him in whose hand Salmān's soul lies, may they emerge from the water in the same numbers in which they entered it!" They crowded the surface so closely that, from the bank, one could no longer see the water. And all the way they chatted, even more so then had they been on land. They got out of the water as Salmān had prayed, having lost nothing and no one having drowned.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Abū 'Umar Dithār—

---

51. Literally "the silent" or "dumb," see Lane, 722, middle column, for several different connotations.

52. I take this to mean: Then they would not have done the job more efficiently.

53. Literally "the horrors."

54. Presumably because they were famous for battling without too much clamor.

55. Translation tentative.

56. Although the Kharsā' brigade is not explicitly mentioned as the subject of the verb "moved out," from a report listed below I deduce that it was they who were the first to follow, see p. 20.

Abū 'Uthmān al-Nahdī: To the last man, they safely made the crossing except for one man from the tribe of Bāriq called Gharqadah, who slid off the back of his chestnut-colored mare which—I still see it clearly before my own eyes—shook its mane free.[57] While the man floated in the water, al-Qa'qā' b. 'Amr urged his horse toward him, grabbed his hand and dragged him along, until they safely reached the bank. The man from Bāriq, himself a very sturdy fellow, said, "Even my own sisters would not be able to give birth to someone like you, Qa'qā'!" It so happened that al-Qa'qā' did have maternal uncles among Bāriq!

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Muhallab, 'Amr and Sa'īd: On that day, nobody lost anything, save a cup, tied (to someone's luggage) with a frayed piece of string that broke, and was swept away in the water. Then the man who was making the crossing alongside the cup's owner said, upbraiding him, "God's decree[58] struck it, so it was lost." The cup's owner answered, "By God, I am just one individual; God would never take away only my cup from among all the people in [2438] the army." When they had arrived at the other side, they came upon a man who had been one of those who initially had established the "beachhead." This man had gone down to the water's edge, until he met the first of the people emerging from the water. The wind and the waves had tossed the cup to and fro, until it landed on the bank. This man retrieved it with his lance and brought it to the troops. The owner recognized it as his and took it from him, saying to his former companion, "Did I not tell you. . . ?" The cup's owner was a confederate of the Quraysh from 'Anz called Mālik b. 'Āmir, and the one who had said, "Your cup is lost" was called 'Āmir b. Mālik.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Qāsim b. al-Walīd—'Umayr al-Ṣā'idī: When Sa'd urged his men to plunge into the Tigris, they all teamed up in pairs. Salmān was Sa'd's companion, making the crossing at his side. Sa'd said, "That is the decree of the Almighty, the Omniscient."[59] They floated thus in the water, all horses erect, in perfect balance. When a horse would become 57. Presumably from the man clinging to it.

58. In Arabic qadar; the alliteration with qadaḥ ("cup") is perhaps deliberate.
59. Q. VI, 96; XXXVI, 38; XLI, 12.

tired, it would (suddenly find itself) treading on to an elevation (i.e., in the river bottom) on which it could regain its breath as if it were on firm ground. That was the most astonishing thing that happened in the taking of al-Madā'in. That was the Day of the Water, also called the Day of the (Underwater) Humps.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, al-Muhallab, Ṭalḥah, 'Amr and Sa'īd: The day they rode the Tigris was called the Day of the (Underwater) Humps, as soon as anyone became tired he would suddenly find himself walking onto an elevation (i.e., in the river bottom) on which he could regain his breath. [2439]

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Ismā'īl b. Abī Khālid—Qays b. Abī Ḥāzım: We plunged into the Tigris, which was (at that time of the year) full. When we got to the deepest passages, the water did not reach higher than a horseman's belt, as long as he remained standing (in his stirrups).

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-A'mash—Ḥabīb b. Ṣuhbān Abū Mālik: When Sa'd entered the city on this side of the river (Bahurasīr), and as a consequence its people had destroyed the bridge and concentrated the boats (of which the bridge was made on the other, eastern, bank) the Muslims said, "What are you waiting for at this puddle?"[60] So one man rushed into the water and the others plunged in after him. No one drowned or lost any of his belongings, except one Muslim who lost a cup, the string (tying it to the luggage) had broken. I saw the cup floating in the water.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, al-Muhallab and Ṭalḥah: The defending Persians did not stop fighting on the loading quays until someone came to them who said, "Why are you killing yourselves? By God, al-Madā'in is deserted!"

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Muhallab, 'Amr and Sa'īd: When the unbelievers[61] saw the Muslims and what they had in mind, they sent troops who had to defend (the loading quays) against the Muslims' crossing. The others loaded their animals and fled away from the city. Before

60. The Arabic word is nuṭfah, "sperm"; in the present context clearly an insignificant quantity of liquid is meant.

61. The Arabic has mushrikūn, which literally means "polytheists." I have opted for "unbelievers" because I think it fits the English translation better.

that, after Bahurasīr had been conquered, Yazdajird had sent the members of his household away to Ḥulwān. Then he himself left later, journeyed until he arrived at Ḥulwān and joined his house-[2440] hold, Mihrān al-Rāzī and al-Nakhīrajān the former keeper of the treasury at al-Nahrawān having been left in control. But they also departed, with the last troops, carrying as much as they could of the most precious and portable commodities, together with as much as they could possibly carry with them from the treasury. In addition, they took the women and children. However, in the treasure chambers they left behind clothes, other commodities, vessels, trinkets,[62] presents[63] and oils, all of inestimable value. They also left the cattle, sheep, food and drink, which they had held in readiness in case of a siege. The first to enter al-Madā'in were the Ahwāl brigade, followed by the Kharsā' brigade. They spread out over its streets, but they did not encounter or hear anyone but those left in the White Palace. So the Muslim brigades surrounded the Persians and called upon them to surrender. They responded to Sa'd's proposition accepting "protection" in exchange for jizā'. One after the other, the inhabitants of al-Madā'in eventually returned to the city on the same conditions, but in this agreement there were no terms pertaining to the royal family or its entourage.

Sa'd took up quarters in the White Palace. He sent Zuhrah at the head of the vanguard in pursuit of those who had fled to al-Nahrawān. So Zuhrah set forth until he arrived at al-Nahrawān. Sa'd[64] dispatched similar numbers in all directions in pursuit of those who had fled.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-A'mash—Ḥabīb b. Ṣuhbān Abū Mālik: On the day of al-Madā'in when the Muslims [2441] crossed the Tigris, the Persians, staring at them in the water, burst out shouting in Persian, "The devils have come!" [dīwān āmad].[65] Then they said to one another, "By God, you and I are

62. The Arabic word is fuḍūl, the plural of a word denoting "remainder," "rest." I arrived at my interpretation by inferring that what is left behind as superfluous or dispensable may well have consisted of trinkets. Ibn al-Athīr (II, 400) has fusūs "precious stones."

63. In Arabic, alṭāf, plural of laṭaf, see Tā, s.v. l-ṭ-f.

64. Zuhrah can conceivably also be taken as the subject of this sentence.

65. In the Leiden manuscript of Ibn Hubaysh there is a marginal gloss of Abū Bakr b. Sayf (would he be the son of our Sayf?), which reads in translation, "Satan not about to wage battle with ordinary people, instead, you and I will have to fight nothing but jinn." So they fled.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Aṭiyyah b. al-Ḥārith and 'Aṭā' b. al-Sā'ib—Abū al-Bakhtarī: The Muslims' scout[66] was Salmān al-Fārisī. They had nominated him to the function of middleman[67] with the people of Persia.

'Aṭiyyah said: They had given him the order to invite the people of Bahurasīr to an agreement. The same order was given on the day of the White Palace's siege. So Salmān invited them to an agreement three times in all.

'Aṭiyyah and 'Aṭā' both went on: The words Salmān called out to them ran as follows: "I have the same origin as you, I shall be compassionate toward you; you have three options to which I invite you, which may bring about a peace treaty for you: Either you embrace Islam, then you will be our brethren, you will have the same privileges and obligations as we. Or you pay the jizyah. And if these two propositions are not acceptable, then we will declare war on you . . . . likewise[68]; God does not care for the treacherous."

'Aṭiyyah went on: When it was the third day, the people in Bahurasīr refused to accept any proposition, so the Muslims fought them. On the third day in al-Madā'in, however, the occupants of the White Palace gave in and came outside. Sa'd took up his quarters in the White Palace and designated the Great Hall as prayer site.[69] In this hall there were several statues of plaster, but they were left in their place.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah and al-Muhallab, complemented by Simāk al-Hujaymī: The Persian king had sent his household to Ḥulwān, when Bahurasīr was [2442] has arrived." Notice the singular and compare it with the plural used in the original Persian.

66. In Arabic, rā'id; this term denotes originally "someone sent ahead to seek herbage." In a military context it also means "guide" or "reconnoiterer."

67. Literally, "propagandist."

68. A quotation from Q. VIII, 58. This "likewise," here seemingly out of context, makes good sense when the text immediately preceding it in the Qur'ān is considered: "If you fear that people (with whom you have a pact) may betray you, you should throw (that pact) back at them, likewise."

69. For a reconstruction of what this Great Hall (in arabicized Persian, īwān) may have looked like and what function it may have had in Sasanian times, see *EI*², s.v. Īwān (Grabar).

conquered. When the Muslims crossed the water, the king (and his entourage) left in flight, while his cavalry, at the water's edge, tried to prevent the Muslims and their horsemen from landing. So they and the Muslims fought fiercely, until someone called out to them, "Why get yourselves killed? By God, there is no one left in al-Madā'in!" So they were put to flight, pursued by the Muslim cavalry who rushed into the city. Sa'd made the crossing amidst the remainder of the army.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah and al-Muhallab: The vanguard of the Muslims caught up with the rearguard of the Persians. A certain Muslim called Thaqīf, one of the 'Adī b. Sharīf, caught up with a Persian warrior. He came face to face with him on one of the roads, while the latter was covering his companions' retreat. The Persian spurred his horse into attacking the Muslim, but it refused and would not budge. Then he spurred his horse to flee, but it was recalcitrant. Finally, the Muslim caught up with him, chopped off his head and took his armour as spoils.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Aṭiyyah, 'Amr and Dithār Abū 'Amr: That day a certain Persian horseman from al-Madā'in happened to be in the vicinity of (a village called) Jāzir.[70] He was told that the Arabs had invaded the territory and that the Persians had fled. But, being a self-confident man, he did not pay heed to this news and went on until he entered the house of some of his serfs. They were busily packing their clothes. He said, "What is the matter with you?" They answered, "Hornets have driven us out of our houses and taken possession of them." So this man asked for (a crossbow and) clay bullets to be brought and he started [2443] shooting at the hornets until he had killed many of them, glued to the walls. Then fear finally struck him. He got up and ordered a serf to saddle a mount for him. The saddlegirth broke, but he quickly refastened it and mounted. Then he left the village and stopped when another man passed him by. This man drove his spear into the Persian saying, "Take this, I am Ibn al-Mukhāriq,[71]" and he killed him. Then he went on his way, not paying heed to his victim.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Sa'īd b. al-Marzubān: In 70. Near al-Nahrawān, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 7.

71. If the name means anything in this context, unfortunately, this could not be established. Form III of kharaqa is listed nowhere.

a similar report: the man turned out to be Ibn al-Mukhāriq b. Shihāb.

They said: A certain Muslim warrior met a Persian, together with a band of people who were reproaching one another, saying, "For what are we fleeing?" One of them said to another, "Give me a ball."[72] Then he threw it (at a certain target), not missing it. When he saw this, he and the others headed in another direction, with himself in front. So they went until they came face-to-face with the aforementioned Muslim. The Persian shot the ball at him from a shorter distance than the first time, this time missing him. Then the Muslim went for the Persian and split his skull, saying, "I am Ibn Musharriṭ al-Ḥijārah.[73]" One after the other his companions fled away from the Persian (who lay there slain).

They said: When Sa'd entered al-Madā'in, he saw that it was vacated. Finally, he came to the Great Hall of the king's palace and started to recite, "How many gardens and springs (flowing therein) have they abandoned, how many sown fields and noble habitats, how many comforts in which they took delight! The situation was thus. We bequeathed them (and their properties) to another people[74]." Then he performed a prayer ritual commemorating the conquest; this was no congregational prayer meeting. He performed eight rak'as without pauses between them. He adopted the Great Hall as site for the prayer ritual. There were plaster statues there, of men and horses, but that did not prevent Sa'd, nor the other Muslims, (from praying there) and they were left as they were.

They said: Sa'd performed the prayer ritual on the day he entered the city; that was because he intended to stay there for the time being. The first Friday prayer ritual held in Iraq was the one held in congregation in al-Madā'in in Ṣafar of the year 16 (March 637). [2444]

72. In Arabic, kurah, obviously some sort of projectile is meant. A polo ball?

73. If, following the edition, we read Musharriṭ, we may interpret this with Lane "scarifier, someone who makes incisions (sc. here in stones, ḥijārah)." There is some confusion, though, as to whether we should read a second or a fourth form; the Tāj, s.v. b-z-gh (that is the synonym suggested by Lane) reads a first. The connotation "twisting," also found in connection with sharaṭa IV (see also sharīṭah in Lane), does not seem to fit in with ḥijārah.

74. Q. XLIV, 25–8. The words in brackets were gleaned from Qur'ān commentaries.

Mention of the Booty Amassed from the People of al-Madā'in

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, al-Muhallab, 'Uqbah, 'Amr, Abū 'Umar and Sa'īd: Sa'd settled in the Great Hall of the King and dispatched Zuhrah with the order to go straight-away to al-Nahrawān. In addition, he sent similar detachments in every direction to expel the unbelievers and collect the spoils. After three days he moved to the palace. He entrusted 'Amr b. 'Amr b. Muqarrin with control over what was confiscated and ordered him to collect what was in the palace, the Great Hall and the private compounds. He also had to count what the search parties had produced. The inhabitants of al-Madā'in, at the time of the defeat, had quickly snatched up what they could before fleeing in every direction. Not one of them, however, escaped with anything that did not eventually turn up in the camp of Mihrān at al-Nahrawān; not even a piece of string. The search parties chased after them to the extent that they retrieved everything that those fleeing had taken with them; the Muslims brought back what the latter had snatched up in order to add all that to what already had been amassed. The first objects to be collected on that day were from the White Palace, the living quarters of the king and the other compounds of al-Madā'in.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-A'mash—Ḥabīb b. Ṣuhbān: We marched into al-Madā'in and came upon Turkish [2445] tents filled with baskets sealed with leaden seals. At first, we did not think they would contain anything but food, but later they were found to contain vessels of gold and silver. These were later distributed among the men. At the time, Ḥabīb (b. Ṣuhbān) went on, I saw a man running around shouting, "Who has silver or[75] gold in his possession?" We also came upon large quantities of camphor which we mistook for salt.[76] So we began to knead it (in our dough) until we discovered that it made our bread taste bitter.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Naḍr b. al-Sarī—Ibn al-Rufayl—his father al-Rufayl b. Maysūr: Zuhrah left with his

75. In the Arabic text we read bi-ṣafrā' "with gold." Is this a use of bi- referred to in Wright, II, 164, l. 1, sc. li'l-muṣāḥabah?

76. Indeed, an easy mistake to make, since both camphor and salt are commonly found as white crystals in nature.

vanguard, ordering them to follow him. Finally, they came to the bridge at al-Nahrawān. The Persians were actually on it, packed together. Suddenly a mule fell into the water. With great effort, the Persians hastened to retrieve it. Zuhrah exclaimed, "I swear by God, there must be something important about that mule. They would not have put in so much effort to retrieve it, nor would they have endured our swords in this dangerous situation, unless there was something special they did not want to give up." And sure enough, on this mule were packed the king's finery, his clothes, gems, swordbelt and coat of mail encrusted with jewelry. The king used to don all these when sitting in state. Then Zuhrah dismounted to fight. Thereupon, after he had routed them, he ordered his men to retrieve the mule. They lifted it (out of the water) and brought its baggage. Zuhrah returned this to the spoils, he and his men still unaware of its contents. On that day Zuhrah recited the following verses in rajaz:

My uncles be ransom today for my fighters,
    Recoiling from leaving me there at the river.
They cleft for (the prize of) the mule in the struggle
    With every sword blow the cranial sutures.
The Persians were slain covering their own hillocks, [2446]
    As if they were (nothing but mere) heads of cattle.[77]

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Hubayrah b. al-Ash-'ath—his grandfather al-Kalaj: I was among those who went out to look for the Persians who had fled. Suddenly I came upon two mule drivers who had repelled the cavalry with arrows. They had nothing but two arrows left. When I persevered in pursuing them, they deliberated, the one saying to the other, "When you shoot him, I'll cover you, or shall I shoot him while you cover me?" So each of them chose to cover the other. The result was that they shot off both arrows. Then I attacked them and killed them. Not realizing what they were carrying, I led the two mules back to our army, where I presented them to the overseer of the spoils. This man was writing down what the warriors brought him and what the treasure chambers and dwellings contained. He said, "Wait a moment, 77. This seemingly simple poem contains a metrical peculiarity and one or two double entendres, which receive detailed treatment in Appendix I.

we will see what you have brought." I began to unload them. On one of the mules there were two baskets containing the crown of the king, which could only be held aloft by two jewel-incrusted props.[78] On the other mule there were (also) two baskets containing the king's garments, in which he used to dress up, brocaded with interwoven gold thread and adorned with gems, as well as other garments made of different fabrics similarly interwoven and adorned.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah and al-Muhallab: Al-Qa'qā' b. 'Amr also went out that day in search of those who had fled. He caught up with a Persian covering the retreat of the others. They engaged in combat and al-Qa'qā' slew [2447] him. At the side of the dead man was a pack animal that carried two leather bags and two bundles, the latter containing five and six swords respectively, the former containing coats of mail. Among these coats of mail, there turned up the one of the king, his helmet, greaves and armplates, as well as the coats of mail of Heraklius,[79] Khāqān,[80] Dāhir,[81] Bahrām Shūbīn,[82] Siyāwakhsh,[83] and al-Nu'mān.[84] What the Persians had not inherited, they had acquired as spoils, in the days of their raids on Khāqān, Heraklius and Dāhir. As for those of al-Nu'mān and Bahrām, those were acquired when they dissented from the king and fled. One of the aforementioned

78. The crown was hanging above the king's head by a chain from the ceiling, or perhaps, as seems to be suggested here, from the two props. For more information on royal crowns at the Sasanian court, see Kurt Erdmann, "Die Entwicklung der Sāsānidischen Krone," in Ars Islamica, XV–XVI (1951):87–123, Christensen, L'Iran, 392–3; R. Ettinghausen, From Byzantium to Sasanian Iran and the Islamic world (Leiden 1972), 23, 28–9 (with pictures).

79. Presumably, this was a trophy captured in the course of the Byzantine campaign into Sasanian territory in the late 620's.

80. This is the title of a foreign monarch; in Ibn al-Athīr, II, 402, he is identified as the king of the Turks.

81. In Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit., Dāhir is identified as the king of India; on p. 2593 below he is mentioned as the king of Mukrān, or Makrān, the coastal area in southeast Iran, see Le Strange, Lands, 329–33. For more on Dāhir, see Yohanan Friedmann, "The Origins and Significance of the Chach Nāma," in Islam in Asia, I, Jerusalem, 1984, 23–37.

82. A usurper of the Persian throne, see Morony, Iraq, index (Bahrām Chūbīn).

83. Identified by De Goeje as Bahrām Shūbīn's grandson, see Tabarī's general index.

84 He is al-Nu'mān b. al-Mundhir, the last of the Lakhmid kings (d. 602), see Morony, Iraq, 220.

bundles contained the swords of the king, Hurmuz,[85] Qubādh[86] and Fayrūz,[87] and the other swords turned out to be those of Heraklius, Khāqān, Dāhir, Bahrām, Siyāwakhsh and al-Nuʿmān.

Al-Qaʿqāʿ brought all these spoils to Saʿd who said, "Pick one of these swords." So al-Qaʿqāʿ selected the one of Heraklius. Saʿd also gave him Bahrām's coat of mail. The rest of this weaponry he distributed freely among the Kharsāʾ brigade, except for the swords of the king and al-Nuʿmān, which were sent to ʿUmar. This was so that the tribesmen, who had previous knowledge of the existence of these swords, would hear of this feat. Thus Saʿd and his men retained as part of the distributable booty[88] those two swords, the king's finery, his crown, and his garments. Then they sent these objects to ʿUmar for the Muslims to see and for the nomadic tribesmen to hear about. In this way, Khālid b. Saʿīd acquired the (famous) sword al-Ṣamṣāmah[89] belonging to ʿAmr b. Maʿdī Karib in the "apostasy" war [al-Riddah], Amr's fellow tribesmen asking that their lives be spared as a consequence.[90] [2448]

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—ʿUbaydah b. Muʿattib—someone from the Banū al-Ḥārith b. Ṭarīf—ʿIṣmah b. al-Ḥārith al-Ḍabbī: I marched among those who left in search of the Persian fugitives. I took a well-traveled path and found myself suddenly face-to-face with a man driving a donkey. When he saw me, he urged it forward, caught up with another man driving a donkey ahead of him and together they surged forward, spurring their donkeys to greater speed. Finally, they came to a stream. Its bridge was broken. They remained standing there until I reached them, then they parted ways. One shot at me, but I pursued and killed him. The other escaped. I returned to the donkeys and

85. Hurmuz is identified by De Goeje as the son of the king.

86. Identified by De Goeje as the son of Fayrūz.

87. Identified by De Goeje as the son of Yazdajird b. Bahrām Gūr.

88. In Arabic, akhmās, to be distinguished from anfāl, which is the booty handed out freely as some sort of special reward to the most deserving warriors, not necessarily in equal portions. Distribution in equal portions of the khums (=one-fifth sent to Medina) and the akhmās (=four-fifths divided among the participating soldiers) is called in Arabic qasm or iqtisām, to be distinguished from the handing out of anfāl, which is nafl or tanfīl. See also n. 94 below.

89. This is a sword which does not bend, see Lane, 1724, left column.

90. Conceivably, this last sentence admits of an alternative interpretation: "as a result of which ʿAmr's fellow tribesmen were put to shame."

brought them to the overseer of the booty. He inspected what the one was carrying. It turned out to be two baskets. In one of these there was a golden figure of a horse, saddled with a silver saddle; on its crupper and breast girth there were rubies and emeralds encased in silver. Its bridle was likewise embellished. There also was a figure of a horseman made of silver encrusted with gems. The other basket contained a figurine representing a silver she-camel; on it were a saddlecloth and a strap of gold. It also had a halter or bridle made of gold, all this studded with rubies. On the camel a man, made of gem-encrusted gold, was seated. The king used to attach these two figures to the props used for holding his crown aloft.

[2449] According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Hubayrah b. al-Ash'ath —Abū 'Ubdah al-'Anbarī: When the Muslims descended upon al-Madā'in and collected the booty, a man came forward carrying a box. He handed this to the overseer of the spoils who with the others said, "We have never seen anything like it; it is not like anything we have, not even remotely." They asked that man whether he had taken away for himself anything from the contents, whereupon he exclaimed, "Of course not, had it not been for God, I would not have brought this box to you." So they began to realize that this was a man of importance. "Who are you?," they asked, to which the man replied, "I won't tell you in anticipation of your praise, nor anyone else in order to solicit his eulogy. I praise God and am satisfied with His reward." (Still curious,) they had him followed by someone. When he finally reached his people, the man (who had shadowed him) made inquiries as to his identity. He turned out to be 'Āmir b. 'Abd Qays.[91]

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Muhallab, 'Amr and Sa'īd: Sa'd said, "By God, the army is truly honest! If it had not been for the prestige of the fighters at Badr[92] earned in the past—and I swear by God, I uphold their merit!—time and again I came across trifles (from the booty amassed at Badr) too many to enumerate, which several of them had kept for

91. He seems a relatively nondescript figure. He plays a minor role in vol. XV of this series.

92. Name of a well where the famous first battle of the year 2 (624) took place between Muḥammad helped by his Medinan following and a far superior Meccan force accompanying a richly laden caravan themselves, whereas I never heard that the warriors (involved in this battle) did anything of the sort!"

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Mubashshir b. al-Fuḍayl—Jābir b. 'Abdallāh: "By God beside Whom there is no other god, it has not come to our notice that anyone of the fighters present at al-Qādisiyyah wanted this world's riches beside the [2450] Hereafter." Although we did suspect three men, Ṭulayḥah b. Khuwaylid, 'Amr b. Ma'dī Karib and Qays b. al-Makshūḥ,[93] we ourselves, nor the enemy whom we attacked, had ever seen anything like their honesty and moderation.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad b. Qays al-'Ijlī—his father: When the king's sword, belt and finery were brought to 'Umar, he exlaimed, "People who hand in such precious booty are indeed honest!" Then 'Alī said, "It is your own virtuous conduct that is imitated by the people."

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Amr and al-Mujālid—al-Sha'bī: When 'Umar saw the king's weaponry, he said, "People who hand in such costly spoils are indeed honest!"

How the Booty Acquired at al-Madā'in Was Distributed among the People Present at Its Conquest, Who Numbered, as Sayf Claims, in All Sixty Thousand

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, 'Amr, Sa'īd and al-Muhallab: When Sa'd, after his arrival in al-Madā'in, had dispatched people in pursuit of the Persians who had fled, the search party reached al-Nahrawān. Then they gradually retreated and the unbelievers marched on to Ḥulwān. After he had set aside the fifth, Sa'd distributed the booty among the people. Every horseman [2451] received a share to the value of twelve thousand (dirhams). In fact, all of them were mounted, no infantry having participated in the conquest. The number of pack animals in al-Madā'in was large.

Al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Mujālid—al-Sha'bī gave a similar account. All the transmitters agree in that he distributed freely

93. All three of these were notorious for having "apostatized," i.e. refused to pay the taxes imposed by Medina, upon the death of the Prophet. They were subdued again during the reign of Abū Bakr in the course of the Riddah wars, the so-called "apostasy wars."

from the (remaining four-fifths of the) spoils, without letting only the men who had displayed particular valor have more than their exact share.[94]

They said: Sa'd distributed the houses of al-Madā'in among the people and made them move into them. The man who exercised control over the collecting of the spoils was 'Amr b. 'Amr al-Muzanī. The man in charge of the booty's distribution was Salmān b. Rabī'ah. Al-Madā'in was conquered in Ṣafar of the year 16 (March 637).

They said: When Sa'd invaded al-Madā'in, he firmly established regulations concerning the performance of the prayer ritual, and he also fasted. He issued orders that the people were to come to the Great Hall of the Royal palace. This hall was made into a place of worship for the religious festivals. He had a pulpit erected in it. Sa'd used to perform the prayer ritual in this hall while there were still (Persian) statues standing there. He also used to convene the congregational Friday prayer in it. When a fast was broken, it was commonly said, "Show yourselves, for the established norm concerning the two festivals is that you come into the

94. This is a difficult passage and perhaps needs some explanation. The "people of particular valor" is my rendering of the Arabic ahl al-balā'. On p. 2412 of vol. XII of this series we find in the details of 'Umar's dīwān ("stipend register") a reference to them, which permits us to see them as fighters who received more than their normal share from the spoils, because they had especially distinguished themselves in the battle of al-Qādisiyyah and the main battles in Syria (e.g. al-Yarmūk), but who had not yet been mobilized into the Muslim armies fighting the battles immediately preceding that of al-Qādisiyyah and its Syrian counterpart. Those battles were called al-ayyām (lit. "the days"). In other words, they fell just short of the prestige accorded to the ahl al-ayyām.

"Distributing freely" is my rendering of the verb naffala. Contrary to the verb qasama, which means "dividing into exactly equal shares among. . . ," naffala means "giving each according to his individual merits," or "handing out in unequal shares." This interpretation is based on Tāj, s.v. n-f-l, where we read among other things: naffalahu tanfīlan faḍḍalahu 'alā ghayrihi and naffilū akbarakum ay zīdūhu 'alā ḥiṣṣatihi, see also Noth, index s.v. nafal. On p. 2412 of Vol. XII, where the ahl al-balā' were previously mentioned, we read how to the bāri' ("excellent") from among them a larger share is allotted. For the fifth form of this root in the Tāj we come across the connotation tabarra'a bi'l-'aṭā' tafaḍḍala bi-mā lā yajibu 'alayhi. Finally, in this at first sight obscure, passage, we are lumbered with the terms wal-lam yajhadhā, which constitutes Prym's otherwise nearly always judicious vocalization. Contrary to what has been my policy adopted throughout, I had to reject this vocalization, because it does not seem to make sense. I propose to read a fourth form: wa-lam yujhidhā; Lane gives for IV also "to give away here and there," see Tāj, s.v. j-h-d.

open."[95] Sa'd said, "Perform your prayer rituals in the Great Hall." It is reported that he himself did so. He also said, "(Come to the Great Hall for the congregational prayer) no matter whether you happen to be in the very centre of your village."[96]

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Amr—al-Sha'bī: When Sa'd had settled in al-Madā'in and had divided the living quarters, he sent for the families[97] and settled them in the houses. These had privies and the like.[98] They stayed on in al-Madā'in until the Muslims had finally finished at Jalūlā', Takrīt and al-Mawṣil. After that they moved to al-Kūfah.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, Ziyād and al-Muhallab, 'Amr and Sa'īd shared with them the same account: Sa'd brought together the fifth part of the booty. Therein was included everything with which he wanted to surprise 'Umar: to wit the king's garments, finery, his sword and the like, [2452] and what might delight Arab tribesmen as well, if it fell into their hands.[99] Then he freely distributed[100] from the remaining four-fifths (among the people of valor). After also the more strict division among the rest of the people was carried out and after he had set apart the fifth (destined for Medina), he was left with the qiṭf,[101] but dividing that up could not be achieved in any fair way. So Sa'd addressed the Muslims saying, "What do you think, if we were to manage without dividing among us four-fifths of this qiṭf, so that we could dispatch it to 'Umar for him to dispose of as he deems fit? For we are of the opinion that it cannot be divided successfully among us, because we (would only end up each of us

95. With this there seems to be an implication that Sa'd wanted to give the congregational aspect of the performance of the prayer ritual more emphasis; history confirms that every nascent religion has benefitted from accentuating this aspect.

96. In other words, far away from the Great Hall.

97. Sc. those families left behind at the 'Atīq, see pp. 1-2 above.

98. That is how I interpret marāfiq here, a word which, according to Lane, stands for any appurtenances of a house, such as the kitchen or washing facilities. My choice of the interpretation "privy" may be justified with the occurrence of kanīf, plural kunuf, in Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, III, 312, indicating a "privy" in use with non-Arabs.

99. The intention seems to be that 'Umar might be thus enabled to persuade nomadic tribesmen to convert to Islam more readily.

100. Again we have the term naffala, rather than qasama, the latter implying a division in strictly equal shares; see n. 94 above.

101. What this qiṭf is will be explained below.

owning) a small piece, whereas it would suit the people of Medina admirably."[102] "But of course, we agree," the people answered. So Sa'd sent it to 'Umar as he had found it.

This qiṭf, measuring sixty by sixty cubits, was one (gigantic) carpet, one jarīb[103] in size. On it were pictures of roads and inlays like rivers; among them were pictures of houses. The edges looked like cultivated lands planted with spring vegetables, made of silk on stalks of gold. Their blossoms were of gold and silver, etc.

When the fifth finally reached 'Umar, he freely distributed from it among certain people and said, "From the main four-fifths of the booty those of the people of valor, who were or were not present at the battle, received their free shares, in all totaling two-fifths.[104] But I am of the opinion that (here in Medina none of) the Medina fifth should be divided up in free shares."[105] Then he distributed it in exactly equal shares among those who were entitled to it.[106] Thereupon 'Umar asked, "Advise me as to what to [2453] do with this carpet." Medina's elders all agreed on one solution and said, "The fighters out there have made that matter over to you,[107] so you do as you think fit." They all agreed on this except 'Alī, who had another suggestion to offer. "Commander of the Faithful," 'Alī said, "the matter stands indeed as they have said,

---

102. If my translation is correct, with this there seems an implication that granting this qiṭf a permanent place in Medina, for everybody to enjoy, appeared to Sa'd a better solution than cutting it up in so many pieces in al-Madā'in.

103. A jarīb is a land measure of 958 m², see Hinz, 60; if we assume it was square, that means that it was a carpet of more than 30 meters long and broad. A cubit is a little over 50 cm in this context. The wording of the following few lines seems defective.

104. This figure of two-fifths may imply either that the other two-fifths minus the qiṭf were distributed according to the qasm method, or that two-fifths constituted all the booty distributed among the warriors, the remaining two-fifths representing the value of the qiṭf.

105. The text reads jahadū 'l-khumsa bi'l-nafli; again I propose to read a fourth form rather than a first (see above, n. 94), or we may deduce that I and IV may have the same meaning: treating booty as to be divided up, not according to the qasm method, but rather to the nafl method, not in strictly equal shares and commensurate with the achievements or prestige of the recipients.

106. Q. VIII, 41, stipulates that the fifth ("God's share") is to be distributed among the Prophet's relatives, as well as orphans, poor people and travelers, while one-fifth of the fifth, originally destined for the Prophet himself, was now to be deposited in the treasury.

107. The verb used is ja'ala, which also implies "giving a soldier his wages."

so there remains no other solution than to ponder this matter somewhat more. If you accept it today as it is, (there does not seem to be anybody who objects, but) tomorrow you will certainly come across people who are entitled to something of the booty that is not in their possession." "You are quite right," 'Umar said, "that is sound advice." So he cut up the carpet and distributed the pieces among them.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Abd al-Malik b. 'Umayr: On the day of the conquest of al-Madā'in the Muslims acquired "the king's spring,"[108] which they found too cumbersome[109] to take along. They had been keeping it ready for use in winter for the time when their provisions were all but exhausted. When they wanted a drinking party, they would sit and drink on this carpet. Then they would feel as if they were sitting in a garden. It was a carpet measuring sixty by sixty (cubits); its background[110] was gold-colored, its brocade was inlaid, the fruits depicted on it were precious stones, its foliage silk and its waters golden. The Arabs used to call it the qiṭf. When Sa'd had divided the booty among them, he was left with this carpet; he could not bring himself to cut it up. So Sa'd gathered the Muslims and said to them, "God has filled your hands, but dividing this carpet is not so easy; nobody could possibly purchase it.[111] Therefore, I consider it a good idea that you should relinquish it freely to the Commander of the Faithful; let him dispose of it as he wants." Thus they decided. When the carpet had reached 'Umar in Medina, he had a dream. He convened the people, praised God and extolled Him, and, having told them what this was all about, he asked them their opinion. Some people suggested that 'Umar keep it for himself, others that he be the arbiter thereof,[112] and still others created disagreement.[113] When 'Alī saw that 'Umar was about to reject each of these suggestions, he stood up, went to him and said, "Why do you pretend not to know or to have doubts? Nothing of this material [2454]

108. Bahār-i Kisrā is the Persian name of the carpet the Arabs called qiṭf.

109. The word used here, thaqula, has two connotations "to be heavy" and "to be difficult." The double entendre is perhaps intentional.

110. According to Lane, the Arabic word ard can mean "carpet."

111. Or "sell it," the Arabic shirā' being a ḍidd admitting of either interpretation.

112. Translation tentative.

113. Translation tentative.

world really belongs to you except what you have been given and then you spend it all, or the clothes with which you dress yourself which you then wear thin, or the food you eat which you then digest." "You are perfectly right," 'Umar replied. So he cut the carpet up into equal pieces and distributed these among the people. 'Alī also acquired a fragment which he sold for twenty thousand (dirhams). And that was not even the best piece!

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Muhallab, 'Amr and Sa'īd: The one who took charge of the four-fifths, namely those of al-Madā'in, was Bashīr b. al-Khaṣṣāṣiyyah. The one who relayed news of the conquest of the city was Ḥulays, of unknown parentage, from Asad, and the one overseeing the amassing of the plunder was 'Amr (b. 'Amr al-Muzanī). Its distribution was in the hands of Salmān (b. Rabī'ah). They continued: When the carpet had been cut up and distributed among the people, they profusely praised the warriors of al-Qādisiyyah. 'Umar said, "Of all the Arabs, they are the prominent ones, the champions. For them, religion goes hand in hand with many dangers. They are truly the warriors of the early battles and of al-Qādisiyyah and its aftermath."[114] They continued: When the king's finery, as well as his attire when he sat in state and his garments destined for other occasions (he had a number of different ceremonial dresses, one set for every occasion), reached Medina, 'Umar ordered that Muḥallim be brought forward. At that time this man was the most corpulent Bedouin in the region of Medina. Muḥallim was crowned with the royal crown, held aloft on its two wooden props, dressed up in his sashes, necklaces and garments, and seated in front of the people. 'Umar looked at him; so did the people. They saw something magnificent belonging to this material world and its allure. Then Muḥallim stepped out of those and he was dressed up in the next set of regalia. The people looked at all that without interest[115] until all the royal garments

114. The Arabic reads ahl al-ayyām wa-ahl al-qawādis; for the first category of people, see p. 13, n. 43 above. Al-Qawādis, which means literally "the Qādisiyyas," I interpreted as comprising the battles of al-Qādisiyyah as well as immediately subsequent battles and skirmishes. See also Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 196.

115. This rendering is a tentative one; the Arabic fī ghayri nū'in or naw'in is listed nowhere in the dictionaries consulted. The Lisān suggests "hunger" or "thirst" for nū', which I have used here.

had been tried on. Then Muḥallim was asked to arm himself with the king's weapons and to gird himself with his sword. The people kept staring. Then 'Umar ordered him to take everything off [2455] and said, "By God, people who surrender (such precious objects instead of keeping them for themselves) are truly honest." Then he handed the king's sword to Muḥallim as his share of the spoils and said, "How stupid is the Muslim who is beguiled by material possessions! Surely, does anyone thus beguiled attain anything except less than this his present share or even just as much? What good is there for any Muslim in that which previously harmed the king and was of no use to him? The king did not go beyond devoting himself to what he was told about his afterlife. Thus he gathered riches for the (future) husband of his wife (after his death) or for his daughter's husband or his son's wife. For himself he did not set anything aside. Here a man has provided for himself and has secured that which he does not immediately need in storage, so that that might provide for him later and if not, then in any case for the three (comparable descendants) coming after him. How stupid is he who gathers riches for the sole benefit of his descendants or (simply) for an enemy to scoop up!"[116]

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad b. Kurayb—Nāfi' b. Jubayr: At the time when the spoils[117] were brought, while looking at the king's weaponry, garments and finery—together with the sword of al-Nu'mān b. al-Mundhir—'Umar said to Jubayr (b. Muṭ'im), "Verily, people who submit (precious booty such as) this are truly honest. What clan did al-Nu'mān belong to?" Jubayr answered, "The Arabs used to trace his lineage to a few remaining members of Qanaṣ; he was one of

116. This entire speech of 'Umar is quite unclear and my rendering is a tentative one. One wonders whether 'Umar's audience understood one iota of it, that is, if it is historical.

117. The text has akhmās "the fifths"; I take this not as an erroneous reading for khums "one-fifth," the normal fraction to be sent back to Medina, but I interpret this as implying that, because al-Madīnah received on top of the usual fifth that costly carpet described above, it received spoils to the value of a few That we do not have a simple mistake (akhmās instead of khums) is borne out by the occurrence of the term akhmās describing the al-Madā'in booty sent to Medina also on a later occasion, see p. 36 below. It is, of course, also conceivable that we have to interpret the plural akhmās as an indication of the different khums parts acquired as a result of different conquests or battles.

the Banū 'Ajam b. Qanaṣ." 'Umar said, "Take his sword," granting it as booty to Jubayr. Not aware of the name 'Ajam, the people always said Lakhm. They went on: 'Umar entrusted Sa'd b. (Abī Waqqāṣ) Mālik with organizing the ṣalāt in the territory conquered and leading the military actions in it. Sa'd did so. Furthermore, 'Umar charged al-Nu'mān and Suwayd with the levying of [2456] the land tax. They were sons of 'Amr b. Muqarrin. Suwayd took charge of the land irrigated by the Euphrates and al-Nu'mān of that irrigated by the Tigris. They also constructed bridges. Then 'Umar sent as overseers—whereupon they resigned—Ḥudhayfah b. Asīd and Jābir b. 'Amr al-Muzanī. Thereupon he sent as overseers of the latter two Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān and 'Uthmān b. Ḥunayf.

Ṭabarī said: In this year, I mean the year 16 (637), the battle of Jalūlā' took place. This was reported to me by Ibn Ḥumayd, who said that he had been informed by Salamah on the authority of Ibn Isḥāq. Also al-Sarī wrote to me about this, mentioning that Shu'ayb had informed him about this on the authority of Sayf.

The Report about the Battle of Jalūlā' al-Waqī'ah[118]

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Ismā'īl b. Abī Khālid—Qays b. Abī Ḥāzim: After we had descended upon al-Madā'in and distributed the spoils that were there, having sent more than[119] one-fifth to 'Umar, and having populated it again with our own people, we stayed there for a while. Then there came to us the news that Mihrān had made his camp in Jalūlā' after he had a trench dug around it, and also that the people of al-Mawṣil had made their camp in Takrīt.

Al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Walīd b. 'Abdallah b. Abī Ṭaybah al-Bajalī—his father, gave the same report with the addition: Sa'd wrote to this effect to 'Umar, who wrote back, "Send Hāshim b. 'Utbah to Jalūlā' with twelve thousand men; give the command over the vanguard to al-Qa'qā' b. 'Amr, that over the right wing to [2457] Si'r b. Mālik and that over the left wing to 'Amr b. Mālik b.

118. See Yaqūt, Mu'jam, II, 107: al-waqī'ah is a word for "onslaught," the battle of Jalūlā' allegedly resulting in large numbers of casualties.

119. The Arabic reads akhmās rather than what we would expect, khums; see n. 117 above.

'Utbah; place the infantry of the army under the command of 'Amr b. Murrah al-Juhanī."

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Muhallab and Ziyād: 'Umar wrote to Sa'd, "If God defeats the two armies, the army of Mihrān and that of al-Anṭāq, order al-Qa'qā' to march on until he gets to (the region) between the Sawād and al-Jabal[120] at the farthest (position reached by) your armed forces."

'Amr and Sa'īd concurred with the account of the abovementioned transmitters: It was said about the men involved at Jalūlā' that, when the Persians, after their flight from al-Madā'in, finally reached Jalūlā' and the people of Ādharbayjān and al-Bāb were about to go their separate ways from the people of al-Jibāl and those of Fārs, they started to incite one another to fight saying, "If you disperse now, you will never get together again; this is a spot that sends us in different directions. So, come on, let us unite to face the Arabs here and let us fight them. If we win, that is what we want, and if we lose, then we will have performed our duty, thus creating an excuse for ourselves."[121] So they dug a moat and assembled within its perimeter under the command of Mihrān al-Rāzī. Yazdajird had passed through to Ḥulwān, where he alighted. He provided them with men and also left some of his wealth behind (in Jalūlā'). They stayed within their trench, which, except for its exits, was completely surrounded by hedges consisting of wooden pointed stakes.

According to 'Amr—'Āmir al-Sha'bī: Abū Bakr never used to ask anyone from the "people of the apostasy" [ahl al-Riddah] to help him in his warfare until he died. 'Umar did request their assistance, but he never entrusted a command to any of them except over a small contingent or even smaller units. He never gave up his custom of entrusting commands to Companions when he found someone worthy enough to wage his war for him. [2458] And if he did not find anyone (from among the Companions) cut out for this task, then he would readily scout around for a suitable Successor. But, until Islam had become firmly established, no one who had participated in the "war of the apostasy" was encouraged with a command, their commanders in those wars having been riff-raff in any case.

120. Al-Jabal (lit. "the mountain"), also called al-Jibāl (the plural of jabal) is the name of the mountainous region northeast of the Tigris between Iṣfahān and Hamadhān, see Yaqūt, Mu'jam, II, 15 f., 22f.; see also Le Strange, Lands, ch. XIII. Sawād means "cultivated area (sc. of Iraq)."

121. Or "having showed our valor," see Lane, 256, left column.

'Amr, Muḥammad, al-Muhallab, Ṭalḥah and Sa'īd concurred: Hāshim b. 'Utbah departed from al-Madā'in in Ṣafar of the year 16 (March 637) at the head of twelve thousand men, among whom were leading Emigrants and Helpers as well as eminent tribesmen, people who had not joined the "wars of the apostasy," but also those who had. Thus Hāshim marched from al-Madā'in to Jalūlā' in four days, until he arrived at the Persians' camp. He surrounded the camp and besieged them, the Persians at first holding out, not venturing out on sorties, unless they saw an advantage therein. The Muslims charged the Persian fortress in Jalūlā' in eighty raids, God granting them victory on every occasion. They showed themselves to be stronger than the unbelievers in spite of their wooden stakes; so the Persians surrounded themselves with ones made of iron.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Uqbah b. Mukram—Biṭān b. Bishr: When Hāshim swooped down upon Mihrān in Jalūlā', he laid siege to them lying behind their trench. The Persians mounted raids against the Muslims in large numbers and with much clamor. Hāshim made it his custom to tell his men, "The emergency (in which we find ourselves) will be decisive for the future."[122] Sa'd began to reinforce Hāshim's troops with horsemen who, when the last of these had arrived, finally presented themselves to the Muslims and, with them, marched against the enemy. Hāshim stood up among his men and said, [2459] "Show God your valor, that He may fulfill therewith your recompense and booty. Strive for God." So they went to face the enemy and fought. God sent a whirlwind over them which darkened the enemy('s free observation of the) terrain. The only thing open to them was to try and prevent the Muslims from engaging them in combat. Their cavalry tumbled down into their own trench and did not see any other way out than to make breaches (in the barricades) at the very spot where they were,[123] enabling their horses to climb (onto the bank), thus ruining their defense system. A rumor that that was going on reached the Muslims. They looked at the scene and said, "Let us attack them a second time; perhaps we can invade their stronghold or else we are prepared to die in the effort." So, when the Muslims moved in on them a second time, the enemy came out and set up around the trench, facing the Muslims, a barricade of iron-pointed stakes, so as to prevent the Muslim cavalry from attacking them. They left one spot in this barricade open for easy access by which they went out to face the Muslims. These last fought ferociously, more so than they had ever fought before except for the "night of clamor,"[124] only this time with even more determination and speed. Al-Qa'qā' b. 'Amr finally took a direction along which he fought his way forward toward the thoroughfare of the Persians' trench. He took up a position there and ordered someone to proclaim the following message: "Listen, Muslim warriors, this is your commander speaking; he has entered the enemy's trench and established a stronghold there. So now you move in on it, and let no one whom you find on your way prevent you from going down into it." He gave this order just to boost the morale of the Muslims. These last attacked, not doubting for a moment that Hāshim had indeed established a position in the trench.[125] Nothing withstood their attack until they ended up at the passage through the trench. Who else but al-Qa'qā' b. 'Amr did they find there! He had established himself firmly. The unbelievers started fleeing right and left, away from the clearance facing their trench. They perished in (the iron stakes) which they had set up against the Muslims. Their [2460] horses were injured and they had to return on foot, pursued[126] by the Muslims. Only an insignificant number got away. That day God killed one hundred thousand of them. The whole clearing was covered with corpses, in all directions. Hence Jalūlā' was called Jalūlā' al-Waqī'ah[127] on account of the dead bodies covering it.[128]

122. In Noth, 118, this expression is identified and analyzed as a topos.

123. Sc. presumably not wandering about in the trench until they arrived at one of its thoroughfares.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Ubaydallāh b. Muḥaf-

124. Sc. at al-Qādisiyyah.

125. Again I have adopted the reading of Ibn al-Athīr, II, 405, which in my opinion gives a better text.

126. I read ittaba'ahum instead of atba'ahum.

127. Waqī'ah, as we saw, has the connotation "massacre" or "onslaught."

fiz—his father: I was among the first of the Muslim hordes at the time they entered Sābāṭ and al-Muẓlim nearby.[129] I was also among the first to cross the Tigris and enter al-Madā'in. It was there that I acquired a statue which, had it been divided as booty among all the members of the Bakr b. Wā'il, it certainly would have satisfied them, what with all its precious stones. But I handed it over (to be added to the other spoils). We only stayed a short while in al-Madā'in until the news reached us that the Persians had gathered an immense force against us at Jalūlā'. They had sent their families ahead to al-Jibāl,[130] but had kept their riches with [2461] them. Sa'd sent 'Amr b. Mālik b. 'Utbah b. Uhayb b. 'Abd Manāf b. Zuhra to them.[131] The army of the Muslims that fought at Jalūlā' was twelve thousand strong. The commander of its vanguard was al-Qa'qā' b. 'Amr. Also, eminent people and horse-owning knights[132] marched in this army. When they passed Bābil Mahrūdh,[133] its dihqān concluded a peace treaty on the condition that he cover a jarīb[134] of land with dirhams (for the Muslim army). This he did, in this way obtaining a safeguard for his people.[135] Then the Muslim army moved on until it confronted the Persians at Jalūlā', where it appeared that these had dug a protecting trench around themselves, and especially their treasury.[136] By the fires

128. Perhaps the double entendre implied in the verb "to cover" (jallala), used in connection with the battle of Jalūlā', a name which is derived from the same root, is quite intentional.

129. Two localities near al-Madā'in, see Yaqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 569.

130. See n. 120 above.

131. He seems to be confused with 'Amr b. 'Utbah b. Nawfal b. Uhayb, who in this context is the general mentioned in Balādhurī; see the note in the text edition.

132. Horses were so valuable, and at the same time so expensive to keep in desert areas, that not all warriors could afford them. Compare the pitifully small number of warriors on horseback participating in the first maghāzī listed, for instance, in the Sīrah of Ibn Isḥāq.

133. The combination of these two geographical names cannot be explained with the help of Yaqūt, where the one and the other are not mentioned in tandem. Above, on p. 2421, a place Bābil was mentioned. Is the story of this peace treaty to be identified with the peace treaty concluded on p. 3?

134. See n. 103 above.

135. See also Yaqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 700.

136. See above p. 2457, where it is related that the king had left some of his treasures behind in Jalūlā'.

they had lit they swore one another solidarity and loyalty that no one was to take to his heels.[137]

The Muslims made their camp near the enemy. Every day troops (dispatched by the king) from Ḥulwān began to arrive at the fortress of the unbelievers. He thus reinforced them with as many people from al-Jibāl as he could find. The Muslims appealed to Sa'd for reinforcements too, which he duly dispatched, three times a contingent of two hundred cavalry. When the Persians became aware of the Muslims' being reinforced, they hastened to wage battle. That day the commander of the Muslim cavalry was Ṭulayḥah, the son of an unnamed father, one of the Banū 'Abd al-Dār. The Persian cavalry commander was Khurrazādh b. Khurrahurmuz. Both armies fought a tremendous battle, the Muslims never having been engaged in anything like it before. They first [2462] used up all the darts and arrows.[138] Then all the spears broke, whereupon they resorted to wielding their swords and battleaxes. Thus they fought all morning until noon. When it was time for the noon prayer ritual, the fighters performed this by just nodding their heads.

(They went on fighting) until, about halfway between noon and the mid-afternoon prayer ritual,[139] one Muslim detachment retreated and another came and took its place. Then, addressing himself to these men, al-Qa'qā' b. 'Amr said, "Has this battle scared you out of your wits?"[140] "Yes," they replied, "we wear ourselves out while they rest; when someone is exhausted, he is always afraid that his strength will fail him, unless his place is regularly taken by others."[141] So al-Qa'qā' said, "We will attack them, we will press hard on them, we will not retreat or draw back until God decides between us. So let us charge them as one

137. This is probably a description of a Zoroastrian ritual accompanying the swearing of oaths.

138. The Arabic has nabl and nushshāb; the first mentioned are short and shot with a crossbow or a bow equipped with an arrow guide, the second are longer and shot with a standard handbow, see J. D. Latham and W. F. Paterson, Saracen archery, London, 1970, index s.v. and esp. 188.

139. Approximately 2 p.m.

140. Which means, perhaps, ". . . to the point that you want to sneak away?"

141. I base this translation of yu'qabu on Lane, 2098, left column, three lines from the top.

man would,[142] until you are actually in the enemy's midst and let no one of you fail to live up to expectations!"[143] He advanced, the enemy's ranks were opened, not a single Muslim warrior budged from the passage through the trench, until the night drew its curtain over them. They ventured right and left. Then Ṭulayḥah, Qays b. al-Makshūh, 'Amr b. Ma'dī Karib and Ḥujr b. 'Adī approached among the reinforcements and arrived on the scene as night fell when the Muslims had just stopped fighting. Then al-Qa'qā' b. 'Amr had someone make a loud announcement, "Why do you desist from fighting, whilst your commander is actually down in the trench?" Then the unbelievers began to flee and the Muslims attacked again. I[144] go down into the trench,[145] (I enter their camp) and come to a tent in which there are pillows and clothes. Suddenly (I sense the presence of) a human form hidden under some blankets. I tear them away and what do I find? A [2463] woman, like a gazelle, radiant as the sun! I took her and her clothes and surrendered the latter as booty, but put in a request for the maid, that she may be allotted to me. Thus I acquired her as a concubine; she later bore me a child.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Ḥammād al-Burjumī—his otherwise unknown father: That day, Khārijah b. al-Ṣalt chanced upon a figurine of a she-camel of gold or silver, adorned with pearls and rubies, about as big as a young goat when placed on the ground. There was a figure of a rider on it, made of gold and similarly adorned. Khārijah brought both objects (to the spot where the loot was accumulated) and surrendered them.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Muhallab, 'Amr, Sa'īd, al-Walīd b. 'Abdallāh, al-Mujālid and 'Uqbah b. Mukram: Hāshim ordered al-Qa'qā' b. 'Amr to go after those Persians who had run away, so he searched for them all the way until he got to Khāniqīn.[146] When news of the defeat reached Yazdajird, he traveled from Ḥulwān to al-Jibāl. In the meantime, 142. That is, in a mass charge.

143. I adopt the interpretation of takdhīb listed in WKAS, I, 93, right column, below.

144. This is Muḥaffiz, the eyewitness of this account, see pp. 39–40 above

145. Since the Arabic has here and in what follows, the verbs in the imperfect, I have chosen to translate them as a historical present.

146. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 393: a locality between al-Madā'in and Hamadhān.

al-Qa'qā' arrived at Ḥulwān, and this because of something that 'Umar had written to Sa'd, "In case God defeats both armies, that of Mihrān and the one of al-Anṭāq, send al-Qa'qā' ahead until he gets to a region between the Sawād and al-Jabal at the furthest (position taken by) your armed forces. So al-Qa'qā' stopped at Ḥulwān with an army of men from different clans and from the Ḥamrā'[147] and he remained there until there was a general move from al-Madā'in to al-Kūfah. When Sa'd left al-Madā'in for al-Kūfah, al-Qa'qā' joined him. He had entrusted the administration of the border region to Qubādh, one of the Ḥamrā' who originally hailed from Khurāsān, and he had freely handed out booty from the area to those who had been present at its subjugation as well as to some of those who had stayed out at al-Madā'in.

They continued with similar accounts: Then they[148] wrote to 'Umar giving the news of the conquest of Jalūlā' and of al-Qa'qā''s arrival in Ḥulwān, and they asked 'Umar's permission to follow [2464] him to this place. But 'Umar refused, saying, "I wish there was a barrier between the Sawād and al-Jabal stopping the Persians from reaching us, and us from going out to them. The Sawād constitutes quite sufficient cultivable land for us; I prefer peace for the Muslims to plunder." They continued: When al-Qa'qā' was dispatched by Hāshim in pursuit of the Persians who had run away, he overtook Mihrān in Khāniqīn, where he killed him. Then he caught up with al-Fayruzān, but this man jumped (off his horse), letting it go, and clambered out of sight away into the mountains. Al-Qa'qā' made prisoners of war and sent some of them to Hāshim; so the latter and his men allocated these among themselves as part of the booty. The women among them were taken as concubines and bore their Muslim masters children. Since those prisoners of war are associated with Jalūlā', they are called "the captives of Jalūlā'." One of these women taken prisoner was al-Sha'bī's mother, who was first allotted to a man from the Banū 'Abs. She gave birth to a child, but the father died. Then Sharāḥīl took her unto him and she also bore him a child, 'Āmir,[149] who grew up among the Banū 'Abs.

147. The Ḥamrā' (literally, "the Red") were Persian defectors who settled with the Muslims in, among other places, al-Kūfah, where they were assigned special living quarters. They occupied a position among the Muslim forces comparable with that of the Asāwirah, Persian cavalry men, who settled among the Muslims in al-Baṣrah. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 280; Pellat, Le milieu, 22, 35; Morony, Iraq, 197 f.; Juda, 76.

148. Presumably, this word "they" refers to other victorious Muslim warriors who had stayed on in Jalūlā'.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah and al-Muhallab: The chattels[150] of Jalūlā' were distributed among them, each horseman receiving nine thousand (dirhams' worth) and nine animals. Then Hāshim returned to Sa'd with the war booty.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Amr—al-Sha'bī: God singled out as fay' booty[151] for the Muslims what they found in the Persians' camp at Jalūlā', what the Persians carried on their persons, as well as all the animals they had stationed there with the exception of a small number. In fact, those who did get away had not been able to take anything of their riches with them. The distribution of all that among the Muslims was in the hands of [2465] Salmān b. Rabī'ah, who in those days supervised the entire intake of the booty.[152] Therefore the Arab tribesmen used to call him "Salmān of the cavalry," especially since it was to that contingent of the fighting forces that he distributed in strictly equal portions, whereas in the allotment to other warriors he did not take such great pains. Thus he distinguished three different types among the thoroughbreds. The share of each cavalryman at Jalūlā' approached that acquired at al-Madā'in.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Mujālid and 'Amr—

149. In other words, this 'Āmir is 'Āmir b. Sharāḥīl al-Sha'bī (d. 103–10/721–8), the man who became later one of al-Kūfah's most famous legal experts. Moreover, Ṭabarī has preserved a large number of al-Sha'bī's historical reports.

150. The Arabic word used here is fay', a problematic term. Strictly speaking, it should not have been used here, fay' denoting mostly immovable property obtained from the enemy after the concluding of a peace treaty: land, estates, etc., not the movable booty acquired after a fight. See Yahyā b. Ādam, Kitāb al-kharāj, ed. Th. W. Juynboll, Leiden, 1896, 3: . . . al-ghanīmah mā ghalaba 'alayhi al-muslimūna bi'l-qitāl hattā ya'khudhūhu 'anwatan wa'l-fay' mā ṣūliḥū 'alayhi. mina'l-jizyah wa'l-kharāj. But its use here by al-Sha'bī in the following report may indicate a very early interpretation of the Qur'an locus. We might say that we find fay' here in its preclassical usage.

151. See previous note; this time not the noun fay' but the Qur'ānic verb afā'a is used.

152. The Arabic reads here al-aqbāḍ wa'l-aqsām; this seems to suggest that the terms convey different notions. We could conceivably read in aqbāḍ "all the takings including the fifth to be sent off later to Medina," and in aqsām "that part of the booty to be divided up into equal parts among the warriors" al-Sha'bī: The booty[153] to be distributed among the men at Jalūlā' amounted to thirty million (dirhams minus) the fifth which amounted to six million.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Muhallab and Sa'īd: Sa'd handed out free gifts[154] from the booty of Jalūlā' to those who had fought most bravely from among those warriors who had actually been present at that battle and also those valiant ones who were out at al-Madā'in. The fifth parts[155] of the booty consisting of gold and silver coins, vessels and garments he sent away with Quḍā'ī b. 'Amr al-Du'alī and he sent the prisoners of war with Abū Mufazzir al-Aswad. So on their way they went.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Zuhrah and Muḥammad b. 'Amr: (Sa'd) sent the fifth parts of the booty away with Quḍā'ī and Abū Mufazzir and the written record with Ziyād b. Abī Sufyān. The latter was the one who acted as the people's scribe and entered their names in the dīwān. When they had made their way to 'Umar, Ziyād spoke to him about what had happened and he gave him descriptions (of the situation in Iraq). Then 'Umar said, "Are you willing to address the people and tell them the same story as you have told me?" "To my mind," Ziyād [2466] answered, "there is no one on earth more respected than you; but, apart from you, why should I not be capable of giving this account?" So he stood up among the people and related to them what had happened (to the troops in Iraq), what these had achieved, and also that they were seeking 'Umar's approval to penetrate even more deeply into enemy territory. 'Umar said, "This is truly an eloquent speaker,"[156] and recited the verse (in khafīf):

Our forces have loosened
our tongues with their exploits.

153. Again the word ghanīmah, rather than the word fay' used here, would have suited the context better, see n. 150 above.

154. This means, not as part of the distribution into strictly equal portions to be carried out later.

155. In Arabic, akhmās; this indicates here probably the fifth parts of the booty acquired at various battles. We might also interpret the plural as referring to the five parts into which the Medina khums is divided.

156. Whatever the merit of the hypothesis may be that historians under the 'Abbāsids "purged" early historical accounts of all the faḍā'il elements eulogizing

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Zuhrah and Muḥammad—Abū Salamah: When the booty from Jalūlā'[157] was brought to 'Umar, he said, "This should not be hidden in any house until I have divided it." So 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf and 'Abdallāh b. Arqam spent the night standing guard over it in the courtyard of the mosque. When morning had come, 'Umar came with a large crowd and took away the covers (which had kept the booty out of sight), they having used mats. When he saw the rubies, chrysalites peridots and (other) gems, he burst into tears. Then 'Abd al-Raḥmān (b. 'Awf) said to him, "Why do you weep, Commander of the Faithful, is this not rather an occasion to be grateful?" Said 'Umar, "No, for heaven's sake, that is not the reason why I cry. By God, He never gave (such as) this to any people without that giving rise to mutual envy and hatred. I pray God that they won't quarrel over it; otherwise fighting will be their lot." 'Umar had agonized over the distribution of all the plunder acquired at al-Qādisiyyah, until the Qur'ānic verse "The spoils God has assigned. . ." (LIX, 7) occurred to him, i.e., in respect of the fifth.[158] So 'Umar assigned that fifth part of the booty to those people who were entitled to it, and he dealt with the fifth from Jalūlā' in exactly the same manner as he [2467] had done with that of al-Qādisiyyah, namely, convening the elders, asking their advice and obtaining a consensus from the Muslims. But first, among some Medinans he handed out free gifts[159] from that fifth.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Muhallab, Sa'īd and 'Amr: Sa'd gathered the people living around al-Madā'in and gave orders to count them. They were found to number more than 130,000, comprising more than 30,000 families. He calculated that that amounted to assigning to every Arab warrior (the supervision over) three Persian peasants with their families. Sa'd wrote to that effect to 'Umar. 'Umar wrote back the Umayyads and their henchmen, this undeniable glorification of Mu'āwiyah's "adopted brother" escaped deletion.

---

157. In Arabic, akhmās; strictly speaking, this should have read khums, see n. 155 above.

158. Sc., the fifth part of the spoils which were to go to the Prophet for him to distribute among himself, his relatives, the orphans, the poor, and eligible travelers.

159. In other words, before distributing the rest in strictly equal portions among those entitled.

saying, "Keep the (local) peasants in their present state except those who are hostile or the ones who ran away from you to your enemy and whom you subsequently captured. Treat the peasants (outside al-Madā'in) in the same way you treated the other peasants before them. When I write to you about (dealing with subjugated) people, always treat them in the same manner."[160] Then Sa'd wrote 'Umar asking him what to do with people who did not farm the land. 'Umar replied, "As for all those who are not peasants, you are to make your own decision concerning them,[161] as long as you have not already acquired their belongings as booty, that is to say, divided that up as such. As for the Persian who is hostile, abandons his land and vacates it, his land shall be yours (to do with as you like). When you summon them (to convert to Islam or else pay the jizā') and you receive the jizā' from them and you send them back (to their homesteads even) before the allotment (of the moneys thereby collected), then that constitutes "protection." In addition, if you do not summon them to convert to Islam, then everything they own constitutes lawful booty for you, destined for him whom God has indicated." The people who had been present at the battle of Jalūlā' received the largest share in the territorial booty (fay'), appropriating all the fay' land beyond al-Nahrawān and sharing with all the other fighters in the fay' divided before the Jalūlā' (battle).[162] They confirmed the peasants (on their land) and summoned the stubborn (to conclude a treaty with the Muslims). They imposed a land tax on the peasants and [2468] on those who, (after having run away first) returned to their land and accepted "protection." They singled out as special booty[163] what had belonged to the king, his family and those of his retinue who had remained stubborn, as destined for those indicated by God. It was not permitted to sell any piece of land situated be-

160. This last imperative is in the plural, an abrupt change from the imperatives in the singular preceding it. If we do not adopt the singular imperative listed in the apparatus as occurring in one manuscript (fa-ajri), the plural (fa-ajrū), for which Prym opted, may be taken as an indication that 'Umar did not only mean Sa'd to carry out his directives but also other Arabs in leading positions, perhaps including those who were yet to be posted in newly created administrative positions. For more details on tax matters, see Dennett, Conversion, 14–42.

161. Or conceivably, everything they own is yours.

162. Or conceivably, this way of an-Nahrawān.

163. The term used is istiṣfā', see *EI*², s.v. Ghanīma (Løkkegaard).

tween al-Jabal (in northern Iraq) and the mountains in the land of the Arabs except to those to whom God had granted this as fay' land. Similarly, they did not permit any piece of that land among the other people, at least not among those to whom God had not granted it as fay' land, namely those who were merely in the employ of the official tenants,[164] to whom (in other words) God had not assigned a share in the fay' land. The Muslims preserved fay' land in this manner and did not divide it up, because the benefit of a division would not be theirs. The same procedure was applied to marsh lands,[165] fire temple domains, postal stations, to what the king used to own and to the possessions of those who used to associate with him, also to the properties of those who were killed, as well as to stretches of rugged ground. Later on, some evil men asked the Sawād's administrative officers (wulāt) to divide that land, but the majority of Arab warriors, having rejected that, prevented them from so doing; then the wulāt espoused the majority's view and did not accede to the request saying, "Had it not been for the fact that you would come to blows, then we would have complied." If this request for the division of that land had come about as the result of a joint decision,[166] then it would have been divided among them.

[2469] According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Ṭalḥah b. al-A'lam—Māhān: No one of the people of the Sawād, except the inhabitants of some villages that were conquered by force, stuck to the agreement concluded with the Arab veterans, all sawādīs violating the agreements except those villages. When these others had been prompted to return (to obedience), they were once more placed under "protection." They had to pay the jizā' but enjoyed the Arabs' safeguard in exchange, except those regions formerly belonging to the royal family and those of their entourage, for those 164. This admittedly wordy rendering of the Arabic mimman yu'āmiluhum is based on the indication in Tāj, VIII, 36, l. 9, that, in Iraq, mu'āmalah is the equivalent of the term musāqāt used in the Ḥijāz. The latter term denotes some sort of land lease, Schacht, Introduction, index; Løkkegaard, Taxation, 94.

165. That is how I interpret the expression ājām "thicket" (in this case, of reeds) used in tandem with maghīḍ al-miyāh "places sometimes inundated, sometimes dry."

166. The Arabic expression used, 'an mala'in. Mala' is "assembly of elders." My translation is based on Lane, 2730, left column.

became ṣāfiyah[167] properties, namely, those situated between Ḥulwān and Iraq.[168] From the beginning, 'Umar had been content with the cultivable lands of the Sawād.[169]

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Ṭalḥah—Māhān: They[170] wrote to 'Umar asking him what to do with the ṣawāfī, so he wrote back, "Repair to the ṣawāfī that God has singled out for you and distribute their revenues among those whom God has indicated; four-fifths are to go to the army and one-fifth to me for me to distribute among those entitled to it. If the Arab fighters prefer to settle in the ṣawāfī, then that is their prerogative." When 'Umar had thus left the decision to them, they thought it best not to scatter over Persian territory.[171] Rather they kept the ṣawāfī as a ḥabīs[172] belonging to them, which they had someone, whom they all agreed on, administer. They would divide their revenues once every year and they would not have it supervised except by someone they unanimously agreed on. It turned out that they only used to agree on governors holding office in al-Madā'in and later those of al-Kūfah, after they had all moved thither.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Walīd b. Abdallāh b. Abī Ṭaybah—'Abdallāh b. Abī Ṭaybah: 'Umar wrote (to the people in Iraq) a letter, saying, "Take possession of your fay' lands, for if you don't, (the normal course of) affairs will grind to a halt because (too) much time has elapsed. By God, I have taken the necessary decision; I ask you[173] to be my witness before them, so testify!" [2470]

---

167. Its plural is ṣawāfī; this is a technical term denoting conquered lands and properties placed under special tutelage of the imām who, at his discretion, favored with the administration thereof those people who deserved to be rewarded particularly for special services rendered. These lands formerly belonged to either the ruling family of the enemy which, having been defeated, could no longer exert their rights over it, or other enemy families who had either perished or had abandoned their properties definitively. See Hinds, "Alignments," 350; Ṭabaṭabā'ī, Kharāj, 8f.

168. Presumably, the area between Ḥulwān and the north bank of the Tigris.

169. See p. 43 above.

170. Presumably, "the Arab leaders in Iraq."

171. In the apparatus and in Glossarium, p. CDII, it is suggested to read an lā yaftariqū fay'a bilādi 'l-'ajam, that is ". . . not to divide the Persian fay' land among themselves."

172. A technical term for an inalienable allotment or bequest, in this case consisting of enemy territory.

173. Presumably Sa'd is meant.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Walīd b. 'Abdallāh—'Abdallāh (b. Abī Ṭaybah): The peasants were to take care of the roads, bridges, markets, tilling of the soil and guide services. Besides, in exchange for protection,[174] they had to pay the jizā' commensurate with their economic ability. Also the dihqāns had to afford jizyah in exchange for Arab protection and they also had to watch all building activities. Furthermore, it was everyone's duty to show traveling Emigrants the way and receive them hospitably. Being shown hospitality was something God had bestowed upon them as an inherited privilege.

Al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Abd al-'Azīz b. Siyāh—Ḥabīb b. Abī Thābit gave a similar account: They said: The conquest of Jalūlā' occurred in Dhū al-Qa'dah of the year 16 on its first day,[175] nine months having elapsed between this event and the conquest of al-Madā'in. They all said: 'Umar's treaty concluded with the people enjoying "protection" stipulated that the state of "protection" would be considered as having ceased should they betray the Muslims to their enemies. Furthermore, if they should revile a Muslim, the terms of the treaty demanded that they would receive a crushing punishment. If they should fight with a Muslim, they would be killed. 'Umar in his turn took it upon himself to guard their safety, although he was not to be held responsible for any ignominious deed committed by passing troops against anyone named in the treaty.

Al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh and al-Mustanīr—Ibrāhīm gave a similar report.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Ṭalḥah—Māhān: Of all the Persians at Jalūlā', the people of al-Rayy had the most difficult [2471] time. They had been the defenders of the local people, but as a result of the battle of Jalūlā' they were wiped out.

They all went on to say: When the fighters at Jalūlā' had returned to al-Madā'in, they settled in their land concessions.[176] All 174. My rendering of the expression 'an aydīhim is suggested by Bravmann, Background, 199–212 See also Paul G. Forand in JESHO, XIV (1971) 32ff.; Dennett, 21.

175. November 24, 637.

176 The Arabic technical term is qaṭī'ah, plural qatā'i', see *EI*², s.v. Ḳaṭī'a (Cahen). One of the manuscripts has the term iqṭā'āt instead of qaṭā'i', this is probably a retrojection of what later also became an administrative term for concessions granted to meritorious servants of the state, who enjoyed, at first, the of the Sawād had become "protection" territory for them, except those properties formerly belonging to the Persian royal household and their staunch supporters, which God had set aside as ṣawāfī.[177] They all went on to say: When the news had reached the Persians of what 'Umar had said and deemed fit in respect of the Sawād and the land beyond, they said, "We'll be content with the same conditions that the Arabs are content with," whereas the Kurds[178] of every township were dissatisfied with the damage done to their arable lands.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Mustanīr b. Yazīd and Ḥakīm b. 'Umayr—Ibrāhīm b. Yazīd: The selling[179] of ṣawāfī lands between Ḥulwān and al-Qādisiyyah is not permitted, because they belong to whom God has given them.

Al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Amr b. Muḥammad—al-Sha'bī gave a similar report.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad b. Qays—al-Mughīrah b. Shibl: Jarīr (b. 'Abdallāh al-Bajalī) once purchased a piece of ṣawāfī land situated in the Sawād on the bank of the Euphrates. Thereupon he went to 'Umar and told him. 'Umar, disapproving of the sale, rescinded it and thereupon forbade the selling of any property that had not been divided among those with a right to it.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad b. Qays: I asked al-Sha'bī, "Was the Sawād conquered by force?" "Yes," he said, "all the land, except for some fortresses and strongholds, for some of these concluded peace treaties and some others were simply overpowered." I asked, "Did the people of the Sawād enjoy [2472] a form of 'protection' laid down in a treaty before some of them ran away?" "No," said al-Sha'bī, "but when they were summoned to embrace Islam or else pay tax, and consented to the latter revenues out of kharāj (land tax levied from the legal owners) minus the tithe imposed by the zakāt regulations, and later the usufruct of these concessions, see *EI*², s.v. Iḳṭā' (Cahen).

---

177. See n. 167 above.

178. Wellhausen exclaimed (Skizzen, VI, 155), "Was sollen hier die Kurden?" Yes, indeed what! Does this passage suggest that the Sawād had pockets of Kurdish inhabitants? Hinds suggests that we should read akarah, the plural of akkār "land cultivator."

179 Or "buying"; like sharā and bā'a (see n. 103 and pp. 47–48 above) ishtirā', which is used here, is a ḍidd.

which was duly collected, they then enjoyed official 'protection.'"

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Abd al-'Azīz—Ḥabīb b. Abī Thābit: None of the Sawād's inhabitants had an official peace treaty drawn up for them except the Banū Ṣalūbā, and the people of al-Ḥīrah, Kalwādhā, and some villages on the Euphrates. Then they broke faith, whereupon they were summoned to accept official "protection" but this was only after they had broken their agreement. Hāshim b. 'Utbah recited the following lines of poetry on the occasion of the battle of Jalūlā'[180] (in rajaz):

The fight at Jalūlā', the battle of Rustum,[181]
And, prior to that, the march on al-Kūfah,
The day of that wide, formidable[182] river[183]
Among other fierce fights of days now gone by,
Have colored my temples with hoar, they look aged,
Like white thaghām[184] flowers in honored Arabia.

Likewise, Abū Bujayd (Nāfi' b. al-Aswad) composed about this the following verses (in ṭawīl):

On th' day of the kill at Jalūlā' our squadrons
Rushed forward, attacking like glowering lions[185]
They crushed all the Persians, while I killed them off;
So perish, you impure cadavers of Magians!
Al-Fayruzān did get away by the skin
Of his teeth; but Mihrān they slew on th' day skulls were cleft.
They stayed in a spot where they were to meet death,
Interred under whirlwinds of dust.

---

180. As everywhere, an attempt has been made to render the following poems in rhythmic English; the admittedly ungrammatical stress mark on the second syllable of Jalūlā' has been placed there just for the sake of the rhythm.

181. He is Rustum b. al-Farrukhzādh, the general of Yazdajird III; the battle referred to is that of al-Qādisiyyah.

182. Literally, it says "holy" or "sacrosanct," but an Arab poet would probably not conceive of a river outside the peninsula as such.

183. This is probably a reference to that successful crossing of the Tigris prior to the conquest of al-Madā'in described above; see pp. 12 ff.

184. A certain white flower with which greying hair is often compared; according to Lane it grows in the mountains of Tihāmah and Najd.

185. See n. 180 above.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Muhallab, 'Amr and Sa'īd: 'Umar had written Sa'd a letter in which he said, "If God conquers Jalūlā' for you, send al-Qa'qā' b. 'Amr in pursuit of those who may get away, until he arrives at Ḥulwān, so that he may be able to help those Muslims arriving there later. May God preserve for you your Sawād land!" So when God had defeated the enemy at Jalūlā', Hāshim b. 'Utbah positioned himself there. Al-Qa'qā' b. 'Amr went forth in pursuit of the Persian soldiers as far as Khāniqīn with an army of men from different clans as well as from the Ḥamrā'. He made several prisoners and killed off those fighting men he caught up with. Mihrān was slain, but al-Fayruzān escaped. When news of the defeat of the people of Jalūlā' and the death of Mihrān reached Yazdajird, he moved out of Ḥulwān, departing in the direction of al-Rayy. In Ḥulwān he left behind a cavalry squadron under the command of Khusrawshunūm. Al-Qa'qā' drew nearer. When he reached Qaṣr-i Shīrīn,[185a] still a full parasang away from Ḥulwān, Khusrawshunūm marched out toward him, having sent al-Zaynabī, the dihqān of Ḥulwān, ahead. Al-Qa'qā' encountered the latter and they engaged in battle. Al-Zaynabī was killed, with both 'Amīrah b. Ṭāriq and a certain 'Abdallāh[186] contending for the credit of having killed him. So al-Qa'qā' gave that credit as well as the man's spoils to both, for them to divide between themselves. 'Amīrah viewed this with disdain. Khusrawshunūm fled and the Muslims took possession of Ḥulwān. Al-Qa'qā' settled the Ḥamrā' there and installed Qubādh as their head. Al-Qa'qā' remained there in control of the border garrison as well as the jizā', that is, after he had summoned them to convert to Islam or pay tax. Gradually they returned to their homesteads and conceded to pay the jizā', until Sa'd moved from al-Madā'in to al-Kūfah. Al-Qa'qā' joined him there after having left Qubādh in control of the garrison. Qubādh was of Khurāsānī origin. [2473] [2474]

In this year, I mean the year 16 (637), according to Sayf's account, the conquest of Takrīt (also) took place. That was in the month Jumādā (May–June).

185a. For a description of this palace, see Le Strange, Lands, 63.

186. He cannot be identified with certainty. Prym suggests that the name should be deleted. Is he perhaps the son of al-Mu'tamm?

The Account of the Conquest of Takrīt

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Muhallab and Sa'īd, al-Walīd b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Ṭaybah concurred with them: Sa'd wrote a letter (to 'Umar) concerning the inhabitants of al-Mawṣil, who had rallied under al-Anṭāq and advanced as far as Takrīt. They had dug a trench around themselves in order to defend its lands against Sa'd. He also wrote regarding the people rallying under Mihrān at Jalūlā'. So 'Umar replied concerning the matter of Jalūlā' as we have described already, and he also wrote about Takrīt and the rallying of the people of al-Mawṣil under the command of al-Anṭāq, saying, "Send 'Abdallāh b. al-Mu'tamm forth to al-Anṭāq, set Rib'ī b. al-Afkal al-'Anazī over his vanguard, al-Ḥārith b. Ḥassān al-Dhuhlī over his right wing and Furāt b. Ḥayyān al-'Ijlī over his left wing. Furthermore, give the command over the infantry to Hānī' b. Qays and that over the cavalry to 'Arfajah b. Harthamah." Thus [2475] 'Abdallāh b. al-Mu'tamm set out from al-Madā'in at the head of five thousand men. He marched to Takrīt until he descended upon al-Anṭāq in four days. This commander had with him, apart from (his) Byzantine contingent, some tribesmen from the Iyād, Taghlib and al-Namir tribes,[187] as well as some local dignitaries. They were all dug in behind trench fortifications. 'Abdallāh b. al-Mu'tamm besieged them for forty days, during which the Muslims stormed them in twenty-four successive attacks. These forces were possessed of less military prowess than the opposition at Jalūlā' and were dealt with more easily. (Realizing this), 'Abdallāh b. al-Mu'tamm dispatched a messenger to the Arab tribesmen (siding with al-Anṭāq), to summon them to embrace his cause and to give him assistance in the fight against the Byzantines, to which they wholeheartedly agreed. When the Byzantines saw that every sortie they made was a failure and that they were routed every time they marched against their enemy, they deserted their leaders and carried their belongings to their boats. Spies from Taghlib, Iyād and al-Namir brought 'Abdallāh b. al-

187. For the Iyād and their involvement with these Byzantine forces, see *EI*², s.v. Iyād (Fück), for Taghlib and al-Namir, see Caskel, II, 541 f and 444 (an-Namir b. Qāsiṭ). See also W. E. Kaegi, "Heraklius and the Arabs," in The Greek Orthodox Theological Review, XXVII (1982):109–33

Mu'tamm news of this and asked him to agree to peace with their fellow tribesmen. They informed him of their (and their fellow tribesmen's) willingness to embrace his cause. Ibn al-Mu'tamm sent word back telling them, "If you seriously desire peace, then testify that there is no god except God and that Muḥammad is His messenger; confirm what he has brought you from God. Then let us know what you think." The spies submitted these conditions to their respective tribes, who sent them back to Ibn al-Mu'tamm asserting they would accept Islam. Ibn al-Mu'tamm then told the delegation to go back to their people with the following order, "As soon as you hear us cry out, God is great!, know that we will have rushed to the gates nearest to us in order to attack the enemy by forcing our way in through them. You yourselves must then take up a position at the gates facing the Tigris, shout at the top of your voices, God is great!, and kill as many defenders as you can. Go now and see to it that your men carry this out." Then [2476]
Ibn al-Mu'tamm, with the Muslims, rushed toward those gates facing them and started to shout, God is great! Thereupon the Taghlib, Iyād and al-Namir followed suit, having taken position at the gates assigned to them. But the defenders thought that the Muslims had launched an attack on them from behind, having forced their way in via the gates facing the Tigris. They hastened in the direction of the gates at which the Muslims had taken position, where swordsmen, that is Muslim swordsmen, stopped them in their tracks. But also the swordsmen of Rabī'ah, who had embraced Islam the previous night, (descended upon them) from behind. Of all those who had defended the trench, no one escaped except those of the tribes of Taghlib, Iyād and al-Namir who had converted to Islam.

Before that, 'Umar had enjoined Sa'd, in case the enemy was defeated, to have 'Abdallāh b. al-Mu'tamm send Ibn al-Afkal al-'Anazī to al-Ḥiṣnān.[188] 'Abdallāh b. al-Mu'tamm therefore dispatched Ibn al-Afkal al-'Anazī to al-Ḥiṣnān. When the latter was 188. According to Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 275, al-Ḥiṣnān, which means literally "the two fortresses," was the name of a certain locality without indicating where that was. Ibn al-Athīr, II, 408, who for once gives more information than Ṭabarī, says that with these are meant Nīnawā (= Nineveh) and al-Mawṣil, twin cities on the Tigris. Checking this information in Yāqūt, we only find under Nīnawā a single reference to the "two fortresses" (Mu'jam, IV, 870, ult.).

about to set out, Ibn al-Mu'tamm said to him, "Try to outrun the news (of the conquest of Takrīt). Travel without taking a rest in the afternoon, or at night for that matter." Along with him, Ibn al-Mu'tamm dispatched the Taghlib, Iyād and al-Namir tribesmen. Ibn al-Afkal positioned them up front under the command of 'Utbah b. al-Wa'l, one of the Banū Sa'd b. Jusham, Dhū al-Qurṭ, Abū Wadā'ah b. Abī Karib, Ibn Dhī al-Sunayna, who was later to [2477] die of rabies, Ibn al-Ḥujayr al-Iyādī and Bishr b. Abī Ḥawṭ, each one of these commanding his own contingent. They did arrive at al-Ḥiṣnān ahead of the news (that Takrīt had been taken), and when they were at a short distance (from the twin cities), they sent 'Utbah b. al-Wa'l forward who immediately demanded that victory be conceded to him, in addition to booty and a free opportunity to return.[189] After that, Dhū al-Qurṭ was sent forward, then Ibn Dhī al-Sunayna, Ibn al-Ḥujayr and Bishr. They halted at the gates, after having taken up a position there. The swiftest horsemen approached, with Rib'ī b. al-Afkal hurtling down upon the enemy in al-Ḥiṣnān. No sooner had they drawn up abreast with the cities, than the besieged shouted out their willingness to conclude a peace treaty. Those who were willing to accept a treaty stayed on, while those who refused fled. Finally, 'Abdallāh b. al-Mu'tamm approached. When he had arrived at the cities, he summoned those who had been obstinate until that moment, as well as those who had departed to accept Islam, and he pledged that he would fulfil his promises to those who had stayed on. Gradually, those who had run away returned, those who had stayed behind rejoiced, and all of them were granted "protection" and safety.

They divided the spoils of Takrīt up into lots, each of one thousand dirhams, every mounted soldier receiving three thousand and every infantry man one thousand. Then they sent the fifths away in the care of Furāt b. Ḥayyān and news of the victory (to 'Umar) with al-Ḥārith b. Ḥassān. Rib'ī b. al-Afkal was entrusted with further military operations at al-Mawṣil, and tax gathering was in the hands of 'Arfajah b. Harthamah.

189. Qafala "to return" also conveys the sense that the enemies give the assurance that they will not pursue the retreating Muslim fighters, see Lisān, s.v. q-f-l.

In this same year, I mean the year 16 (637), the conquest of Māsabadhān also took place.

The Account of the Conquest of Māsabadhān

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Ṭalḥah, Muḥammad, Muhallab, 'Amr and Sa'īd: When Hāshim b. 'Utbah returned from Jalūlā' to al-Madā'in, the news reached Sa'd that Ādhīn b. al-Hurmuzān had brought together a military force with which he had marched to the plain. Sa'd wrote about this development to 'Umar who wrote back, "Send Ḍirār b. al-Khaṭṭāb with an army to stop them; set over its vanguard Ibn al-Hudhayl al-Asadī and over its two wings 'Abdallāh b. Wahb ar-Rāsibī, a confederate of the Bajīlah tribe, and al-Muḍārib al-'Ijlī, son of so-and-so." So Ḍirār b. al-Khaṭṭāb, who was one of the Banū Muḥārib b. Fihr, marched out with a military force with Ibn al-Hudhayl over the vanguard, until he reached the plain of Māsabadhān. The armies came face-to-face at a spot called Bahandaf where they engaged in combat. The Muslims pounced on the unbelievers. Ḍirār took Ādhīn captive and held him. The latter's army was routed, so Ḍirār placed Ādhīn in front[190] and had him beheaded. Then he marched forward in pursuit (of those who had run away) until he came to al-Sīrawān. Thus he took Māsabadhān by force. Its inhabitants scattered in al-Jibāl. Ḍirār summoned them to embrace his cause, to which they consented. He stayed on the spot until Sa'd moved out of al-Madā'in. After receiving the latter's message, he came to al-Kūfah and deputed Ibn al-Hudhayl over Māsabadhān, which was one of the access routes to al-Kūfah. [2478]

In this year, the battle of Qarqīsiyā' also occurred, in the month Rajab (August).

The Account of the Battle That Took Place at Qarqīsiyā'

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Ṭalḥah, Muḥammad, al-Muhallab, 'Amr and Sa'īd: Hāshim b. 'Utbah returned from Jalūlā' to al-Madā'in. In the meantime, concentrations of people of al- [2479]

190. Does that mean "for everybody to see?"

Jazīrah had gathered and assisted Heraklius against the garrison of Ḥimṣ, and they sent a military force to the people at Hīt. Sa'd wrote to this effect to 'Umar, who wrote back, "Send 'Umar b. Mālik b. 'Utbah b. Nawfal b. 'Abd Manāf with an army to fight them. Appoint over its vanguard al-Ḥārith b. Yazīd al-'Āmirī, and Rib'ī b. 'Āmir and Mālik b. Ḥabīb as commanders of its two wings. So 'Umar b. Mālik marched off with his army in the direction of Hīt, having placed al-Ḥārith b. Yazīd over the vanguard, until he descended upon those who had positioned themselves at Hīt, where they had dug themselves in behind a trench. When 'Umar b. Mālik saw their resistance in this trench and how they had found shelter there, he became impatient. He left his tents as they were pitched, with al-Ḥārith b. Yazīd in command of the remaining troops of the besieging forces, and marched out with the other half of his army, taking a direct route until he descended out of the blue on Qarqīsiyā', which he conquered by force. The inhabitants agreed to pay the jizā'. Then he wrote to al-Ḥārith b. Yazīd saying, "If those (to whom you are laying siege) agree to a settlement, leave them and let them out. If not, dig a trench around their trench with your gates facing theirs, until I make up my mind (what to do next)." The besieged agreed, however, to consent to a peace treaty, so the besieging warriors joined 'Umar (b. Mālik's) army again, while the locals were united once more with the people of their places of origin.

Al-Wāqidī said: In this same year, 'Umar banished Abū Miḥjan
[2480] al-Thaqafī[191] to Bāḍi'.[192] He went on: Also in this year, 'Umar's son[193] married Ṣafiyyah bint Abī 'Ubayd.[194] He continued: In this year, Māriyah, the umm walad[195] of the Messenger of God and the mother of (his son) Ibrahim passed away. 'Umar performed the funeral prayer for her and had her buried in the month Muḥarram

191. For some amusing anecdotes about this man, see Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, VII, 260–5.

192. According to Yāqūt, Mu'jam I, 471, this is the name of an island off the Yemen coast.

193. This is 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar, who died in 73 (693).

194. She is the sister of the notorious rebel al-Mukhtār.

195. An umm walad is a female slave who has borne a child to her master and who automatically becomes a free person upon his death. On Māriyah, see Kaj Öhrnberg, "Māriya al-qibṭiyya unveiled," in Studia Orientalia Societatis Fennicae, LV (1983):14.

(February) in the Baqī'.[196] He went on: Also in this year, the (Islamic) dating system was inaugurated as from Rabī' I/April–May.

He continued: According to Ibn Abī Sabrah—'Uthmān b. 'Ubaydallāh b. Abī Rāfi'—(Sa'īd) b. al-Musayyab: The first to fix the (Islamic) dating system was 'Umar after two and a half years of his caliphate had elapsed. This was written as of the year sixteen after the Hijrah, in consultation with 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib.[197]

According to 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Ḥakam—Nu'aym b. Ḥammād—('Abd al-'Azīz b. Muḥammad) al-Darāwardī—'Uthmān b. 'Ubaydallāh b. Abī Rāfi'—Sa'īd b. al-Musayyab: 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb convened the people and asked them, "From what day shall we start using a new Islamic dating system?" 'Alī answered, "From the day the Messenger of God embarked upon the Hijrah leaving the land of polytheism behind." 'Umar followed this suggestion.

According to 'Abd al-Raḥmān—Ya'qūb b. Isḥāq b. Abī 'Attāb—Muḥammad b. Muslim al-Ṭā'ifī—'Amr b. Dīnār—Ibn 'Abbās: The (Islamic) dating system was (taken as beginning in) the year in which the Messenger of God traveled to Medina and in which 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr was born.

(Ṭabarī says:) In this year, 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb led the people on the pilgrimage. According to al-Wāqidī, he had left Zayd b. Thābit in control of Medina. That year 'Attāb b. Asīd was 'Umar's gover- [2481] nor in Mecca, 'Uthmān b. Abī al-'Āṣ in al-Ṭā'if, Ya'lā b. Umayyah in Yemen, al-'Alā' b. al-Ḥaḍramī over al-Yamāmah and al-Baḥrayn,[198] Ḥudhayfah b. Miḥṣan in 'Umān. Abū 'Ubaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ governed all of Syria for 'Umar and Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ was stationed in al-Kūfah. In charge of the judiciary of al-Kūfah was Abū Qurrah, while al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah governed al-Baṣrah and the surrounding territory. Rib'ī b. al-Afkal commanded the military operations (still to be carried out) in al-Mawṣil, while

196. The Baqī' is an area in Medina in which their dead were buried.

197. The first day of the Islamic calendar is July 16, 622, the day when the Hijrah from Mecca to Medina is said to have begun

198. Contrary to today, when Baḥrayn is just the island in the Gulf, in those days the name denoted the entire coastal area along the Gulf between al-Baṣrah and 'Umān, as it says in Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 506. Al-Yamāmah is the region between al-Baḥrayn and Mecca.

'Arfajah b. Harthamah was in charge of the collecting of its kharāj. That is what some experts say; others claim that both military operations as well as kharāj were the responsibility of 'Utbah b. Farqad; another opinion has it that all this was in the hands of 'Abdallāh b. al-Mu'tamm. Finally, 'Iyāḍ b. Ghanm al-Fihrī[199] was governor in al-Jazīrah.

199. The Arabic text has al-Ash'arī, but see Glossarium, p. DCXX, and Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 757.

The Events of the Year 17

(JANUARY 23, 638–JANUARY 11, 639)

In this year the founding[200] of al-Kūfah took place and Sa'd moved there with his people from al-Madā'in, all this according to the account and the transmitted material of Sayf b. 'Umar.

The Reason Why Those Muslims Who Moved from al-Madā'in to al-Kūfah Did So, and the Reason for Their Planning of al-Kūfah, According to Sayf

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Muhallab, 'Amr and Sa'īd: After the conquest of Jalūlā' and Ḥulwān, after al-Qa'qā' b. 'Amr's settling in the latter with his men, after the conquest of Takrīt and the twin fortresses (i.e., Nīnawā and al-Mawṣil), and after 'Abdallāh b. al-Mu'tamm and Ibn al-Afkal had arrived there with their men, messengers brought all that news to 'Umar.[201] When 'Umar had seen them, he exclaimed, [2482]

200. In Arabic, ikhtiṭāṭ.

201. The Arabic original has the nonstructure of an anacoluthon. By disregarding the "and" preceding "approached" (the wa- of qadimat, l. 2), the sentence is straightened out.

"By God, how different you look from when you set out! Messengers carrying the news of al-Qādisiyyah and al-Madā'in came to me looking exactly the same as at their departure. But you look worn out. What caused that?" "The unhealthiness of that region," they answered. So 'Umar looked into their needs and dismissed them as quickly as possible. Among the messengers of 'Abdallāh b. al-Mu'tamm there were 'Utbah b. al-Wa'l, Dhū al-Qurṭ, Ibn Dhī al-Sunayna, Ibn al-Ḥujayr and Bishr. All of these drew up a treaty with 'Umar on behalf of the Banū Taghlib. 'Umar agreed with them that those who converted to Islam would have the same privileges and duties as the Muslims. Those who refused to embrace Islam were to pay the jizā'. Pressure to accept Islam was to be exerted by the Arab tribesmen only on those tribesmen living in the peninsula itself. The messengers said, "(If that is your condition) then they might flee, cut themselves off (from their kinsmen) and become like Persians; would it not be better if they were to pay the Islamic alms tax (i.e. the ṣadaqah)?" "No," 'Umar replied, "nothing other than the jizā' (will be levied from them)." "Then, please, make the rate of their jizā' the same as the alms tax paid by Muslims, that would be their only wish," they suggested. 'Umar agreed to this on the condition that they would not bring up in a Christian way children whose parents had embraced Islam. They said, "We promise you that." So these Taghlibīs, and those of the Banū al-Namir and Banū Iyād who accepted their leadership, attached themselves to Sa'd[202] in al-Madā'in and, a little later, assisted him in the planning of al-Kūfah, while those who wanted, be they dhimmī or Muslim,[203] stayed on in their own lands on the conditions set by 'Umar and concluded for them (by their representatives).

[2483] According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Ibn Shubrumah—al-Sha'bī: Ḥudhayfah (b. al-Yamān) wrote to 'Umar telling him that the Arab tribesmen were getting fatter,[204] while their vigor was on the decline and their complexions sallow. Ḥudhayfah was at the time staying with Sa'd.

202. The technical term for "attach" used here is hājara.

203. For a detailed analysis of the conditions of the pact concluded with these Christian Arabs, see A. Noth, "Die literarisch überlieferten Verträge," BOS, N.S 27/1.

204. This does not imply that they were in a state of well-being, but rather the opposite.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah and their authorities: 'Umar wrote to Sa'd, "Enlighten me as to what caused the complexion of the Arab tribesmen to change and their flesh (to become flabby)." So Sa'd wrote back, "The unhealthiness of al-Madā'in and the Tigris region has made the tribesmen become flaccid and has definitively changed their complexion." 'Umar replied, "No land suits Arab tribesmen except that which suits their camels. Therefore, dispatch Salmān and also Ḥudhayfah—the two principal scouts of the Muslim army—to reconnoitre; let them look for a suitable place to settle on the edge of the desert and (not entirely surrounded by, but with easy access to) the water,[205] so that no major river or bridge separates you from us here."

There was nothing to do with the army but that Sa'd entrusted it to a special man.[206] So he sent Salmān and Ḥudhayfah away (to survey the area). Salmān went off finally ending up in al-Anbār. He wandered around west of the Euphrates without ever chancing upon a spot with which he was really satisfied, until he came to a place called al-Kūfah. Ḥudhayfah went off, too, wandering around east of the Euphrates, similarly dissatisfied with everything he saw, until he also arrived at this place al-Kūfah. Al-Kūfah was (so called because its soil was) gravel, everywhere the sand was reddish of the sort called "coarse,"[207] mixed with the gravel. A piece of land like that is called a kūfah.[208] The two scouts arrived there and found three Christian monasteries, Dayr Ḥurqah, Dayr Umm 'Amr and Dayr Silsilah,[209] with huts made of reeds scattered in [2484]

205. This is the—perhaps somewhat wordy—rendering of the words barriyyan baḥriyyan; in Glossarium, p. CXXX, it is suggested that the words mean respectively "bordering on the desert, on a river."

206. As so often is the case, this not altogether unambiguous sentence is lacking in Ibn al-Athīr's account which, as a rule, only faithfully follows Ṭabarī's when the interpretation of the text is straightforward and unproblematic.

207. In Arabic, sihlah, which also means "gravel."

208. Cf. WKAS, I, 439 f.; also Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 322. From this last source it appears that the etymology is dubious, however.

209. Nothing else seems to be known about these; this is the only occurrence in Ṭabarī, while Yāqūt does not list them in his Mu'jam.

between. The site pleased them both. They alighted and performed a prayer ritual, each of them reciting:

O God, Lord of heaven and what it covers
Lord of the earth and what it carries
By the wind and what it scatters
By the stars and what they topple
By the seas and what they drown
By the demons and what they delude
By the spirits[210] and what they possess

Bless us in this gravelly site and make it an abode of firmnéss.[211]

Thereupon they wrote a report to Sa'd.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. Ṣafwān—Umayyah b. Khālid—Abū 'Awānah—Ḥuṣayn b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān: When, on the day of Jalūlā', the enemy had been defeated, Sa'd recalled the army.[212] When 'Ammār (b. Yāsir) had arrived,[213] he left with the forces for al-Madā'in. But they did not like it there. 'Ammār asked, "Do the camels thrive in this place?" "No," was the answer, "because of the mosquitoes." 'Ammār commented, "'Umar once said that Arab tribesmen won't be healthy in a region in which their camels do not thrive." He went on: Therefore 'Ammār departed with the army and in the end settled in al-Kūfah.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Makhlad b. Qays (al-'Ijlī)—his father—al-Yusr b. Thawr:[214] After[215] we had alighted there, the Muslims found al-Madā'in to be insalubrious, being irritated by dust and flies. 'Umar wrote to Sa'd ordering him to send scouts to select a (suitable) site on firm ground but with easy

---

210. I read khiṣṣān ("familiars") instead of khiṣṣāṣ ("huts").

211. The cripple rhyme "possess—firmnéss" is meant to resemble the equally cripple rhyme in the Arabic ajannat-thabāt. See also n. 180 above, and Appendix I.

212. Literally, it says, "he returned with the army," but that does not fit the known circumstances.

213. This 'Ammār, a stalwart Muslim from the Aws tribe and a confederate of the Makhzūm clan, had been sent by 'Umar to Iraq to give the Arab leaders there a helping hand.

214. This name should probably read (see Glossarium, p. DCXX) al-Nusayr b. Daysam b. Thawr al-'Ijlī.

215. Here I have broken up a very long sentence into a number of short ones.

access to the water,[216] ". . . . for Arab tribesmen only thrive in regions where their camels and sheep are doing well." Then [2485] 'Umar asked someone on the spot[217] what the area looked like where the Muslim warriors were operating. So a certain leading Arab tribesman, who had seen (with his own eyes what the situation in) Iraq was like, drew 'Umar's attention to al-Lisān. The elevated site planned for al-Kūfah is called the "Tongue,"[218] because it (is a tongue-shaped stretch of land which) lies between two river arms of the Euphrates (stretching out) all the way to a certain well, namely that of the Banū Ḥadhdhā'. Arab tribesmen used to say, the land "sticks out its tongue in the countryside." What borders on the Euphrates of that tongue of land is called al-Milṭāṭ, and what is alongside al-Ṭīn[219] is called al-Nijāf.[220] Thus 'Umar wrote to Sa'd ordering him to go ahead with the founding of al-Kūfah.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Muhallab, 'Amr and Sa'īd: When Salmān and Ḥudhayfah approached Sa'd informing him about the site of al-Kūfah and, at the same time, a letter from 'Umar containing the same information had arrived, Sa'd wrote to al-Qa'qā' b. 'Amr saying, "Leave Qubādh in charge of the warriors at Jalūlā', along with those who initially followed you to join those of the Ḥamrā' who had been with him all the time." Al-Qa'qā' obeyed, and he presently made his way to Sa'd amidst his forces. Sa'd also wrote to 'Abdallāh b. al-Mu'tamm saying, "Leave in charge of al-Mawṣil that Muslim b. 'Abdallāh who was captured in the course of the battle of al-Qādisiyyah and was one of the Asāwirah[221] who responded to your call to embrace Islam, along with those Asāwirah who are with you." He obeyed and soon made his way among his troops to Sa'd. Sa'd (himself) departed with his forces from al-Madā'in. Finally, in the month Muḥarram of the year 17 (January–February 638),[222] he set up camp at al-Kūfah, fourteen lunar months having elapsed since 216. Again the expression barrī baḥrī is used, see n. 205 above.

217. That is, "available in Medina."
218. See above, pp. 1–2.
219. The reading is doubtful; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 571, lists a fortress near al-Ḥīrah with that name.
220. This place name could not be traced.
221. See n. 147 above.

the battle of al-Madā'in. From the start of 'Umar's rule until the [2486] foundation of al-Kūfah was a period of three years and eight months. It was in the fourth year of his rule in the month Muḥarram of the year 17 of the Muslim calendar that the foundation of al-Kūfah began. The warriors had been given their stipends in al-Madā'in in that same month, before they set out, (while the previous time they had received stipends was) in Muḥarram of the year 16[223] at Bahurasīr.

In Muḥarram of the year 17 the present-day settlement of the Baṣrans was established, that being after three previous temporary camps,[224] from each of which they had departed.[225] Their settling in al-Baṣrah came about in the same month in which the people of al-Kūfah settled.

According to al-Wāqidī—al-Qāsim b. Ma'n: The people settled in al-Kūfah at the end of the year 17/638. He went on: Ibn Abī al-Ruqqād informed me from his father: They settled there, when the year 18 (639) had just begun.

The Account Is Resumed Once More by Sayf

They continued: 'Umar wrote to Sa'd b. (Abī Waqqāṣ) Mālik and 'Utbah b. Ghazwān ordering that they, together with their people, should, every spring season, pasture their animals on the best of the lands under their control, and he ordered that the people be given supplementary allocations[226] in the month Rabī'[227] of every year and their stipends every Muḥarram. They should, furthermore, receive their share in the fay' every time when Sirius rises[228] and the revenues are forthcoming. Before settling in al-Kūfah, the people had been paid a stipend twice.

---

222 That is, between January 23 and February 21, 638.

223. That is, between February 2 and March 3, 637.

224. The Arabic word mentioned here is nazalāt, which I took to be the plural of nazlah, the nomen vicis of nuzūl, mentioned in Lisān

225. In the following sentence, I have departed from the Ṭabarī text, because that does not seem to make sense. Instead I have opted for the text as preserved in Ibn al-Athīr, II, 411: wa 'staqarra manzīluhum fīhā fī al-shahri alladhī nazala ahlu al-Kūfah.

226. See EI[2], s.v. ma'ūna (Crone).

227. It is indeed somewhat confusing that, in this year 17 (638), spring (which is rabī' in Arabic) coincided with the months al-Rabī' I and al-Rabī' II

228. That is, in the middle of July, see Lane, 1560. The rising of Sirius, also called the Dog Star, still marks a new season for the Marsh Arabs described by Wilfred Thesiger (The Marsh Arabs, Penguin edition, Harmondsworth, 174).

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Makhlad b. Qays—someone from the Banū Asad called al-Maghrūr:[229] When Sa'd had settled in al-Kūfah, he wrote to 'Umar saying, "I have taken up residence on a site covered with pebbles;[230] it is situated between al-Ḥīrah and the Euphrates, one side borders on dry land, the other borders on the water.[231] Dry as well as tender thistles[232] abound [2487] there. I have left a free choice to the Muslims in al-Madā'in; those who have preferred to stay on in the latter, I have left behind there as a garrison. Thus a number of people from different clans have remained (in al-Madā'in), the majority of them being from the Banū 'Abs." According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, 'Amr, Sa'īd and al-Muhallab: When the people destined for al-Kūfah had arrived there, and the people destined to populate al-Baṣrah had settled there, they formed themselves into 'irāfāt[233] (to find out who was missing) and whoever[234] they had lost track of was thus returned to them.

Then the people of al-Kūfah asked permission to use reeds as building material. The people of al-Baṣrah put in the same request, whereupon 'Umar said, "Living in an army camp is easier for you to mount your military operations from and is more convenient, but I do not like to disagree with you; what is this reed anyway?" They answered, "It is like 'ikrish (i.e. flax), when it is watered it puts forth stems and produces reeds." 'Umar replied, "You do what you think best." Thus the people of the two garrison cities used reeds as building material. Then fires occurred in al-Kūfah, as well as in al-Baṣrah, the most vehement one occurring in the former. Eighty roof structures[235] were destroyed, not a single stem of reed being spared. That was in the month Shawwāl,[236] the people never stopped talking about it. Sa'd dispatched a few of the victims of those fires to 'Umar to try and obtain the

229. Glossarium, p. DCXX: al-Ma'rūr b. Suwayd al-Asadī.

230. In Arabic, kūfah.

231. The Arabic expression used here is again barriyyan baḥriyyan, see n. 205 above.

232. Presumably making excellent camel fodder.

233. For the units called 'irāfāt or 'arāfāt, see Hinds, "Alignments," 347, 349, 351, and EI[2] s.v. 'Arīf (Cahen).

234. I interpret mā (lit. "what") as referring to people, rather than to inanimate objects; this constitutes one of the peculiarities of Sayf's usage.

235. This seems the best rendering of 'arīsh

236. That is, October–November.

latter's permission to use bricks for building. Thus they approached 'Umar with the news about the fire and what losses they had incurred. No detail was left unmentioned; they did not touch on anything without asking his advice. 'Umar said, "Go ahead, [2488] but let nobody build more than three rooms for himself and do not let one build higher houses than the other. If you adhere to what is generally recognized as proper,[237] you will thrive." With that advice, the delegation returned to al-Kūfah. 'Umar wrote a letter containing similar advice to 'Utbah and the people of al-Baṣrah. The supervision over the settling of the inhabitants of al-Kūfah lay in the hands of Abū al-Hayyāj b. Mālik, while the same task in respect of the inhabitants of al-Baṣrah was undertaken by 'Āṣim b. al-Dulaf Abū al-Jarbā'.

They continued: 'Umar had enjoined the delegation to carry out what he had said, and he ordered the people (in Iraq) not to construct buildings that were higher than the "norm." "But what is this 'norm'?" they had asked. "The 'norm,'" 'Umar said, "is that which keeps you well away from wastefulness but, at the same time, won't make you lose sight of what you are aiming at."

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Muhallab, 'Amr and Sa'īd: When they had agreed on the building plan of al-Kūfah, Sa'd sent a message to Abū al-Hayyāj and informed him of 'Umar's letter containing instructions for the roads. 'Umar had ordered that (main) thoroughfares of forty cubits (in width) be planned.[238] In between these[239] there should be (other) roads each thirty cubits wide, and between the former and the latter (again others) twenty cubits wide; finally, the side alleys should be seven cubits wide, no passageway should be narrower than that. The plots of land[240] had to measure sixty cubits (square?) except the one assigned to the Banū Ḍabbah.[241] The people who had insight in those matters assembled to carry out measurements, until Abū al-Hayyāj divided up all the available space among them, when they had decided on a certain plot.

---

237. The Arabic has here the major technical term al-sunna.

238. That may have been well over twenty meters, see n. 103 above, where the cubit measured a little over fifty centimeters.

239. Or conceivably, "parallel with."

240. The Arabic word used here is qaṭā'i'.

241. See *EI*², s.v. Ḍabba (Caskel).

The first thing to be marked out in al-Kūfah and that was subsequently erected, when they had finally decided to make a beginning with building, was the mosque. It was situated in what is now the market area of the soap manufacturers and date sellers. [2489] Its ground plan was traced out. Then a man stationed himself in the center of this ground plan. He was an archer of prodigious strength. He shot (one arrow) to his right and ordered that anyone who wanted could start building for his own beyond where the arrow had landed. (Then he did the same with an arrow that he shot to the left.[242]) Next he shot an arrow straight ahead of him and one in the opposite direction and ordered that anyone who wanted could start building for himself beyond where these two arrows had landed. Thus they left a square for the mosque that the people could enter from all sides.[243] Over its front part,[244] a roof structure was built, that had no (walls at) either side, nor at the front or back. The whole square was meant for the people to congregate in, but in a way that they (need) not stand packed. In the same manner, other mosques were laid out, except the masjid al-ḥarām;[245] in those days they did not try to emulate that out of respect for its holiness. The roof structure of al-Kūfah's mosque measured two hundred cubits in width supported by columns of marble. Its ceiling, resembling the ceilings in Byzantine churches, was (taken from a palace formerly belonging) to the Persian kings.[246] They marked (the outer perimeter of) the congregation area by means of a ditch, lest anyone should inadvertently and boldly embark on building inside that perimeter for his own. They built a house for Sa'd, separated from the mosque by a nar-

242. Although this sentence is lacking in the Arabic original, Prym thinks, probably rightly, that it must have been part of the text originally, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 323. Its inadvertently having been omitted in the manuscripts from which Prym worked constitutes in my opinion a clear case of homoioteleuton.

243. What follows is riddled with what appear to be architectural terms not explained in the standard dictionaries; while doing this translation I benefitted from O. Grabar, The formation of Islamic art, New Haven 1973, esp. 113, and the ground plan of the mosque of al-Kūfah, fig. 35.

244. We will see later (see also Grabar, illustration no. 35) that that is its part facing southwest.

245. That is, the mosque that houses the Ka'bah in Mecca.

246. This interpretation is tentative, but in the equivalent passage in Ibn al-Athīr, II, 412, it is implied that the marble pillars once stood in a Persian royal palace in al-Ḥīrah.

row alley of two hundred cubits (in length).[247] The treasure chambers were incorporated in this house. It is the present-day citadel of al-Kūfah. Rūzbih (b. Buzurgumihr) built it for Sa'd out of baked bricks previously used in buildings of the Persian kings in al-Ḥīrah.

North of the congregation area five main thoroughfares branched out, from the south side four such thoroughfares branched out, while from the east and the west (sides) three such roads were planned. All these roads were marked out (by Sa'd). North of the congregation area, adjacent to it, he settled Sulaym and Thaqīf along two roads, Hamdān along another road, Bajīlah along an-[2490] other and Taym al-Lāt as well as Taghlib along yet another road. South of the congregation area he settled Banū Asad along one road, with another road separating them from Nakha', who in turn were separated from Kindah by another, while the latter were separated from al-Azd by yet another road. East of the congregation area he settled the Anṣār and Muzaynah along one road, Tamīm and Muḥārib along another, and Asad and 'Āmir along yet another. Finally, west of the congregation area he settled Bajālah and Bajlah along one road, Jadīlah as well as various groups of mixed origin along another, and Juhaynah as well as other groups of mixed origin along yet another. Thus, all those who lived right next to the congregation area as well as all the other people were housed between (the main thoroughfares) and beyond them, the entire territory having been divided up into plots.[248] These, then, were the main thoroughfares; they also built narrower ones that sometimes would run parallel with the former, then merge with them, and yet others that did not merge with the main roads. These last-mentioned roads, however, were less wide. The dwelling places were found in the space beyond and in between these roads. All the roads and paths[249] began at the congregation area and, right there, he settled the "tenths",[250] into which the veterans of the battles 247. That is how this sentence is translated in Glossarium, p. DXXVI, but the grammatical structure remains obscure.

248. For a reconstruction of this ground plan, see L. Massignon, in Mélanges Maspéro, III, 336–60.

249. This is how I render the secondary plural ṭuruqāt.

250. The "tenths" comprised ten subdivisions originally created by Sa'd at Sharāf before the battle of al-Qādisiyyah, see Tabarī, I, 2224, and G. M. Hinds, The early history of Islamic schism in Iraq, unpubl. PhD thesis, London 1969, 30 f.

preceding al-Qādisiyyah and those of al-Qādisiyyah and its aftermath[251] had earlier been divided. For those warriors who were at the time manning the border garrisons and that of al-Mawṣil, he held various plots ready until they themselves might come to them. When the first and second waves[252] of newcomers[253] joined the Arab warriors (in al-Kūfah) and swamped them, the people found their plots too cramped. Those groups whose newcomers were particularly numerous, went out and joined them (i.e. outside al-Kūfah), vacating the plots they had occupied, while those groups whose newcomers were few in number, settled those—since they were only few in number—in the homesteads of those who had gone to join their newcomers (i.e. outside al-Kūfah) if the latter had been living next door. If that had not been the case, those staying behind chose for themselves more cramped quarters, thus accommodating their newcomers. The congregation area remained in [2491] this state during the entire period of 'Umar's reign, the tribesmen not coveting it. There was nothing there but the mosque, the citadel and the markets, which were devoid of buildings or even markings (for buildings). 'Umar had said, "Markets are to be organized on the basis of the norms valid for mosques: he who gets to a certain place first, has sole rights to it, until he vacates it to go home or as the case may be until he has sold all his wares." For every newcomer they prepared "reception" camps,[254] everyone arriving there being treated on a basis of equality. Those quarters today are the dwelling places of the Banū al-Bakkā'. (The newcomers stayed there) until they came to Abū al-Hayyāj so that he might attend to them by assigning plots to them where they wanted.

In the plot destined for that purpose, Sa'd built a citadel facing the spot where the miḥrāb[255] of the mosque of al-Kūfah is today. He built it and incorporated the treasury in it. He himself lived right next to it. Then, (somewhat later, robbers) dug a tunnel to the 251. See nn. 43 and 114 above.

252. For this rendering, see Glossarium, p. CLV.

253. This is, perhaps, the best rendering of rawādif, a term that indicates the nomads who came to join their clansmen—relatives or otherwise—in the conquered territories. Glossarium, p. CCLXI, calls them "new conscripts." See Hinds, "Alignments," 352 ff; Donner, 231 ff; Morony, Iraq, 242.

254. The word used is munākh "a place where one's camel is made to kneel down."

255. This is the niche that indicates the direction toward Mecca.

treasure chamber and stole from its contents. Sa'd notified 'Umar of this by letter describing to him the layout of the governor's residence and the treasure chambers vis-à-vis the congregation area as situated north of the building. 'Umar replied, "Move the spot where you actually perform the prayer ritual[256] to a place as close as possible to the building housing the treasure chambers; in so doing, you make it the direction for prayer.[257] For in the mosque there are always people present,[258] day and night, they will act as guards of what is also their treasure." Thus the place where the prayer ritual was performed was brought closer (facing the treasure chambers[259]) and then Sa'd set about building it.[260] A dihqān from the people of Hamadhān, called Rūzbih b. Buzurgumihr, said to him, "I shall build it for you, and I shall also build a citadel for you; I shall make some sort of connection between the one and the other so that they constitute one and the same building." Thus he planned the citadel of al-Kūfah according to a well-considered design. Then Rūzbih commenced building it from baked bricks taken from the ruin of a citadel the Persian kings used to have in [2492] the neighborhood of al-Ḥīrah,[261] which today is still in its place.[262] Sa'd did not allow this to continue, however. He built the mosque facing the treasure chambers, with the entire length of the citadel being situated to the right of that side of the mosque facing south.[263] Then he extended it to the right, up to the far end of the Square of 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib with this square as the prayer direction. Then he extended it yet some more so that the prayer direction of the mosque encompassed the whole square as well as the right side of the citadel.

256. The Arabic reads al-masjid, but my—admittedly wordy—translation is meant to convey the original meaning of the word, which happens to suit the context best.

257. Or rather, ". . . . in so doing you make sure that the building lies in the direction in which the people would look when they pray."

258. It is conceivable that with these people some sort of mosque personnel is meant.

259. Presumably this was done before the roof structure on the marble pillars was built.

260. A textual variant admits of the interpretation "and then he looked for someone, an architect, to build it."

261. This ancient city, mentioned a few times before, lay three miles to the west of al-Kūfah.

262. Rendition tentative.

263. That is, the direction of prayer.

The building[264] was supported by pillars made of marble originally from Christian churches[265] belonging to the king. (This roof structure) had no walls, a situation that lasted until the building (complete with walls), as it is today, was constructed in the time of Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān at the hands of Ziyād (his adopted brother and governor of Iraq). When Ziyād set out to construct it, he invited several architects who were born in the Jāhiliyyah to come to him. He described to them the location of the mosque, its size and how high he wanted it to reach up into the air, saying, "I want something higher than anything I have ever heard described." Then a certain architect, who had previously been in the service of the king, said to him, "This can only be done when supported by pillars made from blocks of stone quarried at Ahwāz; these blocks have to be pierced and hollowed out, then filled with lead and (held together by) iron bars, so as to enable you to raise the pillars made of these blocks thirty cubits into the air. Then you build a roof over them and, to grant (the whole structure) extra solidity, you build walls on all sides (i.e., supporting the edges of that roof structure)." Ziyād answered, "This is a description of a structure about which I used to have inward discussions that I have never been able to settle."[266]

Sa'd provided the gate of the citadel with a lock. The reason for this was that the markets used to be held nearby right in front of Sa'd's living quarters, the tumult being so deafening as to prevent Sa'd from conducting a normal conversation. When the citadel was built, people began to ascribe things to him he had never said. [2493]
Thus they alleged that Sa'd had said (on one occasion), "Stop that terrible noise!"[267] News of this reached 'Umar, and also that the people were calling it "Sa'd's citadel." So he called Muḥammad b. Maslamah[268] and sent him to al-Kūfah, saying, "Make for the citadel and burn down that gate, then return to me forthwith." Muḥammad b. Maslamah departed and journeyed until he arrived 264. Sc. the roof structure over the southern part of the mosque.

265. For the relationship of the king with the Christian church, see Morony, Iraq, 332–42.

266. After this digression dealing with an event from Ziyād b. Abīhi's governorship of Iraq, some time between the years 661 and 680, the narrative goes back once more to the time of Sa'd, that is, 638.

267. The word for "noise" here is ṣuwayt, a diminutive expressing enhancement, li 't-ta'ẓīm, see Wright, I, 166.

268. For more on this man, see Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, VI, 33–5.

in al-Kūfah. He bought some firewood, brought it to the citadel and burned down its gate. Someone went to Sa'd and told him what had happened. Sa'd said, "This must be a messenger sent here for this very purpose."[269] So he dispatched someone to find out who it was. It was none but Muḥammad b. Maslamah! Immediately, Sa'd sent a message inviting him inside. But he refused. Then Sa'd came outside and invited him in, offering him hospitality. But he refused again. Next Sa'd offered to bear the expenses of the man's staying on in al-Kūfah, but he would not hear of it. Instead he handed Sa'd a letter from 'Umar that read, "It has come to my notice that you have built a citadel and that you have taken possession of it as your personal fortress, it being called 'Sa'd's citadel.' You have even made a gate separating you from the people! However, it is not your property; have you gone insane?[270] Go and find yourself a place to live near the treasure chambers and lock that (if you insist), but don't have a gate in the citadel preventing the people from entering it and depriving them of their right to sit freely with you in counsel even at the time when you choose to leave your quarters." Sa'd swore to Muḥammad b. Maslamah that he had not said what the people had imputed to him. So, instantly, Muḥammad b. Maslamah set out on his return journey. When, in the vicinity of Medina, his provisions had run out, he had to still his hunger with what bark of trees he could find. Suffering from indigestion, he finally approached 'Umar and told him all that had happened. 'Umar asked, "Did you not take anything from Sa'd for me?" Muḥammad answered, "If you had [2494] wanted that, you should have (said so in the) letter you gave me for him, or you should have given me leave to use my own judgment in this matter." Whereupon 'Umar said, "The most sagacious man is he who displays his own initiative, when he has no directives from his superior to fall back on, or who, without holding back, gives expression to his own views." Then Muḥammad b. Maslamah told 'Umar of the oath Sa'd had sworn and what he had said (on that occasion). Believing Sa'd to be sincere, 'Umar

269. In my translation I disregard the preposition min, which is lacking in manuscript Co.

270. Literally, "it is the citadel of insanity (or wickedness)," or as Glossarium suggests "the palace of perversity." I suspect that the reading khabāl here is dubious.

said, "He is surely more veracious than those who informed on him or those who told me (all about this)."

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Aṭā' Abū Muḥammad, the freedman of Isḥāq b. Ṭalḥah: I used to sit in the great mosque before Ziyād built (the extensions that he added); at that time, (the roof structure) had no walls (i.e. to support it on any side), so that I could see from the mosque the monastery of Hind as well as the gate leading to the bridge.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Ibn Shubrumah—al-Sha'bī: When someone was seated in the mosque, one could see from it the gate leading to the bridge.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Umar b. 'Ayyāsh, the brother of Abū Bakr b. 'Ayyāsh—Abū Kathīr: Rūzbih b. Buzurgumihr b. Sāsān came from Hamadhān. He had had control over one of the approaches to the territory of the Byzantines, to whom he sometimes brought arms. The Persian kings made threats against him, so he joined the Byzantines. But he was never sure of his life, until Sa'd b. (Abī Waqqāṣ) Mālik had come (i.e., to Iraq). For him Rūzbih built the citadel and the mosque. Then Sa'd sent him with a letter to 'Umar in which he gave the particulars of the situation. (When he had arrived in Medina), Rūzbih embraced Islam. 'Umar entered his name in the register of stipends and sent him back to Sa'd with a group of professional camel drivers. Professional camel drivers in those days were (from that class of people called) 'ibād.[271] Rūzbih set out until, when at a place later called Qabr al-'Ibādī,[272] he suddenly died. So the camel drivers dug a grave for him and then they sat down and waited beside the corpse for someone to pass by that route whom they could prevail upon to testify to Rūzbih's having died (a natural death). And, indeed, a group of Bedouins passed along that route, right after they had [2495] finished digging a grave for him at the roadside. So they showed the corpse to those Bedouins, so that they would declare them innocent from having shed Rūzbih's blood and would bear witness to that effect. They named that place the Grave of the 'Ibādī; it was called that on account of these camel drivers (who hailed

271. 'Ibād is the term by which the Christian Arabs of al-Ḥīrah are designated, see Morony, Iraq, index s.v. 'ibād.

272. Literally "the grave of the 'Ibādī."

from the class of the 'ibād[273]. Abū Kathīr added: "That man, this Rūzbih, was my father, by God." Then I[274] said, "Did you not tell anybody about him?" "No," said Abū Kathīr.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Muhallab, 'Amr, Sa'īd and Ziyād: The "tenths"[275] became greatly imbalanced in numbers. Sa'd wrote to 'Umar regarding the possibility of dividing the army up into a more appropriate number of contingents. So 'Umar wrote back, "Yes, by all means." Then Sa'd sent for a number of experts in tribal genealogy, and some clever and sagacious men, among whom were Sa'īd b. Nimrān and Mash'alah b. Nu'aym. These experts redivided the Muslim army into "sevenths," creating seven contingents. Kinānah, with its confederates from among the Aḥābīsh[276] and others, as well as Jadīlah, that is the Banū 'Amr b. Qays 'Aylān, formed one so-called sub'.[277] Quḍā'ah, among whom in those days were Ghassān b. Shibām, as well as Bajīlah, Khath'am, Kindah, Ḥaḍramawt and Azd formed (another) sub'. Madhḥij, Ḥimyar, Hamdān as well as their confederates formed a (third) sub'. Tamīm and all of Ribāb and Hawāzin formed a (fourth) sub'. Asad, Ghaṭafān, Muḥārib, al-Namir, Ḍubay'ah and Taghlib formed a (fifth) one. Iyād, 'Akk, 'Abd al-Qays, the people of Hajar[278] and the Ḥamrā'[279] formed a (sixth) sub'.[280] This subdivision into seven contingents was maintained during the entire period of the reigns of 'Umar, 'Uthmān, 'Alī as well as the better part of that of Mu'āwiyah. Then Ziyād redivided the army into "fourths."

---

273. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 28, penult, adds a remark to the effect that the place was called by this name because ". . . it was thought that Rūzbih had been one of those 'ibād."

274. This is presumably the transmitter of Abū Kathīr, Abū Bakr b. 'Ayyāsh, see p. 2494 above.

275. See n. 250 above

276. See EI[2], s.v. Ḥabash, Ḥabasha, final part (Watt).

277. Literally, "one-seventh."

278. The city in the coastal region of al-Baḥrayn is meant, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 953.

279. See n 147 above.

280. A seventh group is lacking. Is that due to a scribal mistake/omission of the manuscript(s) Prym worked from, or should we insert anywhere in this enumeration the words sub'an wa-ṣārat, thus creating a seventh one? According to Caskel (EI[2], s.v. Ḍabba), the seventh group was made up of Ḍabbah, Bakr and Ṭayyi'. For more speculations, see Morony, Iraq, 243.

The Redivision of the People into 'Irāfahs[281] [2496]

The people were divided into units, *'irāfah*s, each of which was entitled to 100,000 dirhams. Every unit consisting especially of veterans of al-Qādisiyyah, comprising forty-three men, forty-three women and fifty children, had 100,000 dirhams (to be distributed among them). Every 'irāfah of the ahl al-ayyām[282] was similarly entitled to 100,000 dirhams, twenty men receiving 3,000 dirhams and twenty women, as well as every child receiving one hundred dirhams each. Every 'irāfah of the first immigration wave,[283] consisting of sixty men, sixty women and forty children, whose fighting members(?) were each entitled to (?) 1,500, had similarly 100,000 dirhams to divide between them. A similar calculation was applied to other *'irāfah*s. 'Aṭiyyah b. al-Ḥārith said: I personally met one hundred *'arīf*s.[284] The people of al-Baṣrah were organized and administered according to the same principles. The stipends were handed out to the commanders of the *sub'*s[285] and the standard bearers, all standards being carried by pure-blooded tribesmen. These passed the stipends on to the *'arīf*s, (other) leaders and chiefs who duly distributed them among the people in their respective dwelling places.

The Conquest of al-Madā'in before the Founding of al-Kūfah

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Muhallab, 'Amr and Sa'īd: The conquests of al-Madā'in comprised the Sawād, Ḥulwān, Māsabadhān and Qarqīsiyā'. The frontier ways of access of al-Kūfah were the following four: Ḥulwān under the command of al-Qa'qā' b. 'Amr, Māsabadhān under the command of Ḍirār b. al-Khaṭṭāb al-Fihrī, Qarqīsiyā' under the com- [2497]

281. For more information on the unit called 'irāfah and the function of its administrator ('arīf), mainly responsible for the distribution of state stipends among its members, see EI[2] s.v. 'Arīf, and Hinds, "Alignments," 349.

282. That is, the veterans of the battles preceding that of al-Qādisiyyah, see n. 43 above.

283. This comprised the first contingents of rawādif to join the Muslim warriors in al-Kūfah, see above p. 71, especially n. 253.

284. See. n. 281 above.

285. See p. 76 above.

mand of 'Umar b. Mālik or 'Amr b. 'Utbah b. Nawfal b. 'Abd Manāf, and finally al-Mawṣil under the command of 'Abdallāh b. al-Mu'tamm. That situation lasted for some time.[286] Then, after that, Sa'd moved out (sc. of al-Madā'in) to found al-Kūfah and with part of the inhabitants staying behind in al-Madā'in, he ordered the abovementioned people[287] to come and join him in al-Kūfah, after they had appointed those men who were willing to stay behind and assume control as successors commanding the ways of access. Thus al-Qa'qā''s successor over Ḥulwān was Qubādh b. 'Abdallāh, 'Abdallāh b. al-Mu'tamm's successor over al-Mawṣil was Muslim b. 'Abdallāh, Ḍirār's successor was Rāfi' b. 'Abdallāh and finally 'Umar's was 'Ashannaq b. 'Abdallāh.[288] 'Umar (b. al-Khaṭṭāb) wrote to them instructing them to call in the help of the Asāwirah,[289] as many as they needed, and to exempt them from paying the jizā'. Thus they did. When the ground plan of al-Kūfah had been laid out, and the people had obtained permission to start building their dwelling places, they carried their doors with them from al-Madā'in to al-Kūfah and hung them in their new homes. In this way, they made al-Kūfah their base and those (four frontier towns mentioned above) were their ways of access, while they had no control over the adjoining countryside.

[2498] According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Mujālid—'Āmir: In other words, the conquests of al-Madā'in comprised the acquisition of al-Kūfah and its surrounding agricultural area as well as the conquest of the border areas Ḥulwān, al-Mawṣil, Māsabadhān and Qarqīsiyā'. 'Amr b. al- Rayyān—Mūsā b. 'Īsā al-Hamdānī, told a similar report, in which 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb forbade the people of al-Kūfah to venture outside those areas, not allowing them to penetrate further into enemy-held territory.[290]

They all said: Sa'd b. (Abī Waqqāṣ) Mālik ruled over al-Kūfah for

---

286. I have divided the following very long sentence into a number of shorter ones, changing the order somewhat.

287. Sc. of those four border towns.

288. This enumeration of four successive "fathers" all being called 'Abdallāh is one more clear example of how the commonest Muslim names were regularly used either to conceal someone's unknown parentage or to conceal the non-Muslim origin of someone's ancestors. See further Juynboll, Muslim tradition, 145 f.

289. See n. 147 above.

290. See p 45 above.

three and a half years after it had been founded, in addition to the period he had previously spent in al-Madā'in and the period he was 'Umar's governor in the entire area comprising al-Kūfah, Ḥulwān, al-Mawṣil, Māsabadhān and Qarqīsiyā', all the way to (i.e., but not including) al-Baṣrah. While ruling over al-Baṣrah, and while Sa'd ruled al-Kūfah, 'Utbah b. Ghazwān died. He had found his office distressing.[291] In 'Utbah's place 'Umar appointed Abū Sabrah (b. Abī Ruhm al-'Āmirī); then he dismissed Abū Sabrah from al-Baṣrah and employed al-Mughīrah (b. Shu'bah) as his governor. After he had also dismissed al-Mughīrah, he installed Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī in that position.

The Story of Ḥimṣ When the Byzantine Commander Marched on Its Muslim Occupants

In this year, the Byzantines marched on Abū 'Ubaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ and those warriors from the Muslim army who were with him in Ḥimṣ to make war on them. What happened to the Byzantines and the Muslims, as related in Abū 'Ubaydah's own words, is according to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, 'Amr and Sa'īd: The first time 'Umar allowed the troops in al-Kūfah to venture outside (i.e. to penetrate into enemy-held territory[292]) was when the Byzantines, after having exchanged messages with the inhabitants of al-Jazīrah, marched out heading for Abū [2499] 'Ubaydah and the Muslims in Ḥimṣ. So Abū 'Ubaydah gathered his armed units around him ordering them to make camp in the city square of Ḥimṣ. Khālid also approached from Qinnasrīn. He joined them (sc. in Ḥimṣ) amidst other commanders of armed units. Then Abū 'Ubaydah sought their advice: should they prepare to wage battle or should they fortify themselves inside the city until help might come? It was Khālid who suggested to him to fight the Byzantines, whilst the other Muslim commanders advised him to dig himself in and write to 'Umar.[293] Abū 'Ubaydah took the latter's advice and discarded Khālid's. Then he wrote to 'Umar informing him of the Byzantines' offensive 291. Why he may have done so can be gleaned from Ibn Sa'd, VII 1/3, 10 ff.

292. See n. 289 above.
293. Presumably in order to ask for help and obtain fresh orders.

against him and their keeping the Muslim troops in Syria fully occupied, so that they could not help him.

Of late, 'Umar had concentrated cavalry in every city, in each a contingent commensurate with its size. The horses had been left behind by the Muslim forces to be held ready for some unforeseen contingency. Thus there were in al-Kūfah four thousand horses. So when the news (sc. from Ḥimṣ) reached 'Umar, he wrote to Sa'd b. (Abī Waqqāṣ) Mālik, "Detail the cavalry under the command of al-Qa'qā' b. 'Amr and dispatch them forthwith to Ḥimṣ the moment my letter reaches you, for Abū 'Ubaydah is under siege there. Therefore, march on them with the utmost speed." Furthermore, he wrote to him saying, "Dispatch Suhayl b. 'Adī with an armed force to al-Jazīrah; let him make for al-Raqqah, for it is the inhabitants of al-Jazīrah who incited the Byzantines to take up arms against the people of Ḥimṣ. The people of Qarqīsiyā' have a good record. But send 'Abdallāh b. 'Itbān to Naṣībīn.[294] Let both [2500] these men also find out more about Ḥarrān and al-Ruhā'.[295] Then dispatch al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah at the head of the tribesmen of al-Jazīrah, viz. Rabī'ah and Tanūkh, and send 'Iyāḍ too, for if there is any fighting to be done, I have placed the command over all the forces in the hands of 'Iyāḍ b. Ghanm. 'Iyāḍ was originally one of the Muslim warriors in Iraq who had marched out with Khālid b. al-Walīd to help the Muslims fighting in Syria, and he was also one of those who came along when the Iraqi forces left (Syria again) to aid the forces at al-Qādisiyyah; he used to be Abū 'Ubaydah's personal aide.

So on the day 'Umar's letter arrived, al-Qa'qā', at the head of four thousand men, set out toward Ḥimṣ. 'Iyāḍ b. Ghanm and the commanders of the al-Jazīrah forces marched out too, taking the road to al-Jazīrah sometimes along the frontier garrisons, at other times bypassing them. Each commander headed toward the district over which he was appointed. Suhayl went to al-Raqqah and 'Umar left Medina in aid of Abū 'Ubaydah, heading for Ḥimṣ until

294. The edition here repeats the preceding sentence, but Prym points out that it is lacking in the two main manuscripts, and I have accordingly decided to leave it untranslated.

295. The verb used for "to find out more about" is nafaḍa, see Lane, 2830, right column, but the reading is dubious; Ibn al-Athīr has the verb qaṣada "to go."

he alighted at al-Jābiyah.[296] At first,[297] the people of al-Jazīrah helped the Byzantines and incited them against the Muslims in Ḥimṣ, remaining in close contact with them. But then, when they heard the rumor from those who were scattered in al-Jazīrah[298] that those (mounted) forces had pulled out of al-Kūfah, they[299] did not know whether those Kūfan troops were marching on al-Jazīrah or on Ḥimṣ. So they dispersed to their regions and their brethren and they deserted the Byzantines. After this dispersal, Abū 'Ubaydah viewed the situation no longer as he had done at first, and he again sought Khālid's advice as to whether or not they should venture a sortie. Khālid thought they should. So God granted Abū 'Ubaydah and his men victory over the besiegers.

[Translator's note [2501]

Now follows in the edition an insert covering three pages, which Prym found in the Ibn Ḥubaysh manuscripts, and of which there was no trace in the other manuscripts from which he worked. At first he thought it best to leave it out altogether, but then he decided against that because, as he argued, the information contained in this insert gives details found nowhere else, and he inferred the likelihood of a lacuna in the Ṭabarī manuscript of which C and Co (sc. Prym's principal manuscripts) are (in)direct copies. I see no reason why I should not follow Prym's example, and therefore I insert the translation of these pages forthwith.]

According to Sayf with his isnād—Rajā' b. Ḥaywah and others: Heraklius sent an expeditionary force by sea against Ḥimṣ. (Some time ago the Muslim forces[300]) had formed armed units.[301] While 'Alqamah b. Mujazziz and 'Alqamah b. Ḥakīm had entrenched themselves in al-Ramlah and 'Asqalān and their respective environs, Yazīd (b. Abī Sufyān) and Shuraḥbīl (b. Ḥasanah) having 296. A town near Damascus, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 3f. For its importance, see *EI*², s.v. Djābiya (Lammens).

297. I have broken a convoluted sentence into several manageable, shorter ones.

298. In order to make this sentence convey any sense at all, I read ḥadīthu instead of 'an ḥadīthi, a suggestion of M. Hinds.

299. I read lam with one manuscript, and not wa-lam, as it says in the edition.

300. This translation is based on a marginal gloss in one Ibn Ḥubaysh manuscript.

301. Or "strong points."

done likewise, Heraklius asked the people of al-Jazīrah for help and sought to rouse the inhabitants of Ḥimṣ. But those latter (in Ḥimṣ) sent him a message that read, "We have made a pact with them[302] and we fear that we will not win (if we do as you suggest)." Then Heraklius marched on Abū 'Ubaydah amidst a mighty cavalry force.[303] Abū 'Ubaydah asked Khālid to come and help him, so the latter came with every man he had, not leaving anyone behind. After Khālid had left, the inhabitants of Qinnasrīn went back on their promises made to the Muslims and sided with Heraklius. Most of the people who lived there were sedentary Tanūkh. Nonetheless, every Muslim leader held on to his own district. That shows how courageous the Muslims were.[304] Heraklius closed in on Ḥimṣ, made camp and sent spies (to reconnoiter). The Muslims were unanimous in digging themselves in and writing to 'Umar, except Khālid, who maintained that they should prepare to fight. So they dug themselves in at Ḥimṣ and wrote to 'Umar imploring him to help them. The Byzantines and those who aided them drew nearer and nearer until they alighted close by and surrounded them. The forces from al-Jazīrah (rallying with Heraklius) numbered 30,000, this apart from the Tanūkh and others from Qinnasrīn. Thus they created a truly desperate situation for the Muslims.

The letter reached 'Umar while he was on his way to Mecca for the pilgrimage. He proceeded on his journey but sent the following message to Sa'd: "Abū 'Ubaydah is under siege, forced to stay [2502] entrenched. (Please) send your Muslim warriors all over al-Jazīrah and harass the Byzantines with your cavalry so that they cannot address themselves properly to the people in Ḥimṣ and their protégés. Help Abū 'Ubaydah with al-Qa'qā' b. 'Amr and (further) manpower." So al-Qa'qā' went forth in aid of Abū 'Ubaydah and the cavalry squadrons marched on al-Raqqah, Ḥarrān and Naṣībīn. When they arrived in al-Jazīrah and news of that reached the enemy, while they were (laying siege) to Ḥimṣ, they scurried back to their (respective) cities, which they tried to reach before

302. Presumably the Muslim Arabs who had control over much of the northern part of Syria are meant.

303. That is what I think that halbah means in this context; it is not found anywhere in the dictionaries.

304. The translation is dubious, but so is the Arabic text.

the (pursuing) Muslims. Then they dug themselves in, and the Muslims descended upon them in their fortifications. When al-Qa'qā' moved nearer to Ḥimṣ, the members of a certain clan from Tanūkh wrote a letter to Khālid in which they cajoled him and informed him about the situation. Khālid sent a message back saying, "By God, had it not been for the fact that I am under somebody else's orders, I would not have cared whether you had been few or many, whether you would have stayed or whether you would have departed. If you are sincere, you had better disperse, as all the other people of al-Jazīrah have done." They suggested this to the others of Tanūkh, who agreed. Then they sent a message to Khālid, "This is what we propose to you: If you want (us to do as you said), we will do it. But if you want to march against us, then we will flee with the Byzantines." They gave him assurances. But Khālid said, "No, stay, only if we march out against you, then you will flee with the Byzantines." In the meantime, the Muslims said to Abū 'Ubaydah, "The inhabitants of al-Jazīrah have dispersed in all directions, but the people of Qinnasrīn are contrite and have offered to meet us out of their own free will. After all they are Arab tribesmen. Come with us." Meanwhile, Khālid remained silent. So Abū 'Ubaydah said, "Khālid, why do you not say anything?" Khālid answered, "You have always known what I think about this matter, but you did not listen to what I said." Then Abū 'Ubaydah said, "Speak now, I will listen to you and do as you suggest." So Khālid said, "March out with the Muslims. God may have decreased their numbers, while the enemy is still at full combat strength. (But we may not forget that) since we embraced Islam, we only fought to win in the end, so do not be vexed by the enemy's superior forces."

According to 'Alqamah b. al-Naḍr and others: Abū 'Ubaydah assembled the people, praised God and extolled Him and said, "Listen, you men, this is a day that will decide the future.[305] Those of you who will survive this day, your possessions and [2503] homesteads will be undisturbed and, on the other hand, those of you who will die will achieve martyr status. So hold your God in the highest esteem and let nothing, short of polytheism, that is, committed by anyone of you, induce you to abhor death. But turn to God again and offer yourselves up to martyrdom. I testify—and this is no time for lies—that I heard the Messenger of God say: 'He who dies without ever having worshiped other deities but God, will surely enter Paradise.' " Then there was a general rustle among the men as they untied their camels. They marched out, led by Abū 'Ubaydah, who commanded the main body of the army, with Khālid over its right wing and 'Iyāḍ[306] over its left wing, while Mu'ādh b. Jabal stayed behind guarding the gate of the city. Thus they became engaged in combat there, never giving way, when suddenly al-Qa'qā' hurriedly approached with one hundred (horsemen). Then the people of Qinnasrīn began to flee with the Byzantines. The main body of the Muslim army and the right wing grappled with the main body of the enemy's army, one of whose wings had been crushed. The reinforcements joined the Muslim troops which resulted in not a single enemy warrior escaping to tell what had happened. The enemy's left wing all fled in one direction, the last straggler being caught at Marj al-Dībāj.[307] This was where they finally ended up, having broken their weapons and thrown down their furred coats to be less encumbered. But they were overtaken and their belongings were confiscated as spoils of war. When the Muslims had achieved this victory, Abū 'Ubaydah assembled them and delivered the following speech, "Do not flinch now, do not even consider receding in stages from this military operation; for if I had known beforehand that just one of us would survive, I would not have told you this story."[308] The last of the Kūfan horsemen to arrive did so three full days after the battle.[309]

305. See n. 122 above.

[2500–2503] Al-Qa'qā' b. 'Amr arrived with the troops from al-Kūfah three days after the battle (sc. of Ḥimṣ) and 'Umar came and made camp in al-Jābiyah. They[310] wrote to 'Umar telling him about the victory [2504] and the arrival of the reinforcements three days later and asking him for a decision in this affair. So 'Umar wrote back saying,

306. This, instead of 'Abbās, is the reading proposed in the errata in Glossarium, p. DCXX.

307. According to Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 488, this was a river bed ten miles from al-Maṣṣīṣah, commanding spectacular views.

308. Sc. the tradition ascribed to the Prophet mentioned above.

309. This is the end of the insert from Ibn Ḥubaysh. After this, Ṭabarī's account is resumed.

310. Presumably, Abū 'Ubaydah and Khālid.

"Give them a share in the booty. May God reward the Kūfans with His bounty; they protect their own territory but they also give aid to the inhabitants of other garrison cities."

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Zakariyyā' b. Siyāh—al-Sha'bī: Abū 'Ubaydah asked 'Umar for reinforcements. The Byzantines, followed by the Christians[311] had marched on him and besieged him (sc. in Ḥimṣ). Thereupon 'Umar left (Medina) and wrote to the people of al-Kūfah. So, on an early morning, 4,000 men on mules leading horses by their sides,[312] hurriedly made their way toward the besieged Muslims. Three days after the battle between Abū 'Ubaydah and his besiegers they arrived (sc. at Ḥimṣ). Abū 'Ubaydah wrote about this to 'Umar who had finally reached al-Jābiyah. 'Umar wrote back, "Let them share in the booty, for they rushed out in aid of you and on account of them your enemy dispersed."

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Ṭalḥah—Māhān: 'Umar had 4,000 horses at his disposal, held ready for an emergency, which he caused to pass the winter tethered (in the square) south and left of the citadel in al-Kūfah. Hence that spot is called al-Ārī,[313] until this very day. 'Umar also had them pasture on fresh grazing land between the Euphrates and the built-up area of al-Kūfah alongside the river bend.[314] The Persians called this stretch of land Ākhur al-Shāhijān,[315] which means "the place where the princes have their horses foddered." Its commander was Salmān b. Rabī'ah al-Bāhilī at the head of a group of people from al-Kūfah, who organized races for the horses and made them exercise all year round. In al-Baṣrah there was a similar number of horses, whose commander was Jaz' b. Mu'āwiyah. In fact, the eight garrison cities, each according to its size, (had a similar cavalry squadron). And when something unforeseen came to pass, a group of horsemen would ride out and grapple with the situation, until [2505] the main body of fighting forces was brought into readiness.

311. Presumably, from among the Arab tribes living in al-Jazīrah.

312. Thus the horses were spared until the moment when speed was required in military action. Then the horses were exchanged for the mules. All this seems to be implied in the Arabic verb used in this context, see Lane, 464, right column.

313. Sc. a stable, or a post to which an animal is tethered.

314. The Arabic word for "bend" used here is 'āqūl. It is also the name of a certain monastery, see Dayr al-'Āqūl in Ṭabarī's index.

315. Literally "the stable of the nobles."

Al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Ḥallām—Shahr b. Mālik gave a similar report (adding): . . . and when they had finished (clearing up matters), they would return.

In this year, I mean the year 17 (638), the conquest of al-Jazīrah took place.

The Conquest of al-Jazīrah

The conquest of al-Jazīrah took place according to the account of Sayf (in the year 17 (638)), but Ibn Isḥāq mentioned that it was conquered in the year 19 (640) of the Hijrah. He related among the causes leading to the conquest: According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: 'Umar wrote to Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ, "God has conquered Syria and Iraq for the Muslims. So from where you are dispatch an army to al-Jazīrah and put one of the following three, Khālid b. 'Urfuṭah or Hāshim b. 'Utbah or 'Iyāḍ b. Ghanm in command." When this letter finally reached Sa'd, he said, "The Commander of the Faithful mentioned 'Iyāḍ b. Ghanm's name only as the last possible choice for commander because he harbors a secret wish that I put him in charge. Therefore I shall put him in charge." So he dispatched 'Iyāḍ and an armed force with him. On the same mission he also sent Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī, his own son 'Umar b. Sa'd, a young lad without experience in leadership, and 'Uthmān b. Abī al-'Āṣ b. Bishr al-Thaqafī. That was in the year 19 (640). 'Iyāḍ marched on al-Jazīrah and descended with his troops on al-Ruhā' whose inhabitants concluded a peace treaty with him on the condition that they pay the jizyah. Ḥarrān also [2506] concluded a treaty when al-Ruhā' did, its inhabitants committing themselves to pay the jizyah. Then Sa'd sent Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī to Naṣībīn and his son 'Umar to Ra's al-'Ayn among a contingent of cavalry as reinforcements for the Muslims. Sa'd himself moved with the remainder of the Muslim warriors to Dārā and went against it until he had conquered it. Abū Mūsā conquered Naṣībīn; that was in the year 19 (640). Then Sa'd dispatched 'Uthmān b. Abī al-'Āṣ to southern Armenia,[316] where some fighting occurred in which Ṣafwān b. al-Muʿaṭṭal al-Sulamī died a martyr's death. Then the people of the region concluded a peace treaty with ʿUthmān b. Abī al-ʿĀṣ on the condition that they pay the jizyah, which amounted to one dīnār for each family (per year). After that the conquest of Qaysāriyyah in Palestine took place. Heraklius fled.

316. The southernmost part of Arminiyā or Armenia, or the fourth part as it is called in Arabic; it is the region due west of Naṣībīn and due north of al-Raqqah. The emperor Justinian (527–65) had divided Armenia into four parts, see Vasiliev, I, 196.

As for Sayf's account, that runs as follows: According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, al-Muhallab, Ṭalḥah, ʿAmr and Saʿīd: ʿIyāḍ followed in the traces of al-Qaʿqāʿ. The other commanders marched out. . . .[317] That was at the time when ʿUmar wrote to Saʿd instructing him to send al-Qaʿqāʿ with 4,000 troops as reinforcements for Abū ʿUbaydah, whom the Byzantines were marching upon while he was in Ḥimṣ. So the commanders took the road to al-Jazīrah via the border garrisons and other localities. Thus Suhayl b. ʿAdī and his army force followed the route along the border garrisons until they finally reached al-Raqqah. In the meantime the rebellious people of al-Jazīrah had dispersed from Ḥimṣ on their way back to their respective districts, when they heard of the impending arrival of the Kūfan forces. So he (sc. Suhayl) descended upon these people of al-Jazīrah and held them surrounded by his men until they were prepared to make peace with him. This whole process was precipitated, because they said to one another, "We are (caught) between (two fires: on the one hand there are) the Iraqi reinforcements and (on the other hand there are) the Muslim forces in Syria. How can we survive a war against the ones as well as against the others?" So they sent a message concerning that predicament to ʿIyāḍ who, at the time, had made his camp right in the middle of al-Jazīrah. ʿIyāḍ decided to look favorably upon their submission, and they gave the oath [2507] of allegiance to him, which he accepted. The man who actually concluded the treaty with them was Suhayl b. ʿAdī, acting on the order of ʿIyāḍ, because Suhayl was in charge of the actual fighting. They followed the same procedure in respect of the territories they had taken by force—after which the defeated side gave in—as they had used with dhimmīs.[318]

317. This last sentence is a well-nigh classic example of an anacoluthon. What these commanders did will be told as from the next sentence.

318. This is a technical term which, for reasons of expedience, I rather leave untranslated. It denotes the "people of protection," adherents of the other main

The second commander to leave (sc. to leave al-Kūfah) was 'Abdallāh b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Itbān. He traveled along the Tigris until he arrived at al-Mawṣil where he crossed to the other bank to a place called Balad.[319] Then he proceeded towards Naṣībīn. Its inhabitants came out to meet him to offer him peace, acting as the people of al-Raqqah had done. Indeed, harboring the same fears as the latter, they had written to 'Iyāḍ who saw fit to accept their capitulation. Thus 'Abdallāh b. 'Abdallāh concluded a treaty with them, following the same procedure in respect of the territories they had taken by force—after which the defeated side gave in—as followed in the case of *dhimmī*s.

Al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah also left (i.e. al-Kūfah) and marched until he reached the Taghlib and the Arab tribesmen living in al-Jazīrah. All of them, irrespective of whether or not they had become Muslims, threw in their lot with al-Walīd except the members of the Iyād b. Nizār tribe, for they departed with bag and baggage and penetrated into Byzantine territory. Al-Walīd reported all that to 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb by letter.

When the inhabitants of al-Raqqah and Naṣībīn had promised obedience, 'Iyāḍ joined the forces of Suhayl and 'Abdallāh (b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Itbān) with his own, marched with all these forces on Ḥarrān and conquered all the territory separating him from that city. When he finally was about to grapple with (the Ḥarrānians) themselves, they protected themselves against potential harm from him by consenting to pay the jizyah. 'Iyāḍ accepted this, following the same procedure with them as used with *dhimmī*s, after they had given in upon their defeat.

Then 'Iyāḍ dispatched Suhayl and 'Abdallāh to al-Ruhā', whose inhabitants surrendered to them by consenting to pay the jizyah. All other people followed their example, al-Jazīrah thus being the simplest region to keep under control and the easiest to conquer. All this having been so easy was not only an ignominy for those faiths (Jews, Christians, etc.), who yield to the authority of Islam in their region and pay jizyah in exchange for freedom of religion.

---

319. According to Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 715, an ancient city upstream from al-Mawṣil, also called Balaṭ.

conquered but also for those Muslims who stayed on among them. 'Iyāḍ b. Ghanm composed the following poem (in kāmil): [2508]

Who will tell the world that our forces together have conquered Jazīrah in days of fierce battle?
They gathered those wanting to help from the region, dispelling from Ḥimṣ the dark threat of besiegers.
Our warriors, the mighty and noble, have driven the enemy away, leaving cleft skulls behind them.
Defeating the kings of Jazīrah, but failing to conquer those people who made it to Syria.[320]

When 'Umar arrived at al-Jābiyah and the people of Ḥimṣ were liberated, he sent Ḥabīb b. Maslamah to reinforce 'Iyāḍ b. Ghanm, and in that capacity he reached 'Iyāḍ. Abū 'Ubaydah wrote to 'Umar, after his departure from al-Jābiyah, and asked him that 'Iyāḍ b. Ghanm be detailed to him, since Khālid was detailed to Medina. Hence 'Umar sent 'Iyāḍ to him, but he dispatched Suhayl b. 'Adī and 'Abdallāh b. 'Abdallāh (b. 'Itbān) to al-Kūfah in order to deploy them in the east. Over the non-Arabs of al-Jazīrah 'Umar appointed Ḥabīb b. Maslamah as governor and military commander, and al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah he set over the Arab tribesmen there. Both remained in al-Jazīrah performing their duties.

They went on: When the letter from al-Walīd had reached him, 'Umar wrote to the emperor of Byzantium, "It has come to my notice that a certain group of Arab tribesmen has left our territory and has sought residence in your territory; by God, if you do not drive them back, we will surely dissolve our covenants with the Christians living under Arab sovereignty, and expel them." Hereupon the emperor of Byzantium expelled the Arabs who duly left Byzantine territory. Thus 4,000 of them reimmigrated with Abū

320. The translation of this poem is a tentative one. There are many textual variants preserved, e.g. "tombstones" for "battle" in l. 2. Furthermore, the geographical name al-Jazīrah is repeated no less than four times in as many verses of two hemistichs each. In l. 2 I believe it indicates simply the region; in l. 3 it seems to refer to the Arabs of the region who remained loyal to the Muslim cause, while in ll. 6–7 those inhabitants of al-Jazīrah seem to have been meant who rebelled against that cause. The penultimate hemistich can also be interpreted as "to conquer Jazīrah they beat kings, but they failed (sc. stopped short. . .)."

'Adī b. Ziyād, while the rest lagged behind scattering all over the [2509] border regions between Syria, al-Jazīrah and Byzantine territory. Every member of Iyād in the land of Arab tribesmen belonged to those 4,000. Al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah refused to accept anything from the Taghlib except complete submission to Islam. But they argued, "As for those who were made chiefs of their clans according to the treaty made with Sa'd, as well as those who have accepted this condition, for them you have the right to demand that; but as for those who did not see a chief appointed over them and who as a consequence did not walk in the footsteps of those who were placed under a chief, what are you going to do with them? So al-Walīd wrote to 'Umar about them. 'Umar replied, "That rule (which you want to impose upon the Taghlib) is only applicable to the Arabian peninsula; there nothing but strict surrender to Islam is acceptable. But leave those Taghlib be, on the condition that they do not bring up their (newborn) children in a Christian fashion and accept it when they do embrace Islam." Thus al-Walīd agreed with the Taghlib that they would not christen their (newborn) babies and that they would not prevent anyone from embracing Islam. Some Taghlibīs conceded this and adopted this rule; others only conceded to pay the jizā'. So al-Walīd reached agreement with them on the same conditions as drawn up with the 'Ibād and Tanūkh.[321]

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Aṭiyyah—Abū Sayf al-Taghlibī: The Messenger of God drew up a treaty with the delegation of the Taghlib that stipulated that they would not bring up their newborns as Christians. That was the condition imposed upon the delegation as well as on those who had sent them as a delegation, but it was not applicable to members of other tribes. When the time of 'Umar had come, those Taghlib tribesmen who had become Muslims said, "Do not alienate them[322] by imposing the kharāj upon them, so that they go away, but double the amount they have to pay as alms tax, which you levy from their [2510] wealth. In this way, it will have become jizā'. For they resent it when jizā' are mentioned in the context of the stipulation that they will not christen a newborn child, when its parents have embraced Islam." So a Taghlib delegation traveled to 'Umar concerning this matter. When al-Walīd had sent him the heads and leaders of the Christian tribesmen, 'Umar said to them, "Pay the jizyah." But they said to him, "Send us to a place where we can be safe. By God, if you impose upon us the jizā', we will certainly enter Byzantine territory, for, by God, you have brought disgrace upon us among the other Arab tribesmen." Then 'Umar said to them, "You yourselves have brought it upon you by holding points of view different from those of your own people among those camp-dwelling tribesmen who opposed Medinan sovereignty and as a consequence brought disgrace upon themselves. But, by God, I insist you pay it, you are contemptible nobodies. If you seek refuge with the Byzantines, I shall certainly write to them about you and I shall come and lead you away into captivity." They said, "Then take something from us, but do not call it jizā'." Then 'Umar replied, "As for us, we shall call it jizā'; you call it whatever you want." "But, Commander of the Faithful," 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib said to him, "did Sa'd b. Mālik not double the amount they had to pay as alms?" "Yes," 'Umar admitted, paying attention to what 'Alī had said. So he contended himself with the jizā' (which they were already paying), whereupon the Taghlib delegation returned (to where they were living) with tax matters drawn up in this way.

321. See A. Noth, "Die literarisch überlieferten Verträge," 306 f.
322. That is, the other non-Muslim tribesmen.

Nevertheless, among the Taghlib there were many proud and stubborn people who never stopped arguing with al-Walīd. Concerned as to how to deal with them, al-Walīd composed the line (in ṭawīl):

O Taghlib, when I shall fasten [2511]
The turban around my head,
You are, O daughter of Wā'il,[323] indeed as good as dead!

News of this reached 'Umar, who feared that they might harass al-Walīd to the point where he would lose his patience and pounce on them. So he dismissed him and appointed Furāt b. Ḥayyān and Hind b. 'Amr al-Jamalī over them as governors. Al-Walīd left, having entrusted the camel herd he had to one 323. The tribe of Taghlib is called Taghlib b. Wā'il, see Caskel, II, 541. In Arabic, a tribe is usually a feminine concept, see Wright, I, 181, hence "daughter of Wā'il."

Ḥurayth b. al-Nu'mān of the clan of Kinānah b. Taym of the Taghlib tribe. There were one hundred camels in all, but after al-Walīd had departed, he (lost them as a result) of Ḥurayth's cheating.

The conquest of al-Jazīrah took place in the year 17 in Dhū al-Ḥijjah (December–January 638–9).

Also in this year, I mean the year 17 (638), 'Umar left Medina for Syria (and traveled) until he reached Sargh,[324] as Ibn Isḥāq reports on whose authority it reached me via Salamah—Ibn Ḥumayd. I received this report also on the authority of al-Wāqidī.

'Umar's Journey to Syria

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: 'Umar left (Medina) in the year 17 (638) for a campaign in Syria. Then, when he had arrived in Sargh, the commanders of the Muslim armies came to meet him. They told him that the country was diseased, so he returned to Medina with his retinue.

[2512] According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Ibn Shihāb al-Zuhrī—'Abd al-Ḥamīd b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Zayd b. al-Khaṭṭāb—'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥārith b. Nawfal—'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās: 'Umar left (Medina) to go on a campaign. The Muhājirs and the Anṣār left with him. All the people traveled in close formation until, when they had arrived at Sargh, they were met by the army commanders Abū 'Ubaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ, Yazīd b. Abī Sufyān and Shuraḥbīl b. Ḥasanah, who informed 'Umar that the country was diseased. So 'Umar said, "Assemble before me the first Muhājirs."[325]

He said: Thus I assembled the first Muhājirs for him. 'Umar asked their opinion, but they were divided. Some said, "You set out in a direction in which you wanted to please God, seeking to obey His orders. We think that no tribulation which presents itself to you, should deter you from that purpose." But others said, "This is a veritable affliction that may bring about perdition; we are of the opinion that you should not draw any closer to

324. A place where the Ḥijāz ends and Syria begins, thirteen days traveling from Medina, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 77.

325. This appellative meant those of the Companions of the Prophet who converted to Islam before the Hijrah.

it." When they thus disagreed, he said, "Leave me." Then he ordered that the Muhājirat al-Anṣār[326] be assembled before him, so I convened them before him. 'Umar asked their advice, but they reacted in the same way as the Muhājirs had done. It was as if they had heard what the latter had said and simply copied their remarks. When they thus disagreed, 'Umar ordered them to leave him and said, "Bring me the Muhājirat al-fatḥ of Quraysh."[327] I assembled them before 'Umar, who asked their advice. This time, no two men among them disagreed, but they all said, "Return (to Medina) with the men; this is an affliction that may bring about our ruin." He went on: 'Umar said to me, "Ibn 'Abbās, go amongst the men and cry out the following message: The Commander of the Faithful informs you that, tomorrow morning, he will be early in the saddle. Do you likewise!" He went on: So, the following morning, 'Umar made ready to leave, as did all his men. When they were all gathered together, 'Umar addressed them and said, "Men, I am going back; do likewise." Then Abū 'Ubaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ said to him, "Are you fleeing from God's providence?" "Yes," 'Umar replied, "I flee from one divine ordinance to another. Don't you see? Suppose a man goes down into a riverbed with two slopes, one fertile, the other barren, does the one who grazes his animals on the infertile slope not do so according to God's ordinance, and does the one who grazes his animals on the fertile one not do so according to God's ordinance?" 'Umar went on, "If somebody other than you had said this, Abū 'Ubaydah, ..."[328] Then he went with him to a spot away from the people. While the men were thus busily readying themselves to depart, suddenly 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf appeared on the scene. He had been following at a distance and had not been present yesterday. He exclaimed, "What on earth is the matter with the [2513]

326. This term presumably meant those Anṣār who, by converting to Islam, had made a hijrah, dissociating themselves from strictly tribal affiliations and committing themselves solely to the cause of Islam. In Mālik, II, 895, Bukhārī, IV, 59, and Muslim, IV, 1740, they are simply designated as Anṣār.

327. Literally, "the Muhājirs of the conquest" (that is, of Mecca). This appellative seems to encompass those Meccans who only embraced Islam when circumstances seemed to dictate this, immediately before and after the conquest of Mecca. See Ibn Ḥajar, Fatḥ, XII, 292.

328. Presumably he might have finished this sentence with words to the effect that he would have punished him. For other possibilities, see ibid., XII, 293.

men?" So he was told. Then he said, "I know something about this which is relevant." 'Umar said, "In our eyes you are a truthful and honest man; what can you tell us?" 'Abd al-Raḥmān said, "I heard the Messenger of God say: 'When it comes to your notice that there is a pestilence in a certain country, do not go near it, and if it breaks out while you are in it, do not flee from it then.' Therefore," 'Abd al-Raḥmān concluded "nothing should make you leave this place except those words." 'Umar exclaimed, "God be praised, so leave, all you men!" Then he departed with them.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Ibn Shihāb al-Zuhrī—'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir b. Rabī'ah and Sālim, 'Umar's grandson, who related that 'Umar, only on the strength of 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf's tradition, decided to return with his men (to Medina). When 'Umar returned, the governors[329] in their turn went back to their respective provinces.

As for Sayf, according to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Abū Ḥārithah, Abū 'Uthmān and al-Rabī': A plague broke out in Syria, Egypt, and Iraq. It was persistent in Syria, but making victims
[2514] among the inhabitants of all the garrison cities who had spent the months of al-Muḥarram and Ṣafar there. Then the plague disappeared. Letters describing this reached 'Umar except from Syria. So 'Umar set out and traveled until, when he was near to it,[330] news reached him that the plague there was more severe than it had ever been. So he said, "As the Companions say, the Messenger of God said: 'If there is a pestilence in a certain country, do not enter it and if it breaks out in a country while you happen to be in it, do not leave it.'" So 'Umar returned (to Medina and stayed there), until the plague had disappeared and the people of Syria had written to him about it. They also wrote about various inheritance matters they were concerned with. 'Umar convened the people in the month Jumādā I of 17 (May–June, 638), and sought their advice on the (conquered) territories, saying, "It seems a good idea to make an inspection trip along the Muslims in their conquered territories in order to see what influence they exert on their surroundings. May I have your advice?" Ka'b al-

329. "Governors" is in Arabic 'ummāl; they are of course the same men as the "army commanders" (umarā') mentioned above (p. 92). The use of both these titles permits us to draw inferences as to the duties that a "governor" had in early Islam. See further EI[2] s.v. 'Āmil (Duri).

330. That is, the area where Syria proper was supposed to begin.

Aḥbār, who had become a Muslim in that very year of 'Umar's reign and who happened to be present, said, "Where would you like to make a start, Commander of the Faithful?" "Iraq," was 'Umar's reply. Ka'b said, "Do not do that. Evil and good both consist of ten parts. But whereas the one part that is good lies in the east and nine in the west, the one part that is evil lies in the west while the nine other, evil parts lie in the east. The devil and every severe disease are linked with Iraq."

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Sa'īd—al-Aṣbagh—'Alī: 'Alī went up to him saying, "Commander of the Faithful, by God, al-Kūfah is a place to which one makes a hijrah after the Hijrah;[331] it is the 'dome' of Islam.[332] There will come a day when there is no believer left who does not go there out of longing. God will be made victorious through its inhabitants just as He overcame the people of Lot with stones."[333] [2515]

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Muṭarraḥ—al-Qāsim—Abū Umāmah: Then 'Uthmān said, "Commander of the Faithful, the western part of the conquered territories is a land of wickedness; this wickedness is divided into one hundred parts, one part of which is seated in its people and the other parts in the land itself."

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Yaḥyā al-Taymī—Abū Mājid: 'Umar said, "Al-Kūfah is the spear of God and the dome of Islam. The tribal chieftains will protect their frontier ways of access and they will give military aid to the garrison cities. The estates[334] of the victims of the plague in 'Amawās[335] are left untended[336] so I will begin (my tour of inspection) there."[337]

---

331. The first occurrence of the word hijrah is the technical term conveying that one embraces the cause of Islam by giving up one's links with one's tribe and throwing in one's lot with the Muslims. The second occurrence constitutes the emigration on June 22, 622, from Mecca to Medina.

332. The Arabic is qubbah; in Lane it is al-Baṣrah which is described by this vague honorific.

333. That is, the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, see Q. LI, 33.

334. This is used here in the sense of that which is inherited by heirs. See next paragraph.

335. 'Amawās (present day Imwas, the Biblical Emmaus) is a district six miles from al-Ramlah along the road to Jerusalem in central Palestine. It is alleged that the plague started there.

336. For this connotation of the Arabic verb ḍā'a, see Lane, 1812, middle column.

337. That is, I shall begin my tour in Syria.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Abū 'Uthmān, Abū Ḥārithah and al-Rabī' b. al-Nu'mān: 'Umar said, "Since the estates of the people who recently died in Syria are left untended, I shall start my tour there. I shall properly divide the estates and I shall take measures for them as I think best. After that I shall return and travel all over the country, renouncing my previous orders to them."[338] (In all,) 'Umar went to Syria four times, twice in the year 16 (637) and twice in 17 (638), but he did not set foot on Syrian soil on the first trip of the year 17 (638).

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Bakr b. Wā'il—Muḥammad b. Muslim (al-Zuhrī): The Messenger of God said, "Taking care is divided into ten parts, nine of which are with the Turks, [2516] one with all the other people. Miserliness is divided into ten parts, nine of which are found with the Persians, one with all the other people. Generosity is also divided into ten parts, nine of which are found with negroes, one with all the other people. Lechery is divided also into ten parts, nine of which are found with Indians, one with all the other people. Bashfulness is also divided into ten parts, nine of which are found in women, and one with all the other people. Envy is also divided into ten parts, nine of which are found with the Arabs and one with all the other people. Lastly, arrogance is divided into ten parts, nine of which are found in the Byzantines and one in all the other people.[339]

Variant Features of the Story of the Plague of 'Amawās[340] and the Uncertainty as to the Year That It Occurred

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: Then the year 18 (639) began, in which the plague of 'Amawās broke out. One after the other the people perished in it. Also Abū 'Ubaydah b. al-

338. The Arabic reads anbidhu "I give up, forswear." Since this does not seem to be in keeping with 'Umar's usual emphasis on the centralization of government, and since the reading is dubious in any case, it is tempting, as Hinds suggests, to read unaffidhu ilayhim amrī "I shall transmit my orders to them."

339. This catalogue of popular generalizations is not found in any of the canonical ḥadīth collections.

340. For an interesting study on this plague and other epidemics in early Islamic history, as well as a detailed analysis of the technical terms used for describing such calamities, see L. I. Conrad, "Ṭā'ūn and wabā'. Conceptions of plague and Jarrāḥ died, the supreme commander (of Syria), as well as Mu'ādh b. Jabal, Yazīd b. Abī Sufyān, al-Ḥārith b. Hishām, Suhayl b. 'Amr, 'Utbah b. Suhayl and (many more) noble people.

According to Aḥmad b. Thābit—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar: The plague of 'Amawās and al-Jābiyah was in the year 18 (639). According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Shu'bah b. al-Ḥajjāj—al-Mukhāriq b. 'Abdallāh al-Bajalī—Ṭāriq b. Shihāb al-Bajalī: We went to Abū Mūsā (al-Ash'arī), who was in [2517] his home in al-Kūfah, to talk to him. When we were seated, he said, "I am not asking from you that you make light of this matter, for in this house someone succumbed to this disease, but neither do you need to keep away from this town, leaving for the wide and wholesome open spaces of your land until this pestilence abates. I shall tell you what ideas are frowned upon, with which one might try to protect oneself in this respect: that someone who does leave town thinks that, if he had stayed, he would have died, and that someone who does not leave and does contract the disease thinks that, if he had left, he would not have been infected. If the veritable Muslim does not think this, then there is no real need for him to leave town or to keep far away from it. I was with Abū 'Ubaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ in Syria in the year when the plague of 'Amawās broke out. When the disease had become widespread and news of that had reached 'Umar, he wrote to Abū 'Ubaydah in an attempt at inducing him to leave the contaminated area, saying, "Peace be upon you. Listen; a problem has presented itself to me that I urgently need to discuss with you. I implore you that, when you set eyes on this letter from me, you will not put it down until you are actually on your way back to me."

He went on: Abū 'Ubaydah realized only too well that all 'Umar [2518] wanted was to get him out of (this) plague-(stricken country). "May God forgive the Commander of the Faithful," he thought. Then he wrote to 'Umar, "I understand your need for me, Commander of the Faithful, but the fact is that I am surrounded here by an army of Muslim warriors for whom I could not possibly pestilence in early Islam," in JESHO, XXV (1982): 268–307, idem, "Arabic plague chronologies and treatises: social and historical factors in the formation of a literary genre," in Studia Islamica, LIV (1981):51–93.

---

muster the slightest dislike. I do not want to separate myself from them until God has carried out His divine plan in respect of me and them. Please, absolve me from my duty toward you, Commander of the Faithful, and let me stay here among my soldiers." When 'Umar read this letter, he burst into tears. The people (around him) asked, "Has Abū 'Ubaydah died, Commander of the Faithful?" "No," he replied, "but it is as if he had."

Then 'Umar wrote to him saying, "Peace be upon you. Listen; you have let your men settle in a country that is diseased. (I beg of you), make them depart to more elevated and wholesome surroundings." When this letter had reached Abū 'Ubaydah, he called me to him and said, "Abū Mūsā, I just received this letter from the Commander of the Faithful; see for yourself what he orders. Go and scout around for a suitable site for the army to make camp. I shall follow you later with the troops." So I returned to where I was living in order to get ready for my journey. There I found that the woman I was living with had contracted the disease. I returned to Abū 'Ubaydah immediately and said to him, "By God, in my own household there is a casualty." "Is it perhaps the woman you are living with?" he asked. "Yes," I answered.

He went on: Thereupon Abū 'Ubaydah ordered his camel to be saddled for him and just as he placed his foot in the stirrup, he suffered (an acute attack of) the plague. "By God," he exclaimed, "now I have contracted it." But even so, he himself traveled with his men all the way to al-Jābiyah. Eventually the pestilence abated.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Abān b. Ṣāliḥ—Shahr b. Ḥawshab al-Ash'arī—someone from his [2519] clan who, after his father had died, was left behind to take care of his mother and an eyewitness of the plague of 'Amawās, (in other words Shahr's) stepfather:[341] When the disease became widespread, Abū 'Ubaydah stood up among his men and delivered the following speech, "Men, this sickness is a mercy from your Lord, a request from your Prophet Muḥammad and it has caused the death of the pious who died before you; I, Abū 'Ubaydah, ask God that He assign to me my share thereof." Suddenly he suffered (an acute attack of) the disease, as a result of which he died. Mu'ādh b. Jabal was appointed as his successor over the people.

341. The Ṭabarī text has Rābah, as if that is the name of a man. In his edition of Ibn Ḥanbal's Musnad, Aḥmad Shākir (in III, no. 1697) proposes that, instead of 'an rābata rajulin min qawmihi, we read 'an rābbihi rajulin min qawmihi. The connotation "stepfather" is also listed in Lane, 1005, right column. The following story is also found in a few other sources such as Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, VII, 78 f; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, VII, 455. The common link in the different isnāds is Muḥammad b. Isḥāq. Whether it is he who is responsible for the story, or just for (part of) the wording, cannot be established. The transmitter Shahr b. Ḥawshab (d. between 110–12/728–30), who figures also in the isnād, a man of Syrian background who spread many stories of his own making in Iraq, is a far likelier candidate.

He went on: Then, after that, (Mu'ādh) delivered a speech in which he said, "Truly, men, this sickness constitutes a mercy from your Lord, a request from your Prophet and it has caused the death of the pious who died before you; I, Mu'ādh, ask God that He assign thereof a share to my family." Then his son, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mu'ādh, suffered (a sudden attack of) the plague as a result of which he died. Then Mu'ādh stood up and prayed for a share of the disease for himself, after which it smote him in the palm of his hand. Indeed, I saw him looking at his palm, then he kissed the back of his hand and said, "I prefer not to have anything of this world (together) with what (I have) in you (sc. my hand)." When he had died, 'Amr b. al-'Āṣī was made his successor over the people. 'Amr stood up to address the people and said, "Men, when this sickness strikes, it spreads like wildfire, so let us run away from it to the mountains." Then Abū Wāthilah al-Hudhalī said, "By God, you are known to us as a liar. While you were still no better than the donkey I sit on, I had already become a Companion of the Prophet. But," he went on, "by God, this time I will not reject what you say. I swear by God, we should not stay here!" Then he departed and the people went with him and scattered in all directions. Eventually God took the plague away from them. He went on: News of this opinion of 'Amr b. al-'Āṣī's reached 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb and, by God, he did not raise objections to it. [2520]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—someone anonymous—Abū Qilābah 'Abdallāh b. Zayd al-Jarmī: From among the words spoken by Abū 'Ubaydah and Mu'ādh b. Jabal it came to my notice that they said, Verily, this sickness constitutes a mercy from your Lord, a request from your Prophet and it has caused the death of the pious who died before you. At this point I used to say, How can the Messenger of God pray for such (a calamity to befall) his community! Someone whose veracity I do not suspect even related to me that he had heard it from the Prophet's own mouth and also that Gabriel once came to the Messenger of God and said to him, "The perdition of your community will occur as the result of a spear thrust or the plague."[342] Then the Messenger of God began to intone, "O my God, death through the plague!", and so I realized that those were the same words spoken by Abū 'Ubaydah and Mu'ādh.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: When news of the deaths of Abū 'Ubaydah and Yazīd b. Abī Sufyān finally reached 'Umar, he put Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān in charge of the forces in Damascus and its kharāj and Shuraḥbīl b. Ḥasanah in charge of the forces in al-Urdunn[343] and its kharāj. As for Sayf, he claims that the plague of 'Amawās occurred in the year 17 (638).

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Abū 'Uthmān, Abū Ḥārithah and al-Rabī' via their (respective) isnāds: That plague, that is the plague of 'Amawās, was so devastating[344] that nothing resembling it had ever been seen. The enemy ardently wished the Muslims to succumb to it, the hearts of the latter being filled with terror. The death toll was enormous and it persisted a long [2521] time, so long—months in fact—that the people talked about nothing else.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Abdallāh b. Sa'īd—Abū Sa'īd: As a result of this pestilence a rapidly spreading, fatal sickness struck al-Baṣrah. A certain man from Tamīm ordered a Persian servant of his to put his young son—his only child—on a donkey and to bring him to Safawān,[345] where he would shortly join them. The servant left just before daybreak, in time followed by his master, who soon reached a spot overlooking Safawān. As

342. Both "spear thrust" and "plague" are words derived from the same root t-'-n. The message conveyed seems to be, "Your community will perish as a result of warfare and disease."

343. This was a large district (see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 200 f.) comprising at the time, among other places, Ṣūr, 'Akkā and Ṭabariyyah (present day Tyre, Acre and Tiberias). Al-Urdunn has given rise to the name Jordan.

344. The Arabic word used here is mūtān, a word used to indicate a mortal disease that destroys entire herds of sheep or camels.

345. This is a watering place at one day's journeying from al-Baṣrah, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 98 f; the name is said to mean "dust" raised by the prevailing winds there, or "earth" causing the water there to be muddy.

he came closer to his son under the care of his servant, the latter suddenly raised his voice reciting loudly (in rajaz):

They 'll never see God outstripped by a donkey,
Or even a thoroughbred spurred on to fly,
For death may surprise the night traveler at dawn.

The man was not quite sure (whether or not he did see his son with his servant) until he had come quite close. But then he saw it was they. He exclaimed, "Curse you, what were you reciting?" "I do not know," the servant replied. Then the master said, "Go back now." Thus the father returned with his son, realizing that he had been made to hear as well as see a sign from God.[346]

He went on: Another man intended to leave for a country in which a plague had broken out. After he had departed, he was overcome by doubt. Suddenly he heard a Persian servant of his, urging the camels with the following song (in rajaz):

O you, who are fraught with anxiety, don't fret!
If fever is writ for you, that's what you'll get!

In this year, I mean 17 (638), 'Umar made his last trip to Syria, never to set foot there again, as Sayf has it. As for Ibn Isḥāq's account, that has been mentioned above.

Sayf's Account of 'Umar's Last Trip to Syria and How He Introduced New Ideas for the Well-Being of the Muslims [2522]

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Abū 'Uthmān, Abū Ḥārithah and al-Rabī': Having left 'Alī in charge of Medina, 'Umar departed, taking a group of Companions with him. They made good time, taking the road to Aylah.[347] Finally, when he was near Aylah, he left the track, followed by his servant, and alighted in order to pass water. Then he went back to the track and mounted his servant's camel. A pelt turned upside down was placed on its

346. This is the second time in this translation that someone is introduced who is heard speaking a language he is not supposed to know. Is this a coincidence or do we have here a topos? See above, pp. 11 f.

347. This is present day Elat.

saddle. 'Umar gave his servant his own camel to ride. When an advance party of the local population met him, they asked, "Where is the Commander of the Faithful?" "In front of you," 'Umar answered, meaning that he himself was facing them. They went on ahead[348] passing him. Finally 'Umar arrived at Aylah and dismounted. The advance party was told, "The Commander of the Faithful entered Aylah some time ago and dismounted." So at last they made their way to him.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Hishām b. 'Urwah—his father ['Urwah b. al-Zubayr]: When 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb had arrived in Aylah with his following of Muhājirs and Anṣār, he gave a cotton qamīṣ[349] of his, which had a tear in the backside as a result of the long journey, to the [local] bishop[350] saying, "Have this cleaned and mended." So the bishop left with 'Umar's qamīṣ and had it mended. He also had another one just like it sewn for him, which he brought to 'Umar, who said, "What is all this?" "As for this one here," the bishop answered, "that is the qamīṣ you gave me that I had washed and mended; as for the other one, that is a garment[351] I hereby give you as a present." 'Umar in-[2523] spected it and rubbed its fabric. Then he donned his own qamīs, but returned the other to the bishop saying, "The one I am wearing is better in that it absorbs more sweat."

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Aṭiyyah and Hilāl—Rāfi' b. 'Umar: I heard al-'Abbās in al-Jābiyah say to 'Umar, "If you practice the following four customs, you deserve the title 'righteous': honesty in money matters, equality in dividing up,[352] keeping your promise and steering clear of disgrace; purify yourself and your people."

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Abū 'Uthmān, al-Rabī' and Abū Ḥārithah each with his own isnād: 'Umar divided the allowances and ordained the winter and summer campaigns. He

348. "Ahead," in Arabic ilā amāmikum, and "in front of you" or "facing you," in Arabic amāmakum, can easily be confused.

349. A qamīṣ is a shirtlike, sleeved garment reaching down almost to the ground.

350. See H. Busse, "'Omar b. al-Ḫaṭṭāb in Jerusalem," in JSAI, V(1984):109 f., who sees in this an association with the story of the investiture of Joshua.

351. The Arabic word used here is the noncommittal kiswah.

352. That is, for instance when dividing booty.

manned[353] the frontier roads and observation posts at the border of Syria and he began to make inspection tours in the country, ordaining those measures in every district. He made 'Abdallāh b. Qays governor over the coastal plains of every district; he dismissed Shuraḥbīl (b. Ḥasanah) and appointed Mu'āwiyah (b. Abī Sufyān) as governor in his place. Abū 'Ubaydah and Khālid (b. al-Walīd) were given high commands in the army under the authority of Mu'āwiyah. Shuraḥbīl asked 'Umar, "Did you sack me out of discontent, Commander of the Faithful?" "No," was the reply, "I appreciate you as you are, but I really want a more forceful man."[354] "All right," Shuraḥbīl said, "but, please, clear my name in public, lest I be criticized for a shortcoming (which I do not have)." So 'Umar addressed the congregation and said, "(Listen, you) people, by God, I did not relieve Shuraḥbīl of his functions out of discontent, but I just wanted a more forceful man." He placed the granaries under the supervision of 'Amr b. 'Abasah and ordained all those measures. Then he addressed the people (in a meeting) to say goodbye.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Abū Ḍamrah and Abū 'Amr—al-Mustawrid—'Adī b. Suhayl: When 'Umar had finished seeing to the access routes (to the Ḥijāz) and his other business, he divided the estates of persons recently deceased, letting various heirs who were still alive inherit from various others, and then he presented the estates to the living heirs of every man (deceased) among them. [2524]

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Mujālid—al-Sha'bī: Al-Ḥārith b. Hishām departed (for Syria) amidst seventy of his relatives of whom only four eventually returned. Al-Muhājir b. Khālid b. al-Walīd recited the following lines (in sarī):

Who settles in Syria goes surely to rest there!
For ev'n if we can't be destroyed by calamities,
It's Syria that killed off the children of Rayṭah,[355]
Those twenty young knights, their lips' down still untrimmed,

353. That is what I think is meant by the verb sadda which usually means "to block," "obstruct."

354. Literally, it says, I want a man stronger than a man.

355. She seems to be al-Ḥārith b. Hishām's grandmother.

And likewise their equally noble young cousins!
At such a disaster th' onlooker's perplexed:
Their deaths were all caused by spear wounds and the plague;[356]
That's what we were told by the military scribe.[357]

He went on: 'Umar returned from Syria to Medina in the month of Dhū al-Ḥijja. When he was about to depart, he addressed the people in congregation, praised God and extolled Him, and said, "I have been put in charge over you and I have carried out what I had to do in respect of those matters concerning you, which God has entrusted to me. If He wills, we will justly distribute among you the revenues of your fay' lands, your living quarters and your raiding assignments.[358] We have given you your due. We have mobilized armed forces for you, we have put your access routes in order. We have indicated places for you to settle. We have extended the revenues of your fay' lands for you and of that part of Syria you fought for. We have ordained your foodstuffs for you[359] and we have given orders that you will be given your stipends, allowances and supplementary allocations. He who possesses [2525] information[360] on a certain issue, should act upon it. Let anyone inform me[361] (about something special he knows), then I myself shall put that into practice, God willing. There is no power except with God."

The hour for the prayer ritual had struck and the people asked 'Umar, "Could you please order Bilāl to call us to prayer?" So 356. Again the Arabic expression ṭa'n wa-ṭā'ūn is used; see above, p 100.

---

357. Is this the function referred to by Morony, Iraq, 54?

358. To be ordered to go on a raid was a privilege in view of the anticipated booty. See above, p. 43, where raiding was temporarily suspended.

359. I have opted for aṭ'imātukum from the apparatus rather than aṭmā'akum in the text.

360. The "information" alluded to, in Arabic 'ilm, is knowledge of how one should behave in certain circumstances. According to the ancient sunnah principle, which dates back to the Jāhiliyyah, one had only to follow the exemplary behavior of a revered ancestor to be certain that one had taken the right course of action. But "knowledge" of these "precedents" was not universal. So, if someone "knew" some solution to a problem, his "knowledge" served others as guiding principle. We find in this Ṭabarī passage the ancient sunnah principle alluded to still without a reference to, or an association with, (prophetic) ḥadīth. See Juynboll, Muslim tradition, 26–30.

361. I have opted for the variant falyu'limnā listed in the apparatus. Surely, the contrast 'ilm—'amal is also apparent in the second sentence, in which verbs, rather than nouns, are used.

'Umar issued the order and Bilāl sang out the call to prayer. There was no one, whose lifetime reached back to the lifetime of the Messenger of God, who did not weep, moistening his beard, when Bilāl's call rang out. 'Umar wept most copiously of all and everyone too young to have seen the Prophet with his own eyes wept all the same, moved by the weeping of the others, with memories of the Messenger of God coming back to him.[362]

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Abū 'Uthmān and Abū Ḥārithah: Khālid remained in control of Qinnasrīn, until he went on that campaign in which he was so successful; he distributed among the others that part of the booty which he had gained for himself.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Abū al-Mujālid: a similar report. They said: The news reached 'Umar that Khālid once entered the bathhouse where, after he had removed the depilatory agent, he rubbed himself with a thick mixture of safflower[363] and wine. So he wrote to him, saying, "It has reached me that you rubbed your body with wine; but God has forbidden the drinking of wine or its use in any other way just as He has forbidden sins[364] committed in a direct or indirect manner. He has even forbidden the touching of wine unless you cleanse yourself of it immediately, just as He has forbidden you to drink it. So make sure it will not touch your body, for it is filth.[365] And if you are actually still practicing this, (stop doing it immediately and) do not do it again!" Thereupon Khālid wrote to 'Umar, "We have diluted the wine with so much water[366] that it is no longer wine but has become (ordinary) washing water." Then 'Umar wrote to him, "Methinks the descendants of al-Mughīrah[367] have picked up some bad manners, but I pray that God will not destroy you for this." This last letter finally reached Khālid.

---

362. For the topoi discernible in this story, see H. Busse, op. cit., 106.

363. Carthamus tinctorius, a dye used to achieve an orange-red color.

364. The Arabic word used is ithm, which also means "wine" as well as "game of hazard." Perhaps a double entendre is intended here.

365. The use of "filth" in this context seems to imply that touching it causes a person to incur a state of ritual impurity.

366. For "diluting wine" Arabic uses the verb "to kill."

367. That is, al-Mughīrah b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar, who was Khālid's grandfather and the eponym of a major subclan of the Makhzūm clan of Quraysh. Caskel, pedigrees 22, 23. See also *EI*², s.v. Makhzūm (Hinds).

In this same year, I mean the year 17 (638), Khālid b. al-Walīd and 'Iyāḍ b. Ghanm went on a military campaign according to Sayf—his authorities.

An Account of the Campaign of Khālid and 'Iyāḍ

[2526] According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Abū 'Uthmān, Abū Ḥārithah and al-Muhallab: In the year 17 (638), Khālid and 'Iyāḍ went on a campaign in enemy territory. They journeyed and came upon huge riches. They had set out from al-Jābiyah, from where 'Umar returned to Medina. Abū 'Ubaydah was in charge of Ḥimṣ with Khālid under his command in Qinnasrīn. Yazīd b. Abī Sufyān was in control of Damascus, Mu'āwiyah in al-Urdunn, 'Alqamah b. Mujazziz administered Palestine. 'Amr b. 'Abasah was in charge of the granaries and 'Abdallāh b. Qays had the coastal plains under his control. Over every administrative area a governor was appointed. The strong points of Syria, Egypt and Iraq have remained thus until today. It was no longer the case that a community passed from its own administrative area into another's without these forces pouncing on them after the (first) default.[368] For in that case the troops would be sent in. This state of equilibrium was achieved in the year 17/638.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Abū al-Mujālid, Abū 'Uthmān, al-Rabī' and Abū Ḥārithah: When Khālid had returned and the rumor had reached the general public how much that summer expedition had brought in, people were drawn toward him. Thus people from near and far flocked to Khālid. Among those who did so was al-Ash'ath b. Qays, who went to seek out Khālid in Qinnasrīn. The latter gave him an allowance of ten thousand dirhams. Nothing that went on in Khālid's province remained hidden from 'Umar, who was informed in writing by someone from Iraq about those who departed, while someone from Syria wrote to him about those who had received an allowance (i.e. from Khālid). Then 'Umar called a courier and dispatched a message with him for Abū 'Ubaydah ordering him to summon Khālid to appear in front of him, to tie him up with his own turban and to take off his cap,[369] until he disclosed to them from what source he had taken the allowance for al-Ash'ath, from his own wealth or from loot that he had acquired. If Khālid stated that it was part of the loot, then thereby it would have been established that he had cheated, and if he claimed that it was part of his own wealth, then he would be earmarked as a squanderer. "Dismiss him from his post in either case and add his administrative area to your own," 'Umar concluded. Abū 'Ubaydah wrote a message to Khālid who promptly made his way to him. Then Abū 'Ubaydah assembled the people and sat in front of them on the pulpit. The courier stood up and said, "Khālid, did you give this ten thousand dirhams allowance out of your own pocket or did you take it from loot acquired during a campaign?" Khālid did not reply even when the courier insisted, while all the time Abū 'Ubaydah remained silent, not speaking a word. Then Bilāl went to him and said, "The Commander of the Faithful has ordered that you be dealt with in the following manner." Then Bilāl took off Khālid's cap and bound him with his own turban, whereupon he said, "Speak up, was it from your own pocket or from loot?" "No," Khālid answered finally, "from my own pocket." Then Bilāl released him, returned his cap to him and, with his own hands, wound the turban around Khālid's head again. This finished, he said, "We hark unto our governors and obey them, and we honor and serve our masters." [2527]

368. The Arabic text has the word kufr, literally "unbelief." Not obeying the law of Islam, even in matters such as the paying of taxes, in the eyes of early Muslims constituted an act of "unbelief." Closely associated with this is the appellative of the so-called apostasy wars, in Arabic riddah. Just before, and on a larger scale immediately after, the Prophet's death, various Arab tribes started to refuse (radda) to pay the alms tax imposed by Muḥammad and, in doing so, became murtadd ("apostate"), a word like riddah derived from the same root r-d-d.

They went on: For a time, Khālid remained bewildered, not knowing whether or not he had been dismissed. Initially, Abū 'Ubaydah did not inform him until, when 'Umar was becoming impatient for Khālid to show up, he pondered the things that had happened. He wrote to Khālid to come to him. So the latter went to Abū 'Ubaydah and said, "May God have mercy upon you, what do you want now with me in addition to what you have already done to me! You have always kept something hidden from me that I have wanted to know for so long." Then Abū 'Ubaydah said, "By God, I am not the sort of man to scare you as long as I can avoid it, but now I know that what I have got to tell you is going to scare you."

369. This was probably in order to humiliate him. The Arabic word is qalansuwah, a headdress that the Arabs copied from the Persians. In this early age we have to visualize a skull cap rather than the pointed bonnet, the usual shape of the qalansuwah in 'Abbāsid times. See EI[2] s.v. Libās (Y. K. Stillman), Morony, Iraq, 259.

They continued: Khālid returned to Qinnasrīn, addressed the people of his province in a speech, and took his leave of them. Then he packed and started off to Ḥimṣ, where he gave a speech to the people in which he said goodbye to them. After that he departed in the direction of Medina. Finally, he approached 'Umar and muttered to him, "I complained about you to the Muslims. So help me God, 'Umar, you have treated me like dirt!" "Where did you get all that money?" 'Umar asked. "From the booty that was freely distributed and from sharing in the loot handed out in strictly equal portions; everything over sixty thousand is for you," Khālid answered. So 'Umar assessed the value of Khālid's possessions. The outcome was that twenty thousand (dirhams) were singled out for 'Umar, which he deposited in the treasury. Hereupon 'Umar said, "By God, Khālid, you are a truly honorable man in my esteem, and you are dear to me; after today you will [2528] never have occasion to blame me for anything."

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Abdallāh b. al-Mustawrid—his father—'Adī b. Suhayl: 'Umar wrote to the garrison cities, "I have not relieved Khālid from his post because he has caused me displeasure or because of deceit on his part. But the people were captivated by illusions on account of him, so I was afraid that they would confer too much trust upon him and would consequently be tested. I wanted them to realize that it is God who is the creator of all things and I did not want them to be subject to an illusion."

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Mubashshir—Sālim: When Khālid came to him, 'Umar quoted a verse (in ṭawīl) alluding (to Khālid):

Although you have done things that no one can do,
Remember it's God who creates and not you![370]

370. Literally "mankind."

Then 'Umar obliged Khālid to pay a certain sum of money and gave him compensation for this. He wrote a letter to the people concerning Khālid in order to absolve him from guilt so that they knew exactly what had happened.

In this year, I mean the year 17 (638), 'Umar performed a 'umrah.[371] He built the Masjid al-Ḥarām,[372] as al-Wāqidī asserts, and widened it. In all, he stayed in Mecca for twenty days. He demolished the properties of those who refused to sell their homes and he deposited the compensation thereof in the treasury, where it remained until they came and collected it.

Al-Wāqidī continued: The month in which 'Umar performed that 'umrah was Rajab (July–August 638). He had left Zayd b. Thābit in charge of Medina.

Al-Wāqidī continued: Also in (the course of) this 'umrah, he ordered the renewal of the boundary markers of the Ḥaram[373] to be carried out by Makhramah b. Nawfal, al-Azhar b. 'Abd 'Awf, Ḥuwayṭib b. 'Abd al-'Uzzā and Sa'īd b. Yarbū'.

Al-Wāqidī continued: According to Kathīr b. 'Abdallāh al- [2529]
Muzanī—his father—his grandfather: In the year 17 (638) we approached Mecca in the company of 'Umar (who was on his way to perform) a 'umrah. He passed the track[374] where he was addressed by the overseers of the wells, who asked him whether they were allowed to build road stations between Mecca and Medina, where hitherto there had not been structures of any sort. 'Umar gave his consent, and stipulated that the wayfarer[375] was even more entitled to shelter and water (than pilgrims).

Al-Wāqidī said: Also in this year, 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb married Umm Kulthūm, the daughter of Fāṭimah (the daughter of the

371. The Arabic term for the lesser pilgrimage consisting mainly of a visit to, including circumambulations of, the Ka'bah.

372. Islam's holiest sanctuary, the great mosque in Mecca housing the Ka'bah.

373. This is the entire area of Mecca and surroundings closed to non-Muslims.

374. Perhaps this "track" refers to the route generally taken by travelers from Medina to Mecca.

375. The "wayfarer," in Arabic ibn al-sabīl ("son of the road"), in Arabian society used to form a special class of people, the preservation of whose well-being was a sacred duty of the (partially) settled. In Islam the ibn al-sabīl received his own special share from the fifth set aside from the booty acquired in battle. For an analysis of the connotations of ibn al-sabīl in the Jāhiliyyah and early Islam, see Puin, 43–57, and Abū 'Ubayd, Amwāl, 416–19.

Messenger of God) and 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib. 'Umar consummated the marriage in Dhū al-Qa'dah (November–December 638).

Al-Wāqidī continued: In this year, 'Umar put Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī in charge of al-Baṣrah and ordered him to send al-Mughīrah (b. Shu'bah) back to him in Rabī' I (March–April 638). According to Ma'mar (b. Rāshid)—al-Zuhrī—Sa'īd b. al-Musayyab: Abū Bakrah, Shibl b. Ma'bad al-Bajalī, Nāfi' b. (al-Ḥārith b.) Kaladah and Ziyād (b. Abīhi) bore witness against him.[376]

Al-Wāqidī went on: According to Muḥammad b. Ya'qūb b. 'Utbah—his father: (Al-Mughīrah) used to visit Umm Jamīl, a woman from Hilāl. She had had a husband from Thaqīf, called al-Ḥajjāj b. 'Ubayd,[377] but he had died some time back. So al-Mughīrah started having an affair with her. The people of al-Baṣrah got wind of this and were shocked. One day al-Mughīrah left (his house) and entered her house, which the people had kept under close observation. The men, who were to testify against him, went together (to this house) and tore away the curtain.
[2530] There he was, making love to her! Abū Bakrah wrote about this to 'Umar (and consequently went to him in Medina to discuss matters).[378] 'Umar heard his voice, (but could not see him for) there was a curtain between him and his visitor. 'Umar asked, "Is it you, Abū Bakrah?" "Yes," the latter said, "Have you come because of something bad having happened?" asked 'Umar. "It is really al-Mughīrah who caused me to come to you," Abū Bakrah answered, and he told 'Umar the whole story. Then 'Umar dispatched Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī (to al-Baṣrah) as the new governor and ordered him to send al-Mughīrah back to him (in Medina). (After Abū Mūsā had arrived in al-Baṣrah), al-Mughīrah presented him with (a servant girl of his called) 'Aqīlah saying, "I have chosen her especially for you." Then Abū Mūsā sent al-Mughīrah back to 'Umar.

Al-Wāqidī continued: According to 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥam-

376. In respect of what legal matter will become clear in what follows.

377. In Ya'qūbī, II, 166, 'Atīk.

378. Prym states in the apparatus that, apparently, something from the Ṭabarī text is missing and draws attention to a similar version of this story in Ya'qūbī, loc. cit., showing a considerable textual overlap but containing a seemingly more complete account. This last sentence, added in brackets, is distilled from that account.

mad b. Abī Bakr b. Muḥammad b. 'Amr b. Ḥazm—his father—Mālik b. Aws b. al-Ḥadathān: I was present when al-Mughīrah was brought before 'Umar; al-Mughīrah had a proper wife from the tribe of Murrah. 'Umar said to him, "You have taken leave of your senses, you randy old goat." Then I heard him interrogate al-Mughīrah about the woman with whom he was supposed to have had illicit relations. Mālik b. Aws said: She was called al-Raqṭā', she was from Hilāl, and her late husband had been from Thaqīf.

Ṭabarī said: The reason for what occurred to Abū Bakrah and the testimony he gave against al-Mughīrah is according to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, al-Muhallab, Ṭalḥah and 'Amr, supported by their respective isnāds: What happened in actual fact between Abū Bakrah and al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah was that al-Mughīrah made it his custom to start conversations with Abū Bakrah, but the latter avoided him every time the former did so. At the time, both lived in al-Baṣrah; they were each other's neighbors, with a road separating their houses. Both used to spend time sitting behind their latticed windows[379] opposite one another in their respective houses. Both lattices were fitted with peepholes, the one exactly opposite the other. One day, some people came together in Abū Bakrah's house for a chat at his lattice, when a [2531] (sudden) gust of wind opened the peephole. Abū Bakrah stood up in order to close it. Then—the wind having also opened the peephole of the lattice window opposite—he saw al-Mughīrah lying between the legs of a woman. He said to his visitors, "Come and look!" They got up and looked. Then Abū Bakrah said, "Bear witness!" "Who is she, anyway?" they asked. "Umm Jamīl, the daughter of al-Afqam," Abū Bakrah replied. Umm Jamīl was one of the 'Āmir b. Ṣa'ṣa'ah tribe; she was al-Mughīrah's mistress, making it her business to offer her services to governors and tribal nobles (ashrāf) as some other women did in those days. The men exclaimed, "We only saw buttocks, we do not know what she looks like." They kept staring when she stood up. When al-Mughīrah left the house to go to the ṣalāt, Abū Bakrah stopped him and said, "You may not perform the prayer ritual with us." Thereupon, they wrote about the affair to 'Umar and exchanged letters with him. 'Umar sent for Abū Mūsā and said to him, "Abū Mūsā, I am going to employ you as governor, I shall send you to a land where the devil has taken up residence, spreading his evil.[380] Stick to what you know is proper and do not change, lest God wreak a change in you!" Abū Mūsā replied, Commander of the Faithful, then help me with a number of Companions of the Messenger of God, Muhājirs as well as Anṣārīs, for I have found them, in this community as well as in those outlying administrative areas, to be like the salt without which no food tastes good."[381] 'Umar informed him, "Seek the help of anyone you care for." So Abū Mūsā asked for twenty-nine men, among whom were Anas b. Mālik, 'Imrān b. Ḥuṣayn and Hishām b. 'Āmir. Then he departed in their company and journeyed until he came to the Mirbad.[382] (The news) reached al-Mughīrah that Abū Mūsā had alighted at the Mirbad and he [2532] thought, "By God, Abū Mūsā has not come simply to pay a visit or even for trade purposes, but he has come here in his function of commander." People were going about their business there, when suddenly Abū Mūsā came and approached them. He handed a letter from 'Umar to al-Mughīrah. It was truly the most concise letter ever written by anyone, just four statements with which 'Umar dismissed, censured and ordered the immediate return of one person, and installed another as governor. (It read:)

379. In Arabic mashrabah, in modern Arabic mashrabiyyah. These latticed windows have for centuries been characterized by woodwork through which the people inside can see what is going on outside, but passersby cannot distinguish what is going on inside the house. Whether or not the same applies to these supposedly seventh-century Baṣran latticed windows mentioned here is hard to establish. But why not? Thesiger describes latticed windows in the muḍīfs of the Marsh Arabs in southern Iraq that have the same properties as the oriel-shaped mashrabiyyahs found elsewhere. Muḍīfs are guesthouses made of bundles of reed according to allegedly age-old designs, see Thesiger, ch. 23.

"Listen. A shocking rumor has reached me. I have sent Abū Mūsā to be governor. Hand all authority over to him. Hurry hither."

'Umar wrote to the inhabitants of al-Baṣrah:

"Listen. I have sent Abū Mūsā to be your governor. He is to

380. The Arabic has here the expression "the devil has laid eggs and produced young."

381. One is perhaps justified in being reminded of Matthew v, 13, in which the apostles are addressed with the words, "Thou art the salt of the earth." Christians were found everywhere in Iraq of the seventh century and it is feasible that expressions used by them also caught on with adherents of different faiths.

382. Al-Mirbad was the commercial center of al-Baṣrah where caravans stopped, see EI[2] s.v. (Pellat).

take away from the affluent among you to give to the poor. Together with you he will fight your enemy. He is to defend your security and to count the revenues of your fay' lands. Then he will distribute those among you. Finally, he will rid your roads (of unwanted elements) for you."

Al-Mughīrah presented Abū Mūsā with a slave girl from al-Ṭā'if[383] called 'Aqīlah, saying, "I have chosen her especially for you." She was very attractive. Then al-Mughīrah, and also Abū Bakrah, Nāfi' (b. al-Ḥārith) b. Kaladah, Ziyād (b. Abīhi) and Shibl b. Ma'bad al-Bajalī departed and journeyed until they came to 'Umar. 'Umar confronted them with al-Mughīrah who said, "Ask these nobodies[384] how they saw me; was I facing them or did I have my back toward them? And how did they see the woman, or how could they recognize her? For if they were facing me, how was it that I was not hidden (i.e. from their sight, because the woman was between me and them)? And if I had my back toward them, on what grounds did they permit themselves to spy on me in my own home, making love to my own wife? God in heaven, I have never bedded anyone except my own wife. This Umm Jamīl woman must have looked like her."

Then 'Umar started by asking Abū Bakrah, who testified against al-Mughīrah that he had seen him lying between the legs [2533] of Umm Jamīl, heaving up and down like a kohl[385] stick in its phial. 'Umar asked, "In what position did you see them?" "From behind," he replied. "But how did you establish her identity?" pursued 'Umar. "Standing on my toes, I stretched out my neck,"[386] was the answer. Then 'Umar summoned Shibl b. Ma'bad who testified to the same effect. 'Umar asked him, "Did they have their backs toward you, or did they face you?" "No, they faced me," Shibl answered. Then Nāfi' testified, giving the same testimony as Abū Bakrah. Ziyād, however, did not offer the same testimony saying, "I saw him sitting between the legs of a

383. The Arabic technical term used here is muwallad(ah), which indicates a slave boy or slave girl of foreign background but born and reared among Arabs.

384. Literally, "serfs."

385. Webster: a cosmetic preparation, usually powdered antimony sulfide, used . . . to darken the eyelids.

386. This is how I render the verb taḥāmaltu; this connotation was suggested by Glossarium. I think the reading is dubious, but the message seems clear.

woman; I saw two painted feet[387] tapping on the floor and two bare buttocks and I heard heavy panting." 'Umar asked, "Did you notice a heaving up and down like a kohl stick in its phial?" "No," Ziyād said. "And did you recognize the woman?" "No, I did not, I must have confused her with somebody else." 'Umar told him, "Step aside." Then he ordered the other three to be flogged according to the Qur'ānic punishment[388] and he recited: "And when they cannot produce witnesses, then they are liars in God's view."[389] Then al-Mughīrah spoke, "Rid me of these nobodies," but 'Umar said, "Be silent, may God strike you dumb, for by God, if their testimony had turned out to be valid, then I would have stoned you with your own stones."[390]

In that year, I mean 17 (638), the conquest of Sūq al-Ahwāz, [2534] Manādhir and Nahr Tīrā[391] took place according to some; according to others, that was in the year 16 (637) after the Hijrah.

An Account of the Circumstances Leading to the Conquest of al-Ahwāz and of Him Who Carried It Out

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Muhallab and 'Amr: Al-Hurmuzān was one of the seven noble families among the Persians.[392] His territory was comprised of 387. Women painted their fingers and toes with henna, an ancient custom that persists to this day.

388. The Qur'ānic, fixed penalty for qadhf, that is, an unproven, and therefore slanderous, accusation of illicit sexual relations, is eighty stripes for a free person. Proof of fornication is only established on the testimony of at least four male witnesses. If their testimony turns out to be valid and is, subsequently, accepted, the Qur'ānic fixed punishment for zinā' (stoning, or one hundred lashes plus in some cases one year of banishment) is meted out to the guilty couple. Qadhf is succinctly dealt with in Q. XXIV, 4, "Those who accuse honorable women (of adultery) and then cannot produce four witnesses, give them eighty lashes and never accept their testimony again; those are the evildoers."

389. Q. XXIV, 13.

390. He means probably, ". . . with the stones you then would have coming to you."

391. All three are districts (in Arabic, kuwar) in al-Ahwāz, which is the Arabicized name of Khūzistān. The main city in the region of al-Ahwāz is called Sūq al-Ahwāz, which literally means "Market of al-Ahwāz," see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 410 f.

392. See Morony, Iraq, 186, for more details on the ahl al-buyūtāt, as they are called.

Mihrijān Qadhaq and the districts of al-Ahwāz. These were families who were higher in rank[393] than anybody in Fārs. When al-Hurmuzān was routed at the battle of al-Qādisiyyah, he headed for his territory in the abovementioned region.[394] He went on governing his subjects and fought with them those who attacked them. Al-Hurmuzān used to make raids on the people of Maysān and Dastimaysān[395] from two directions, Manādhir and Nahr Tīrā.[396] 'Utbah b. Ghazwān asked Sa'd for reinforcements, so the latter sent him Nu'aym b. Muqarrin and Nu'aym b. Mas'ūd, ordering them to go to the highest point overlooking Maysān and Dastimaysān until they had reached a position between where al-Hurmuzān (and his people) were and Nahr Tīrā. 'Utbah b. Ghazwān sent Sulmā b. al-Qayn and Ḥarmalah b. Murayṭah out on a certain mission. They were two of the Companions of the Messenger of God, who had made the Hijrah with him; both were from the 'Adawiyyah clan of Ḥanẓalah. They arrived at the border of the land of Maysān and Dastimaysān, at a point between al-Hurmuzān and Manādhir. There they called upon the Banū al-'Ami.[397] So Ghālib al-Wā'ilī and Kulayb b. Wā'il al-Kulaybī [2535] responded.[398] They had separated from Nu'aym (b. Muqarrin) and Nu'aym (b. Mas'ūd) and turned away from them. Now they went to Sulmā and Ḥarmalah. After they had arrived there, the latter 393. The term "high in rank" is expressed by the Arabic preposition dūna, which usually means the opposite "lower," "baser." This seems an example of a ḍidd, that is the phenomenon in Arabic that a word has two diametrically opposed connotations, one of which is used most of the time, its opposite rarely. That dūna is such a ḍidd is confirmed in Lane.

394. In this passage the word ummah, usually rendered as "community," occurs twice; I opted here for "territory." See also pp. 3–4 above.

395. These are districts north of al-Baṣrah and west of al-Ahwāz.

396. These are two more districts of al-Ahwāz, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 644, 837.

397. A clan affiliated to Tamīm that had been living among the Persians for some time. See the next note and further down for an explanation of how that came to pass.

398. Literally "they went out" (kharaja). In the edition, a pedigree is given allegedly indicating how these two men fitted in their clan and, subsequently, in Tamīm. When compared with Caskel (nos. 59 ff.), this pedigree is not substantiated. But in no. 212 of Caskel, a man, Murrah b. Wā'il, is mentioned who is the reputed ancestor of the Banū al-'Amm or al-'Ami and who is listed as having descended from Azd. Whether or not the Banū al-'Amm, or al-'Ami, were originally Tamīmīs, or only became affiliated to Tamīm by "adopting" Mālik b. Ḥanẓalah as 'forefather' is anybody's guess.

said, "You are from the same tribe[399] therefore you may not desert us. When the day such-and-such has come, rise against al-Hurmuzān. One of us will attack Manādhir, the other Nahr Tīrā and we will kill al-Hurmuzān's fighters. Then we will come to you again. God willing, there is no other enemy than al-Hurmuzān." After the two men from the 'Ami b. Mālik clan had promised their cooperation, they returned to their clansmen who, in their turn, also agreed to help.

Sayf went on: There is a story explaining how this man called al-'Ami[400] came by his name. This al-'Ami was Murrah[401] b. Mālik b. Ḥanẓalah b. Mālik b. Zayd Manāt b. Tamīm, with whom, as well as with al-Uṣayyah b. Imri' al-Qays, there settled a mixed bunch of people from Ma'add.[402] Those people who were of the opinion that he should not give support to the Persians in controlling al-Ardawān[403] had believed him to be blind[404] to what was [2536] the proper course of action. Concerning this attitude, Ka'b b. Mālik, his brother—sometimes it is Ṣudayy (b. Mālik) who is mentioned—composed the following verses (in ṭawīl):

(Though) once a good man, now our Murrah is blind, and, deaf to his kinsmen's pleas, he has set out

399. That is to say, the two of you are descended from the same woman as we, namely al-'Adawiyyah who, according to Caskel, II, 136, is al-Ḥarām bt Khuzaymah b. Tamīm.

400. In the following story, two forms of the name alternate: al-'Ami, with a short i, a poetic license for 'amiya "he was blind," occurring in the poem that follows shortly, and al-'Amī, with long ī, as if it is a regular nisbah. Caskel (II, 166) lists the clan as the Banū al-'Amm. In Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Kitāb al-Aghānī (Cairo 1323–), III, 257, the name is interpreted as "cousins," conveying that the members of the Banū al-'Amm clan are as "dear to us as our own cousins." Whether the clan was, or had become, part of Tamīm, as is suggested in this story, is a matter of controversy. Other sources claim that they originated from Azd, see Tāj, VIII, 410, also Caskel, no. 212, and Kaḥḥālah, II, 820 f. See also Juda, 77.

401. Murrah was allegedly the grandfather of Ghālib and the great-grandfather of Kulayb, the two persons mentioned in the pedigree of Prym's apparatus.

402. Ma'add is a collective name for the northern Arab tribes, see *EI*², s.v. Ma'add (Watt).

403. This is another name for Khūzistān, the Persian name of the Ahwāz district; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 204.

404. In Arabic 'ammā, form II of 'amiya mentioned in n. 400 above. It is also possible to interpret this verb as meaning "they made him blind to the proper course of action." Although the second form of this verb may be used to convey "to consider someone to be blind," neither Lane nor Glossarium confirm this.

To settle away from us, spurning his land, and seek with the Persian lords[405] power and fame.

Because of the first line he, Murrah, was called al-'Ami, and the saying became current: the Banū al-'Ami have deemed him blind[406] to the right course of action because of[407] the support that he gave to the Persians. The Qur'ānic expression, "They have become blind and deaf,"[408] is to be taken in a similar vein. Yarbū' b. Mālik[409] composed the following poem (in ṭawīl):

The best of Ma'add realize that it's we who'll be in the contest the stars of the race[410]
In spite of the enemies[411] we settled ourselves,
Though none of Tamīm did[412] nor any big tribe.
We drove out the lowly,[413] so nothing remained
Which the Persians begrudged us, not even a pin.
If the lands of the noblest of nomads are rich,[414]
we boast of lands richer in water than theirs.

Ayyūb b. al-'Uṣayyah b. Imri' al-Qays recited the following lines (in ṭawīl):

Of (all) the tribes we were the first here to settle,
On purpose we did so where large groups would gather.

---

405. The term used is Asāwirah, see n. 147 above.

406. Or conceivably "have made him blind to . . ."

407. Or conceivably "through."

408. Q. V, 71; "they" refers to the Jews and Christians.

409. He is another alleged brother of Murrah al-'Ami.

410. Probably a reference to one of the big fairs organized in various places in the peninsula, during which members of different tribes, by entering various contests, tried to outdo one another to the glory of the winner's tribe and the detriment of the loser's.

411. Probably a reference to those former inhabitants of the area who were forced to make room for the Arab settlers.

412. Glossarium, p. DCXXI, suggests that we read wa-lam nunikh or yanakh for wa-lam yutnakh. This does not affect the translation given here and is, in fact, required by the meter.

413. The word used is nabīṭ, which initially stood for Nabateans, and was later applied to people of mixed origin who settled in southern Iraq, north of al-Baḥrayn, reviled for their lifestyle as petty agriculturalists in small villages scattered over the swampy area known as al-Batā'iḥ and also in the Sawād.

414. Rich in water.

While ruling them, those who came first we did honor,
Henceforth at all times we ruled over all neighbors.

[2537] When that particular night had come, agreed on by Sulmā, Ḥarmalah, Ghālib and Kulayb, al-Hurmuzān being at the time between Nahr Tīrā and Duluth,[415] Sulmā and Ḥarmalah left, very early the following morning, with a fully equipped armed force, and roused Nu'aym (b. Muqarrin) and Nu'aym (b. Mas'ūd). All of these and al-Hurmuzān came face to face at a spot between Duluth and Nahr Tīrā, Sulmā b. al-Qayn at the head of the warriors from al-Baṣrah and Nu'aym b. Muqarrin in command of those from al-Kūfah. Then fighting broke out. While they were thus engaged, the reinforcements recruited by Ghālib and Kulayb approached. Then the news that Manādhir and Nahr Tīrā had been taken reached al-Hurmuzān. So God broke his strength[416] and that of his army and defeated him and his troops. The Muslims killed and captured as many as they wanted from them and they pursued them until they came to a halt on the bank of the Dujayl,[417] having occupied all the land this side (i.e. that is west) of the river. They encamped opposite Sūq al-Ahwāz. In the meantime, al-Hurmuzān had crossed the bridge to Sūq al-Ahwāz and taken up residence there. So the Dujayl became the line of demarcation between al-Hurmuzān on the one hand and Sulmā, Ḥarmalah, Nu'aym (b. Muqarrin), Nu'aym (b. Mas'ūd), Ghālib and Kulayb on the other.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Abdallāh b. al-Mughīrah al-'Abdī—a man from 'Abd al-Qays called Ṣuḥār: I went to Harim b. Ḥayyān in the region between al-Dulūth and the Dujayl with baskets of dates, for which he could hardly wait. Most of his [2538] provisions, when stocked up, consisted of dates. When (the regular provisions) ran out, he chose for himself from some of those baskets that he used as provision bags, while his comrades were already on their way. Then he carried these bags and ate from

415. Also spelled Dulūth, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 583, and a few lines down.

416. The unusual combination in the text of kasara "to break" and the preposition fī "in" looks dubious; see Lane, 961, middle column, ad finem, where fī is replaced by min; see also WKAS, I, 179, right column, l. 38. The meaning seems clear, however.

417. The Dujayl is a river in Khūzistān-al-Ahwāz, see Le Strange, Lands, 232. Nowadays it is called Kārūn.

them, giving also to others, wherever he happened to be, in the plains or in the mountains.

They said: When the Muslim warriors invaded al-Hurmuzān's territory and set up their camp close to where he was in al-Ahwāz, he realized that he lacked the manpower to overcome them. So he begged for peace, whereupon they wrote about that proposal to 'Utbah, asking him for directives in this matter. Al-Hurmuzān sent a letter to 'Utbah who, while accepting the proposed peace treaty, answered that al-Hurmuzān was to remain in control of all of al-Ahwāz and Mihrijān Qadhaq with the exception of Nahr Tīrā and Manādhir and that area of Sūq al-Ahwāz that the Muslims had already conquered. What we had liberated from Persian rule would not be returned to them. Sulmā b. al-Qayn placed a garrison[418] in Manādhir under the command of Ghālib, and Ḥarmalah placed one in Nahr Tīrā under the command of Kulayb. They had formerly commanded the forces of al-Baṣrah.

Meanwhile, groups of the Banū al-'Ami left their former dwelling places and took up residence in al-Baṣrah, one group after another. 'Utbah wrote about that to 'Umar and sent a delegation (i.e. from them to 'Umar). Among these were Sulmā, who had been ordered to leave someone in control of his district, as well as Ḥarmalah—both had been Companions of the Prophet—furthermore, Ghālib and Kulayb. Also, other delegations from al-Baṣrah traveled in those days (i.e., to Medina). Upon their arrival, 'Umar[419] ordered them to voice their needs, whereupon each of them said, "As far as the common people are concerned, you are their lord;[420] the only ones (who have demands to make) are our élite." So they voiced their demands beyond those raised by al-Aḥnaf b. Qays,[421] who said:

"Commander of the Faithful, you are the sort of man as they have described; but there is perhaps something that eludes you, [2539] that is our duty to bring to your attention, something that is

418. Or "set up an army camp."

419. The text in Ṭabarī admits also of 'Utbah being the one who gives the order, but the text of Ibn al-Athīr, II, 424, implies clearly that it was 'Umar.

420. Presumably this means "you are directly responsible for their well-being."

421. Al-Aḥnaf b. Qays was a leader of Tamīm in al-Baṣrah, see *EI*², s.v. al-Aḥnaf b. Ḳays (Pellat). The parallel passage in Ibn al-Athīr, II, 424, leaves out the words illā mā kāna min, which means that they asked that al-Aḥnaf be heard as their spokesman. The text in Ṭabarī can conceivably be interpreted in this way too.

connected with the well-being of the common people. But, then, a ruler looks into matters (happening in a spot) from which he is far removed with the eyes and the ears of his informants. We kept on moving from one place to another, until we arrived at a piece of open country. Well, our brothers among the inhabitants of al-Kūfah have settled in a place rich in vegetation,[422] overflowing with sweet springs and lush palm groves; in a never-ceasing flow its fruit produce reaches them. But we, the people of al-Baṣrah, we have settled in a soggy swamp, which does not produce anything. One side faces the desert and the other side gives on to a brackish river. Supplies reach this region like a trickle from an ostrich's gullet. Our houses are crammed, our daily rations poor. Our numbers are large, but our nobles are few in number. Many of us have fought vigorously, but our finances are straitened, while our plots of land are small. In the past God enriched us and increased our land. So may you now enrich us, Commander of the Faithful, and increase the daily rations assigned to us so that we may survive!"

So 'Umar reviewed their dwelling places which they had occupied until they moved out into the desert. Then he gave them the region as their share in the booty and allotted plots to them, also taken from what used to belong to the Persian royal family. Thus all the land between the Tigris and the desert became fay' [2540] land. They divided it among themselves. The other properties of the royal family in the land around al-Baṣrah were thus dealt with in the same manner as the land of al-Kūfah was dealt with: they let those who were interested settle there and divide it up among themselves—where no preference was given to the first or second wave of settlers—after they had singled out one fifth of its revenues for the governor.

The land occupied by the people of al-Baṣrah consisted of two halves, one was divided up into plots; the other was left for the benefit of the armed forces and the community. The aṣḥāb al-alfayn,[423] from those who had been present at the battle of al-

422. Literally, it says "in a camel's eye," as Lane (532, middle column, line 1) asserts ". . . a tract abounding with herbage; likened to the ḥadaqah 'the black of the eye' of the camel because this is plentifully supplied with moisture."

423. Literally, "the people of two thousand," that is, the people who received annual stipends of two thousand dirhams. In Ṭabarī, I, 2412, l. 14, the veterans of al-Qādisiyyah and Syria are singled out for this amount. See vol. XII of this series.

Qādisiyyah and then had gone to al-Baṣrah together with 'Utbah, were five thousand in number, while in al-Kūfah they numbered thirty thousand. 'Umar increased the numbers of the veterans of al-Baṣrah from those who had displayed valor among the stipendiaries of two thousand dirhams by so many that their numbers became the same as those of al-Kūfah, by adding all those who (had fought) in al-Ahwāz. Then 'Umar decreed, "This young man[424] is to be the leader of the people of al-Baṣrah," and he wrote to 'Utbah in respect of him that he listen to him and make use of his counsel. Then 'Umar sent Sulmā, Ḥarmalah, Ghālib and Kulayb back to Manādhir and Nahr Tīrā, where they had to keep themselves prepared for any eventuality and where they had to set apart the kharāj.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Muhallab and 'Amr: While the people of al-Baṣrah and those who were living under their protection were thus engaged, a controversy flared up, each side putting forth contradictory claims concerning the boundaries of their lands, between al-Hurmuzān on the one hand and Ghālib and Kulayb on the other. Sulmā and Ḥarmalah went there to see what was going on among them and found Ghālib and Kulayb to be in the right and al-Hurmuzān to be wrong. So they separated the quarreling parties. Moreover, al-Hurmuzān went back on his word and withheld what he had accepted to pay. Then he called upon the Kurds to help him, whereupon his army grew in strength. Sulmā, Ḥarmalah, Ghālib [2541] and Kulayb wrote about the designs of al-Hurmuzān, as well as about his unfairness and his broken promise, to 'Utbah b. Ghazwān who, in turn, notified 'Umar about this. 'Umar wrote back, giving him his orders and sent them Ḥurqūṣ b. Zuhayr al-Sa'dī, one of the Prophet's Companions, as reinforcement. 'Umar put him in command of all military operations and of all the land conquered (sc. in al-Ahwāz). Al-Hurmuzān, together with those who were with him, went forth to wage war; Sulmā, Ḥarmalah, Ghālib and Kulayb did likewise until, when they had reached the bridge to Sūq al-Ahwāz, they sent a message to al-Hurmuzān that ran, "Either you cross over to our side, or we to yours."[425] Al-

424. That is, al-Aḥnaf b. Qays.
425. Noth, 121, identifies such phrases as a topos.

Hurmuzān answered, "You may cross over to our side of the water." So, when they crossed over the bridge to the other side, fighting broke out while they were still on that part directly facing Sūq al-Ahwāz. In the end, al-Hurmuzān was beaten. He set out in the direction of Rāmhurmuz,[426] took a village called al-Shaghar[427] on the dam of Arbuk[428] and finally alighted at Rāmhurmuz.

Ḥurqūs conquered Sūq al-Ahwāz and took up residence there. Then he entered the mountain region, and the administration of the whole region from Sūq al-Ahwāz all the way to Tustar[429] became well organized. He imposed the jizyah, wrote the news about the conquest to 'Umar and sent the fifth parts of the booty acquired in the different areas, dispatching a delegation to carry this to him. 'Umar praised God and asked Him to confer stability upon Ḥurqūs and grant him territorial expansion.

The Companion al-Aswad b. Sarī'[430] on this occasion composed the following lines (in wāfir):

The sons of our father[431] have not been neglectful,
But have remained firm among those who obeyed,
Listening to their Lord, while th' enemy revolted Against Him, with others who heed no command.
[2542] The Magians who'd never been bound to a Scripture
Thus joined in a struggle from which they retreated.
Al-Hurmuzān fled on a steed at a gallop,
Relentlessly hunted by all of our warriors,
Reluctantly leaving the area's capital[432]
On the Day of the Bridge,[433] just as springtime[434] set in.

---

426. A city some eighty kilometers due east of Sūq al-Ahwāz; see also Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 738.

427. The name of this village, not identified as such in ibid., III, 303, where the term al-Shughr is dealt with, indicates that it was deserted by its inhabitants and left defenseless. See further down.

428. The name of a region in al-Ahwāz, see ibid., I, 185 f 429. Present-day Shushtar, a city some eighty kilometers due north of Sūq al-Ahwāz.

430. Al-Baṣrah's first storyteller and a well-known poet, see Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 74.

431. This expression is meant to convey that he is proud of his fellow tribesmen from Tamīm

432. Literally, "the navel of al-Ahwāz."

433. That is, the day of the battle on the bridge.

434. The Arabic word rabī' used here may in actual fact refer to a number of

As for Ḥurqūṣ, he recited the following lines (in wāfir):

We wrested from al-Hurmuzān a whole area so rich in provisions in every district!
Its dry land and water supply well in balance, when excellent groves come to early fruition.
This land has a turbulent stream into which pour tributaries from both sides, always overflowing.

In the same year, I mean the year 17 (638), Tustar was conquered according to Sayf and the report he transmits. Other historians say it was conquered in 16 (637), still others say it was as late as the year 19 (640).

The Conquest of Tustar

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Muhallab and 'Amr: When al-Hurmuzān had been defeated on the day (of the battle) of Sūq al-Ahwāz, and after Ḥurqūṣ b. Zuhayr had conquered that city, the latter took up residence there. He dispatched Jaz' b. Mu'āwiyah to Surraq[435] in pursuit of al-Hurmuzān, as 'Umar had ordered. 'Umar had charged Ḥurqūṣ, should God conquer the area for them, to send Jaz' after al-Hurmuzān in pursuit, and also to take the direction to Surraq. So Jaz' left on the heels of al-Hurmuzān who, on the run, had taken the direction to Rāmhurmuz. Jaz' ruthlessly killed those enemies (who crossed his path) until he arrived at the village of al-Shaghar, where al- [2543] Hurmuzān was not able to withstand him. Since al-Shaghar was abandoned by its inhabitants[436] because of its poverty, Jaz' set out for Dawraq, the administrative center of the district of Surraq.[437] The people who lived there were not able to defend the city, so Jaz' took possession of it as "special property"[438] and wrote about it to 'Umar and to 'Utbah. He also mentioned that he had invited those who had fled to pay the jizā' and in exchange to accept different seasons of the year as well as to two months of the Muslim calendar (see Lane, 1018 f.); in other words, the interpretation of this term as indication of time is vague.

---

435. A district in al-Ahwāz province.

436. See n. 427 above.

437. A place of some importance, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 618 ff.

438. In Arabic, ṣāfiyah, the singular of ṣawāfī, a term dealt with in n. 167 above.

protection, terms that they accepted. Then 'Umar wrote to Jaz' b. Mu'āwiyah and Ḥurqūṣ b. Zuhayr to hold on to the territory they had conquered and to take up residence there, until orders from him reached them. 'Umar wrote about this to Jaz'[439] in a letter addressed to 'Utbah. Jaz' and Ḥurqūṣ did as they were told. Moreover, Jaz' asked 'Umar's permission to colonize his territory, a request 'Umar granted. So Jaz' had the waterways opened up and the uncultivated land cultivated.

When al-Hurmuzān had arrived in Rāmhurmuz and the province of al-Ahwāz had become crammed full of the Muslims settling in it, even right in front of him, he sought a peace agreement and sent messages to Ḥurqūṣ and Jaz' asking for this. Then Ḥurqūṣ wrote to 'Umar about him. 'Umar in turn replied to him and 'Utbah, ordering the latter to accept al-Hurmuzān's peace proposal on the condition that that territory, which the Muslims had not yet conquered, to wit, Rāmhurmuz, Tustar, al-Sūs, Jundaysābūr, al-Bunyān and Mihrijān Qadhaq[440] (would come under Muslim control). Al-Hurmuzān told them that he accepted these conditions. The commanders of al-Ahwāz set up the administration of the regions assigned to them and al-Hurmuzān complied with the conditions of the peace treaty, gathering taxes for the Muslim commanders while the latter defended him; in case the Kurds of Fārs were to make raids on him, they would help and defend him.

[2544] 'Umar wrote to 'Utbah, "Send me a delegation of ten God-fearing men from the garrison at al-Baṣrah." Thus the men traveled to 'Umar. Among them was al-Aḥnaf who, when he approached 'Umar, was addressed by the latter with the following words, "You are in my eyes someone worthy of my faith in you. I have seen that you have comported yourself like a man; tell me, is it true that the protection granted to the conquered people has been violated? Have they run away because of an injustice done to them, or was there another reason for this?" Al-Aḥnaf answered, "No, on the contrary, it was not because of an injustice; besides, 439. Or should we translate "to them" and substitute ilayhimā for ilayhi in l. 6? The dual of fa'alā that follows seems to indicate that.

440. All these towns lie roughly at the same distance in a semicircle around Sūq al-Ahwāz. Only the place called al-Bunyān is not clearly defined, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 749.

the people are now living in conditions you would approve of." "Allright then," 'Umar said, "you may return to your camels."[441]

The party went back to the camels. 'Umar looked over their luggage and found a garment, its hem sticking out from a clothes bundle. He smelled it and said, "Which one of you is the owner of this garment?" "I am," al-Aḥnaf replied. Then 'Umar asked him, "How much did you pay for this?" Al-Aḥnaf mentioned a low price, eight dirhams or something like that, lowering the real figure for which he had bought it, which was twelve dirhams. "Could you not have acquired something for less?" 'Umar said, "then you might have spent the remainder in a way that might have benefitted a fellow Muslim! Take pains[442] and spend what you do not need in a proper manner, then you will set your conscience at ease and you will have spent your money well.[443] And do not squander it, so that you will lose your peace of mind as well as your money. If a man only looks after his own desires and indulges them, he will have to face the consequences in the hereafter."[444] Then 'Umar wrote to 'Utbah, "Keep the people far from injustice, fear God[445] and take care lest fortune turn against you because of an act of treachery or concupiscence committed by one of you. For through God you have attained what you have, on the basis of a covenant that He has concluded with you, and He has shown you His grace in matters He reproached you for. So fulfill the covenant with God and carry out His commands; then He will give you help and victory."

News reached 'Umar that Ḥurqūṣ had invaded the mountainous region of al-Ahwāz, while the people kept seeking refuge with him. These mountains are well-nigh impassable, causing those who want to climb them great hardship. Thus 'Umar wrote to him, saying, "It has come to my notice that you have ventured into an impassable region where you cannot be attacked except with difficulty. But take it easy, and do not cause one Muslim or [2545]

441. Literally, "saddles."

442. I take ḥaṣṣa to mean the same as ḥaṣḥaṣa; this is confirmed in Lane.

443. The intentional double entendre in the Arabic verb arāḥa does not seem to be translatable with one English verb.

444. Literally, "he will be compensated (by God)."

445. In Arabic, wa'ttaqū, which is a conjecture of Prym; in the apparatus he lists from the Leiden Ibn Ḥubaysh wa'nqaw "be pure," which makes equally good sense.

one confederate any hardship. But if you handle your affairs with firmness and caution,[446] you will attain the hereafter, while this material world will be untroubled for you. And let not indifference or hastiness determine your behavior, so that your life on earth is spoiled, and your chances of attaining the afterlife disappear." Then, at Ṣiffīn,[447] Ḥurqūṣ joined those who went off to Ḥarūrā'.[448] He did not change his mind and was killed in the battle of al-Nahrawān[449] on the side of the Ḥarūriyyah.

In that year, I mean 17 (638), the Muslims raided the land of Fārs opposite al-Baḥrayn,[450] as Sayf has asserted and reported.

The Raid into Fārs

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, al-Muhallab and 'Amr: In al-Baṣrah and its environs, comprising in those days the adjacent Sawād and al-Ahwāz, the Muslims had been living in circumstances prevailing until that day:[451] what they had conquered was fully under their control, and the region with which they had concluded a peace treaty was under the control of its inhabitants, who duly paid the kharāj, with the understanding that they would not be invaded, enjoying full protection and with al-Hurmuzān being responsible for the terms of the treaty to be observed. 'Umar had said, "With the adjacent cultivated area and al-Ahwāz, the people of al-Baṣrah should be content; I wish there were between us and the people of Fārs a mountain of fire, through which they cannot reach us, nor we them." In the same 446. This translation is suggested in Glossarium, p. CCLX.

447. The battle in 37 (657) in which Mu'āwiyah and 'Alī faced one another, and which ended, more or less undecided, with the mutal acceptance of arbitration, a move on the part of 'Alī that led to the desertion of a sizable part of his following, people who first grouped themselves in the village of Ḥarūrā' (hence the name Ḥarūriyyah) and later became generally known as the Khāriǧites or Khawārij. For more details, see *EI*², s.v. Ḥarūrā' (L. Veccia Vaglieri).

448. In Arabic, Taḥarrara; this rendering is suggested in Glossarium, p. CLXXXVI.

449. This is the battle at which 'Alī dealt the rebelling Khāriǧites a death blow in 38 (658).

450. For this region, see n. 198 above. For a detailed study of this raid, see M. Hinds, "The first Arab conquests in Fārs," in Iran, XXII (1984):39–53.

451. Presumably this means that these circumstances were about to change shortly.

manner he had expressed himself concerning the people of al-Kūfah, "I wish there were a mountain of fire between them and the Jabal region, through which the people of al-Jabal cannot get at us, nor we at them."

During the reign of Abū Bakr, al-'Alā' b. al-Ḥaḍramī[452] was administrator of al-Baḥrayn. 'Umar dismissed him and nominated Qudāmah b. al-Maẓ'ūn[453] in his place. Then he dismissed Qudāmah and returned al-'Alā' (to al-Baḥrayn). Al-'Alā' used to feel rivalry for Sa'd, caused by a rift that Fate had struck between them. Al-'Alā' had had very much the upperhand as a result of his exploits in the apostasy wars. However, when Sa'd was victorious at al-Qādisiyyah, had removed the Persian royal family from its palace, had established boundaries of the adjacent cultivated area, had grown in social position and submitted more booty (to Medina) than al-'Alā' had done, the latter was filled with desire to achieve something himself in territory held by the Persians, in the happy expectation that his fortune would take a turn for the better, as had been the case with Sa'd. But al-'Alā' failed to assess the situation properly, for he did not distinguish diligently between the merit of obedience and that of disobedience. [2546]

Abū Bakr had made use of his services as governor and had given him permission to fight the people who had apostatized. Then 'Umar employed him in the same function while forbidding him to venture out overseas. But al-'Alā' did not appreciate the difference between obedience and disobedience and their respective consequences, for he ordered the people of al-Baḥrayn to go on a raid into Fārs. The people jumped at the occasion. Al-'Alā' divided them into several contingents, one commanded by al-Jārūd b. al-Mu'allā, another by al-Sawwār b. Hammām, yet another one by Khulayd b. al-Mundhir b. Sāwī, while the latter was also in charge of the whole fighting force. He ordered them to put out to Fārs without 'Umar's consent. 'Umar never used to allow anyone to go on a raid by ship, objecting to the risk for the fighters, in so doing following the example of the Prophet and Abū Bakr, both of whom never put out to sea for a raid.

452. For more information about this man, see Ibn Sa'd, IV/2, 76–9.

453. One of the first men to be converted to Islam. Once he was flogged for drinking wine, as Ibn Ḥajar, Isābah, V, 423–6, has it.

However, those fighting forces crossed from al-Baḥrayn to Fārs and headed for Iṣṭakhr,[454] where they met the people of Fārs face to face under the command of their Hirbadh,[455] under whose [2547] leadership they had assembled. Then they cut the Muslims off from their ships. Thereupon Khulayd stood up among his people and said, "Listen. When God decrees something, the fate of the people runs parallel with it, until that comes to pass. Through what they have done, they have really not done more than challenge you to fight them. But you have come here with the single purpose of waging war against them. The ships and the land will belong to him who is victorious." (And then he recited,) "Therefore, ask endurance and the prayer ritual to help you, for the (situation) is grave except for those who humble themselves."[456] The people reacted positively to his suggestion and performed the noon ṣalāt. Then they moved in the direction of the enemy and fought a hard battle at a place called Ṭāwūs. On that day, al-Sawwār began to declaim a poem in rajaz in which he praised his warriors, saying,

O people of 'Abd al-Qays, on to the struggle!
Reserve troops have gathered apace in the plains,
Each one of them, skilled in the art of armed battle,
Rains hefty blows on enemy (heads) with their swords.

(He recited these lines) until he was slain. Then al-Jārūd started to declaim verses in rajaz, saying,

If it had been a thing near at hand, I'd have eaten it,
If it had been a well clogged with mud, I'd have cleared it!
But I shrink from this ocean that's come over us!

(He recited these lines) until he got killed. On that day, 'Abdallāh b. al-Sawwār and al-Mundhir b. al-Jārūd hung on to dear life,[457]

454. The ancient capital of Fārs, in Greek: Persepolis, see Le Strange, Lands, 257 f.

455. A functionary of the Zoroastrian fire temple, see Christensen, L'Iran, 114.

456. Q. II, 45, this verse can also be interpreted as pointing to the ṣalāt being described as a demanding duty except for those who perform it faithfully. My rendering is based upon R. Paret's interpretation (Der Koran. Kommentar und Konkordanz, Stuttgart, 1971, 18). See also Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, 2nd impression, Cairo, 1954, I, 261.

457. Rendition tentative. I have not found corroboration for my interpretation of the expression waliya hayātahumā. Or should we translate "they fought to their last drop of blood?"

until they died. That same day Khulayd began to recite the following verses in rajaz, saying,

O tribe of Tamīm, tell your clans to assemble![458] [2548]
The army of 'Umar has virtually perished.
And each of you should know (the weight) of my words!

(He went on to shout,) "Come hither!" So they did and the armies fought. The people of Fārs were killed in a bloodbath such as they had never before experienced. Then the Arabs moved away, heading for al-Baṣrah, but their ships had been scuttled. So they had no means of transport to return by sea. After that they found that (a Persian named) Shahrak had blockaded the roads against the Muslims,[459] so they had to make camp and defend themselves in the isolated location in which they were.[460] When 'Umar was brought the news of what al-'Alā' had done by sending that army overseas, an idea of what that desperate situation might be like occurred to him, and he was furious with al-'Alā'. He wrote to him to dismiss him from his function, he uttered threats and he ordered him to do something most painful and to take a step most odious: he had to place himself under the command of Sa'd. "Go," 'Umar told him, "join Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ accompanied by your entourage." So, amid his entourage, al-'Alā' left for Sa'd.

'Umar wrote to 'Utbah b. Ghazwān: "Al-'Alā' b. al-Ḥaḍramī compelled an armed force of Muslims to go overseas, consequently, the inhabitants of Fārs cut them off from returning in their ships. Al-'Alā' has disobeyed me, I do not think he was seeking God's approval with this. Moreover, if they do not get help, I fear that those men marooned in Fārs will be defeated, cut off from help as they are. Therefore, before they are wiped out, send them reinforcements and, once rescued, place them under your supervision."

'Utbah dispatched the reinforcements and told them what 'Umar had written. Those detailed were 'Āṣim b. 'Amr, 'Arfajah b. Harthamah, Ḥudhayfah b. Miḥṣan, Majza'ah b. Thawr, Nahār b. [2549] al-Ḥārith, al-Tarjumān b. Fulān,[461] al-Ḥuṣayn b. Abī al-Ḥurr, al-Aḥnaf b. Qays, Sa'd b. Abī al-'Arjā', 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Sahl and

458. Or "tell (everybody) to come hither together."
459. Presumably, preventing them from finding their way back home over land.
460. For this rendering of nushūb, see Glossarium, p. DXII.

Ṣa'ṣa'ah b. Mu'āwiyah. They marched out among twelve thousand men, riding mules leading horses on their sides. Abū Sabrah b. Abī Ruhm, one of the Mālik b. Ḥisl b. 'Āmir b. Lu'ayy was in command. Life in the garrisons, meant to assist raiding parties and the sedentary population alike,[462] as well as among the conquered people in al-Ahwāz, was as usual. Thus Abū Sabrah marched out with his men, taking a route along the coast. On the way, he was not met, or resisted by, anyone. Finally, Abū Sabrah came face to face with Khulayd in exactly the same spot as the latter found himself when the enemy, after the battle at Ṭāwūs, had manned the roads against the Muslims. Only the inhabitants of Iṣṭakhr and a few more people from other areas had undertaken to fight them. After they had cut the Muslims off from taking the overland route, thus isolating them, the inhabitants of Iṣṭakhr had asked all the other people of Fārs for military support against them. In this way the Muslims suffered attacks from every region and district.

Then they were joined by Abū Sabrah after the battle of Ṭāwūs, the Muslims thus receiving reinforcements just as the unbelievers, who were under the command of Shahrak, had received theirs. Then they fought, God granting the Muslims victory and killing the unbelievers. The Muslims acquired as much booty from them as they wanted. This was the raid during which the newly conscripted warriors of al-Baṣrah distinguished themselves. They were the best new conscripts of all the garrison cities, the recruits of al-Baṣrah being even better than those of al-[2550] Kūfah.[463] Then they returned with what they had acquired, for 'Utbah had sent them his orders. He had written to them to come to him in haste, and not to tarry. So they joined him in al-Baṣrah. Warriors originally hailing from al-Baṣrah returned to their Baṣran quarters, and those of the people of Hajar[464] who had been

461. Tarjumān means "interpreter," this man's real name was probably something else.

462. I take -hum in l. 6 to refer to masālih in l 5 rather than to the preceding al-dhimmah, which is used here in the connotation ahl al-dhimmah, see Lane, 976, right column, l. 9.

463. This admittedly free rendition is tentative.

464. See n. 278 above.

rescued in Fārs scattered over their tribes, while those from the 'Abd al-Qays clan spread to a place (called) Sūq al-Baḥrayn.[465]

When 'Utbah held al-Ahwāz under control and had subdued Fārs, he asked 'Umar permission to go on the pilgrimage, which was granted. When he had completed the rites, he asked 'Umar to be relieved of his duties, but the latter refused to let him go and he adjured him to return to his governorate. Then 'Utbah offered up a prayer, departed and died in Baṭn Nakhlah,[466] where he was buried. When his news reached 'Umar, he went by that place to pay a visit to 'Utbah's grave, where he said, "It is I who killed you, were it not for the fact that death is set at a fixed hour and described in a 'written book'."[467] Then he praised him for his merits. 'Utbah had not assigned special living quarters to himself as the (other) Muhājirs had done, but his children inherited their quarters from Fākhitah, a daughter of Ghazwān. She was a wife of 'Uthmān b. 'Affān. Khabbāb, 'Utbah's client, had adopted his master's conduct and had never sought special living quarters for himself.

'Utbah b. Ghazwān died exactly three and a half years after Sa'd had departed for[468] al-Madā'in. He had left Abū Sabrah b. Abī Ruhm as his successor to govern the people, while his officials were retained in their functions. He left garrisons in Nahr Tīrā, Manādhir, Sūq al-Ahwāz and Surraq, al-Hurmuzān under the conditions of a peace agreement being left in Rāmhurmuz. He also left garrisons in al-Sūs, al-Bunyān, Jundaysābūr and Mihrijān Qadhaq. These were organized after the rescue of those whom al-'Alā' had forced to put out to sea to Fārs and after their settling in al-Baṣrah. They used to be called "the people of Ṭāwūs" after the battle that goes by the same name.

'Umar retained Abū Sabrah b. Abī Ruhm in al-Baṣrah for the [2551]
rest of the year. Then he employed al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah in the second year after 'Utbah's death. Al-Mughīrah remained governor 465. This geographical name is not found in Yāqūt's Mu'jam. Does it refer to the spot where the seasonal fairs were held, and can it be considered as the center of al-Baḥrayn, just as Sūq al-Ahwāz is the center of al-Ahwāz?

466. According to Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 667, this is a village near Medina along the route to al-Baṣrah.

467. An allusion to Q. LXXXIII, 9, 20.

468. Rendition tentative. The preposition preceding al-Madā'in is bi "at," rather than a preposition we would have expected like min "from" or ilā "toward."

for the rest of that year and the next one, with no one rebelling against him during his governorate. He was endowed with integrity and he committed no outrage except that which occurred to him and Abū Bakrah.[469] Then 'Umar employed Abū Mūsā to command al-Baṣrah, after which he was transferred to al-Kūfah. Next 'Umar appointed 'Umar b. Surāqah (al-Makhzūmī) governor (i.e. of al-Baṣrah) after which he was also transferred to al-Kūfah, while Abū Mūsā was sent back to al-Baṣrah to administer it for a second time.

In this year, I mean 17 (638), the conquests of Rāmhurmuz, al-Sūs and Tustar took place and, according to what Sayf transmits, al-Hurmuzān was taken prisoner in it.

The Conquest of Rāmhurmuz, al-Sūs, and Tustar

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Muhallab and 'Amr: Meanwhile, Yazdajird never gave up rousing the people of Fārs, regretting the fiascos for which they had been responsible. While he was in Marw, he wrote to them reminding them of the rancor he bore them and upbraiding them saying, "Have you resigned yourselves, people of Fārs, to the fact that the Arabs have wrested from you the Sawād and the adjacent region and al-Ahwāz! However, they will not be satisfied with that and will go on until they have descended upon you in your own country, and even inside your very houses." Thereupon they stirred and started exchanging letters with the people of al-Ahwāz. They concluded a pact and gave each other promises and pledges to help one another.

Rumors (of this) reached Ḥurqūṣ b. Zuhayr, while Jaz', Sulmā [2552] and Ḥarmalah were notified by a rumor passed on by Ghālib and Kulayb. Sulmā and Ḥarmalah wrote to 'Umar and to the Muslims in al-Baṣrah, the letter sent by those two being the first to arrive. Thereupon 'Umar wrote to Sa'd saying, "Mount a large expedition to al-Ahwāz under the command of al-Nu'mān b. Muqarrin. Hurry and dispatch Suwayd b. Muqarrin, 'Abdallāh b. Dhī al-Sahmayn, Jarīr b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḥimyarī and Jarīr b. 'Abdallāh al-Bajalī and let them set up camp right across from where al-Hurmuzān is presently, so that they can get a clear picture of what he is up to." Then 'Umar wrote to Abū Mūsā, "Send a large army into al-Ahwāz and put Sahl b. 'Adī, Suhayl's brother,[470] in charge, and dispatch al-Barā' b. Mālik, 'Āṣim b. 'Amr, Majza'ah b. Thawr, Ka'b b. Sūr, 'Arfajah b. Harthamah, Ḥudhayfah b. Miḥṣan, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Sahl and al-Ḥuṣayn b. Ma'bad with him. Abū Sabrah b. Abī Ruhm is to be commander-in-chief of the forces from al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah; everybody who comes to him is to give him support." So al-Nu'mān b. Muqarrin marched out amidst his warriors from al-Kūfah, cutting right through the Sawād, until he crossed the Tigris near Maysān. Then he traveled over dry land to al-Ahwāz on mules with horses at their sides, until he came to Nahr Tīrā. He passed through it and then through Manādhir from where he passed on to Sūq al-Ahwāz. He left Ḥurqūs, Sulmā and Ḥarmalah behind and made his way to al-Hurmuzān who, at the time, was in Rāmhurmuz.

469. See above, pp. 110–14.

When al-Hurmuzān heard that al-Nu'mān was heading toward him, he hastened to organize a counterattack against him, hoping he would cut short (the other's) offensive. Al-Hurmuzān had been anxious to enlist the help of the people of Fārs. They had come to him and the first units of their reinforcements had reached Tustar. Al-Nu'mān and al-Hurmuzān came face to face in Arbuk and fierce fighting broke out. Then God routed al-Hurmuzān for [2553] al-Nu'mān. The former vacated Rāmhurmuz and left it to go to Tustar. Al-Nu'mān moved out of the Arbuk area until he arrived at Rāmhurmuz. Then he went up to Īdhaj,[471] where Tīrawayh[472] offered him a peace agreement, which he accepted. Then he left Tīrawayh, returned to Rāmhurmuz and stayed there.

They said: When 'Umar had written to Sa'd and Abū Mūsā, and al-Nu'mān and Sahl had marched out, al-Nu'mān, amidst the troops from al-Kūfah, outstripped Sahl with his forces from al-Baṣrah and drove out al-Hurmuzān (i.e. from Rāmhurmuz). Amidst his men from al-Baṣrah, Sahl went on until they arrived at Sūq al-Ahwāz through which they wanted to get to Rāmhurmuz.

---

470. In a note in the apparatus, it is suggested that it was Ṭabarī himself who identified this Sahl as a brother of Suhayl mentioned above on pp 80, 87.

471. This is the name of the district between al-Ahwāz and Iṣbahān, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 416–17. See also EI[2] s.v. Īdhadj (Bosworth).

472. The name of the local Persian chief.

While they were in Sūq al-Ahwāz, the rumor about the battle at Rāmhurmuz reached them. The news came that al-Hurmuzān had withdrawn to Tustar. So Sahl and his men left Sūq al-Ahwāz, taking a direct route from Sūq al-Ahwāz to Tustar. Also al-Nu'mān headed from Rāmhurmuz in the direction of Tustar, and Sulmā, Ḥarmalah, Ḥurqūṣ and Jaz' set out too. All of these descended together on Tustar, with al-Nu'mān commanding the forces from al-Kūfah, directly supported[473] by those from al-Baṣrah.

In Tustar, al-Hurmuzān, together with his forces from Fārs, al-Jibāl and al-Ahwāz, held out in trenches. The Arab commanders wrote about this to 'Umar, and Abū Sabrah asked him for reinforcements. So 'Umar sent them Abū Mūsā, who set out in their direction. Thus we see the people of al-Kūfah commanded by al-Nu'mān, those of al-Baṣrah under Abū Mūsā, while Abū Sabrah was in charge of both contingents together. The Muslims besieged the Persians for months and killed many of them. From the day the siege began until the time God conquered Tustar for the Muslims, al-Barā' b. Mālik[474] killed one hundred adversaries, in [2554] addition to those he slew on other occasions. Among a number of Baṣrans, Majza'ah b. Thawr, Ka'b b. Sūr and Abū Tamīmah killed similar numbers of enemy soldiers. Among the Kūfans there were also some who killed many enemies, for example, Ḥabīb b. Qurrah, Rib'ī b. 'Āmir and 'Āmir b. 'Abd al-Aswad. Moreover, during that siege there were a number of enemies wounded that have to be added to the numbers killed by them.

During the siege of Tustar, the unbelievers made eighty sorties against the besiegers, beating them off one time, but being driven back another. This continued until, on the day of the last sally, when bitter fighting had broken out, the Muslims said (sc. to al-Barā'), "Barā', beseech your Lord that He rout them for us." So al-Barā' prayed, "Drive them away from us, my God, and let me die a martyr's death."

He said: Then they put the enemy to flight until they drove them into their trenches, whereupon they dived after them. The 473. Mutasānid means either "assisting" or "everyone under his own banner," see Lane, 1443 f.

474. He is noted for an allegedly glorious military career, see Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 279–82.

enemy fled back to the city. Then the Muslims laid a cordon around it. While they were thus engaged, with the Persian fighters cramming the city, their military efforts wearing them down, a man came to al-Nu'mān who asked that his life be spared; in exchange he would show the Muslims an entrance into the city via which the Persians could be attacked. (What happened in actual fact was that) an arrow had been shot that landed in the vicinity of Abū Mūsā. (Fastened to it was a message that read,) "I shall put complete trust in you; I ask you to spare my life. In exchange I shall show you a passageway via which you can enter the city. Its conquest may be achieved through this." The Muslims were willing to grant him immunity (which they promised him in a message also shot) with an arrow. Then another arrow was shot in their direction (with a message attached to it that) read, "Attack via the outlet of the water,[475] then you will conquer the city." So he incited and roused (them) in this matter. Then, in answer to his summons, 'Āmir b. 'Abd Qays, Ka'b b. Sūr, Majza'ah b. Thawr, Ḥasakah al-Ḥabaṭī and a large number of other warriors were dispatched to him. They set out for that particular spot in the night. When that man approached him too, al-Nu'mān charged his companions Suwayd b. al-Math'abah, Warqā' b. al-Ḥārith, Bishr b. Rabī'ah al-Khath'amī, Nāfi' b. Zayd al-Ḥimyarī and 'Abdallāh b. Bishr al-Hilālī to go and join him. So they too set out with many warriors and they met with those from al-Baṣrah at that water outlet. Meanwhile, Suwayd and 'Abdallāh b. Bishr had entered the outlet followed[476] by the men from the one and the other group. [2555]

In the end, when they had assembled in it, while the rest of the warriors outside the city walls were ready to pounce, those inside shouted, "God is great." The Muslims outside also shouted, "God is great," whereupon the gates of the city were thrown open and a sword fight broke out in them. They dispatched every enemy fighter and al-Hurmuzān took refuge in the citadel. Those who had entered the city through the water outlet encircled him in the citadel and when they spotted him and advanced upon him,

475. See Appendix II for a description and a plan of the situation as it was at the beginning of this century.

476. I read an eighth form, fa'ttaba'ahum.

he said to them, "What do you want? Perhaps you realize that you and I cannot escape one another.[477] But I still have a quiver with one hundred arrows and, by God, you will not lay a hand on me as long as I have still one arrow left. No arrow of mine will fail to find its target. What benefit is there in taking me prisoner, when I kill or wound one hundred of you first?" "What is it you want then?" they asked. He replied,"I would like to place my hand in yours,[478] leaving the decision with 'Umar to do with me as he [2556] wants." "We agree," they answered, whereupon he threw down his bow and surrendered to them. Next they bound him securely.

The Muslims divided up what God had granted them as fay'. Each horseman's share amounted to three thousand (dirhams), while each footsoldier received one thousand.

The man who had shot the arrows drew attention to himself, and he and the man, who had come out of the city in person, came forward, saying, "Who will guarantee us the safety we requested for ourselves and those siding with us?" "Who sided with you then?" the Muslims asked. They said, "Those who bolted their doors against al-Hurmuzān at the time you burst into the city." Then the Muslims granted them immunity.

During that night, many people of the Muslim forces were killed. Among those whom al-Hurmuzān killed personally were Majza'ah b. Thawr and al-Barā' b. Mālik.

They said: Abū Sabrah marched out of Tustar, taking the road to al-Sūs, in pursuit of those who had been defeated and who had fled in that direction. He took al-Nu'mān and Abū Mūsā with him and also al-Hurmuzān was brought along. Finally, they descended upon al-Sūs, the Muslims surrounded the city and wrote to that effect to 'Umar. 'Umar then wrote to 'Umar b. Surāqah that he was to travel to Medina, and he wrote to Abū Mūsā, ordering him to return to al-Baṣrah. In all, he reinstated Abū Mūsā as governor of al-Baṣrah three times in that same year and 'Umar (b. Surāqah) twice. Then 'Umar wrote to Zirr b. 'Abdallāh b. Kulayb al-Fuqaymī to go to Jundaysābūr. Zirr obeyed and arrived there. Abū Mūsā left for al-Baṣrah after he had stayed where he was, waiting for 'Umar's reply. 'Umar put al-Aswad b. Rabī'ah, one of the Banū

477. Literally, the text reads "perhaps you see the straits I and you are in."
478. That is, "I want to surrender."

Rabī'ah b. Mālik, who had the honorific of al-Muqtarib,[479] in charge of the forces in al-Baṣrah. This al-Aswad, as well as Zirr, had been Companions of the Messenger of God. In actual fact, [2557] they were Muhājirs. In the past this al-Aswad had called upon the Messenger of God saying, "I have come in order to draw nearer to God by associating with you." So the Prophet named him al-Muqtarib.[480] Zirr, too, had once called upon the Messenger of God and said to him, "My clan has died out, but our brothers are numerous; please pray God that He bless us." So the Prophet said, "God, restore Zirr's tribe," whereupon their ranks were indeed filled up again.

Abū Sabrah dispatched a delegation (to Medina) among whom were Anas b. Mālik and al-Aḥnaf b. Qays, and he sent al-Hurmuzān with them. They arrived in al-Baṣrah in the company of Abū Mūsā; then they (alone) set out for Medina. When they were about to enter the city, they arrayed al-Hurmuzān in his own finery, dressing him in his brocaded garment stitched through with gold thread. On his head they placed a crown that was called al-Ādhīn[481] and that was encrusted with rubies. They put on his jewelry so that 'Umar and the Muslims would see him in his regalia. Then they paraded him in front of the people on their way to 'Umar's house. But they did not find him there, so they inquired after his whereabouts. They were told, "Just now he was sitting in the mosque to receive a delegation that had come to him from al-Kūfah."

So they left to look for him in the mosque, but they did not find him there either. When leaving, they passed by some local boys who were at play and who asked them, "What are you walking in and out for? If you want to speak to the Commander of the Faithful, he is asleep in the right part of the mosque with his cloak folded under his head for a pillow." 'Umar had sat there to receive the delegation from the inhabitants of al-Kūfah dressed in a hooded cloak.[482] When he had finished talking to them and they had risen from the audience and left him alone, he took off his

479. See further down.
480. That means "he who draws near."
481. If the reading is correct, this is a Persian word meaning "ornament."
482. In Arabic burnus, the English "burnoose" or "burnous."

cloak, folded it to make a pillow and went to sleep. So the people from al-Baṣrah, together with the bystanders, went to look for him. Then, when they spotted 'Umar, they sat down at a little distance from him. No one else, asleep or awake, was in the [2558] mosque (at that time). His whip was dangling from his hand. Al-Hurmuzān asked, "Where is 'Umar?" "There he is," they said, whereupon they gave a sign to the people to keep quiet. Heeding their order, al-Hurmuzān nonetheless asked,[483] "But where are his guards and attendants?" "He has neither," they answered, "nor clerks, nor a chancellery for that matter." "Then he must be a prophet," al-Hurmuzān exclaimed. "No, he is not, but he does the things prophets do," was the reply.

Meanwhile, the number of onlookers had greatly increased and 'Umar awoke because of the din that they made. He sat upright, spotted al-Hurmuzān and asked, "Is that man al-Hurmuzān?" "Yes," was the answer. 'Umar looked closely at him and at what he was wearing, and then he said, "I seek my refuge with God from Hellfire and Him I ask for succor. Praise be to God," he went on, "who has humbled this man and his followers through Islam. Hold on to this religion, my fellow Muslims, and be guided by the guidance that your Prophet has given you. Let this material world not make you reckless, for it is a treacherous world." Then the delegation said, "This is the king of al-Ahwāz, speak to him." "No," 'Umar answered, "not as long as there remains a single item of finery on his body."

So they stripped him of everything he was dressed up in apart from some piece of clothing that covered his nakedness and they made him put on a coarse garment. Then 'Umar said, "Hey, Hurmuzān, how do you look now upon the evil consequences of your perfidy and the outcome of God's command?" Al-Hurmuzān replied, "In the days before Islam, 'Umar, God left things between us and you as they were, so we had the upper hand over you, since He was neither with us nor with you. But when He took your side, you gained the upper hand over us." To this 'Umar replied,

---

483. Although this is not borne out by the manuscripts, reading wa-mā aṣghā al-Hurmuzān, instead of wa-aṣghā al-Hurmuzān as Prym has it, would have given a better text: "Not heeding their order, al-Hurmuzān said . . ."

"You only succeeded in defeating us in the days before Islam because you were united, whereas we were divided. But," 'Umar continued, "what is your excuse or what arguments can you adduce in your defense for going to war against us time after time?"

"I fear that you will kill me before I have told you," al-Hurmuzān answered. "No, do not be afraid," 'Umar assured him. [2559] Then, when al-Hurmuzān had asked for something to drink, he was brought water in a primitive cup. "Even if I were to die of thirst, I could not possibly drink from a cup like this," he cried. So he was brought some water in a vessel he approved of. But then his hand began to tremble and he said, "I am afraid that I will be killed while I am drinking." "No harm will come to you," 'Umar said, "until you have drunk it." Hereupon al-Hurmuzān spilled the water by turning the vessel upside down. "Give him some more," 'Umar ordered, "so that he will not be bothered by thirst when the time of his execution has come."[484]

Then al-Hurmuzān spoke, "I do not need water; what I want is to ask that you grant me immunity." "I shall certainly kill you," shouted 'Umar, but al-Hurmuzān cut him short and said, "But you have already granted me immunity." "You lie," roared 'Umar, but Anas (b. Mālik) intervened and said, "He is right, Commander of the Faithful, you have indeed granted him safety." "Woe unto you, Anas," said 'Umar to him, "should I grant immunity to the killer of Majza'ah and al-Barā'? By God, think of a subterfuge or I shall surely chastise you!"

But Anas maintained, "You did tell him that no harm would come to him before he had told you what you asked him and you also told him that no harm would come to him until he had drunk the water." Then all those who were standing around 'Umar joined in, telling him the same thing. 'Umar approached al-Hurmuzān and said, "You have made a fool of me and, by God, I shall not be hoodwinked by anyone who is not a Muslim."[485] So al-

484. Literally, this sentence reads "Give him some more and do not heap death and thirst upon him together."

485. Contrary to the general rule, we find here a verb VII with the passive meaning "to be cheated," followed by what seems to be the agent introduced by the preposition li. This phenomenon is attested also in W. Fischer, Grammatik des klassischen arabisch, Wiesbaden, 1972, 98, 138.

Hurmuzān embraced Islam and 'Umar assigned him a stipend of two thousand (dirhams) and permitted him to settle in Medina.

[2560] According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Abū Sufyān Ṭalḥah b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān—Ibn 'Īsā: The day al-Hurmuzān was brought before 'Umar the translator was al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah. (He did all the translating) until the official translator arrived. Al-Mughīrah had been learning some Persian, so 'Umar ordered him, "Ask him: from what region are you?" whereupon al-Mughīrah said, "Az kudhām ardī?"[486] "I am a Mihrijānī," al-Hurmuzān replied. 'Umar summoned him to adduce arguments in his own defense. "Shall I speak as someone who will live, or as someone who is about to die?" he asked. "No," 'Umar said, "speak as someone who will live." "You have granted me immunity in that case!" al-Hurmuzān exclaimed.

Then 'Umar said, "You have played a trick on me and, in wartime, it is for the victim of the trickery used to decide in matters of life and death of the trickster. No, by God, I shall not grant you safety until you have embraced Islam." At that moment, al-Hurmuzān was certain that he had to choose between death and Islam. So he chose the latter and 'Umar duly assigned two thousand dirhams annually from the treasury to him, allowing him to settle in Medina. Then he addressed al-Mughīrah saying, "I see that you are not at all good at speaking Persian. None of you speaks it well enough without simulating, but he who simulates will betray himself(?). Therefore, be on your guard against this language, for it may devitalize our Arabic language." Then Zayd (b. Thābit)[487] came along and talked to al-Hurmuzān, after which he told 'Umar what the Persian had said, and he also informed the latter about what 'Umar had said.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah and 'Amr—al-Sha'bī . . . (and Sayf)[488]—Sufyān (b. Ḥusayn b. al-Ḥasan

---

486. This means, "from what region are you?"

487. This Zayd was reputedly famed for his knack for languages. He is reported to have had a working knowledge of Hebrew and Aramaic. He is listed among the Prophet's trusted Companions who allegedly recorded the Qur'ān as it was revealed, and he is also said to have been a legal expert, particularly skilled in the laws of inheritance. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 592–5.

488. The text reads as if al-Sha'bī, as well as a certain Sufyān (whom De Goeje identified in the index as al-Thawrī), had both been pupils of al-Ḥasan. But that al-Wāsiṭī)—al-Ḥasan (al-Baṣrī): 'Umar said to the delegation (from al-Baṣrah), "Have the Muslims perhaps done harm to the people living under their protection? Or have they perhaps done things to them that caused them to commence hostilities against you?" "No," they answered, "we only know that we acted in good faith and with decency." 'Umar asked, "Then how did their revolt come about?" But after questioning them, he did not receive any answer from anyone that took away his doubt or through which he gained insight into the situation they described. Only what al-Aḥnaf (told him helped 'Umar to form a clear picture, for he) said:

"Commander of the Faithful, I shall enlighten you. You forbade [2561] us to spread out farther into Persian territory, and you ordered us to stay within the borders of the region that we have under our control. However, the king of the Persians is still alive among them, and they will therefore not cease to contend with us for control of the region, as long as their king is among them. Two kings can never govern simultaneously and agree; the one will inevitably oust the other. I have come to realize that we made one conquest after another solely because of their continuous revolts. It is their king who incites them, and this will always be his line of action until you give us permission to venture out into their land so that we separate him from his subjects and expel him from his kingdom by divesting him of his might and authority.[489] Only then will the hope of the Persians be crushed and will they capitulate."

"By God, you have given me a believable picture, and you have explained the situation to me as it is in reality," 'Umar said. Then he looked into what they were in need of and sent them forth. Next a letter came to 'Umar informing him of the assembling of the Persians at Nihāwand and of how the people of Mihrijān Qadhaq and those of the districts of al-Ahwāz gravitated toward the point of view and the erstwhile ambitions of al-Hurmuzān. That was what prompted 'Umar to give the Muslims permission to venture out into Persian territory.

---

solution results in a chronological anomaly. This is clearly a case of an isnād ending in two different strains, one with al-Sha'bī and one with al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī as oldest authority.

489. For the way in which religious and secular authority were combined in Sasanian kingship, see Morony, Iraq, 28–31.

The Conquest of al-Sūs

The historians have different accounts of the conquest of al-Sūs. According to Abū Zayd—al-Madā'inī:[490] When those defeated at Jalūlā' finally reached Yazdajird, who was in Ḥulwān at the time, he summoned his court and the Priest[491] to him and said, "Every time our warriors encounter an enemy force, they suffer defeat at their hands. What do you think we should do?" The Priest answered, "We are of the opinion that you should leave and settle in Iṣṭakhr, for that is the center of the kingdom. Furthermore, keep your treasures with you, and send the soldiers away." Yazdajird [2562] took his advice and traveled to Iṣbahān. He summoned Siyāh[492] and dispatched him with three hundred men, including seventy Persian aristocrats, with the order to crimp from every village through which they passed as many men as he liked. Siyāh departed, followed by Yazdajird. They finally arrived at Iṣṭakhr, just when Abū Mūsā was laying siege to al-Sūs. So Yazdajird sent Siyāh to al-Sūs and al-Hurmuzān to Tustar. Siyāh then arrived at al-Kalbāniyyah.[493]

Meanwhile, the news of what had happened at Jalūlā' and that Yazdajird had fled to Iṣṭakhr had reached the people of al-Sūs, so they asked Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī for peace. He complied with their request and then he set out for Rāmhurmuz, while Siyāh was still in al-Kalbāniyyah, the military successes of the Muslims weighing him down.[494] He stayed put until Abū Mūsā set out for Tustar. Only then did Siyāh move to take up a position between Rāmhurmuz and Tustar. He stayed there until 'Ammār b. Yāsir was about to step onto the scene.[495]

At this juncture, Siyāh summoned the chiefs who had left Iṣbahān with him, and said to them, "You remember that we used to

---

490. He is the famous historian 'Alī b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī, who died in 235 (850). Precious few of his numerous works have been made available in printed editions, see GAS, I, 314–15.

491. In Persian mōbadh. For his position at the Sasanian court, see Morony, Iraq, 281–2, Christensen, L'Iran, 112–13.

492. Siyāh al-Uswārī was the chief of the Asāwirah, Persian nobles first mentioned above on p. 2485 and n 147; see Morony, Iraq, 198.

493. This is the way De Goeje reads this place name and not al-Kaltāniyyah, as Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 299, lists it.

494. Or ". . . scaring him."

495. See p. 64 above.

talk about these invaders as people who would bring misery and suffering, who would overpower our kingdom and who would have their animals shit all over the courtyards of Iṣṭakhr and its royal pavilions, even tying up their horses in its orchards. They have subjugated our territory as you have seen, never encountering an armed force without defeating it, never stopping at a stronghold without conquering it. Look for yourselves!" "We concur with what you have said," they answered. Then Siyāh went on, "Let everyone of you protect me with his servants and dependents, for I think we should go over to them and embrace their religion."

They sent Shīrawayh with ten of the Asāwirah to Abū Mūsā to convey the conditions upon which they would embrace Islam. So Shīrawayh approached Abū Mūsā and said to him, "We have [2563] developed a liking for your religion. We will become Muslims in the understanding that we will fight against Persians on your side, but not against Arab tribes.[496] If any tribesman engages us in a struggle, you will defend us against him; we settle where we want, mingling with those of you whom we want. You will assign us to the ranks of those with maximum stipends,[497] and the Commander (of the Faithful), who is more elevated in rank than you, will personally enter into a pact with us on these conditions."

"No," Abū Mūsā countered, "you will have exactly the same rights and duties as we have," to which they replied, "We do not agree." Then Abū Mūsā wrote to 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb who, in turn, wrote back to Abū Mūsā, "Give them what they have asked you," whereupon Abū Mūsā told them this by letter. Thus they accepted Islam and participated with Abū Mūsā in the siege of Tustar, but he saw no application or military efforts on their part.[498] Then he turned to Siyāh with the words, "You one-eyed good-for-nothing, you and your comrades do not comport yourselves as we thought you were capable of." "Yes, but we are not as attached to your religion as you are;" Siyāh replied, "we lack

496. The parallel passage in Balādhurī, 372 f., shows many textual similarities to this account of al-Madā'inī. In Balādhurī, this last sentence is worded in clearer language "we will not participate in intertribal warfare."

497. That is how Hinds, "Alignments," 354, interprets sharaf al-'aṭā'.

498. For this connotation of nikāyah, see Lane, 3038.

the enthusiasm you have and, living among you, we have no wives to protect, while you have not assigned the most generous stipends to us (i.e. as we stipulated). And whereas we have weapons and animals, you face the enemy not even wearing helmets!"

Abū Mūsā wrote about this incident to 'Umar, who duly replied, "Assign to them the highest possible stipends according to their military record, in fact the largest amount any Arab tribesman is paid." So Abū Mūsā decided that one hundred of the Asāwirah were to receive stipends of two thousand (dirhams), while six of them were even given two thousand five hundred: Siyāh, Khusraw—he was the one who had the nickname Miq-[2564] lāṣ[499]—Shahriyār, Shahrawayh, Shīrawayh and Afrūdhīn. A poet recited the following verse (in ṭawīl):[500]

When 'Umar discovered the extent of their valor and had been enlightened about their exploits,
He assigned them two thousand, whereas he had given to 'Akk and to Ḥimyar[501] no more than three hundred!

Al-Madā'inī said: One day, they laid siege to a fortress in Fārs. At the end of the night Siyāh, dressed in Persian attire, stole away (from the camp of the Muslims) and threw himself on the ground just outside the fortress with his garments streaked with blood. When the people in the fortress awoke in the morning, they saw the prone figure of a man, dressed as they were, so they thought that he was one of them whom they had lost (in a previous battle). They opened the gate of the fortress in order to bring the body inside. Suddenly, he jumped up and began to fight them. In the end they abandoned the gate of the fortress and fled. Thus Siyāh

499. This is the word for a camel that fattens in summer and slims in winter. In his youth the 'Abbāsid caliph al-Manṣūr was given this nickname too, see Dozy, Supplément, II, 395.

500. For an irregularity in the meter, see Appendix I.

501. For more on these South Arabian tribes, see *EI*², s.v. 'Akk (Caskel) and Kaḥḥālah, I, 305–6. Concerning the figures two thousand and three hundred, Puin, 173 ff., has some more information on these. Although the amounts vary in different reports, a stipend of two thousand had been the usual amount assigned to veterans of al-Qādisiyyah. The granting of the same amount to Persians may have caused some bitterness or shock. Three hundred has been mentioned as the amount assigned to the third immigration wave of rawādif.

conquered it singlehandedly and the Muslims marched in. Other people say that Siyāh performed this deed at Tustar.

On another occasion, they laid siege to a fortress. Khusraw went forth and moved close to it. A man looking down on him from the parapet spoke to him, whereupon Khusraw shot an arrow at him and killed him.

As for Sayf's account, according to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, 'Amr and Dithār Abū 'Umar—Abū 'Uthmān: When Abū Sabrah, amid his warriors, descended upon al-Sūs and the Muslims had surrounded it under the command of al-Hurmuzān's brother, Shahriyār, they engaged the Persians several times in fights, during which the forces from al-Sūs made casualties among the Muslims. One day, the monks and clerics,[502] looking down upon them from above, said to them, "Hey, you Arabs, among the things our scholars and ancestors have taught us is the story that no one will ever conquer al-Sūs but the Antichrist, or people who have the Antichrist in their midst.[503] If he is among you, you will conquer this city, but if he is not, then you might as well save yourselves the trouble of besieging us." [2565]

News of the plight of Abū Mūsā reached al-Baṣrah. In lieu of Abū Mūsā, who was laying siege to al-Sūs, al-Muqtarib had been put in charge of the people of al-Baṣrah. Meanwhile, the Persians assembled at Nihāwand. At the head of the people of al-Kūfah, al-Nu'mān was participating in the siege of al-Sūs with Abū Sabrah, while Zirr, on his part, was closing in on the enemy at Nihāwand. He issued the order to those left behind in al-Kūfah to march under the leadership of Ḥudhayfah and instructed them to join him at Nihāwand. In the meantime, al-Nu'mān was also preparing himself to march upon Nihāwand, but then he decided to go it alone and, before departing from al-Sūs, he engaged the enemy in combat. Then the monks and the clerics returned (to the battlements) and looked down upon the Muslims, shouting, "Hey, you Arabs, do not bother, for no one will conquer this fortress but the 502. The two Arabic terms used, ruhbān and qissīsūn, unmistakably point to Christians. See Morony, Iraq, ch. 12, for a great deal of material on the Christians under the Sasanids.

503. For more on this enigmatic figure, see *EI*², s.v. Dadjdjāl (Abel).

Antichrist, or forces that have the Antichrist in their midst." Thus they shouted at the Muslims, greatly enraging them. (At the time) Ṣāfī b. Ṣayyād was with al-Nuʿmān among his cavalry. The Muslims attacked the enemy with all their forces, saying, "We will fight them before we withdraw." For Abū Mūsā had not yet pulled out. Then Ṣāfī, furious as he was, strode to the gate of al-Sūs and, kicking it with his foot, shouted. "Open up!" And then it blew open![504] The chains snapped, the locks broke and the other gates were opened too. The Muslims stormed inside and the unbelievers surrendered, stretching out their hands, shouting, "Peace, peace," while trying to grasp the hands of their conquerors. These agreed to peace after[505] they had entered the city by force. They divided everything they found into equal portions before they granted them the peace treaty, and then they dispersed.

Al-Nuʿmān pulled out of al-Ahwāz among his Kūfan troops.
[2566] Finally, he arrived at Māh. Abū Sabrah dispatched al-Muqtarib, who set out until he arrived at Jundaysābūr together with Zirr. After entering Māh, al-Nuʿmān stayed there, until the forces from al-Kūfah joined him there. Then he rode with them to the enemy at Nihāwand. When the conquest of al-Sūs had been completed, Ṣāfī returned to Medina where he stayed until he died.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—ʿAṭiyyah—the one who reported on the conquest of al-Sūs: Someone said to Abū Sabrah, "Here are the remains of Daniel which are buried in this city." "What concern is that of ours?" Abū Sabrah asked and he left the remains there under the supervision of the local people.

ʿAṭiyyah continued with the same isnād: Daniel had stayed on in the coastal regions of Fārs after Nebuchadnezzar's death.[506] Without ever having met anyone from those among whom he lived who had voluntarily embraced Islam,[507] he wanted, when the time of his death had come, to preserve the book of God from those who had never wanted to listen to him or accept his teaching and he wanted to entrust it to his Lord. He called his son and said, "Go to the seashore and cast this book into the sea." The lad took it, clasped it to his breast and disappeared for as long as it would have taken him to go (to the shore) and return. He said to his father, "I have done it." The father asked, "And what did the sea do when the book fell into it?" "I did not see it do anything," the son replied. Then the father burst out angrily and said, "By God, you have not done as I ordered." So once more the lad left his father's house, but he did exactly as he had done before, and he went back saying, "I have done it." How did the sea react when it fell into it?" Daniel asked. "It heaved and surged," was the answer. Then the father became even more furious than the first [2567] time and he said, "By God, you have still not done as I ordered." He adjured his son a third time to go and cast the book into the sea. So the boy left for the seashore and, once there, flung the book into the sea. The sea retreated so that the bottom became exposed. Then the earth split and an abyss of light appeared into which the book vanished. The earth again closed over it and the waters mingled over the bottom. When the son returned for the third time, his father asked him what he had seen. He told him, whereupon the father exclaimed, "Now you have spoken the truth." Daniel died at al-Sūs and there, near his tomb, people used to pray for rain.

504. As two manuscripts have it, I read fa-ṭāra, instead of bazārī, which does not seem to convey more than an obscenity (baẓr means "clitoris").

505. In the Arabic, baʿda mā; since this passage is meant to convey magnanimity on the part of the Muslims, it is perhaps better to translate "although they had entered the city by force"; according to the policies of the day, an enemy who had tried to resist being conquered was not entitled to a peace treaty. Translating baʿda mā by "although" seems to be attested in Lane, 225, middle column, 9 lines from the bottom.

506. See II Kings, xxiv, and the Book of Daniel.

When the Muslims conquered the city, Daniel's remains were brought to them, but they left them in the permanent care of the local people. Later, when Abū Sabrah had departed from them and gone to Jundaysābūr, Abū Mūsā came and stayed in al-Sūs. He wrote to 'Umar about Daniel's grave. 'Umar wrote back and ordered him to hide it. So Abū Mūsā had the body wrapped in shrouds and the Muslims buried it. Meanwhile, Abū Mūsā wrote to 'Umar saying that on the body they had found a signet ring that they had taken from it. "Return the signet ring to the body," 'Umar wrote back. In the stone of that ring there was the picture of a man between two lions.[508]

507. This anachronism of identifying the religion preached by pre-Muḥammadan prophets as Islam is a well-known and frequent feature in stories dealing with those prophets.

In this year, I mean the year 17 (638), the peace treaty of the Muslims with the inhabitants of Jundaysābūr was concluded.

What Happened between the Muslims and the Inhabitants of Jundaysābūr

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, Abū[509] 'Amr, Abū Sufyān and al-Muhallab: When Abū Sabrah had finished what he had to do in al-Sūs, he left with his army and marched until he arrived at Jundaysābūr, where Zirr b. 'Abdallāh b. Kulayb was besieging them. They stayed there, engaging the enemy mornings and evenings in combat and they constantly beset them until someone from the camp of the Muslims shot an arrow in their direction with the message that safety would be granted to them. The conquest of Jundaysābūr and that of Nihāwand took place in a [2568] timespan of two months. Nothing surprised the Muslims more than the fact that at a certain moment the city's gates were opened. Out came the cattle, the markets emptied themselves and the inhabitants scattered in all directions. The Muslims sent a courier after them who had to ask them, "What has come over you?" They answered, "You have shot us an arrow carrying a message that safety would be granted to us. We have accepted this proposition and we have set aside the jizā' payments for you in the understanding that you will grant us protection." "But we did nothing of the sort," the Muslims said. "Nor do we lie," the inhabitants of Jundaysābūr countered. So the Muslims asked around among themselves, and then they came upon a slave, called Muknif, who was in actual fact of Jundaysābūri origin. It was he who had written them the message affixed to the arrow. So the Muslims said, "It was but a slave who sent this message." But they said, "We do not know your slaves from your freeborn; safety has been granted to us, so we have immunity

508. The Muslim version of the story of Daniel differs somewhat from that of the Old Testament. See EI[2] s.v. Dānıyāl (Vajda), and R. G. Khoury, Les légendes prophétiques dans l'Islam, Wiesbaden, 1978, 266–83.

509. This word Abū should in all probability be deleted, as Prym suggests.

now since we have accepted your proposition, and we have not changed our minds. But act in perfidy, if you want." Then the Muslims turned away and wrote about these events to 'Umar, who duly replied, "God holds the keeping of promises in the highest esteem. As long as you hesitate, you will never be true to your word so that you fulfil your pledge. Grant them their immunity and keep your promises to them." So they fulfilled their promise to them and left them.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Muhallab and 'Amr: 'Umar allowed the Muslim forces to spread out into Persian territory in the year 17 (638), having finally adopted this strategy from al-Aḥnaf b. Qays, whom he knew for his virtue and sincerity. He separated commanders and their armed contingents from one another, putting the commanders in charge of the inhabitants of al-Baṣrah as well as others over al-Kūfah, the former as well as the latter implementing what 'Umar (himself) had ordered. He gave them permission in the year 17 (638) to spread over Persian territory. So they wandered out in 18 (639). He ordered Abū Mūsā to march from al-Baṣrah to the borderland where the protection of al-Baṣrah ceased. Here he stayed until further notice. [2569]
'Umar sent the banners for those in command out with Suhayl b. 'Adī, the confederate of the Banū 'Abd al-Ashhal. So Suhayl arrived with the banners and he gave the banner of Khurāsān to al-Aḥnaf b. Qays, that of Ardashīr Khurrah[510] and Sābūr[511] to Mujāshi' b. Mas'ūd al-Sulamī and the one of Iṣṭakhr to 'Uthmān b. Abī al-'Āṣ al-Thaqafī, the one of Fasā and Darābajird[512] to Sāriyah b. Zunaym al-Kinānī, and the banner of Kirmān[513] remaining with Suhayl b. 'Adī himself. The banner of Sijistān Suhayl gave to 'Āṣim b. 'Amr, one of the Companions of the Prophet, and the one of Mukrān he handed to al-Ḥakam b. 'Umayr al-Taghlibī.

They all marched out in the year 17 (638) and set up camp from where they could move out toward their respective districts. Their campaign was not an easy one until the beginning of the year 18 (639). Then 'Umar reinforced them with fighters from al-

510. This is a district in Fārs of which Shīrāz is the capital, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 199, and Le Strange, Lands, 248.
511. Another district of Fārs, see loc. cit.
512. See ibid., 290.
513. See ibid., map VII, opposite 323.

Kūfah, sending 'Abdallāh b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Itbān to Suhayl b. 'Adī, while he sent 'Alqamah b. al-Naḍr, 'Abdallāh b. Abī 'Uqayl, Rib'ī b. 'Āmir and Ibn Umm Ghazāl to al-Aḥnaf. He also reinforced 'Āṣim b. 'Amr by sending him 'Abdallāh b. 'Umayr al-Ashja'ī, and al-Ḥakam b. 'Umayr he helped with Shihāb b. al-Mukhāriq al-Māzinī.

Some transmitters say: The conquests of al-Sūs and Rāmhurmuz, as well as the transfer of al-Hurmuzān from Tustar to 'Umar, all took place in the year 20 (641).

In this year, I mean the year 17 (638), 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb led [2570] the people on the pilgrimage. His administrator in Mecca was 'Attāb b. Asīd; his official in Yemen was Ya'lā b. Umayyah. He had put 'Uthmān b. Abī al-'Āṣ in charge of al-Yamāmah and al-Baḥrayn, in 'Umān Ḥudhayfah b. Miḥṣan, and in Syria those whose names I have mentioned above. In charge of al-Kūfah and the surrounding territory was Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ; Abū Qurrah was in charge of the judiciary there. In al-Baṣrah and the surrounding territory Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī was in command. Above I have mentioned the times when he was relieved from his function and when he was reinstated. Abū Maryam al-Ḥanafī is said to have been in charge of the judiciary of al-Kūfah. I have mentioned above who was in charge of al-Jazīrah and al-Mawṣil.

The Events of the Year 18

(JANUARY 12, 639–JANUARY 1, 640)

Ṭabarī said: In this year, I mean 18 (639), the people were afflicted by a severe famine and a drought of catastrophic proportions. This is the year that is called the Year of the Drought.[514]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: Then the year 18 (639) began. This was the Year of the Drought in which the epidemic of 'Amawās occurred, during which the people perished, one after the other.

According to Aḥmad b. Thābit al-Rāzī—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar: The Drought was in the year 18 (639).

He continued: In this year the plague of 'Amawās broke out. According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Rabī', Abū al-Mujālid, [2571] Abū 'Uthmān and Abū Ḥārithah: Abū 'Ubaydah wrote to 'Umar, "Several Muslims have taken to drinking wine. Among them are Ḍirār (b. al-Azwar al-Asadī) and Abū Jandal (b. Suhayl b. 'Amr). We asked them about this, but they justified their act with a dictum, saying, "We have been given the choice, and so we have chosen."[515] Then someone said[516] to us, "[Do you not remember the verse] 'Will you refrain'?"[517] But that man did not forbid us to drink wine in so many words." Then 'Umar wrote to Abū 'Ubaydah, "This matter is purely between them and me. The Qur'ānic expression 'Will you refrain?' means nothing but 'Stop that practice.'" Then he assembled the people and they all agreed that those who had drunk wine should be given eighty lashes for it, and that they would be held accountable for a 'transgression.'[518] They also agreed that all those who adduced the same dictum to justify their wine drinking should be dealt with in the same manner. If anyone objected, he was to be killed.

514. In Arabic ramādah; see Lane, 1154, right column, for a catalogue of nuances this name evokes.

'Umar wrote to Abū 'Ubaydah, "Summon all of them. If they claim that wine drinking is permissible, have them killed, and if they claim that it is forbidden, have them flogged with eighty stripes." So Abū 'Ubaydah sent for them and interrogated them in front of all the people. "It is forbidden," they answered. Thereupon he ordered that each one of them be given eighty lashes.[519] So the people who had sinned against this prohibition were to be punished[520] and they repented of their pigheadedness. Then 'Umar said, "People of Syria, may something unexpected occur among you!" whereupon the Drought broke out.

---

515. This dictum bears a close resemblance to an expression ascribed to the Prophet innī khuyyirtu fa'khtartu, see Concordance, II, 93, left column, when he was asked why he did not refuse to lead the prayer ritual at the grave site of an adversary, the leader of the munāfiqūn, 'Abdallāh b. Ubayy. See Wāqidī, III, 1068 ff.

516. The subject of "said" is not expressed. There is perhaps the implication that it was Abū 'Ubaydah, but the syntax of the sentence is too confused to infer this.

517. These are the final words of Q. V, 91; the whole verse reads in translation: "The devil only wants to sow animosity and hatred among you through wine and games of chance, and he wants to turn you away from mentioning God and from the prayer ritual; will you refrain?"

518. The Arabic word fisq developed into a technical term for "an act of disobedience against God." For more details, see EI[2], s.v. Fāsiḳ (Gardet).

519. Strictly speaking, the text says "he flogged them." From what follows, it will become clear that the culprits had the flogging postponed until their return from a campaign against the Byzantines.

520. The Arabic word used is the technical term hadda "to inflict a punishment detailed in the Qur'ān." For other Qur'ānic punishments, see EI[2], s.v. ḥadd (Schacht).

Al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Abdallāh b. Shubrumah—al-Sha'bī gave a similar account.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Ubaydallāh b. 'Umar—Nāfi': When the letter of Abū 'Ubaydah about Ḍirār and Abū Jandal had reached 'Umar, he wrote back about the matter to Abū 'Ubaydah and he ordered him to summon them to appear in front [2572] of the people and to ask them whether wine is forbidden or permissible. "And if they say forbidden, have them be given eighty lashes, and ask them to repent. But if they say permissible, have their heads chopped off!"

Abū 'Ubaydah summoned them to his presence and interrogated them. "No," they said, "wine is forbidden." So he ordered that they be flogged, whereupon they were ashamed and kept to their quarters. But on top of that, Abū Jandal was suffering from a diabolical whispering in his ear.[521] Abū 'Ubaydah wrote to 'Umar, "Abū Jandal is ridden with fear, which cannot be allayed unless God grants him relief through you. Therefore, write to him and set his mind at rest."[522] So 'Umar wrote to Abū Jandal and admonished him. This letter read as follows:

"From 'Umar to Abū Jandal. God will not forgive His being associated with other gods, but He can show forgiveness to whomever He wants for lesser offenses. Repent therefore, raise your head, show yourself again and do not despair, for God says, 'O my servants who have committed an outrage against yourselves, do not despair of God's mercy, for God forgives all sins, He is merciful, compassionate.'"[523]

When Abū 'Ubaydah had read this letter to Abū Jandal, he cheered up again, beaming with happiness. 'Umar wrote similar letters to the others, so they all showed themselves again. Then he wrote to the people in general, "Take good care of yourselves; he whose behavior is in need of correction, make him change his ways, but do not heap disgrace upon anyone, lest tribulations spread among you."

---

521. See Lane, 2939 f., for this rendition of waswasa.

522. The Arabic verb dhakkara is given in Lane as "to remind of what might soften the heart by the mention of rewards and punishments."

523. Q. XXXIX, 53.

Al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh—'Aṭā' gave a similar account, except that there was no mention of 'Umar writing to the people in general that they should not heap disgrace upon one another.

He[524] said: Those (who were to be punished for drinking wine) said, "The Byzantines are busily regrouping themselves. Let us [2573] therefore attack them, for if God decrees martyrdom for us, then that will be our destiny, and if not, then you (sc. Abū 'Ubaydah,) will embark upon the line of action that 'Umar wants." Thus Ḍirār b. al-Azwar died a martyr's death together with a number of men, but the others (found guilty of wine drinking) survived the campaign and were duly flogged. Whereupon Abū al-Zahrā' al-Qushayrī composed the following lines (in ṭawīl):

Have you never witnessed how fate strikes young men who lack the ability to turn away death?
E'er patient, unruffled I was, until one day
I yielded, with all my friends dead, to the wine.
Then 'Umar, our leader, poured all wine away,[525] while bibbers were weeping around (empty) presses.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Rabī' b. al-Nu'mān, Abū al-Mujālid Jarād b. 'Amr, Abū 'Uthmān Yazīd b. Asīd al-Ghassānī and Abū Ḥārithah Muḥriz al-'Abshamī with their isnād and Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh—Kurayb: In the reign of 'Umar the people in Medina and its surrounding territory were afflicted by a drought in which the world was awhirl with dust when the wind blew, as if it rained ashes. That is why this year was called the Year of the Drought.[526] 'Umar swore an oath that he would not taste butter,[527] milk or meat, until the people found the world once more covered in herbage from the first rains. So he refrained 524. Presumably he is the transmitter Nāfi', introduced on p. 153 above.

525. The text reads ramāhā bi-ḥatfihā; literally, this means "he threw the wine away . . . with its death." The word ḥatf is a dubious reading and does not seem to admit of a feasible rendering other than "with its deadly effect (on man)."

526. The word used here for "Drought" is ramādah, that for "ashes" ramād(ah), the former in actual fact being derived from the latter.

527. In Arabic samn; strictly speaking we should render this "clarified butter," "ghee," see EI[2], s.v. Ghidhā' (Rodinson, II, 1057, right column, of the English edition).

from these until the people did see the world sprouting again from the first rains. Then a skin filled with butter was brought to the market and also a skin filled with milk, whereupon a servant of [2574] 'Umar bought these skins for forty (dirhams) and brought them to 'Umar saying, "Commander of the Faithful, God has honored your oath and added to your reward. These two skins, one filled with milk, the other with butter, were brought to the market, so I bought them for forty (dirhams)." But 'Umar said, "You have spent too much on them; give the contents of both away in alms, for I loathe extravagance in my daily food. How can I show true concern for my subjects," he added, "if I am not smitten by what smites them?"

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Sahl b. Yūsuf al-Salamī[528]—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ka'b b. Mālik: This tribulation lasted all during the latter part of the year 17 (638) and the beginning of 18 (638–9). The Drought brought famine, which affected all the people in Medina and the surrounding territory, and spread so much death that the wild animals began to seek food in the settlements of human beings. People even started to slaughter their sheep but then, disgusted with the loathsome appearance of (the meat of) the animals, they would not eat it, although they were starving.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Sahl b. Yūsuf—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ka'b: In this way the population was suffering while 'Umar was too diffident[529] to approach the people of the garrison cities. One day, Bilāl b. al-Ḥārith al-Muzanī[530] went to 'Umar, asked permission to enter his house, and said, "I am the emissary of the Messenger of God to you. Thus speaks the Messenger to you, "I have always known you as a resourceful[531] man and as someone who was always ready to act. What is the matter with 528. Not al-Sulamī; see M. Hinds, "Sayf b. 'Umar's sources on Arabia," 7 and n. 17.

529. For this interpretation of maḥṣūr, see Lane, 582, right column, infra.

530. He was a leading spokesman of his tribe and one of its standard bearers. He was present at the battle of al-Qādisiyyah, see Wāqidī, I, 276.

531. For once I must disagree with De Goeje, who suggests in Glossarium, p. CDLXII, that the Arabic word used here (kayyis) has the meaning of "happy" or possibly "alert." Ullmann (in WKAS, I, 492 f.) does not seem to concur either. The same story is related a second time below.

you now?" 'Umar asked, "When did you dream[532] this?" "Yesterday," was the answer.

Then 'Umar left his house, had someone call the people to a congregational prayer ritual, and performed two rak'as with them. After that he stood up and said, "People, I swear to you by God, do you remember that I ever gave you an order that could have been deferred in favor of something better?" "No, by God," they shouted. "Bilāl b. al-Ḥārith," 'Umar continued, "claims as much." "Bilāl is right," they cried, "ask God and the Muslims (in the garrison cities) for help." 'Umar then sent a messenger to them after he had been hesitant to approach them. He said, "God is great; our suffering has reached its peak and has manifested itself fully. As a rule, people are not permitted to ask for help unless a catastrophe can be warded off from them by doing so." Then 'Umar wrote to the commanders in the garrison cities, "Help the people of Medina and the surrounding territory, for their plight has reached its limit."

[2575]

Next, he ordered the people to leave the prayer meeting for a supplication for rain ritual.[533] He himself left too, on foot, and he brought al-'Abbās[534] along with him. (Having arrived at the suitable spot,) 'Umar delivered a sermon, a short one, then he performed the prayer ritual. After that he fell down upon his knees and prayed, "God, it is You whom we worship, and You we ask for succor.[535] God, forgive us, have mercy upon us, show us Your satisfaction with us." Then he left, and even before the people had reached their homesteads on their way back they had to wade through pools of water!

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Mubashshir b. al-Fuḍayl—Jubayr b. Ṣakhr—'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb: For one whole year during 'Umar's reign, the people suffered from drought and their resources dwindled. The members of a family of the Muzaynah Bedouins said to their chief, "We are near exhaustion. Slaughter a sheep for us." "But they have no meat on them!" the chief protested. However, they persisted until he slaughtered a 532. Messages from the Prophet, it is thought, are transmitted via dreams.

533. In Arabic istisqā', an ancient ritual dating back to the Jāhiliyyah, during which one prayed for rain, see *EI*², s.v. Istisḳā' (Fahd).

534. Al-'Abbās was an uncle of the Prophet.

535. Q. I, 5.

sheep for them, which was nothing but skin over bleeding bones. "O Muḥammad," he shouted (in despair), whereupon he had a dream in which the Messenger of God came to him and said, "Announce that the rains are coming. Go to 'Umar, give him my greetings and say to him, "I know you intimately, you are one [2576] who keeps his covenant and you vigorously watch your responsibilities, but, 'Umar, be resourceful!"

So this chief left and journeyed until he reached the door of 'Umar's homestead. He said to 'Umar's servant, "Announce the arrival of the emissary of the Messenger of God." Then the servant went to 'Umar and transmitted the message to him, whereupon 'Umar was horror-struck and asked, "Do you think he is insane?" "No," said the servant. "Ask him to come in then," said 'Umar. The man entered the house and related his story to 'Umar. 'Umar left the house, had someone call the people to assemble, climbed the pulpit and said, "I swear to you by him who has guided you to Islam, have you ever witnessed anything from me at which you looked askance?" "No, by God," they shouted, "but why do you ask?" So he told them and they understood the implication. But 'Umar himself did not. Then they said, "The message implies that it has indeed taken you a long time to enact a supplication for rain ritual. Therefore, hold one with us now."

'Umar had someone announce among the people (that a supplication for rain ritual was going to be held). Then he stood up, delivered a sermon, a short one, next he concisely performed two rak'as and said, "Our allies were unable to help us, by God, our own strength and vigor were lacking, our own souls could not help us, but there is no vigor or strength except in You, O God. So give us rain, and give the people and their lands a new lease on life."

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Rabī' b. al-Nu'mān, Jarād Abū al-Mujālid, Abū 'Uthmān and Abū Ḥārithah, all of them—Rajā' (b. Ḥaywah); Abū 'Uthmān and Abū Ḥārithah added: According to 'Ubādah (b. Nusayy) and Khālid (b. Ma'dān)—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ghanm: 'Umar wrote to the commanders of the garrison cities requesting them to help the people of Medina and the surrounding territory and asking them for supplies. The first to arrive in Medina amid four thousand camels loaded with foodstuffs was Abū 'Ubaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ. 'Umar charged him with the distribution thereof among the people who lived around Medina. After he had finished his task and had returned to 'Umar, the [2577] latter ordered that four thousand dirhams be given to Abū 'Ubaydah, who said, "Commander of the Faithful, I have no need of this. I only wanted to please God and to help in matters that pertain to Him, and this material world is of no concern to me." But 'Umar said, "Take it, there is no harm in it since you did not ask for it." Abū 'Ubaydah remained adamant, whereupon 'Umar repeated, "Take it, for I once took care of certain matters for the Messenger of God under similar circumstances, whereupon he said the same things to me as I said to you, and I answered in the same manner as you did me. But he pressed it upon me." Then Abū 'Ubaydah accepted the money and left for his province, gradually followed by his men. The people of the Ḥijāz were no longer in need of supplies and fully recuperated with the first rains.

They went on with the same isnād: Then in answer to 'Umar's plea for help, there came a letter from 'Amr b. al-'Āṣī which read, "At the time when the Messenger of God first received his mission, a waterway was dug to the Mediterranean that also has an outlet[536] into the Red Sea.[537] But the Byzantines and the Copts have made it unusable.[538] If you want the price of food in Medina to be on the level of that in Egypt, I shall excavate this latter waterway again and build bridges across it."[539] Then 'Umar wrote to 'Amr, "Carry out what you suggested and make haste with it." But the people of Miṣr[540] said to him, "Your kharāj is now easy to collect and your ruler is satisfied. However, when this work is finished, the paying of the kharāj will be discontinued." 'Amr wrote this to 'Umar mentioning that the restoring of this canal

536. This is a reference to a canal that the Romans had dug between Babylon (Bāb al-Yūn, near present-day Cairo) and the Mediterranean via the Bitter Lakes north of present-day Suez, see Vasiliev, History, I, 203, and also *EI*², s.v. Baḥr al-Ḳulzum (Becker); furthermore, Butler, 345–8; idem, Babylon of Egypt, 34–6, Jabartī, Ta'rīkh muddat al-Faransīs bi-Miṣr, Leiden, 1975, ed. tr. S. Moreh, 60/86.

537. Strictly speaking "the Gulf of Qulzum," an ancient town near present-day Suez.

538. Or ". . . have let it silt up (through long neglect)," as Butler (346) has it.

539. In Ibn 'Abd al-Hakam, 162 ff, the story of 'Amr reexcavating this canal is related in several versions with many details missing from Ṭabarī's account.

540. Miṣr is the name of Egypt and of a city, see n. 547 below.

might entail the discontinuation of payment of the kharāj of Miṣr and its ruination. But 'Umar wrote back to him, saying, "Work at it and make haste. May God lay waste Miṣr for the sake of the prosperity and salvation of Medina." So 'Amr applied himself to his task while in al-Qulzum. (Food) prices in Medina reached the level of those in Miṣr, which derived nothing but comfort from it. The inhabitants of Medina never saw anything like the drought again after it was over, until their trading route via the sea was cut off at the time of the murder of 'Uthmān. Then they became weak, poor and downtrodden.

Ṭabarī said: Al-Wāqidī has said that al-Raqqah, al-Ruhā' and [2578]
Ḥarrān were conquered in this year by 'Iyāḍ b. Ghanm and that 'Ayn al-Wardah was taken by 'Umayr b. Sa'd, but in the foregoing I have already mentioned the accounts of those who disagree with him on this. Al-Wāqidī also says that 'Umar transferred al-Maqām[541] to the spot in which it now lies in the month Dhū al-Ḥijjah of this year, whereas, before that, it used to be propped up[542] against the Ka'bah itself. Furthermore, he mentioned that during the plague of 'Amawās twenty-five thousand people died.

Ṭabarī said: Some historians say that in this year 'Umar asked Shurayḥ b. al-Ḥārith al-Kindī[543] to take charge of the judiciary in al-Kūfah and Ka'b b. Sūr al-Azdī in al-Baṣrah.

Ṭabarī went on: In this year it was 'Umar who led the people on the pilgrimage, while his governors in the garrison cities were the same as those in the previous year, that is 17 (638).

---

541. Al-Maqām stands here for Maqām Ibrāhīm, a stone, allegedly already venerated in the Jāhiliyyah, on which Abraham is believed to have stood when he built the Ka'bah. See *EI*², s.v. Ka'ba (Wensinck-Jomier).

542. The Arabic has mulṣaq. Other sources do not throw more light on exactly how the Maqām ended up close to, or against, the Ka'bah, after having been washed away from its old place by a flood (Arabic sayl) nicknamed Umm Nahshal. See Azraqī, Kitāb akhbār Makkah, ed. Wüstenfeld, Leipzig, 1858, 275.

543. He was allegedly the most famous judge of early Islam, in charge of the judiciary for the incredibly long period of sixty years in al-Kūfah with one or seven years in al-Baṣrah. He is said to have died sometime between 72 (691) and 99 (718) at an equally incredibly advanced age. In Wakī', Quḍāt, II, 189–402, there is a large number of judicial decisions ascribed to him. Schacht, Origins, 228 f doubts the historicity of Shurayḥ

The Events of the Year 19

(January 2–December 20, 640)

Ṭabarī said: According to Aḥmad b. Thābit al-Rāzī—his authority—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar: The conquest of Jalūlā' occurred in the year 19 (640) at the hands of Sa'd (b. Abī Waqqāṣ). Al-Wāqidī agrees. Ibn Isḥāq says that the conquest of al-Jazīrah, al-Ruhā', Ḥarrān, Ra's al-'Ayn and Naṣībīn occurred in the year 19 (640).

Ṭabarī went on: In the foregoing we have mentioned the accounts of those who disagreed with them on this issue.

[2579] Abū Ma'shar said: In this year, I mean the year 19 (640), Qaysāriyyah was conquered, its governor was Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān, all this according to Aḥmad b. Thābit al-Rāzī—his authority—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar, and al-Wāqidī mentions the same details about this as Abū Ma'shar. As for Ibn Isḥāq, he says that the conquest of the Palestinian city Qaysāriyyah, the flight of Heraklius and the conquest of Egypt all took place in the year 20 (641), as related to me by Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—himself. But Sayf b. 'Umar says that Qaysāriyyah and Egypt were conquered in 16 (637). The account of the conquest of Qaysāriyyah was given above[544] and I shall mention the account concerning Egypt and its conquest in the following, together with the account of those who say that it was conquered in the year 20 (641) and the account of those who disagree on this date.

544. Ṭabarī, I, 2397, translated in vol. XII of this series.

Ṭabarī said: In this year, I mean the year 19 (640), the Ḥarrat Laylā[545] was ablaze with fires, as al-Wāqidī has it. 'Umar wanted to march out to it with his men,[546] but then he ordered the giving of alms, whereupon the fires went out.

Al-Wāqidī also says that al-Madā'in and Jalūlā' were conquered in this year, but the accounts of those who disagree with him on this have been given above.

'Umar led the pilgrimage in this year. His governors and judges in the garrison cities were the same as in the year 18 (639).

---

545. A ḥarrah is a stretch of basalt desert that owes its origin to subterranean volcanic action. The Ḥarrat Laylā is such a volcanic field near Medina, but its exact location could not be given in Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 250 f. See also EI², s.v. Harra (Ed.)

546. Presumably to give help to the local inhabitants.

The Events of the Year 20

(DECEMBER 21, 640–DECEMBER 9, 641)

The Campaigns of the Muslims and Other Matters

Ṭabarī said: According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq:
[2580] Egypt[547] was conquered in this year. It was conquered in the year 20 (641). Abū Ma'shar has the same (date); according to Aḥmad b. Thābit—his authority—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—himself: Egypt was conquered in the year 20 (641), the Muslim commander was 'Amr b. al-'Āṣī.

According to Aḥmad b. Thābit—his authority—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar: Alexandria[548] was conquered in the year 25 (646), 547. In Arabic, the name of Egypt is Miṣr. This name has given rise to some confusion, since an ancient city, situated south of the fortress of Bāb al-Yūn (in Greek Babylon), but on the opposite bank of the Nile, was also called Miṣr (see Butler, 221 f.). Bāb al-Yūn eventually became the name the whole settlement on the Nile was known by, including the city of Miṣr, which also comprised a part called al-Fusṭāṭ, or Fusṭāṭ Miṣr. It was here that the Arabs allegedly first set up camp, see Butler, Babylon, ch. 3. In the following I shall render the name Miṣr by Egypt when I think the country is meant (in which the city of Alexandria does not seem to have been included), and I shall leave it untranslated when I think this ancient city is meant. However, one cannot always be sure which interpretation is correct.

548. In the following I have preferred this name to the Arabic Iskandariyyah.

and al-Wāqidī says, as transmitted from him to me by Ibn Sa'd, that Miṣr and Alexandria were conquered in the year 20 (641). Sayf says, according to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—himself: Alexandria was conquered in the year 16 (637).

The Conquest of Miṣr and Alexandria[549]

Ṭabarī said: We have mentioned the different opinions of the historians concerning the year in which the conquest of Miṣr and Alexandria took place. Now we will mention the events leading to their conquest and at whose hands this occurred, including the historians' differences concerning this issue too.

As for Ibn Isḥāq, according to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—himself: When 'Umar had finished taking measures pertaining to all of Syria, he wrote to 'Amr b. al-'Āṣī that he was to march upon Egypt with his army. So 'Amr departed and finally conquered Bāb al-Yūn[550] in the year 20 (641).

Ṭabarī said: There is a difference of opinion about the date of the conquest of Alexandria. Some say that it was conquered in the year 25 (646), two years after the beginning of the caliphate of [2581]
'Uthmān b. 'Affān under the supervision of 'Amr b. al-'Āṣī.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq[551]— al-Qāsim b. Quzmān, a man of Egyptian origin—Ziyād b. Jaz' al-Zubaydī, who reported that he was a fighter in the army of 'Amr b. al-'Āṣī when Miṣr and Alexandria were conquered: We conquered Alexandria during the caliphate of 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb in the year 21 (642) or 22 (643). He went on: When we had conquered Bāb al-Yūn, we advanced on all the villages in the countryside lying between Bāb al-Yūn and Alexandria, one after the other, until we ended up in Balhīb, one of those rural villages,

549. The conquest of Egypt has never been analyzed better, it seems to me, than by Alfred J. Butler in his The Arab conquest of Egypt and the last years of the Roman dominion. Here the second edition, printed together with two brief treatises that have also been drawn upon, is used. See the Bibliography.

550. Also called Bābilyūn, that is in Greek Babylon; see n. 547 above.

551. The text reads as if the isnād ends in Ibn Isḥāq and as if Ṭabarī mentions a new strand, but I think it more feasible to consider this as one isnād running from Ṭabarī via Ibn Isḥāq to the eyewitness, Ziyād b. Jaz'. I therefore propose to delete wa- preceding ḥaddathanī in l. 2. When verbs like ḥaddathanī are preceded by wa- in the middle of an isnād the compiler of the tradition collection introduces a new isnād (strand), which is obviously not the case in the present context.

called the Village of Prosperity. In the meantime, the people we had taken prisoner had arrived in Medina, Mecca, and Yemen.

He went on: When we arrived in Balhīb, the ruler of Alexandria[552] sent a message to 'Amr b. al-'Āṣī that ran, "(Listen,) you Arabs, in the past, I used to pay the jizyah to people who were more hateful to me than you, Persians and Byzantines.[553] If you want me to pay you the jizyah, I am agreeable, on the condition that you will return to me all those people from our region whom you have captured.

The eyewitness went on: Then 'Amr b. al-'Āṣī sent that ruler a message that said, "Above me there is a commander without whose consent I cannot do anything. If you want me to suspend hostilities, while you do the same, so that I can write to him about the proposal you have made to me, (I shall certainly do that). If he accepts that condition from you, I will too, and if he [2582] orders me to do something else, I will carry out his order." The man agreed. He went on: So 'Amr b. al-'Āsī wrote to 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb. Our leaders never kept secret for us the letters they wrote. So in this letter he mentioned to him what the ruler of Alexandria had proposed. All the time, the remainder of the Egyptian prisoners had been in our care. Then we stopped at Balhīb and stayed there waiting for 'Umar's letter, which finally arrived. 'Amr read it out to us. In it were the words,

"Listen, I have received your letter, in which you mention that the ruler of Alexandria has proposed to give you the jizyah on the condition that you return to him all those prisoners of his region who have been captured. Upon my life, a fixed jizyah that comes to us, and will be coming to those Muslims who live after us, is in my view preferable to booty, which seems never to have been there once it is divided up. So you must propose to the ruler of Alexandria that he give you the jizyah in the understanding that those of their people who were taken prisoner and who are still in your care, be offered the choice between Islam and the religion of their own people. Should anyone of them opt for Islam, then he belongs to the Muslims, with the same privileges and obligations as they. And he who opts for the religion of his own people has to pay the same jizyah as will be imposed upon his coreligionists. As for those captives who have been scattered over Arabia and have arrived in Mecca, Medina, or Yemen, those we cannot return and we would not like to enter into a peace treaty with anyone on the condition of a pledge which we cannot fulfill for him."

552. For more on this ruler, see n 564 below.

553. That is, of course, very unlikely, since the ruler himself was a Byzantine. This is the sort of inconsistency that Butler analyzed so fully, see n. 549 above.

'Amr sent a message to the ruler of Alexandria informing him of what the Commander of the Faithful had written, whereupon this ruler sent a message back that said, "I agree." [2583]

He went on: Then we assembled all those captives who were still in our care, and the Christians among them were grouped together. Then we began to bring forward every single man from among them and we gave him the choice between Islam and Christianity. When he chose Islam, we all shouted, "God is great," even louder than we had done when that village was conquered, and we gathered him within our ranks. When he opted for Christianity, the Christians would snort and pull him back into their midst, while we imposed the jizyah on him. All the time we were subject to great uncertainty as if one of us was about to cross over to the other camp. The eyewitness went on: This is how we went about it, until we had dealt with all of them. Among those who were thus brought forward was Abū Maryam 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān.[554] (The transmitter of this eyewitness), al-Qāsim (b. Quzmān) added at this point: I have set eyes on this Abū Maryam; he was the 'arīf[555] of the Banū Zubayd. The eyewitness went on: We positioned him (i.e., in front of the people) and offered him the choice between Islam and Christianity. Meanwhile, his father, mother and brothers had already opted for Christianity. But Abū Maryam chose Islam, so we made him step into our ranks. However, his father, mother and brothers pounced on him, struggling with us for control of him, until they tore his clothes from his body. Today he is our 'arīf, as you see. Then God conquered Alexandria for us and we could enter the city. This rubbish heap, which you see,[556] Qāsim, is in the vicinity of Alex-

554. For more on him, see further down.

555. For this function, see n. 233 above.

556. It is indeed rare when the words via which an eyewitness directly addresses someone who listens to his story are preserved. We find it here twice. It seems as if Ziyād b. Jaz' pointed out the rubbish heap to al-Qāsim. It is also conceivable that, andria. It is meant for garbage.[557] It is enclosed within (a girdle of) stones, (so that) it has not grown or shrunk (in size). He who says something else, for instance that Alexandria and the surrounding villages had no jizyah imposed upon them, or that its inhabitants had no pact with us, that man is a liar, by God!"

[2584] Al-Qāsim went on: This account did not fail to give rise to the story that the kings of the Banū Umayyah used to write to their governors of Egypt: "Egypt could only be conquered after we used force.[558] Therefore, the inhabitants are no more than our slaves, whose taxes we can increase if we so desire and with whom we can deal as we want."

Ṭabarī said: As for Sayf, according to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—himself—al-Rabī' Abū Sa'īd, Abū 'Uthmān and Abū Ḥārithah: 'Umar stayed at Īliyā'[559] after its inhabitants had been granted a peace treaty. He entered the city and stayed there a few days. He sent 'Amr b. al-'Āṣī to Egypt and appointed him governor over it, were God to conquer it for him. Then he dispatched al-Zubayr b. al-'Awwām after him as reinforcement and he directed Abū 'Ubaydah to al-Ramādah,[560] ordering him, in case God conquered it for him, to return to his province.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Abū 'Uthmān—Khālid and 'Ubādah: 'Amr b. al-'Āṣī left for Egypt after 'Umar had returned to Medina. 'Amr journeyed until he arrived at Bāb al-Yūn. Al-Zubayr followed him in his tracks and joined up with him right at the spot where Abū Maryam,[561] the metropolitan of at this point, Ziyād showed al-Qāsim a sketch he had made of the situation, if he and his audience were not standing in front of it.

---

557. In Arabic, li-kunāsatin. The Cairo edition of Ṭabarī, IV, 106, has la-kunāsatun ". . this rubbish heap is a pile of garbage in the vicinity of Alexandria."

558. This is a reference to the military customs of those days enemies who surrendered and asked for peace had to pay the jizyah and were entitled to Muslim "protection" (dhimmah), but those who had been subdued by force had all their belongings confiscated, which were distributed as war booty. For a detailed account of this, see D. R. Hill, The termination of hostilities in the early Arab conquest, London-New York, n.d.

559. Another name for Jerusalem.

560. There are various places that bear this name, here the one near al-Ramlah seems to be meant, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 813.

561. Butler (513 f.) thinks this is a distortion of Benjamin He abandons this surmise in Treaty, 60 f.

Miṣr,[562] met them, in the company of the bishop and some people of purpose.[563] The Muqawqis[564] had sent the metropolitan so that they might defend their land. When ʿAmr reached them, they prepared to fight him. Then ʿAmr sent them a message that read, [2585] "Do not prompt us to come down heavily upon you;[565] in a moment you will realize what you can do best." Thereupon they held their fighters back. ʿAmr sent them another message that said, "I shall come forward, let Abū Maryam and Abū Miryām[566] approach me." They consented to this and they granted one another safe-conduct. Then ʿAmr said to the two Christian prelates, "You two are the ecclesiastics[567] of this region. Listen. God sent Muḥammad with the truth and He ordered him to hold to it. Muḥammad transferred to us every command he was given, then he passed away—May God have mercy upon him—having accomplished everything he had been told to do. The instructions that he left us are crystal clear: among the things he enjoined upon us is that we should do our utmost in admonishing the people with whom we come into contact.[568] Therefore, we call upon you to embrace Islam. He who is willing to do so will be like one of us. To him who refuses, we suggest that he pay the jizyah and we will give him ample protection. Our Prophet informed us that we would conquer your lands and he has determined that we

562. The Arabic term jāthalīq is arabicized from the Greek katholikos. According to Lane, 369, right column, he is the highest ranking in the Christian hierarchy. However, this title was given to the head of the Christian church under the Sasanids (see Vasiliev, I, 121) and should, strictly speaking, not have been given to an Egyptian Christian. See also Butler, Treaty, 58 f.

563. The Arabic reads ahl al-niyyāt, literally "the people of the intentions." It is not clear who are meant here, but the "intentions" are probably military rather than religious. At any rate, the reading niyyāt is dubious.

564. He is a controversial figure. It seems to me that the most authoritative information on him is given by Butler, 508–26, esp. 521. He identifies him as the viceroy and (Melkite) archbishop of Alexandria, appointed by Heraklius. See also his Treaty, 54–83.

565. I base this rendering on Lane's interpretation of i'dhār "taking extraordinary pains in exhortation" (1984, left column, below).

566. Presumably that is the name of the bishop present; this is suggested in note n of the previous page, 2584, of the edition. The vocalization is that of Ibn Hubaysh.

567. Literally, "the two monks"; perhaps the term is used here to humiliate those addressed.

568. See n. 565 above.

keep you from harm because of our family ties among you. If you accept our proposition, we will give you constant protection. Among the orders we received from our Commander (i.e., in Medina) was the order, "Take the interest of the Copts to heart, for the Messenger of God enjoined their best interests upon us, because they have ties of kinship[569] with us and are therefore entitled to our protection."'

"It is truly a distant relationship," the prelates answered, "one [2586] that only prophets can establish. (Hagar[570]) was a well-known and noble woman who was the daughter of our king. She belonged to the people of Manf[571] where the monarchy was established. Then the people of 'Ayn Shams[572] were granted victory over them; they killed them and wrested their kingdom from them, whereupon the people of Manf embarked on a vagrant life. As a result of that she became Abraham's property. He[573] is heartily welcome! Grant us immunity, until we return to you."

'Amr answered, "A man like me cannot be deceived, but I will grant you a delay of three days so that you see how things stand with you and can discuss the matter with your people. If you do not promise to return in time, I shall fight you." "Give us more time," they pleaded, so he gave them one day longer. "Give us

569. Muslim tradition has it that Hagar, the maidservant of Sarah, by whom Abraham fathered Ishmael (that is, Ismā'īl, the ancestor of the Arabs), was of Egyptian origin. It is reported that, for this reason, the Prophet had enjoined upon his followers to treat the Egyptians well after they had been subjugated, in particular because of this "kinship." The tradition collector Muslim b. Ḥajjāj (d. 261/875) has preserved a Prophetic ḥadīth to this effect in his Ṣaḥīḥ, IV, 1970, see also Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥakam, 2 f. A variant of this report (see the same sources) has sihr "relationship by marriage" instead of "kinship," taken to be a reference to Māriyah, the Coptic wife of the Prophet and the mother of his son Ibrāhīm; see also Balādhurī, 219, and Maqrīzī, I, 24 f.

570. Although the context refers unmistakably to Hagar, the name itself is lacking in Ṭabarī, and was supplied from parallel versions of this story, for instance Ibn al-Athīr, II, 440.

571. The arabicized name of the ancient city of Memphis, see EI[2], s.v. Manf (U. Haarmann).

572. This is a place at three parasangs (18 kilometers) north of al-Fusṭāṭ, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 762 f; it is probably identical with Heliopolis, which seems to have been bigger than the present-day suburb of Cairo bearing that name (see Butler, 231).

573. It is not clear who is meant. If we read bi-hi with the edition, the reference may be taken to point to Abraham, the Prophet or 'Amr. If we read bi-kum with Ibn Ḥubaysh (see apparatus, n. f), "welcome to you" gives an understandable text.

more time," they asked again, so 'Amr gave them one more day. Then they returned to the Muqawqis, who took 'Amr's proposition into consideration. But Arṭabūn[574] refused to accept it and ordered an attack on the Muslims.

The two prelates addressed the people of Miṣr, "As for us, we shall do our best to defend you and we would not return to the Muslims—after all, four days have passed by now during which you came to no harm—were it not for the fact that we hope that therein might lie immunity for you."

Nothing surprised 'Amr and al-Zubayr more than the sudden attack of Farqab[575] one night, but 'Amr was prepared. They confronted the Muqawqis, who was killed with his men. Then the Muslims pursued those who had fled. Thereupon 'Amr and al-Zubayr headed for 'Ayn Shams, where they had their assembly point, and he sent Abrahah b. al-Ṣabbāḥ to al-Faramā,[576] where he duly arrived, and to Alexandria he sent 'Awf b. Mālik, who (also) duly arrived there. Each one of them said to the inhabitants of the [2587] city on which he was ordered to march, "If you surrender, you will be granted immunity." They agreed. Then the Muslims exchanged messages with them and waited there for the Muslim army, (which was at 'Ayn Shams at the time,) to arrive. In the meantime,[577] they took prisoners.

'Awf b. Mālik said, "People of Alexandria, how beautiful is your city." They replied, "Alexander the Great once said, 'I shall build a city that is in need of God and can do without people.' Or he said, I shall certainly build a city that is in need of God and can do without people.' That is why its splendor has lasted."

Likewise, Abrahah said to the inhabitants of al-Faramā, "What a ramshackle town this is, people of al-Faramā." "Yes," they answered, "al-Faramā once said, 'I shall build a city that can do 574. He is the general of the Byzantines. He is described with a few qualities in vol. XII, 2398, of this series. Butler, 215, maintains that his name should read Aretion.

575. This is the name of the Muqawqis according to Sayf. Butler, 516 f. consistently calls him Cyrus, basing himself on Severus of Ushmūnayn; see also his Treaty, 54–83. See also the literature cited in Prym's apparatus.

576. Al-Faramā is ancient Pelusium, a town on the Mediterranean shore near the outlet of the eastern branch of the Nile. Butler, 212, doubts the historicity of this mission.

577 Or possibly, "On their way (from 'Ayn Shams to these coastal cities). ."

without God but not without people.' Thus its splendor has faded." Alexander and al-Faramā were brothers.

Ṭabarī said: Al-Kalbī said: Alexander and al-Faramā were brothers. Then he related a similar story in which both cities were associated with the two brothers. In al-Faramā, something collapsed every day and its outward appearance deteriorated, whereas Alexandria kept its gloss.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Abū Ḥārithah and Abū 'Uthmān: When 'Amr descended upon the Egyptians at 'Ayn Shams, a place governed jointly[578] by Copts and Nubians, and al-Zubayr had joined 'Amr there, the people of Miṣr said to their king, "What do you want to accomplish against warriors who defeated the armies of the Persian king and the Byzantine emperor and overpowered them in their own countries? Conclude a peace treaty with these warriors and enter into a pact with them. Do not resist them and do not order us to resist them." That occurred on the fourth day (since the Muslims' arrival). But (the king) refused.

[2588] So the Muslims attacked them and fought them. Al-Zubayr scaled the wall of the city. When those inside spotted him there, they opened the gate for 'Amr and rushed out, begging for a peace treaty, to which he agreed. But (inside the wall) al-Zubayr fell upon them with force. In the end he passed through the gate, making his way to 'Amr together with the Egyptians. After they had taken care[579] of the casualties, they concluded a treaty. The Muslims took the same measures against those who were overpowered by force as they had taken in the case of those who had surrendered on the condition of a treaty. They were all placed under "protection."

The text of their peace treaty reads as follows:

> In the name of God, the merciful, the compassionate.
> This is the text of the covenant that Amr b. al-'Āṣī has granted the people of Miṣr concerning immunity for themselves, their religion, their possessions, churches, crucifixes, as well as their land and their waterways. Nothing of these will be interfered with or decreased.

578 Or "alternatively"?
579 Or "taken stock of."

Nubians[580] are not allowed to share their homesteads. It is incumbent upon the people of Miṣr, if they agree on the terms of this covenant and when the rise of the Nile water comes to a halt, to afford the jizyah, to wit fifty million (dirhams).[581]

They will have to account for the crimes committed by robbers from among them.

If anyone refuses to comply with the terms of this treaty, jizā' obligations will be lifted from them commensurate with their numbers, and we will be exempt from awarding protection to those who do so. If their river fails to reach the highest point when the rise of the water has come to a halt, then, commensurate with the losses suffered, their jizā' payments will be reduced.

Those Byzantines and Nubians who are willing to accept the same terms as in the covenant with the people of Miṣr will have the same privileges and duties as the latter.

He who refuses to accept these terms and chooses to depart will enjoy immunity, until he has reached his destination where he can be safe, or has moved out of the territory where our authority prevails.

It is incumbent upon them to comply with the following terms: in three instalments, every third part of the year, they will have to afford one third of what they have to pay.

For the terms of this document the covenant of God and His protection, as well as that of His Messenger, that [2589] of the Caliph, the Commander of the Faithful, as well as the protection awarded by all the Muslims, are guarantees.

It is incumbent upon the Nubians who have accepted the terms of this treaty that they help (sc. the local government) with so many men[582] and so many horses, in 580. On the Nubians, see Butler, index s.v., especially 432; see also his Treaty, 37–46.

581. Butler surmises on reasonable grounds that this amount is a later gloss not to be relied upon, see his Treaty, 46–8.

582. Presumably slaves are meant. Butler, Treaty, 35, interprets ra's as heads (of cattle), but he does mention "contingents of horse and foot" as a possibility the understanding that no raids will be mounted against them and that they will not be prevented from trade, export or import.

Al-Zubayr, his sons 'Abdallāh and Muḥammad, have witnessed the concluding of this covenant, Wardān[583] has put it down in writing and was present.[584]

All the people of Miṣr entered into this covenant and accepted the peace treaty. Then the horses were rounded up.[585]

'Amr organized al-Fusṭāṭ as a garrison city, whereupon the Muslims took up residence there. Abū Maryam and Abū Miryām presented themselves and spoke to 'Amr about the prisoners captured after the battle. 'Amr said, "Have these prisoners a pact and a covenant with us? Did we not come to an agreement with you two, and were we not attacked the very same day?" Then he kicked them out, whereupon they returned saying, "Everyone you have captured up to the time of our return to you will be placed under your protection!" 'Amr replied, "Would you launch an attack against us while they are under 'protection'?" "Yes," they answered, "we would." Then 'Amr divided those prisoners among his men, who distributed them, whereupon they ended up in the lands of the Arabs.

After that, a messenger approached 'Umar with some fifth parts [2590] of the war booty.[586] 'Amr sent emissaries (sc. to Medina). 'Umar questioned them and they gave him a complete account, until they touched on the story of the metropolitan[587] and his companion. 'Umar said, "Surely, I think that they showed sense, whereas you acted foolishly, without any sense at all. He who fights you has no immunity, but he who does not fight you, and is subsequently dealt with by you in the same way the villagers[588] were elsewhere. He quotes Caetani, who doubts the authenticity of the inclusion of terms concerning Nubians and labels them as anachronisms, Treaty, 51. On the whole, Butler, Treaty, 53, thinks that the treaty is possibly authentic in its main outline.

---

583. He was a client of 'Amr b. al-'Āsī, see Ibn Sa'd, VII 2, 201.

584. Presumably when it was signed. Butler, Treaty, 35, thinks that the subject of ḥaḍara was left unmentioned and translates "and there were present. . "

585. The context does not seem to make clear why.

586. Presumably the fifths of more than one battle or conquest.

587. See n. 562 above.

588. A reference to the prisoners taken in the villages mentioned above on p. 2587.

treated, does have immunity during those five days until they have lapsed." Then he sent messengers in all directions, until all those prisoners who had been captured from among those who had not taken up arms during the five days were returned, except those who had engaged in fighting afterwards. Thus the Muslims sent those captives back to Egypt, one after the other, except those who belonged to that last category.[589]

Meanwhile, some Copts had come to 'Amr's living quarters. He was informed that they had been saying, "How worn out these Arabs look, how little care they take of themselves; we are of the opinion that people like us should not be obedient to people like them." So 'Amr feared that this appearance of the Arab warriors would prompt the Copts to rebellion. Therefore, he ordered that several camels be slaughtered and cooked in water and salt. Then he ordered the army commanders to assemble, after they had notified their troops to do likewise. 'Amr sat down and beckoned to the people of Miṣr to join him. Then the meat and the broth were served. (Servants[590]) handed it out to the Muslims, who began to eat in typically Arab fashion, tearing at the meat with their teeth and slurping the broth, dressed in their woolen cloaks and unarmed. After a while, the people of Miṣr dispersed with [2591] their ambitions and courage boosted.

The next day, 'Amr sent word to the army commanders to come (i.e. to his tent again) with their troops. He ordered them to come dressed in Egyptian clothes and footwear, bidding them that they order their troops to do likewise. They complied. Then 'Amr invited the people of Miṣr again who saw something completely different from what they had seen the previous day: erect figures[591] dressed in Egyptian colors standing by, the Arabs eating Egyptian food, behaving in an Egyptian manner. The Copts dispersed, perturbed this time, muttering, "We have been made fools of!"

'Amr sent word to his army that they had to arm themselves for the roll call to be held the next day. Then he went to the parade

589. Sc. those who had joined in the battle after the five days of truce.

590. The subject is not expressed. Grammatically, the Copts could be the subject, but I do not think that that is meant.

591. Presumably of servants. The dictionaries do not seem to list a connotation for quwwām that fits the present context. Conceivably, it could also be "banners" or "standards."

and permitted the Copts to be present. He showed his troops to them and said, "I am aware that you considered yourselves to have panache when you saw the frugality of the Arabs and their simple life style. But I fear lest you perish. Therefore, I wanted to show you what sort of people they really are, under what circumstances they lived in their own country, then what they have come to in yours, and how ready they are for war. They have defeated you, warfare is their life. They were anxious to take [2592] possession of your country even before they appropriated its customs as you saw on the second day. And I also wanted you to realize that those you saw on the third day will not abandon the life you saw depicted on the second day, nor will they resume the lifestyle you saw depicted on the first day." Thereupon the people of Miṣr dispersed saying to one another,[592] "The Arabs have smitten you with this one hero of theirs."

News of these events reached 'Umar, who said to his companions, "By God, 'Amr's military campaign has become truly easy, no more attacks or assaults like the ones in battles against others. 'Amr is indeed a crafty fellow!" Then he installed 'Amr as governor of Miṣr, where he stayed.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Abū Sa'īd al-Rabī' b. al-Nu'mān—'Amr b. Shu'ayb: When 'Amr and the Muqawqis came face to face at 'Ayn Shams and their respective cavalries began to do battle with one another, the Muslims started to swerve some way toward the far end (i.e. of the battlefield), but 'Amr urged them to attack. Then a certain man from Yemen said, "We are not made of stone or iron!" "Shut up, you dog!" 'Amr shouted, but the man retorted, "In that case you are the upper dog."[593]

The transmitter went on: When that contingent began to draw more closely together, 'Amr shouted, "Where are the Companions of the Messenger of God?" Then those Companions who had participated in the evasive action[594] came along and 'Amr roared, "Advance, through you God will grant victory to the Muslims." So they went forward. Among them that day were Abū Burdah and Abū Barzah.[595] The other warriors attacked the enemy, close-

592. Or, conceivably, "to their countrymen upon their return"
593. Literally, "the commander of the dogs."
594. Admittedly, a wordy rendering of man shahidahā.
595. They could not be identified with certainty.

ly following the Companions. Then God granted victory to the Muslims who vanquished the enemy in a glorious manner. Miṣr was conquered in the month Rabīʿ I of the year 16 (April 637); there the authority of Islam stood firm. [2593]

On the whole, Islam began to spread over peoples and kings. Thus the people of Egypt started to engulf (Ifrīqiyah[596] and its ruler) al-Ajall,[597] likewise the people in Mukrān overran Rāsil and Dāhir,[598] the people in Sijistān overpowered the Shāh and his nobles, and the people in Khurāsān and Bāb (al-Abwāb)[599] their respective Khāqāns,[600] as well as less powerful nations. ʿUmar held the conquering armies back out of concern for the lives of the Muslims. Had he allowed them to go where they liked, they would have gone anywhere where water was available.[601]

According to ʿAlī b. Sahl—al-Walīd b. Muslim—(ʿAbdallāh) b. Lahīʿah—Yazīd b. Ḥabīb:[602] When they had conquered Miṣr, the Muslims launched an attack on (northern)[603] Nubia. But they returned having sustained injuries and with many people having been blinded because of the Nubians' superior bowmanship. That is why the Nubians were nicknamed "the eye shooters." When ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿd b. Abī Sarḥ governed Egypt, over which ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān had appointed him, he concluded a peace treaty with the Nubians on the condition that they offer a gift, namely a number of people from among them (i.e., to be used as a labor force), whom they were to deliver into the hands of the Muslims. In exchange, every year the Muslims would present them with certain specific foodstuffs and equally well-specified garments.

According to ʿAlī—al-Walīd—Ibn Lahīʿah: ʿUthmān and those governors and commanders who lived after him stuck to this

596. In this particular context, it is the name of the North African coastal regions west of Egypt; but see *EI*², s.v. Ifrīḳiya (Talbi), for the many different definitions of this name.

597. According to a gloss in Ibn Hubaysh (Berlin), this is the title of the ruler of Ifrīqiyah; it means something like "the most noble." He is mentioned once more in a subsequent volume of this series.

598. These are the names of local rulers.

599. This is a city on the western shore of the Caspian Sea, north of Baku. Nowadays it is called Derbent. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 437–42.

600. This is the (Persian) title of local rulers.

601. Literally, "they would have reached every watering place."

602. On this important Egyptian historian, see GAS, I, 341 f.

603. In Arabic, Nūbat Miṣr, probably that part of Nubia bordering on Egypt.

peace treaty and 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz confirmed it out of consideration and concern for the well-being of the Muslims.

[2594] Sayf said: When the month Dhū al-Qa'dah of the year 16 (November–December 637) had begun, 'Umar stationed the armed forces of Egypt along all the coastal regions, the reason for this being that Heraklius was launching attacks on Egypt and Syria from the sea while he assaulted the people of Ḥimṣ in person. That occurred after three and a half years of 'Umar's reign had elapsed.

Ṭabarī said: In this year, I mean 20 (641), Abū Baḥriyyah al-Kindī 'Abdallāh b. Qays made a raid into Byzantine territory. It is alleged that he was the first to invade it, but another opinion has it that Maysarah b. Masrūq al-'Absī was the first to do so and to return safely, laden with booty.

(Ṭabarī) said: Al-Wāqidī said: In this year, 'Umar dismissed Qudāmah b. Maẓ'ūn as governor from al-Baḥrayn and had him flogged for wine drinking. In the same year, 'Umar installed Abū Hurayrah[604] as governor of al-Baḥrayn and al-Yamāmah.

Ṭabarī said: In the same year, 'Umar married Fāṭimah bt. al-Walīd, the mother of 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥārith b. Hishām.

He continued: Also in the same year Bilāl b. Rabāh[605] passed away. He was buried in the cemetery of Damascus.

In the same year, 'Umar relieved Sa'd from the governorship of al-Kūfah on the strength of complaints filed against him. People said that he could not perform the ṣalāt properly.

In the same year, 'Umar divided Khaybar[606] among the Mus-

---

604. He was reputedly a major Companion of the Prophet, whose role in the dissemination of prophetic hadīth has occupied scholars in East and West until the present day. For his biography, see the somewhat uncritical study of him by Helga Hemgesberg, Abū Hurairа, der Gefahrte des Propheten, Frankfurt/Main, 1965, and for his alleged role in ḥadīth transmission, see Juynboll, Authenticity, ch. VII, idem, Muslim tradition, 190–206.

605. He is described as a black Ethiopian slave who had embraced Islam very early. After Abū Bakr had bought him from his cruel Meccan master, he manumitted him. Bilāl later became Muḥammad's official mu'adhdhin, the man who called the faithful to prayer. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 326 f.

606. Khaybar is an oasis comprising settlements, cultivated soil and palm-groves, ninety-six miles/154 kilometers north of Medina, captured by Muḥammad in 7 (628), it used to be occupied by Jews. See *EI*², s.v. Khaybar (Veccia Vaglieri).

lims and expelled the Jews from it. He sent Abū Ḥabībah[607] to Fadak;[608] he granted them half[609] the fruit produce and the value of the land in gold and silver and let them keep that. (The other half he confiscated), then he went to the Jews of Wadī al-Qurā[610] and (confiscated their property) to divide it. Also in this year, 'Umar drove the Jews out of Najrān to al-Kūfah, as al-Wāqidī has it. [2595]

Al-Wāqidī said: In this year, I mean the year 20 (641), 'Umar organized the dīwāns.[611] Ṭabarī said: We have already mentioned the accounts of those who disagree on this chronology.[612]

In the same year, 'Umar sent 'Alqamah b. Mujazziz al-Mudlijī overseas to Ethiopia, and this because it was rumored that Ethiopia had made a sudden attack on some border regions of the Islamic domain, but the Muslim forces were annihilated. Then 'Umar imposed upon himself that he would never send anyone again on a mission overseas. As for Abū Ma'shar, according to Aḥmad b. Thābit—his authority—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—himself: The campaign against the land of the blacks was one overseas, in the year 31 (651–2).[613]

Al-Wāqidī said: In the same year, Usayd b. al-Ḥuḍayr[614] passed away in the month Sha'bān (July–August).

Also in this year, Zaynab bt. al-Jaḥsh[615] died.

---

607. Who this man was could not be established with certainty.

608. A village not far from Khaybar, see op. cit., which surrendered to Muḥammad when he marched on Khaybar, as it says in the sources.

609. Ṭabarī's text appears to have a lacuna; my translation is based upon Prym's emendation, which is derived from Balādhurī, 29, 32. See also Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 855, and Wāqidī, II, 721, which has nakhl "palms."

610. Wādī al-Qurā is a wādī running from Medina to Syria in which there were several villages. The Jews who lived there were said not to have been expelled, since Wādī al-Qurā is not part of the Ḥijāz but of Syria.

611. The registers in which stipends, etc. were entered; see the monograph of G. R. Puin.

612. In vol. XII of this series.

613. That is, during 'Uthmān's reign.

614. Usayd was a nobleman from the Jāhilīyyah, who could write Arabic and was an excellent swimmer and archer. He who possessed these qualities was called al-Kāmil "the perfect one" He embraced Islam early, see Ibn Sa'd, III/2, 135–7.

615. This Zaynab was the wife of the Prophet's adopted son Zayd b. Ḥārithah. When the Prophet married her, after Zayd had repudiated her, it is reported that

In this year, 'Umar led the pilgrimage. His governors in the garrison cities were the same in this year as in the previous year with the exception of those whom I have mentioned as dismissed or replaced by others. The same applies to his judges, who were the same persons as in the previous year.

---

the Qur'ān abolished adoption. Thus Muḥammad could not be accused of incest by marrying his "son's" wife. This episode has been analyzed by western as well as oriental scholars, but with quite different results. For an interesting account of both treatments, see Muhammad Husayn Haykal, Ḥayāt Muhammad (first published Cairo 1935, now also in English translation) ch. XVII, latter half.

The Events of the Year [2596]

21

(December 10, 641–November 29, 642)

Ṭabarī said: In this year the battle of Nihāwand occurred as related in the account of Ibn Isḥāq according to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—himself. Abū Ma'shar has the same according to Aḥmad b. Thābit—his authority—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar. Al-Wāqidī says likewise. As for Sayf b. 'Umar, he has it that the battle of Nihāwand took place in the year 18 (639), in the sixth year of 'Umar's reign, according to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf.

The Battle of the Muslims and the Persians at Nihāwand[616]

The beginning of this episode was as follows according to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: (A basic element) of the story of Nihāwand was that al-Nu'mān b. Muqarrin was governor of Kas-

616. For a detailed source analysis of this battle and a comparison with the accounts concerning the conquest of Isfahān, see the fundamental study of Noth, "Iṣfahān-Nihāwand," in ZDMG, CXVIII (1968):274–96.

kar.[617] He wrote to 'Umar to inform him that Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ had employed him to levy the kharāj. He wrote, "I would have loved to wage Holy War, indeed I am craving it."

Then 'Umar wrote to Sa'd, "Al-Nu'mān has written to me mentioning that you have employed him to gather the kharāj. However, he loathes this function and would much rather go and fight in the Holy War. Send him, therefore, to your most important objective, to wit Nihāwand."

He said: In the meantime, the Persians had assembled in Nihāwand under the command of (Bahman Jādhawayh) Dhū al-Ḥājib,[618] a certain Persian. Then 'Umar wrote to al-Nu'mān b. Muqarrin, "In the name of God, the merciful, the compassionate. From the servant of God, 'Umar, the Commander of the Faithful, to al-Nu'mān b. Muqarrin. Peace be upon you, I praise God to you, beside Him there is no other god. Listen. It has reached me that [2597] numerous bands of Persians have assembled against you at the city of Nihāwand. When this letter has reached you, I want you to march out against them, by order of God, with His help and His support, together with those Muslims who are with you at present. Do not let your fighters tread on rugged ground lest you bring harm to them, do not deny them their rights lest you have to make up for that to them, and do not make them enter swampy areas. For one Muslim man is dearer to me than one thousand dīnārs. Fare you well."

So al-Nu'mān marched out toward his goal with the most important Companions of the Prophet accompanying him, such as Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān, 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, Jarīr b. 'Abdallāh al-Bajalī, al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah, 'Amr b. Ma'dī Karib al-Zubaydī, Ṭulayḥah b. Khuwaylid al-Asadī and Qays b. Makshūḥ al-Murādī.[619] When al-Nu'mān b. Muqarrin finally arrived with his army at Nihāwand, the enemy spread iron spikes over

617 This is the name of the district that lies between al-Kūfah and al-Basrah. The main town in it in later times is Wāsiṭ, founded half-a-century later, see Le Strange, Lands, 39

618. That may mean "he in charge of the screen." Was he a chamberlain? See n 17 above. In other sources, such as Balādhurī, 303, he is called Dhū al-Ḥājibayn "he in charge of the two screens." Elsewhere (below, and Balādhurī, 302) he is Mardānshāh Dhū al-Ḥājib. It should be borne in mind, though, that Dhū al-Ḥājibayn can also mean "he with the (big) eyebrows."

619. For the three last-mentioned, see n. 93 above.

the ground against him. Al-Nuʿmān sent out spies who approached unaware of the caltrops. One of them urged his horse which had just stepped with its leg into a spike forward, but it would not budge. The man dismounted and inspected his horse's foot and then he found the caltrop lodged in its hoof. He brought it to al-Nuʿmān and told him what had happened. Then al-Nuʿmān asked his men what they thought should be done. They answered, "Move away from the position that you have taken here, so that they think that you are fleeing away from them. Then they might come out of their stronghold to pursue you."

Thus al-Nuʿmān moved away from that position. The Persians swept the caltrops out of their path and left their stronghold in pursuit of the Muslims. Then al-Nuʿmān turned around to face them once more. He set up camp, drew up his platoons in battle array and addressed them as follows, "If I am killed, Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān will be your new commander; if he is slain, obey Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh, and if he gets killed too, then Qays b. Makshūḥ will command you."

Al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah was resentful that al-Nuʿmān had not asked him to succeed him. So he went up to al-Nuʿmān and asked him, "What is your plan of action?" Al-Nuʿmān replied, "After I [2598] have performed the noon ṣalāt, I shall fight them, because I have seen that the Messenger of God preferred it that way."[620] "If I had been in your place," al-Mughīrah remarked, "I would have engaged them very early in the morning." Then al-Nuʿmān said, "(On several occasions in the past) you may perhaps have engaged the enemy in fighting early in the morning, which did not result in your face being blackened by God,[621] but today happens to be Friday."

So al-Nuʿmān said to his army, "With God's permission, we will first perform the ṣalāt, and then we will confront our enemy after the ṣalāt." When they had arranged themselves in rows for 620 This is a reference to a ḥadīth (Bukhārī, II, 293; Abū Dāwūd, III, 49; Tirmidhī, IV, 160; Ibn Ḥanbal, V, 444 f.). Although ascribed to the Prophet, its originator was most probably Ḥammād b. Salamah (d. 167/784), a fact highlighted by Noth op. cit., 274. A reason why Ḥammād might have brought this ḥadīth into circulation is hard to give. For an account of a later time in the day when the struggle is reported to have started, see below, on pp. 187–88.

621. This is an expression conveying that God renders someone's face expressive of sorrow or displeasure, or "to disgrace" (Lane, 1461, left column).

the prayer ritual, al-Nu'mān spoke to his fighters, "I shall shout 'God is great': after the first time everybody should fasten his sandal straps and adjust his gear. After I have shouted it a second time, everybody should fasten his belt and prepare himself to attack straightaway. After the third time, you must launch an all-out assault against them. I shall attack too."[622]

The Persians went forth, having fastened themselves to one another with chains so that they could not flee.[623] The Muslims attacked them and fought them. Al-Nu'mān was hit by an arrow, as a result of which he died. His brother Suwayd b. Muqarrin wrapped him in his garment and concealed the fact that his brother had been slain, until God granted victory to the Muslims. Then Suwayd gave the standard to Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān. God killed Dhū al-Ḥājib and Nihāwand was conquered. After this, the Persians never amassed an army of that size again.

Ṭabarī said: According to what I was told, 'Umar had sent al-Sā'ib b. al-Aqra', a client of Thaqīf[624] (i.e., to Nihāwand). Al-Sā'ib could write and was good at arithmetic. 'Umar told him, "Join the army there and stay with them. If God grants the Muslims victory, you must divide the booty among them. And set aside the fifth that belongs to God and the fifth of His Messenger. This army has suffered losses. Go into the countryside, for low land is better than elevated land."[625]

Al-Sā'ib said:[626] When God had conquered Nihāwand for the Muslims, they acquired enormous masses of booty. So, by God, I took pains to divide it justly among the fighters, when someone 622. Or, conceivably, "I shall carry (our standard)." The carrying of flags and standards as a prominent feature in early Muslim war tactics is studied in Juynboll, "The Qur'ān reciter on the battlefield and concomitant issues," in ZDMG, CXXV (1975): 11–27.

623. Enemy troops tying themselves up in chains out of cowardice is a topos observed in various sources, see Noth, 122, and idem, "Isfahān-Nihāwand," 280.

624. This man was highly praised for his intellectual powers. For more stories about him, see Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 16 f.

625. This seems to suggest that 'Umar advised the Muslim warriors to recuperate from their war effort in the countryside, where they could hide themselves and where they were less conspicuous. The opposition bāṭin/ẓāhir is very much in evidence in the opposition baṭn/ẓahr. However, this expression as used here could not be traced to other sources.

626. This whole story is interrupted so often by the word qāla "he said" that for once I deemed it proper to leave it out altogether in what follows.

from the local people came to me and said, "Will you grant me, [2599]
my wife and my family immunity? For my part I will show you the treasures of al-Nakhīrajān. These are the treasures of the royal family, which will be for you and your commander without anyone else sharing with you in them." "All right," I said, whereupon that man said, "Send someone with me whom I can show where they are." I dispatched someone with him. That man returned to me with two huge baskets filled with nothing but pearls, chrysolites and rubies. When I had finished dividing the booty among the men, I took these two baskets with me and traveled to 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, who said, "What happened, Sā'ib?" "Good news, Commander of the Faithful," I answered, "God has granted you the most glorious victory and al-Nu'mān b. Muqarrin died a martyr's death." Then 'Umar exclaimed, "Verily, we belong to God and to Him we will return,"[627] and burst into tears, weeping like a child, (bending his head forward so) that I saw the uppermost part of his shoulders above his neck. When I saw how he grieved, I said to him, "By God, Commander of the Faithful, apart from al-Nu'mān nobody who could be considered important died." "The weak are also Muslims," 'Umar retorted, "but He who has honored them with martyrdom knows their prominence and lineage, and of what they achieve. 'Umar, his mother's son, is aware (too)."[628] Then he stood up to enter his house. So I said, "I have enormous riches that I have brought along with me," whereupon I told 'Umar the story of the two baskets. "Bring them to the treasury," 'Umar ordered, "we will see later what we will do with them. And you should once more join your army unit."

So I brought the baskets to the treasury and soon afterwards left [2600] for al-Kūfah.

The same night that I departed for al-Kūfah, 'Umar rested, but when he awoke the next morning, he dispatched a messenger after me. By God, he only caught up with me the moment I was about to enter al-Kūfah. When I made my camel kneel, he made his camel kneel right beside mine. "Go back immediately to the Commander of the Faithful," he shouted. "He sent me to fetch you but I only caught up with you this very moment." "Damn you," I said, "what is all this about and why should I?" "I (honestly) do not know," he answered.

627. Q. II, 156.
628. Rendition tentative.

So I rode back with the messenger. Finally, I approached 'Umar, who the moment he spotted me said, "What shall I tell the son of al-Sā'ib's mother, or rather what can he tell me?" "Commander of the Faithful," I asked him, "what is all this about?" "Damn you, by God," 'Umar replied, "hardly had I gone to sleep that night in which you left Medina, when the angels of my Lord came to me to escort me to those two baskets that shone like flames, while the angels said, "We are going to brand you with them." Then I said, "I shall divide their contents into equal shares among the Muslims." Therefore, Sā'ib, go and take them away from me, you bastard, do not let them out of your sight. Sell them so that with the proceeds the stipends and annuities of the Muslims can be paid." Thus I left with the baskets. (Having arrived in al-Kūfah,) I deposited them in the mosque, whereupon the tradesmen descended upon me. It was 'Amr b. Ḥurayth al-Makhzūmi who bought them from me for two million dirhams. He left with them for the land still under control of the Persians and sold them there for four million. Consequently, he remained ever after the wealthiest man in al-Kūfah.

According to al-Rabī' b. Sulaymān—Asad b. Mūsā—al-Mubārak b. Fuḍālah—Ziyād b. Jubayr—his father (sc. Jubayr b. Ḥayyah): 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb said to al-Hurmuzān when he granted him immunity, "Do not fear, will you give me advice?" "I will," [2601] al-Hurmuzān replied. Thereupon 'Umar said, "Suppose Persia is today like a head and two wings." "Then where is that head?" al-Hurmuzān asked. "In Nihāwand," was the answer, "under the command of Bundār,[629] for he has the royal brigade of the Asāwirah[630] and troops from Iṣbahān with him." "And where are the wings?" al-Hurmuzān asked. 'Umar mentioned a region that I have forgotten. "Cut off the wings," the Persian suggested, "then the head will weaken." "You speak lies, enemy of God," 'Umar retorted, "no, I shall go for the head first, which I shall cut off; when God has struck off the head, the wings will no longer resist Him."

629. This is thought by De Goeje to be a corruption of Mardānshāh (Dhū al-Ḥājibayn), see Glossarium, p. DCXXII.

630. See n. 147 above.

He went on: Then 'Umar intended to march on Nihāwand himself, but his associates said, "For God's sake, may we remind you, Commander of the Faithful, that you intend to march on the élite cavalry of the Persians? If you are slain, the Muslims will no longer have a binding force. But by all means, send military forces." So 'Umar sent men from Medina. One of them was his son 'Abdallāh, but Muhājirs and Anṣār were also among them. Then he wrote to Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī, "March out with the people of al-Baṣrah," and to Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān, "March out with the people of al-Kūfah," and to both ". . . until you all come together near Nihāwand. When you are assembled," the letter went on, "then your commander will be al-Nu'mān b. Muqarrin al-Muzanī." When the Muslims gathered at Nihāwand, Bundār, nicknamed the Sturdy One, sent them a message that said, "Detail someone to us so that we may speak to him." So al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah was commissioned.

He went on: It is as if I still see him: a man with long hair and only one eye. They sent him to the Persian commander. When he came back, we questioned him. Al-Mughīrah said," (When I came into their presence,) I learned that a short while ago the Persian commander had sought the advice of his associates by asking them, "For what good reason shall we allow this bedouin to behold our stateliness, grandeur and regality? Or should we present ourselves to him in an unkempt state, hiding from him what we are really like, so that he turns away in disgust?" "No," they shouted, "let us adorn ourselves in the most splendid possible way, in full armor. Let us array ourselves in our gear, and when [2602] we ride against them, our spears and lances will glitter so brilliantly that it will almost affect their eyesight."

(Al-Mughīrah entered and) lo, there was Bundār, with a crown on his head, (stretched out) on a golden throne, with (the nobles) standing around its head end, looking (vainglorious) as devils.[631]

631. In Lane, 1552, middle column, a devil is described in terms of insolence, audacity and pride, among other characteristics. Hence my use of "vainglorious."

Al-Mughīrah continued: I walked a few steps, (shabbily dressed) as I was, and bowed. But I was pushed and held back.[632] "This is not the way emissaries are treated," I protested. But they said, "You are nothing but a dog." "God forbid," I retorted, "among my own people I hold a higher rank than he among his." But they jeered at me, hollering, "Sit down!" pushing me to a place to sit.

He went on: Someone translated for me[633] the words Bundār spoke. "You bedouins, of all people you are the farthest removed from anything that is beneficial; you have been hungry longer than anyone else, you are the most wretched, live in the greatest squalor and in the most remote homesteads. Nothing prevents me from ordering these knights around me to shoot the lot of you with a barrage of arrows[634] except the fear of all your corpses polluting the air, for you are filth. If you go away, we will let you do so, but if you persist, we will show you the spot where you will be slaughtered."

Al-Mughīrah went on: I praised God and extolled Him and then I spoke, "By God, everything you said to describe and characterize us is absolutely correct. It is true, of all people we have the most remote homesteads, our hunger has been most severe, we were the most wretched and we were farther removed from anything beneficial than anyone, until God sent us His Messenger and promised us victory in this world as well as Paradise in the Hereafter. And by God, since His Messenger came to us, we have never experienced anything from our Lord but conquest and victory. Finally, we have come to you, and I swear by God, we will never [2603] return to that misery until we have vanquished you, acquiring everything you own, or otherwise get killed in your land." Hereupon Bundār said (i.e. to his entourage), "Forsooth, this one-eyed scoundrel has given you a truthful rendering of what he thinks deep down."

---

632. In parallel reports (for instance, Balādhurī, 303) the reason why al-Mughīrah was jostled was that he had torn the carpet with his spear and had seated himself next to the Persian general on the latter's throne, apparently just to provoke them.

633. The text has "for him," but I have opted for a suggestion made in the apparatus.

634. This is the translation suggested in Glossarium for form VIII of nazama.

Al-Mughīrah continued: Then I stood up and I swear that I had rattled the lout[635] with my determination.

Thereupon the Sturdy One[636] sent us a message that said, "Either you cross over to us in Nihāwand, or we will cross over to you." Al-Nu'mān ordered, "Let us cross over to them."[637]

He[638] went on: I swear by God, I have never seen a spectacle as on that day, the Persians advancing like mountains of steel, having tied themselves[639] to one another lest they flee from the Arabs. In units of seven they had bound themselves to their peers with ropes,[640] and they threw iron spikes behind their backs, thinking that, if someone fled, he would wound himself on the spikes. When al-Mughīrah saw how numerous they were, he said, "I have never seen such vacillation.[641] Our enemies are left free to prepare themselves without any pressure being exerted on them. But I swear, had I been in command, I would not have hesitated a moment to attack them." Al-Nu'mān b. Muqarrin, however, was a mild-mannered man, who said to him, "God will see to it that you witness similar battles (sc. in future, in which your preferred tactics are followed). Let your point of view not sadden you or reproach you, for I swear, nothing prevents me from attacking them except something I witnessed from the Messenger of God: When he went on a campaign, he never fought at the beginning of the day, not seeking a speedy outcome, but he waited until the time for the sunset[642] ṣalāt had come and the wind had freshened. As a consequence, fighting could be expected 635. The Arabic has 'ilj "strong," "sturdy," "coarse," a term especially used to indicate unbelievers. It is unclear whether 'ilj is here an honorific of Bundār or a term of abuse. I have translated it as a double entendre.

636. See previous note.

637. For this topos, see n. 425 above.

638. He is Jubayr b. Ḥayyah again, the transmitter of this report introduced above on p. 184.

639. This verb tawāthaqa also permits of the translation "they had made promises to one another."

640. For the words qarana and qirān, see Lane, 2987 f. For the topos of enemy troops binding themselves to one another out of cowardice, see n. 623 above.

641. He probably means "in our strategy."

642. Although the text in Ṭabarī does not specify this ṣalāt as the one performed at sunset, parallel texts in the ḥadīth (referred to above in n. 620) have it coincide with sunset (. . . hattā tazūla al-shams).

to be more vigorous. That is really the only reason that holds me back. Almighty God, I beg You to gladden my eyes today with a victory in which there is prestige for Islam and an ignominy in which the unbelievers are humiliated. Then gather me unto You as a martyr after (victory has been won). And now, all of you, say 'Amen' to that. May God have mercy upon you." So we all said, "Amen," and wept.

Then al-Nu'mān b. Muqarrin went on, saying, "When I wave my banner, you must hold your weapons ready. When I wave it a second time, you must prepare yourselves for fighting your en-[2604] emies and when I wave it a third time, let every man attack the enemy nearest to him, secure in the blessing of God."

Meanwhile, the enemy had scattered the iron stakes. Al-Nu'mān, however, waited until the time of the sunset ṣalāt had come and the winds had freshened. Then he shouted, "God is great," whereupon we answered with, "God is great." After that al-Nu'mān said, "May God answer my prayer and grant me victory." Al-Nu'mān waved the banner, so we prepared to fight. Then he waved it a second time, whereupon we positioned ourselves facing the enemy. After that he waved it a third time. Al-Nu'mān shouted, "God is great," and the Muslims did likewise saying, "Victory will be ours with which God will honor Islam and its adherents." Then al-Nu'mān ordained, "If I am slain, then Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān will lead the troops, and if Ḥudhayfah is slain, then so-and-so, and if he is also killed, then such-and-such." (He went on mentioning names) until he had enumerated seven leaders, the last of whom was al-Mughīrah. Then he waved the banner a third time, whereupon every fighter attacked the enemy nearest to him. By God, on that day I do not know of a single Muslim who wanted to get back to his family; (everybody kept fighting) until he either got killed or defeated his adversary. We attacked as one man, but the enemies stood their ground against us. The only sound we heard was iron clashing on iron, until the Muslims had sustained serious losses. However, when the Persians saw our endurance and our reluctance to leave the battlefield, they lost their confidence. As soon as one man fell down, seven others fell down too, one on top of the other, still being chained together. So all of them were slain, while others sustained injuries from the caltrops that they had spread about behind them. Al-Nu'mān shouted, "Bring the banner forward." So we began to move the banner forward. We killed the enemy and routed them. When al-Nu'mān realized that God had answered his prayer, and when he saw that victory was ours, an arrow was shot at him that struck him in his flank and killed him.

Then Ma'qil, his brother, went to him and covered him with a cloak. He took the banner and joined the fight again. Next he [2605] shouted, "Forward. Let us kill and rout them." When the warriors had assembled, they asked, "Where is our commander?" Then (pointing to the body) Ma'qil said, "Here is your commander. God has gladdened his eye with victory and has sealed this with his martyrdom." After that the warriors gave the oath of allegiance to Ḥudhayfah and also to 'Umar in Medina, asking (God) to grant him victory and invoking God's blessing upon him, as is done for pregnant women.

News of the victory was recorded in a letter for 'Umar that was delivered by one of the Muslims. When he had arrived at 'Umar's abode, he said to him, "Rejoice, Commander of the Faithful, in a victory with which God has honored Islam and His subjects and with which He has disgraced unbelief and its advocates." 'Umar said, "Praise be to God. Has al-Nu'mān sent you?" "Prepare yourself (for bad news and God's blessing), al-Nu'mān (was slain),[643] Commander of the Faithful." 'Umar burst into tears and cried, "Verily, we belong to God, and to Him we will return,[644] who else was killed, you bearer of bad news?" The man mentioned such-and-such and so-and-so, until he had enumerated many people for him, concluding with the words, "And the others, Commander of the Faithful, you would not know." "It will not hurt them that 'Umar does not know them. In any case God certainly knows them," 'Umar said tearfully.

As for Sayf, according to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—himself—Muḥammad, al-Muhallab, Ṭalḥah, 'Amr and Sa'īd: What precipitated the fighting at Nihāwand was that, after the fighters from al-Baṣrah had overpowered al-Hurmuzān and had forestalled the people of 643. The Arabic expression iḥtasaba fulānan conveys that someone may reap a reward from God for his composure upon hearing about the death of someone dear, see Lane, 565, right column, below.

644. Q. II, 156.

Fārs by preventing them from annihilating the army force of al-'Alā'[645] and had trampled them underfoot, the people of Fārs wrote to their king, who was at the time in Marw, to prompt him to take action. The king wrote to the inhabitants of al-Jibāl, namely those of al-Bāb, al-Sind, Khurāsān and Ḥulwān, who were duly roused. They exchanged letters and some even rode to others. They agreed that they would show up at Nihāwand and sort out their matters there.

One after the other, the first contingents of Persians began to arrive at Nihāwand. Qubādh (b. 'Abdallāh al-Khurāsānī), the commander at Ḥulwān, sent news of this to Sa'd, who in turn wrote to 'Umar. Meanwhile, Sa'd was being beleaguered by certain[646] peo-[2606] ple, who incited against his authority in the time that elapsed between the exchange of letters among the Persians and their assembling at Nihāwand. But the latter were not concerned with the commotion that their maneuvers caused the Muslims. Among those people who recalcitrated was al-Jarrāḥ b. Sinān al-Asadī amidst a group of followers.

'Umar wrote back, "Proof that not everything is in order among you lies in your[647] rising up just at the moment when those who are preparing to fight you are getting ready. But I swear by God, this crisis will not prevent me from looking into your situation first, even if the Persians attack you." Then 'Umar sent Muḥammad b. Maslamah.[648] In the meantime, the Muslim forces were getting ready to fight the Persians, while the Persians were concentrating their forces. Muḥammad b. Maslamah was the overseer of the governors, whose task it was at the time of 'Umar's reign to investigate the administrative measures taken by those against whom complaints had been filed.

So Muḥammad went up to Sa'd to be escorted amongst the inhabitants of al-Kūfah, while deputations meant for the people of the garrison cities were sent in the direction of Nihāwand. Sa'd escorted Muḥammad along the mosques of the people of al-Kūfah.[649] Muḥammad did not address himself in secret to any

645. See above, pp. 129–31

646. Who these people were will become clear further down.

647. Presumably, 'Umar refers only to those malcontents siding with al-Jarrāh.

648. In the past he had also acted as 'Umar's trouble-shooter, see pp. 73–74 above.

649. Various clans and tribal groupings had their own prayer sites, also used for local public meetings.

question raised about Sa'd, since in those days problems related to people's circumstances were never dealt with behind closed doors. Muḥammad did not stop at a prayer site in order to interrogate the people about Sa'd without receiving the answer, "We know nothing but good (about him), we do not wish him to be replaced, we will not say anything that discredits him and we will help no one against him." (All expressed these and similar ideas) except those who supported al-Jarrāḥ b. Sinān and his associates. The last-mentioned had kept silent, not saying anything detrimental, nor had Muḥammad given them permission (to speak for that matter). They had also deliberately abstained from uttering salutations. Finally, the investigation committee reached the abode of the 'Abs. Muḥammad addressed them, "I swear by God, let anyone who knows the truth speak up."

Then Usāmah b. Qatādah said, "If you adjure us, by God, (to be frank with you), Sa'd does not divide the booty equally among us, he does not act justly among his subjects and he does not mount campaigns (sc. that might bring in spoils)." Hereupon Sa'd exclaimed, "By the almighty God, if he has told a deliberate lie for everybody to see and hear, then, God, blind him, give him numerous children,[650] and expose him to tribulations that will make him take leave of his senses!" And indeed, (in the time that followed), Usāmah did become blind. Moreover, in the end he had [2607] ten daughters, having heard about a woman whom he went to seek out, until he felt his way toward her. Later, when people bumped into him, he would say, "(The state in which I am is the result of) an imprecation of Sa'd, that blessed man."

Then, in conformity with his imprecation, Sa'd addressed (al-Jarrāḥ's) hangers-on and said, "O God, if they have stepped out of line in brazen impertinence with false pretenses, mete out a severe punishment to them." And indeed, the afflictions that befell them were great: al-Jarrāḥ was cut down by sword blows on the day he pounced on al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī to kill him at Sābāṭ;[651] Qa-

650. A reference to one of man's most serious misfortunes, to have many children and little means, expressed in a saying later ascribed to the Prophet: jahd al-balā' kathrat al-'iyāl ma'a qillat al-shay'. See Juynboll, "The ḥadīṯ in the discussion on birth-control," in Actas IV Congresso de estudos árabes e islâmicos, Leiden, 1971, 373–9.

651. This event is described in more detail in Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Maqātil al-Ṭālibiyyīn, ed. Aḥmad Ṣaqr, Cairo, 1949, 64.

bīṣah (b. Ḍubay'ah al-'Absī) was stoned to death;[652] Arbad was killed as a result of emasculation and blows with sword scabbards. In addition, Sa'd said, "Remember that I was the first man to shed the blood of unbelievers.[653] The Messenger of God asked that both his parents be held ransom for me[654] and that was something he had never done for anyone before. At one time I saw that I comprised one-fifth of the adherents of Islam.[655] And now these yokels from Asad claim that I cannot perform the ṣalāt correctly and that I am solely concerned with hunting." Muḥammad (b. Maslamah) took Sa'd and those men from Asad with him back to 'Umar. When they had arrived at 'Umar's abode, Muḥammad reported to him, whereupon 'Umar said, "Woe unto you, Sa'd, how do you perform the ṣalāt?" "I take my time in performing the first two (rak'as)," Sa'd replied, "and I shorten the last [2608] two." "But that is merely your own private interpretation,"[656] 'Umar said and he went on, "Had it not been for their (lack of) circumspection (in their accusations), their line of action would have been clearly (justified)." Then he asked, "Sa'd, who is your deputy in al-Kūfah?" "'Abdallāh b. 'Abdallāb b. 'Itbān," Sa'd answered. 'Umar confirmed this appointment and nominated him as governor. The prelude to the battle of Nihāwand and the beginning of deliberations and missions concerned with it occurred during the time of Sa'd's governorship, as for the actual battle, that took place in the time of 'Abdallāh.

They said: What happened among other things was that the Persians responded to the letter of king Yazdajird and set out for 652. He was an associate of the Shī'ite agitator Ḥujr b. 'Adī (on him, see EI[2] s.v Ḥudjr (Lammens)). For more on Qabīsah, see Ṭabarī, II, 128–43.

---

653. This is a reference to an incident during which Sa'd is reported to have dealt someone from the (still unbelieving) Quraysh a blow when he and a group of early converts to Islam were harassed during their prayer ritual. See Abū Hilāl al-'Askarī, al-Awā'il, ed. M. al-Miṣrī and Walīd Qassāb, Damascus, 1975, I, 308.

654. This is a reference to an ancient custom. If someone is about to embark on a dangerous mission, well-wishers pray that a parent be held ransom in order to secure his safety. The Prophet is reported to have said when Sa'd was about to mix in the fray at Uhud, fidāka abī wa-ummī "may my father and mother be held ransom for your (safe return)," see Bukhārī, III, 81 Compare also l. 1 of the poem on p. 25 above.

655. He is even recorded as having considered himself one-third of the adherents to Islam, see Bukhārī, II, 439.

656. In other words: This is not the established norm according to which four rak'as should be performed.

Nihāwand. Thus, one after the other, there arrived those living in the territory between Khurāsān and Ḥulwān, those living in the territory between al-Bāb and Ḥulwān and those living in the territory between Sijistān and Ḥulwān. The cavalry of Fārs and of the Fahlūj, the inhabitants of al-Jibāl,[657] joined forces. Those hailing from the territory between Bāb (al-Abwāb) and Ḥulwān numbered thirty thousand troops, those hailing from the territory between Khurāsān and Ḥulwān numbered sixty thousand and those hailing from between Sijistān and Fārs and Ḥulwān numbered sixty thousand. They all assembled under the command of al-Fayruzān and they all set out to him, one after the other.

Mūsā—Ḥamzah b. al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah—Abū Ṭu'mah al-Thaqafī, who was a witness to these events, concurred with the last-mentioned transmitters: The Persians said to one another, "This man, Muḥammad, who has brought this religion to the Arabs, never wanted to undertake anything against us. Then, after his death, they were ruled by Abū Bakr, who did not undertake anything against the Persians either, except on one campaign during which he attacked them.[658] For the rest he concentrated on military maneuvers in that part of the Sawād bordering on Arab territory. Then, after Abū Bakr, the Arabs were ruled by 'Umar. His rule has lasted for some time and he has become so powerful that he could grapple with you and conquer the Sawād and al-Ahwāz little by little.[659] Now he has trampled these territories underfoot, but he will not be satisfied until he has attacked the people of Fārs and the monarchy in the very heart of their country. If you do not rush upon him now, he will certainly launch an offensive against you, after he has destroyed the seat of your monarchy and invaded the heartland of your royal family. The crisis will not be over until you have expelled the last of [2609] 'Umar's warriors from your country and razed their two gar-

657. I have not found another reference to them. But see Paul Schwarz, Iran im Mittelalter nach den arabischen Geographen, VII, Stuttgart-Berlin 1936, 829.

658. Probably a reference to the campaign led by Khālid b. al-Walīd, which resulted in the conquest of al-Ḥīrah, a city that had been under a Persian governor for some time. See *EI*², s.v. al-Ḥīra (Shahid). For the controversy about Khālid's mission to Iraq, see *EI*², s.v Khālid b. al-Walīd (Crone) risons.[660] After that you will have to keep 'Umar occupied with (defending) his own country and security."

659. This connotation for intaqasa is suggested in Lane, 2841, middle column, below.

Thereupon, the Persians concluded pacts and covenants among one another. They exchanged letters about this matter among themselves, pledging to help each other in this. News of this reached Sa'd who had just appointed 'Abdallāh b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Itbān as his deputy. Having left (al-Kūfah, he went to) meet 'Umar to tell him the news in person. Before that he had notified 'Umar by letter, in which he had said, "The people of al-Kūfah request your permission to spread out into enemy-held territory in order to attack the Persians first." In the past, 'Umar had forbidden the Muslims to invade al-Jabal. But also 'Abdallāh (b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Itbān) as well as other Muslim commanders had written to 'Umar to tell him that a Persian army force of fifty thousand fighters was being concentrated, arguing, "If they march on us before we have mounted an offensive against them first, they will increase in courage and strength. But if we forestall them, that will be to our advantage and to their disadvantage."

The messenger who carried this letter to 'Umar was named Qarīb b. Ẓafar al-'Abdī. After this messenger, Sa'd left al-Kūfah and set out for consultations with 'Umar. When the messenger had presented himself to 'Umar with the letter containing the news, and 'Umar had read it, he asked, "What is your name?" "Qarīb." "And who is your father?" "I am the son of Ẓafar," the messenger replied. 'Umar regarded this as a good omen, saying, "Victory is nigh,[661] if God wills it, for there is no power except in Him."

Then a congregational prayer meeting was announced among the people, who flocked together. Right at this moment, Sa'd presented himself to 'Umar, who saw a favorable omen in the fortuitous presence of Sa'd b. Mālik.[662] 'Umar climbed the pulpit to deliver a speech. He informed the congregation of the news and 660. A reference to al-Baṣrah and al-Kūfah.

661. A play on the messenger's name, ẓafar "victory" and qarīb "close at hand."

662. Unlike in the case of Qarīb b. Ẓafar, the supposedly good omen in Sa'd b. Mālik's name seems less obvious, but a yawm sa'd is a "lucky day" and mālik means "master," "possessor" as in Q. I, 4, where God is called mālik yawm al-dīn "the master of the Day of Reckoning."

asked the people's advice, saying, "Today is a day that will be [2610] decisive for the future,[663] but one thing is constantly on my mind. I will disclose this to you; therefore, listen to it, inform me of your views and be concise, '. . . and do not quarrel so that you lose heart and your vigor disappears.'[664] Do not use too many arguments and avoid longwindedness, lest you lose sight of your goal[665] and your suggestions turn out to work against you. Is there anyone who proposes that I should march out amidst my men and whomever else I succeed in persuading to follow me, until I have reached a position between our two garrison cities? Shall I call upon them to launch an offensive, while I am there to support them, until God grants them victory and carries out what He desires? If He grants them victory, I suggest that I order the Muslims to pursue the enemy far into his lands and to wrest their monarchy from him." Then 'Uthmān b. 'Affān, Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh, al-Zubayr b. al-'Awwām and 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf stood up among other Companions of the Messenger of God considered to be people of sound judgment, and they deliberated for a while. They said, "We do not think that (you yourself should set out on this campaign), but your authoritative opinion should not be withheld from the Muslim forces (sc. in Iraq)."

Several Arab chieftains, horse-owning knights and eminent leaders held the opposite view, as well as those whose associates had scattered, whose leaders had been killed and who had engaged in military activities even more extensive than the one (that lay ahead). They said, "They[666] have asked you leave to invade enemy territory without asking for your support. Give them your permission, send them your orders and pray for their well-being." The one who was critical of 'Umar's opinion, when he was asked to give his views, was al-'Abbās.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Ḥamzah (b. al-Mughīrah)—Abū Ṭu'mah: 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib stood up and said, "The people have arrived at the right decision, Commander of the [2611]

663. See n. 122 above.

664. Q. XLVIII, 46.

665. This rendering is suggested in Glossarium, p. CDIV, but is not recorded in the available dictionaries. Going by what is given there, one may translate "lest you are swamped by circumstances."

666. Presumably the Muslim fighters in al-Baṣrah and al-Kūfah.

Faithful, for they have insight into the circumstances you were informed about by letter. The outcome of this perilous situation will not be determined by victory because of superior numbers in one army or by defeat because of inferior numbers in the other army. No, the determining factors will be His religion, with which He prevails, and His army, which He has made powerful and which He has strengthened with His angels,[667] so that it may achieve its goal. For we can count on a promise from God. God will fulfill His promise and He will grant victory to His army. For them you are the string on which the beads of a necklace are threaded and held together. When the string is broken, all the beads on it will scatter and be lost, and they will never be gathered together again. Although few in number, today the Arabs are numerous and powerful through Islam. So stay (in Medina) and write to the people of al-Kūfah, for they comprise the most eminent leaders of the Arabs as well as those people who do not even pay attention to others who might have a more numerous following, better weapons[668] and greater application than they themselves. Let two-thirds of the people of al-Kūfah march on the Persians, with one-third staying behind. And write to the inhabitants of al-Baṣrah to reinforce those of al-Kūfah with some of their men."

'Umar was delighted with their sound advice and he expressed his admiration for them. Then Sa'd stood up and said, "There is no need to strike such a belligerent note, Commander of the Faithful, the people will march out because they want revenge."

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Abū Bakr al-Hudhalī: When 'Umar had told the people the news (sc. about the Persians concentrating their troops at Nihāwand), and had asked their advice, adding that they should avoid prolixity and not be long-winded lest they lose track of their objectives, he said, "Know that this is a day that will be decisive for the future.[669] Speak up."

---

667. This is probably a reference to the celestial hosts that descended from heaven to help the early Muslims in their struggle against the Meccans. See Juynboll, "Fighting angels," in Ohio Journal of Religious Studies, II/1 (1974):85–7.

668. This rendering is based on Lane's connotation (525, middle column, 6 lines from the bottom) dhawū ḥaddin "possessors of arms." In Glossarium, p. CLXXXIII, the connotation "élite troops" is suggested.

669. See n. 122 above.

Then Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh stood up. He was one of the major [2612]
public speakers from among the Companions of the Messenger of God. After he had uttered the formula of the unity of God he said, "Listen. You, Commander of the Faithful, have been fortified by circumstances and tested by tribulations. Your experience has rendered you sound in judgment. Do as you deem fit and proper. We will not withdraw from our obligations to you and we will never tire from serving you. With you rests the decision to be taken in this matter. So, if you give us your orders, we will obey them. If you call upon us, we will oblige. If you give us mounts,[670] we will ride them. Detail us and we will go, lead us and we will be led. For you are in charge of this matter, having been tested, tried and examined.[671] No outcome of God's decree has been revealed to you that was not favorable."

Ṭalḥah sat down. Then 'Umar returned to the pulpit and said, "Today is a day that will be decisive for the future. Speak your minds." After that, 'Uthmān b. 'Affān stood up and, having uttered the formula of God's unity, he said, "Commander of the Faithful, I propose that you write to the people in Syria. Let them march out from their territory. I also propose that you write to the people of Yemen to march out from theirs. Furthermore, I suggest that you, together with the people of these two holy cities,[672] march out in the direction of the two garrison cities, al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah, in order to confront the assembled unbelievers with all the Muslim forces. For if you march out with your allies as well as your (Ḥijāzi) followers, then the enemy's forces, although increasingly mobilized, will no longer pose so much of a problem to you. You will be more powerful and numerous, Commander of the Faithful. After the tribal warriors have given their utmost, you will not leave the least bit of your energy unused. You are not the man to carry the goods of this world away for yourself, nor the man to seek refuge from it in a shelter. Today is a day that will be decisive for the future. Be present at this crucial day with your [2613] good counsel and your allies, and do not absent yourself from it."

670. Literally, the text reads "if you carry us, we will ride." My rendering is suggested by Lane, 647, left column, lines 4 ff.

671. Instead of the active verbs of the text, I opt for the passives suggested in the apparatus.

672. That is, Medina and Mecca.

At this 'Uthmān sat down. 'Umar returned to the pulpit and said, "Today is a day that will be decisive for the future. Speak your minds." Then 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib stood up and said,

"Listen. If you order the people of Syria to leave their country, Commander of the Faithful, then the Byzantines will pounce on their offspring, and if you order the people of Yemen to leave theirs, the Ethiopians will pounce on their offspring. And if you depart from this land, rebellions may break out against your authority from all sides and regions to the point that what you left behind, namely your wives and children, may become more important to you than what lies ahead of you. Let those tribesmen stay in their garrison cities, and write to the people of al-Baṣrah ordering them to divide themselves into three groups—one to remain behind to protect the women and children, another to remain behind to keep an eye on the conquered people who have treaties with the Muslims, lest they rebel against them, and the third to march out to their brethren in al-Kūfah as reinforcements for the latter. If the Persians lay eyes on you some day in the near future, they will say, 'This is the Commander of the Arabs on whom the whole nation of the Arabs depends,' and that will only increase their desire to defeat you. Thus you will have incited them against you. You also mentioned that the enemy has mobilized; God abhors that even more than you do, and He is more powerful to alter a situation He abhors. And as for the consideration you mentioned—that the enemy is (so) numerous—in the past we never had superior forces, but we fought assured of divine support."

"Yes, indeed," 'Umar exclaimed, "by God, if I leave this land, the whole area may start a rebellion against me from all quarters [2614] and regions. If the Persians see me in person, they will certainly not leave the battleground (of Nihāwand) and they will surely be reinforced by those who have never given them help (in the past). They will say to their forces, 'This is the man on whom the Arabs depend; if you cut him down, you will have severed the spine of the Arab nation.' Advise me, what man shall I entrust with handling the situation in that border region in the days to come?"

The people answered, "You yourself have better ideas and are more competent to decide." But 'Umar went on, "Give me some name and let it be someone presently in Iraq." They answered "Commander of the Faithful, you know the people in Iraq and the warriors in your army better than we. They have sent you a delegation; you have seen them and spoken with them." "By God," 'Umar said, "I shall certainly place the command over them in the hands of a man who will surely face the first of their spears when he confronts the enemy in a few days' time." "Whom do you have in mind, Commander of the Faithful?" he was asked. "Al-Nu'mān b. Muqarrin al-Muzanī," he answered, whereupon they said, "He will be the man to face them."

At that time al-Nu'mān was in al-Baṣrah, surrounded by several army commanders from the people of al-Kūfah, with whom 'Umar had reinforced the people of al-Baṣrah at the time of the insurrection of al-Hurmuzān. They conquered Rāmhurmuz and Īdhaj and helped them against Tustar, Jundaysābūr and al-Sūs. Through Zirr (b. 'Abdallāh) b. Kulayb and al-Muqtarib al-Aswad b. Rabī'ah, 'Umar sent a letter to al-Nu'mān with the news of his appointment: "I have given you the command to fight the enemy. So march out immediately and go on as far as Māh.[673] In the meantime, I have written to the people of al-Kūfah to join you there. When all your troops have assembled under your command, advance on al-Fayruzān and all those people from Fārs and the others who joined him. Pray God to grant you victory, and frequently repeat the words[674] 'There is no power or strength except in God.'"

As to 'Umar's motive for sending al-Nu'mān b. Muqarrin to [2615]
Nihāwand, according to Muḥammad b. 'Ubaydallāh b. Ṣafwān al-Thaqafī—Umayyah b. Khālid—Abū 'Awānah—Ḥusayn b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān—Abū Wā'il: While al-Nu'mān was governor over Kaskar,[675] he wrote to 'Umar, "The way I feel here in Kaskar is like a young, vigorous man who is beside a prostitute who has put on make-up for him and has perfumed herself. I swear to you by God

673. That is Nihāwand. Māh is the Persian word for chief city, Arabic qaṣbah. Because it paid its tribute after the conquest in particular to al-Baṣrah, Nihāwand was called Māh al-Baṣrah. In the same manner Dīnawar was called Māh al-Kūfah. See n. 15 above, and Le Strange, Lands, 196 f.

674. A common expression, probably based on Q. 18, 39.

675. See n. 617 above.

that when you have relieved me of my function in Kaskar and have sent me to one of the armies of the Muslims (I shall perform great feats!)"

He said: Then 'Umar wrote to him (saying), "Join the troops at Nihāwand, for you will be their commander."

He said: The armies came face-to-face, and al-Nu'mān was the first to be killed. His brother, Suwayd b. Muqarrin, took the flag (that al-Nu'mān had dropped). Then God granted the Muslims victory, and they, that is the Persians, never assembled a host like that again. Henceforth, the inhabitants of every garrison city launched campaigns against their enemies in the countryside near their cities.

The Account Is Resumed Once More by Sayf

Through Rib'ī b. 'Āmir, 'Umar wrote to 'Abdallāh b. 'Abdallāh (b. 'Itbān), "Call up so-and-so many men from al-Kūfah to accompany al-Nu'mān. I have written to him ordering him to go from al-Ahwāz to Māh, and these troops are to join him there. He is to march with them to Nihāwand. I have appointed Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān as their commander until he meets up with al-Nu'mān b. Muqarrin. In the meantime, I have written to al-Nu'mān, 'If something happens to you, Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān is to take charge of the troops, and if something happens to Ḥudhayfah, then Nu'aym b. Muqarrin is to be the new commander.'"

[2616] 'Umar sent Qarīb b. Ẓafar back (to Iraq), accompanied by al-Sā'ib b. al-Aqra' as 'Umar's confidential agent. To the latter he said, "If God grants you victory, you must divide the booty that God has made available to them in equal shares among the troops, and do not swindle me out of what is due to me[676] by setting aside worthless goods for me. And if our warriors suffer a disastrous defeat, you and I will never see each other again."

The two emissaries arrived in al-Kūfah carrying 'Umar's letter with his marching orders. Among the people of al-Kūfah, the quickest to respond were the 'newcomers',[677] who were eager to have their faith tested and to be given a share in the booty.

---

676. That is, the fifth part

677. See n. 253 above for an explanation of the term rawādif.

Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān left with the troops accompanied by Nu'aym. After a while they joined al-Nu'mān at al-Ṭazar, and they concentrated the cavalry at Marj al-Qal'ah[678] under the command of al-Nusayr (b. Thawr al-'Ijlī).[679] To Sulmā b. al-Qayn, Ḥarmalah b. Murayṭah, Zirr (b. 'Abdallāh) b. Kulayb, al-Muqtarib al-Aswad b. Rabī'ah and the Persian commanders, who had settled in the region between Fārs and al-Ahwāz,[680] 'Umar had written a letter saying, "Prevent the Persians from bothering your brethren and, for that purpose, protect your manpower and your land from all sides. Furthermore, stay at the borders of the area between Fārs and al-Ahwāz, until new orders from me reach you."

Then 'Umar sent Mujāshi' b. Mas'ūd al-Sulamī[681] to al-Ahwāz and said to him, "Withdraw from there in the direction of Māh." So off he went. Some time later, when he was near Ghuḍā Shajar,[682] al-Nu'mān ordered him to stay where he was. Thus Mujāshi' made camp between Ghuḍā Shajar and Marj al-Qal'ah. Sulmā, Ḥarmalah, Zirr and al-Muqtarib went forth, ending up at the district borders of Iṣbahān and Fārs, thereby blocking the access routes to be taken by reinforcements from Fārs intended for the enemy at Nihāwand. When the Kūfan troops joined al-Nu'mān at al-Ṭazar, a letter from 'Umar, delivered by Qarīb, reached him, that read, "In your army you have the best fighters from the tribes as well as their heroes of long standing.[683] Let them see action rather than those whose experience of warfare is less extensive. Ask for their support and follow their good counsel. Ask advice also from Ṭulayḥah, 'Amr and 'Amr,[684] but do not give them any [2617]

678. Al-Ṭazar and Marj al-Qal'ah were two localities in al-Jibāl, see Le Strange, Lands, 191 f., Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 537, IV, 488.

679. According to De Goeje's index, he may be identified with the man mentioned in n. 214 above.

680. Presumably they are the leaders of Persian deserters, such as the Hamrā' and the Asāwirah.

681. A colorful figure whose military career is described in Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, V, 767 f.

682. A locality between al-Ahwāz and Marj al-Qal'ah, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam III, 804

683. Literally "in the Jāhiliyyah."

684. For their full names, see a little further down. Two of these were mentioned above in n. 93 as erstwhile leaders in the riddah wars; one 'Amr, the son of Abū Sulmā, seems a less well-known person.

commanding function." Thereupon al-Nu'mān sent Ṭulayḥah and the two 'Amrs ahead on patrol so that they might furnish him with military intelligence, and he ordered[685] them not to penetrate too deeply into enemy territory. So Ṭulayḥah b. Khuwaylid, 'Amr b. Abī Sulmā al-'Anazī and 'Amr b. Ma'di Karib al-Zubaydī left. When they had been gone for a day and the evening was nigh, 'Amr b. Abī Sulmā returned. "What caused you to turn back so soon?" he was asked. "I was in the land of the enemy," he replied. "A country can kill someone who does not know it, whereas someone who does know a certain country will not die crossing it."[686]

Meanwhile, Ṭulayḥah and (the other) 'Amr pressed on until, by the end of the night, the latter came back too. "What made you return so soon?" people asked him, whereupon 'Amr replied, "We had been gone for a day and a night without spotting anything suspicious, and I began to have fears that the route we had taken would be seized by the enemy."

Ṭulayḥah pressed forward, not paying attention to the other two (and stayed away so long that) the people said to one another, "Maybe he has turned his back on Islam again."[687] So Ṭulayḥah forged ahead, until he finally reached Nihāwand. From al-Ṭazar to Nihāwand is a distance of more than twenty parasangs.[688] He learned the whereabouts of the enemy and gathered intelligence;
[2618] then he himself returned. When he finally came in sight, approaching the Muslim army, the people shouted, "God is great." When he asked them what the commotion was about, they told him about their anxiety for him, but he said, "By God, were religion nothing more than being Arab, I would not be inclined to let these barbarous Persians be slaughtered by us noble Arabs."[689]

Then al-Nu'mān came and sat down with Ṭulayḥah, who told 685. For this connotation of taqaddama, see Lane, 2985, right column.

686. Literally, "whereas someone who does know a certain country can kill it." 'Amr's explanation is couched in two short proverbs. My rendition is based upon an analysis of both proverbs in G. W. Freytag (ed.), Arabum proverbia, Bonn 1838–43, II, 271; the reference is Prym's.

687. Literally, "he has apostatized a second time," a reference to his alleged role in the riddah wars.

688. Twenty parasangs equal sixty miles; see Lane, 2369, left column, where other numbers are also given.

689. Rendition tentative. Is Ṭulayḥah here at his most cynical?

him everything that had happened and informed him that, between the spot in which they were and Nihāwand, there was nothing that might cause him alarm, in fact there was not a soul. Thereupon al-Nu'mān issued the order to saddle the animals, and he told the men to line up. To Mujāshi' b. Mas'ūd he sent word that he was to take charge of the rearguard.[690] Al-Nu'mān marched at the head of his formations, his brother Nu'aym leading the vanguard, his brother Suwayd and Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān leading the wings, with al-Qa'qā' b. 'Amr in command of the cavalry[691] and Mujāshi' commanding the rear. In the meantime, reinforcements from al-Madīnah had joined al-Nu'mān. Among these were al-Mughīrah (b. Shu'bah) and 'Abdallāh (b. 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb). They ended up at al-Isbīdhahān.[692]

The enemy was stationed in their formations on this side of Wāya Khurd[693] under the command of al-Fayruzān, with al-Zarduq and Bahman Jādhawayh, who had been appointed in the place of Dhū al-Ḥājib, commanding the wings. They had been joined at Nihāwand by everyone from the border regions, including princes and several nobles, who had not participated in the battle of al-Qādisiyyah or in those battles immediately preceding it. In all, they were no less in number[694] than those who had been present at the battles preceding al-Qādisiyyah, that of al-Qādisiyyah and its aftermath.[695] In command of the Persian cavalry was Anūshaq. [2619]

When al-Nu'mān spotted the enemy, he shouted, "God is great." This was repeated by the men who were with him, something that greatly upset the Persians. Halting his mount, al-Nu'mān ordered that the luggage be unloaded and that the tent[696]

690. Or, conceivably, "to urge the men on from the rear."

691. This word is problematic. De Goeje suggests (Glossarium, p. CLXII) "contingent of cavalry." In his partial translation of Ṭabarī, Kosegarten, 257, seems to have opted for "lightly armed footsoldiers" (Latin velites). See Lane, s.v. jarīdah, but also s.v. mujarrad. Below, on pp. 205–6, the context seems to suggest that horses are involved.

692. A locality near Nihāwand; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 239.

693. According to Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 896, a riverbed near Nihāwand. On p. 209 below it is described as a ravine.

694. Or, conceivably, "more numerous," the preposition dūna used here being a didd, admitting of two opposite connotations "more than" and "less than."

695. See n. 114 above.

696. Presumably the one from which the battle is directed.

be pitched. So while al-Nu'mān waited there, his tent was set up. The nobles from al-Kūfah hurried to him to pitch a tent for him, racing each other to get there first. Arriving ahead of their peers were the following fourteen persons: Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān, 'Uqbah b. 'Amr, al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah, Bashīr b. al-Khaṣṣāṣiyyah, Ḥanẓalah b. al-Rabī' the secretary, Ibn al-Ḥawbar, Rib'ī b. 'Āmir, 'Āmir b. Maṭar, Jarīr b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḥimyarī, al-Aqra' b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḥimyarī, Jarīr b. 'Abdallāh al-Bajalī, al-Ash'ath b. Qays al-Kindī, Sa'īd b. Qays al-Hamdānī and Wā'il b. Ḥujr. Never before had Iraq witnessed such illustrious people setting up a tent (together).

After the luggage had been unloaded, al-Nu'mān announced that fighting was to begin. They fought for two days, the Wednesday and the Thursday, both armies scoring alternate successes. This took place when seven years of 'Umar's reign had elapsed, in the year 19 (640). On Friday, the Persians took refuge in their [2620] trenches with the Muslims encircling them. They launched a fair number of attacks against them, but the Persians fared well, only leaving their trenches when they wanted. This exasperated the Muslims, who feared that the struggle might turn into a lengthy one. Finally, one Friday,[697] the wise men among the Muslims assembled and talked things over, saying, "We see that the enemy is faring well against us." So they raised the matter with al-Nu'mān and told him their views; then they confronted him (with their point of view,[698]) while he pondered over the very same matter. Finally, he said, "Take it easy; do not leave your position." Then al-Nu'mān sent for the remaining people of steadfastness[699] and strategic acumen, whereupon they made their way to him. He addressed them as follows,

---

697. Literally, it says "one day on a Friday of Fridays." This seems to suggest that, after the skirmishes of Wednesday and Thursday mentioned above, the two armies spent one week or more facing each other. Assuming that jum'ah is here used in the sense of "congregation," usually jamā'ah in Arabic, we may translate "one day at one of the prayer meetings." This solution seems to make more sense, while jum'ah in the sense of jamā'ah is listed in Lane, 457, middle column, supra.

698. The reading is dubious. The Arabic verb used here is wāfaqa, which usually means "to agree with." This does not seem to suit the present context at all, however, and that is why I have opted for a connotation suggested in Lane, 3057, middle column, line 5 (ṣādafa "to encounter someone").

699. See n. 47 above.

"You probably witnessed how the unbelievers sought refuge in their fortified trenches and settlements.[700] They do not make sorties unless they feel like it, while the Muslims are unable to stir or incite them to battle unless the Persians let them (do so). You may have also seen how exasperated[701] the Muslims are as a result of the situation in which they find themselves, and how successful the enemy is in that same situation when they make sallies. What is the proper strategy for us to stir them up and lure them into an open confrontation and make them abandon their shilly-shallying?"

The first to speak was 'Amr b. Thubayy.[702] He was at that time the oldest warrior among them, since they only rose to speak in order of seniority. He said, "Their being entrenched is harder for them to bear than the delay of getting to grips with them is for you. Let them be. Do not exert pressure on them to come forth and vie with them in pertinacity. Fight only with those enemies [2621] who attack you."

But all of those assembled rejected this proposal, saying, "We are certain that our Lord will keep His promise to us." Then 'Amr b. Ma'dī Karib rose to speak and said, "Attack them, try to defeat them and do not fear them." But again, all the others rejected this suggestion, saying, "All you want us to do is to run with our heads against their walls, but these walls are their friends in need against us."

Then Ṭulayḥah began to speak and said, "Those two have said what they think, but what they suggest is not appropriate. As for me, I think that you should send forth armed horsemen to surround the enemy and shoot at them, feigning to open hostilities and thus inciting them to battle. When the enemy is provoked in this way and they are about to leave their trenches in order to engage our horsemen, these must retreat in simulated flight[703] back to our position. All the time that we have been doing battle 700. The Arabic has madā'in "cities," but that seems too grand a rendering in the present context.

701. Or "how constrained they are in their movements."

702. This man is identified by De Goeje with 'Amr b. Abī Sulmā mentioned above on p. 2617.

703. In Arabic, istiṭrād, see Lane, 1839, left column, below, for a detailed description of this ancient Arab stratagem.

with them, we have never made use of this stratagem against them. Therefore, if we resort to it now and they see us behaving like this, they may develop the ambition to inflict a crushing defeat upon us and they will not have second thoughts. They will leave their trenches and fight with us, whereupon we will (turn around and) fight them, until God decides between them and us as He likes."

Then al-Nu'mān ordered al-Qa'qā' b. 'Amr, the commander of the cavalry,[704] (to do as Ṭulayḥah suggested). Al-Qa'qā' obeyed. At first the Arab cavalry kept themselves at a distance from the Persians, but then they suddenly rushed upon them as if to open hostilities, while gibing[705] at them. When the enemy was about to leave the trenches, al-Qa'qā' withdrew little by little, whereupon, expecting to acquire booty, the Persians did exactly as [2622] Ṭulayḥah had thought they would. Shouting, "Hurry up, get a move on!" they rushed forth from their trenches. No one stayed behind except those who stood guard for them at the gates. They followed the Arabs closely, until al-Qa'qā' had retreated to the Muslim army, in doing so, partly cutting off the Persians from their prepared positions.

Meanwhile, al-Nu'mān b. Muqarrin and the Muslim warriors were drawn up in battle array on that particular Friday.[706] It was still morning. Al-Nu'mān had issued orders to his men to the effect that they were to remain where they were and not to fight the enemy until he gave permission to do so. Accordingly, they stayed put, hiding behind their shields against the enemy's arrows. The unbelievers advanced upon them, shooting at them and causing many Arabs to sustain injuries. The Arabs complained to one another about this and said to al-Nu'mān, "Do you not see that we are in a spot? Do you not see what they have to endure from the enemy? What are you waiting for? Give our warriors permission to engage the enemy in combat."

"Take it easy, take it easy," al-Nu'mān replied, thus soliciting the same complaint from his men several times and each time calming them down with the same words. Then al-Mughīrah

704. See n. 690 above
705. By making a clicking noise with their tongues.
706. I prefer the reading al-jum'ah in Co.

said, "Had I been in command here, I know exactly what I would have done." But again al-Nu'mān answered, "Easy does it—mind your own business! In the past, when you were in command, you did a good job. But God will not forsake us, nor you for that matter. We expect the same result from staying put as you do from rushing forth." So al-Nu'mān started to postpone doing battle, until that particular hour of the day had arrived in which the Messenger of God preferred facing the enemy in battle, to wit when the sun has begun its decline, shadows lengthen, and breezes start to blow.[707] [2623]

When this hour had almost come, al-Nu'mān stood up and rode through the army, seated on a dark brown, short-legged hack. He stopped at every banner and, after praising and extolling God, he said:

"You know how far God has honored you with this religion and what victory He has promised you. So far He has realized the neck and the chest of His promise; only the rump and the hind legs remain to be fulfilled.[708] But God will realize His promise and He will make sure that the final stage thereof will follow its initial stage. Remember what has happened, how weak you were, and how much you have achieved in this situation now that you are powerful. At present you are the veritable servants and protégés of God. You know that you are cut off from your brethren in al-Kūfah; you know well how they will benefit if you are granted a glorious victory and what a difficult task awaits them if you are defeated and disgraced. You may have seen what enemies you are facing. You may be aware of your exertions against them and theirs against you. As for what they stake, that is these paltry chattels and the land you see around you, but what is at stake for you is your religion and your nobility.[709] There is no comparison between what you and they put at stake. Surely there is no one who protects his worldly goods as zealously as you protect your religion. The most God-fearing person is he who believes in God, puts himself to the test and does so wholeheartedly. You have two excellent choices, anticipating either one of two beneficial [2624]

707. All these seem to point to approximately 5 p.m.
708. The imagery is derived from the horse.
709. The word bayḍah also admits of the interpretation "territory."

courses: everlasting martyrdom in which you will be well provided, or a quick conquest and easy victory.

Every man is to look to the adversary in front of him," he went on, "nobody may leave the grappling with his opponent to his brother, so that the latter is suddenly faced by his brother's adversary as well as his own, for that is ignominious. Even a dog sometimes fights in defense of its mate. Therefore, every one of you is held responsible for the adversary facing him. When I have finished issuing my marching orders, get ready. I shall shout three times 'God is great!' When I shout it the first time, let anyone who is not yet ready get ready. After I have shouted it a second time, everybody is to gird himself with his sword and get himself prepared to rush forward, and after the third time, I shall attack,[710] if God wills it. Then you must attack with me. O God, honor Your religion and grant Your servants victory! Make al-Nu'mān the first martyr today, so that You may strengthen Your religion and ensure victory for Your servants!"

When al-Nu'mān had finished doing his rounds among the fighters in their respective positions, and had issued his marching orders to them, he returned to his former position and shouted "God is great!" three successive times, whereupon the troops listened, obeyed and got ready to rush forward, some of them (in their haste) brushing aside others from their path. Al-Nu'mān charged and so did the troops. The flag that al-Nu'mān was hold-
[2625] ing swooped down upon the enemy like an eagle.[711] al-Nu'mān himself was recognizable by his white cloak and bonnet.[712]

The armies fought a tremendous battle with their swords, causing such a clamor that those who heard it had never heard in any battle a din louder than this. In the period between late afternoon and early darkness, they killed so many Persians in this battle that the battlefield was inundated in blood and warriors and animals lost their footing in it. Several Muslim horsemen lost their lives in this way, having slipped in the blood. So too the horse of 710. Or, conceivably, "I shall carry (the banner) forward." Compare n. 622 above.

711. Compare the report in which the Prophet is said to have had a flag called al-'uqāb "the eagle", see Juynboll, "The Qur'ān reciter on the battlefield and concomitant issues," in ZDMG, CXXV (1975):26.

712. For the topos of distinctive clothing worn during battle, see also the paper mentioned in n. 667 above.

al-Nu'mān stumbled and threw off his rider. Thus al-Nu'mān was killed when his horse lost its footing and he was flung down. Nu'aym b. Muqarrin took hold of the flag before it fell down, and he covered al-Nu'mān in a garment. Then he brought the flag to Ḥudhayfah and gave it to him. The banner was already with Ḥudhayfah. He made Nu'aym b. Muqarrin take his place and he himself took up the position previously occupied by al-Nu'mān. Then he stuck the banner in the ground. Al-Mughīrah suggested to him, "You must hide the fact that your commander has fallen so that we will see what decision God will take between us and the enemy, lest our forces lose heart."

They fought until the night cast its shadow over the warriors, and the infidels took to their heels. They ran away, with the Muslims constantly harassing them and pursuing them. In the end the enemy forces lost their sense of direction in the dark, so they abandoned that course and directed their steps toward the ravine in which they had made their camp at Isbīdhahān. They fell into this ravine, and nobody tumbled down into it without shouting "wāyah khurd." That is why to this day this ravine is called Wāyah Khurd.[713]

In that place, one hundred thousand enemy warriors, or even more, lost their lives, in addition to those who were killed on the battlefield, who were also very numerous. Nobody escaped except a few stragglers. Amidst the slain on the battlefield, al-Fayruzān found a way to safety. Amidst those stragglers he fled in the direction of Hamadhān. Nu'aym b. Muqarrin pursued him and sent al-Qa'qā' to head him off. Finally, just as al-Fayruzān arrived at the mountain road to Hamadhān, al-Qa'qā' overtook him. This road was chock-full of mules and donkeys loaded with honey, so the animals prevented him from escaping his death. In that mountain pass Al-Qa'qā' killed al-Fayruzān after he had duly defended himself.[714] Hence the Muslims have a saying, "God recruits soldiers even from honey."[715] The Muslims led away the [2626]

713. None of the experts I consulted is sure what the name might mean; Prym pointed out that wāyah may mean "woe"; this is supported by D. N. MacKenzie (Göttingen). "Woe has consumed (us)" may then be a tentative interpretation.

714. For this interpretation of imtana'a, see Lane, 3024, right column, in form V.

715. Prym gives a reference to the proverb listed in Freytag (ed.), Arabum proverbia, I, 10: inna li 'llāhi junūdan minhā 'l-'asalu "God has soldiers, honey is one of them."

animals laden with the honey and all the other goods they carried besides, and marched on. That is why that mountain road is called the Honey Pass. When al-Qa'qā' closed in on al-Fayruzān, the latter dismounted and clambered away in the mountains, since he could not find a passage to ride through them. Al-Qa'qā' clambered after him, pursuing him until he caught him.

With the Muslim cavalry hot on their heels, the vanquished Persian warriors ran on until they arrived at the city of Hamadhān.[716] They entered the city. The Muslims descended upon them and laid a cordon around the city and its immediate vicinity. When Khusrawshunūm[717] saw this, he sought to obtain immunity from the Muslims and he accepted their preconditions, namely that he would surrender to them Hamadhān and Dastabā,[718] and that the Muslims would not be attacked by Persians living in that area. The Muslims accepted the Persians' guarantees and granted them immunity. So the Persians were safe and everyone who had run away returned.

After the defeat of the unbelievers at the battle of Nihāwand, the Muslims entered the city itself and laid a cordon around it and [2627] its immediate vicinity. They collected the enemy's armor and chattels, and handed them to the overseer of the spoils, al-Sā'ib b. al-Aqra'. While the Muslims were thus engaged, operating from their camp and waiting for those of their brethren who were at Hamadhān to make their way to them, the Hirbadh, that is the overseer of the fire temple,[719] came forward seeking immunity. Ḥudhayfah was notified of his arrival (and received him). The hirbadh said, "Will you grant me immunity provided that I tell you what I know?" "All right," Ḥudhayfah replied. Then the hirbadh said, "Al-Nakhīrajān has deposited in my care a treasure of the king. I will produce it on the condition that I, as well as those people I shall name, will be granted immunity." When Ḥudhayfah had given him this guarantee, the hirbadh brought

716. One of the main cities of al-Jibāl lying about forty miles (sixty-four kilometers) north of Nihāwand; see Le Strange, Lands, 194 ff.

717. He was a Persian general whom we encountered as the one left in charge of Ḥulwān after the king had vacated that city.

718. A city northeast of Hamadhān, see Le Strange, Lands, the map opposite 185.

719. For more details on this functionary, see Morony, Iraq, 284 f.

him the royal treasure consisting of gems that the king held in readiness for the deputies of his reign.[720] The Muslims looked into this matter and agreed with one another that they should submit this treasure to 'Umar, so they kept it apart and delayed sending it off, until they had finished amassing all the booty. Then, finally, they sent it away together with the fifths[721] that were due.

Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān distributed shares in the booty equally among his men, the share of a mounted warrior at Nihāwand being six thousand dirhams and that of a footsoldier two thousand. Before that, Ḥudhayfah had handed out free shares[722] from the fifths among those fighters "of tested strength,"[723] who had participated in the battle of Nihāwand and whom he had selected himself. All that remained from the fifths he handed over to al-Sā'ib b. al-Aqra'. Al-Sā'ib took possession of it and departed with it, as well as with the royal treasure, to 'Umar.

After he had written about the victory at Nihāwand to 'Umar, Ḥudhayfah stayed there and waited for 'Umar's reply and orders. His messenger carrying the news of the victory was Ṭarīf b. Sahm, the brother of the Banū Rabī'ah b. Mālik.

When the news had reached the people in charge of Māh (al-Baṣrah) and Māh (al-Kūfah)[724] that Hamadhān had been taken and that Nu'aym b. Muqarrin and al-Qa'qā' b. 'Amr had made camp there, they followed Khusrawshunūm's example and corresponded with Ḥudhayfah, who reacted positively to what they were asking. They agreed on accepting Ḥudhayfah's invitation and set out to meet him. But they were deceived by one of them, a man called Dīnār. He was a king[725] (in his own right) but of lesser nobility than the others, all of them being more exalted in status than he, with Qārin[726] the noblest of them all. Dīnār had said to them, "Do not present yourselves to these Arabs in full regalia, [2628]

720. In Arabic, nawā'ib al-zamān. I base my rendering on Lane, 1254, middle column, lines 1–3, and Steingass, A comprehensive Persian-English dictionary (London 1957), 621, left column, above.

721. See nn. 88, 117 above.

722. See nn. 88, 94 above.

723. In Arabic ahl al-balā'; see n. 94 above.

724. Two regional centers, see Le Strange, Lands, 189, 197, and n. 15 above.

725. See Morony, Iraq, 186, for this use of the title "king."

726. See loc. cit., where the noble Persian family of Qārēn is mentioned.

but assume a shabby appearance when you confront them." So they did, but Dīnār acted otherwise; he approached the Arabs dressed up in brocaded garments and jewelry. He paid the Muslims the necessary respect,[727] bringing them presents that they appreciated. So the Muslims concluded a treaty with him while disregarding his (fellow aristocrats, the outcome of this being that) the latter saw no other way than to yield to Dīnār and to accept his authority. That is why Nihāwand came to be called Māh Dīnār.[728]

Ḥudhayfah went by Māh Dīnār. Some time earlier, al-Nuʿmān had concluded a pact with Bahrādhān based on the same conditions as mentioned above. Hence this pact was associated with Bahrādhān. Ḥudhayfah charged al-Nusayr b. Thawr with the taking of a citadel to which a number of people had sought refuge. Al-Nusayr engaged these people in battle and conquered the citadel, which was henceforth associated with him.

In his distribution of the booty of Nihāwand Ḥudhayfah included those left behind in Marj al-Qalʿah and those who were still in Ghuḍā Shajar, as well as the forces occupying the strong points, in the same manner as he had distributed it among those who had participated in the actual battle. This was because the aforementioned three categories of warriors could have been called upon as reinforcements for the Muslims fighting in the battle, so that they would not be attacked from one (unforeseen) direction or another.

In that same night, which was destined for the encounter of the Muslims (and their adversaries at Nihāwand), ʿUmar was restless, [2629] so he left his house to seek further news. In the meantime, a certain Muslim, who had gone out to attend to some business of his and had returned to the city in the dark, was overtaken by a rider, who himself was on his way to Medina. (This was) in the course of the third night after the battle of Nihāwand. The man asked him, "Hey, ʿAbdallāh, where have you come from?" "From Nihāwand," the other answered. "What is the latest news?" the first man asked. "The news is good," the other replied, "God has

727. The text seems corrupt and my rendition is tentative.

728. Literally, "the district of Dīnār." For the exact meaning of the Middle Persian word māh, see also Le Strange, Lands, 190 n.

granted al-Nu'mān victory and a martyr's death. The Muslims have divided the booty of Nihāwand among themselves, each mounted warrior receiving six thousand dirhams." The rider accompanied the man until he was swallowed up in the dark in Medina. The first man entered his house and slept. The following morning he started telling this story. The news spread around until it reached 'Umar, who was as restless as ever. He sent for the man and questioned him, whereupon the other gave him the news. 'Umar said, "That traveler spoke the truth, and so have you. This was 'Uthaym, the messenger of the jinn; he must have seen the messenger sent by the people at Nihāwand."

Then, somewhat later, Ṭarīf (b. Sahm) came to 'Umar with the news of the victory. 'Umar said, "Give me all the news." The man replied, "I have no more information than just the news of the victory. When I left, the Muslims were busily pursuing the enemy and still on full alert." But from 'Umar he hid everything except that which might please him. After that, 'Umar went out accompanied by his companions. 'Umar insisted on receiving more news. Then a rider was pointed out to him. He said to his companions, "Tell me who he is." Then 'Uthmān b. 'Affān said, "He is al-Sā'ib (b. al-Aqra')," so 'Umar exclaimed, "Al-Sā'ib?" When al-Sā'ib had come closer, 'Umar asked him, "What happened to you?" "I have glad tidings for you and news of victory," al-Sā'ib replied. "How did al-Nu'mān fare?" 'Umar wanted to know. "His horse stumbled in the blood of the enemies," al-Sā'ib replied, "so he was thrown down and died a martyr's death." 'Umar went home accompanied by al-Sā'ib. He asked him about the number of Muslims who got killed, so al-Sā'ib told him their number—which was small—and also that al-Nu'mān was the first to die a martyr's death on the "day of the victory of victories." That is how the men of al-Kūfah and the Muslims referred to that day.[729]

As 'Umar was entering the mosque, the loads were being taken off (the camels of al-Sā'ib) and deposited in the mosque. 'Umar [2630] ordered some of his companions, among whom were 'Abd al-

729. In Ibn al-Athīr, III, 12, we read that the battle of Nihāwand was so called because, after that, the Persians never succeeded in mobilizing such an army again and the Muslims remained in control of their land. Noth, 118, identifies the expression as a topos.

Raḥmān b. ʿAwf and ʿAbdallāh b. Arqam, to spend the night in the mosque guarding these loads. He himself entered his house followed by al-Sāʾib b. al-Aqraʿ with these two baskets.[730] The latter gave him the news concerning the two baskets and information about the Muslim warriors. "Son of Mulaykah," ʿUmar said, "by God, the warriors did not know about these baskets and you are no longer there with them to tell them about them. Quickly, go back where you came from. Go to Ḥudhayfah and let him dole out the contents of these baskets in equal shares among those to whom God has granted them as booty." So al-Sāʾib went back again and journeyed until he came to Ḥudhayfah at Māh, where he offered the baskets for sale. In due course he sold them and received four million dirhams for them.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad b. Qays al-Asadī: While they were encamped at Nihāwand, a man called Jaʿfar b. Rāshid said to Ṭulayḥah, "We suffer from lack of supplies. Do you know one more of those wonderful jingles, which might be of use to us?" "Stay where you are," Tulayḥah answered, "I will see what I can do." He took a garment, wrapped himself loosely in it[731] and declaimed,

By far the best news
    Is the dihqān's ewes
(They roam) in a meadow
    Dispelling our sorrow.

[2631] When they entered the enclosure, they found the sheep to be well fed.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Abū Maʿbad al-ʿAbsī and ʿUrwah b. al-Walīd—someone from their tribe: On a certain day, while we were laying siege to the enemy in Nihāwand, they made a sortie against us. They engaged us in close combat and we did not have to wait long before God put them to flight. Simāk b. ʿUbayd al-ʿAbsī pursued one of the enemies who was escorted by eight horsemen. Simāk challenged them to fight him and whoever accepted the challenge was killed. Then Simāk advanced on them, he attacked the man whom the others were escorting and took him prisoner. He divested him of his weapons and called for someone called 'Abd to guard him. When Simāk had entrusted him to 'Abd, the prisoner spoke, "Bring me to your commander to conclude a peace treaty with him in respect of this region and to pay him the jizyah. And you yourself may ask your prisoner[732] for whatever you want, for you have been merciful toward me by not killing me. From now on I shall be your servant. If you present me to your king and bring us together, you will find me grateful and you will be like a brother to me."

730. See p. 183 above.

731. A reference to Ṭulayḥah's former status as a kāhin ("soothsayer") turned false prophet at the time of the riddah. For the custom of wrapping oneself in a cloak before uttering the soothsayer's "jingle," which was often, as is the case here, in rhyming prose (sajʿ), see Toufic Fahd, La divination arabe, Strasbourg, 1966, 65, esp. n. 2.

Then Simāk let him go and granted him immunity. He asked him, "Who are you?" "I am Dīnār," was the answer. The ruling family in those days was that of Qārin.[733]

When he was brought before Ḥudhayfah, Dīnār told him about the valor of Simāk and how many enemies he had killed. He also gave evidence of his own respect for the Muslims. Ḥudhayfah granted him a peace agreement in exchange for payment of the kharāj. Thus Māh was called after Dīnār, who entered into a close relationship with Simāk and gave him presents. He used to come to al-Kūfah whenever the collected taxes of his area had to be submitted to the Kūfan governor.

One day during the caliphate of Mu'āwiyah, Dīnār came to al-Kūfah, addressed the people there and said,

"Inhabitants of al-Kūfah, from the moment you first came into contact with us, you have behaved irreproachably and you have stayed the same throughout the reigns of 'Umar and 'Uthmān. But thereafter you changed and four qualities have gained the upper [2632] hand among you: niggardliness, deceit, perfidy and narrow-mindedness, although not one of these marked you in the past. I have been watching you and I have found these characteristics in your new generation.[734] I also know where you got them. Deceit you derived from the Nabateans, niggardliness from the Persians, per-

732. I have opted for min from Ibn Hubaysh, rather than 'an in Prym's edition.
733. See n. 726 above.
734. In Arabic: fī muwalladīkum. Strictly speaking, a muwallad is a person of non-Arab origin who has grown up among Arabs having embraced Islam.

fidy you copied from the Khurāsānians, and narrow-mindedness from al-Ahwāz."

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Amr b. Muḥammad—al-Sha'bī: When the prisoners taken at Nihāwand were brought to Medina, a servant of al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah, Abū Lu'lu'ah Fayrūz, could not meet any young captive without caressing his head and bursting into tears, wailing, "'Umar has consumed my liver!"[735] Fayrūz was a Nihāwandī whom the Byzantines had taken prisoner in the days of the Byzantine-Persian war and who, after that, had been captured by the Muslims. That is why he was supposed to hail from Nihāwand.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Amr b. Muḥammad—al-Sha'bī: Of those who tumbled into the ravine, eighty thousand lost their lives, while on the battlefield thirty thousand got killed, being chained together,[736] apart from those who were slain when they were pursued (while running for safety). The Muslims numbered thirty thousand (on that day). The city of Nihāwand was conquered in the beginning of the year 19 (640), just after the year 18 (639) had come to a close, after seven years (had elapsed) of 'Umar's caliphate.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, al-Muhallab and Ṭalḥah: The texts of the two documents that al-Nu'mān and Ḥudhayfah presented to the inhabitants of the two regions called Māh read, "In the name of God, the merciful, the [2633] compassionate. This is the covenant that al-Nu'mān b. Muqarrin has granted to the inhabitants of Māh Bahrādhān.[737] He has guaranteed them immunity for their person, their property and their lands; they need not give up any religious custom and they will not be prevented from implementing any of their own laws. They will enjoy protection as long as every year they pay the jizyah to the governor in charge. This is incumbent upon every adult in respect of himself and his possessions, each according to his ability. They will also enjoy protection as long as they show the way to travelers, keep the roads in good repair and extend hospitality for a day and a night to Muslim warriors who pass by and seek refuge with them, and as long as they fulfill their promises and give sound advice. But if they act dishonestly and change their conduct, our obligation to protect them will lapse." Witnesses to this document were 'Abdallāh b. Dhī al-Sahmayn, al-Qa'qā' b. 'Amr and Jarīr b. 'Abdallāh (al-Bajalī), and it was written in the month Muḥarram of the year 19 (January 640). (The second document read), "In the name of God, the merciful, the compassionate. This is the covenant that Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān has granted the inhabitants of Māh Dīnār. He has guaranteed them immunity for their person, their property and their lands; they need not give up any religious custom and they will not be prevented from implementing any of their own laws. They will enjoy protection as long as every year they pay the jizyah to the Muslim governor in charge. This is incumbent upon every adult in respect of himself and his possessions, each according to his ability. They will also enjoy protection as long as they show the way to travelers, keep the roads in good repair and extend hospitality for a day and a night to Muslim warriors who pass by and seek refuge with them, and as long as they give sound advice. But if they act dishonestly and change their conduct, our obligation to protect them will lapse." Witnesses (to this second document) were al-Qa'qā' b. 'Amr, Nu'aym b. Muqarrin and Suwayd b. Muqarrin, and it was written in the month Muḥarram.

735. This expression is supposed to mean (Glossarium, p. CDLXIV) "he has caused me great pain."

736. See n. 623 above.

737. See p. 212 above.

They said: 'Umar assigned to each of those who had been present at the battle of Nihāwand, and those newcomers[738] who had fought valiantly, two thousand dirhams, putting them in the same category as the veterans of the battle of al-Qādisiyyah.

738. For this term, see n. 253 above.

Appendix I

The Poetry and Saj' in This Volume

Throughout this translation I have tried to render the poetry, as well as a few fragments of rhymed prose (saj'), into rhythmic English.

The majority of translations of Arabic occasional poetry hitherto published in western languages occurring in works such as this are anything but poetic, and are distinguishable from the surrounding prose only by the way these translations are printed. In the present volume an attempt is made to set off the scattered verses against their backdrop more distinctly than is usually the case in translated histories of this sort.

The poems and one-liners found in this text are on the whole of little artistic merit and constitute no more than the endeavors of alleged eyewitnesses at Gelegenheitsdichtung, commemorating mostly military events. But as with all classical Arabic poetry, this poetry has a strict meter and rhyme, and in my translation I have tried to substitute the various meters with something similar that, it is hoped, might be felt to fall easily on anglophone ears. Where possible, I have included rhyme in the one-liners.

In the following pages, I have collected some comments on the poetic fragments in the order in which they appear in this volume. These comments are of a slightly more technical nature and sometimes contain a host of details; that is why I have chosen not to include them in the footnotes.

Pp. 2419f.: The final syllable -bu of the first word of line 1 has to be read as long so as to make it fit the rajaz meter.

P. 2434: Occasionally I have shortened certain Arabic words or names so as to make them fit the English rhythm, for example, Madā'in for al-Madā'in; I also had to resort to this device in some of the poetic fragments that follow.

Pp. 2445f.: These six lines in my view present by far the most intriguing problem of all the poetry found in this volume.

Before I dwell for some time on a metrical anomaly in ll. 1 and 2, let me make some remarks about ll. 3 to 6.

The word khiṣām in l. 3 may be taken as a double entendre, conveying on the one hand "fray" and on the other "squabble (over the distribution of the booty)."

The verb falaja in l. 3 also seems to permit two interpretations; constructed with shu'ūna as direct object, it means "cleaving" (as in my rendition); on the other hand, constructed with bi- it means "acquiring," namely, the mule. Translated thus, ll. 3 and 4 should then be rendered:

They acquired the mule in the struggle by means of every sharp-cutting blow to the sutures of skulls.

In l. 6, the apparatus gives a variant ba'run "dung" for na'mun "cattle," which makes equally good sense; I have preferred to read na'mun, though, because of the following qualification mina 'l-an'āmi, which constitutes a well known stylistic device as described in Wright, II, 136. It is true that the voweling na'mun is far less common than na'amun, but the former is duly listed in Lisān al-'arab, XVI, 64, l. 12.

Finally, ll. 1 and 2 deserve a short digression.

Although I have rendered the first two lines in an equal number of syllables as are found in the rest of the lines, the Arabic originals contain three long syllables more than ll. 3 to 6. Literally translated, ll. 1 and 2 read:

May my maternal and paternal uncles be held ransom for my men;
they recoiled at the river from deserting and surrendering me.

However, since akhwāl (maternal uncles) and aʿmām (paternal uncles) in l. 1, and khidhlān (deserting) and islām (here: surrendering) in l. 2, are near-synonyms, I chose to ignore them in my translation for the following reasons:

Although I have no evidence for this other than the otherwise unattested peculiarity of three long syllables too many in the first two lines, I contend that these lines may have been "doctored." Who may have been responsible for this "doctoring" is anybody's guess; everyone in the isnād qualifies, from the eyewitness(es) to Ṭabarī himself or, conceivably, even a later copyist of a manuscript, from which the presently available manuscripts are (in)directly derived.

In any case, we have here two lines with three long syllables too many to make them fit in with the following four, totally regular, rajaz lines. Furthermore, in each of these lines we find two seemingly superfluous near-synonyms of the crucial rhyme bearers aʿmāmī and islāmī. Both words happen to comprise three long syllables. Is this just a coincidence, or may we dig into this a little bit more deeply?

Now, it is good practice not to interfere with the original text, any original text, and even if we have to bend over backwards in an attempt to account for seemingly insoluble "peculiarities," that is what we mostly do because that is what we have been taught. In this case, however, we may find some justification for doing our best to restore the regular rajaz meter also in the first two lines, because the "peculiarity" of three long syllables extra is recorded nowhere else, as far as I have been able to ascertain. Should this anomaly—as I now term it—turn out to be attested elsewhere, or even to be unexpectedly common, then the following suggested emendation loses its raison d'être. But for the time being I feel free to go ahead.

A feasible way to create an orthodox rajaz meter in ll. 1 and 2, it seems to me, is to take away the penultimate words, near-synonyms as we saw of the rhyme bearers, as well as the two immediately following particles wa- that, without the synonyms, no longer make sense. We then have:

Fidan li-qawmī 'l-yawma — aʿmāmi
Hum karihū bi 'l-nahri — islāmi

All that remains to be done is to look for a suitable word or particle of one long syllable to insert in the place of —, which stands for the invariably long fourth syllable of the second foot in both lines. But that is a lot easier said than done, as the following may show. The syntax seems to require a preposition.

In l. 1 min appears to fit nicely; see Wolfdietrich Fischer, Grammatik des klassischen Arabisch, Harrassowitz, Wiesbaden, 1972, 141, l. 18, 163, l. 19, 164, l. 15.

However, in l. 2 the choice is not so easy. Kariha, at least in old Arabic, always takes its direct object in the accusative, and the line therefore seems to exclude the insertion of a preposition. We do find in WKAS, I, 157, l. 17–18, the object of kārihun mentioned as sometimes introduced by fī, which would suit admirably, but this is a later usage that is not yet attested in early Arabic.

On the other hand, we might conjecture that we are confronted with a case of contamination. Suppose that before it was "doctored" the line read:

hum raghibū bi 'l-nahri 'an islāmi and we have exactly the same meaning as

hum karihū bi 'l-nahri . . . islāmi

Whatever the right solution may be, this brings me to the important question: If we assume that the lines were indeed interfered with, what induced the "culprit" to tamper with them at all? Translated literally, the reconstructed l. 2 reads in translation

They hated to desert me at the river but it could just as well be interpreted as

They were disgusted with my (having embraced) Islam and that interpretation may, in actual fact, have caused our tamperer to resort to some padding; he selected an equivalent of islāmī in the sense of "surrendering," coming up with khidhlānī, and inserted it in order to make absolutely sure that the word islāmī could not be taken as "my (having embraced) Islam" but only in the sense indicated, in fact prompted, by the insert khidhlānī.

Let us suppose that what happened may be reconstructed as follows: Someone in the isnād of the report containing the four rajaz lines under scrutiny found two lines that permitted of the interpretation:

> Although these brave warriors of mine were disgusted with the fact that I had embraced Islam, let my uncles be ransom for them today.

Let us furthermore assume that the eyewitness/transmitter felt that he could not let that pass without doing something to the lines in an attempt to do away with this odious ambiguity. Before the advent of Islam, the verb aslama/yuslimu usually meant "to surrender" or "to desert," more often than not in a wartime situation, as the majority of occurrences in Ibn Isḥāq's Sīrah, for instance, seem to indicate. But in later times the verb was almost exclusively used in the connotation "to surrender to the new religion." The obviously ancient usage of islāmī in the poem had to be made unequivocally clear to readers no longer familiar with this usage, hence the insert of khidhlānī wa-, which in turn resulted in the insertion of akhwālī wa-.

Now, it could be argued that the word islāmī in the poem could have been substituted by another verbal noun of form IV ending in -mī, allowing of the same, or a cognate, interpretation as khidhlānī. Did our tamperer think of that solution? A study of the standard dictionaries yields only a limited number of eligible roots and none seem to fit effortlessly. Idhāmī and ighmāmī both mean "to grieve me," is'āmī means "to disgust me" and i'dāmī "to put me to death." Any of these four might just have suited the context, but it is my contention, expressed with due caution of course, that it is precisely the occurrence of the slightly ambiguous term islāmī that induced our tamperer to try his hand at some, in his eyes probably indispensable, "doctoring," without having to rewrite l. 2.

P. 2484: Like the preceding verses, this short piece of rhyming prose (saj') solicits a few comments.

At first glance, it sounds like a pastiche of Qur'ān verses or, to be more precise, verses commonly ascribed to the first Meccan period. This fragment of saj', preserved for us by Ṭabarī, but as far as I was able to ascertain never commented upon, bears all the hallmarks of those early Qur'ān verses that still bespeak the pre-

Islamic setting of *kāhin*s, the soothsayers: oaths taken on heaven, earth, wind and stars, with a loose cadence and a consistent rhyme. For more on early saj', see Wellhausen, Reste, 135 f., and Fahd, 159–70.

A few more points deserve our attention, I think.

All but the first and the last line are purely pre-Islamic; the new religion is not yet discernible. The first line may have been purely pre-Islamic as well, but is now provided with an introductory vocative Allāhumma[yā] rabba. . . The second line may also have been "islamicized" by the insertion of rabba before al-arḍi. In fact, all the following lines may be interpreted as equally well "islamicized" by reading rabba between wa- and, respectively, al-rīḥi, al-nujūmi, al-biḥāri, al-shayāṭīni and al-khiṣṣāni (which I read for the nonsensical khiṣṣāṣi). Then the lines translate:

Lord of the earth . . .
Lord of the wind . . .
Lord of the stars . . .
Lord of the seas . . . etc.

It looks like a kāhin's formulaic oath partly padded by "islamifying" elements. The final line "Bless us . . ." then seems to round off the oaths with a prayerlike request, no longer built of soothsayers' material but of Islamic ingredients, and it concludes seven short, consistently rhyming lines in -at with the cripple thabāt. (My stressmark on "firmnèss" is an equally awkward attempt at having it rhyme with "possess").

Who composed this piece of saj'? Possible solutions are many but, as yet, incapable of substantiation. Two points should be made:

The piece could be an original part of the Qur'ān that failed to become part of the first tentative redaction then allegedly in the process of being compiled; if the historical accounts about Abū Bakr and 'Umar toying with the idea of compiling the scattered fragments of revelation into one generally recognized corpus have never been satisfactorily authenticated in the eyes of western historians, the likelihood that they may have done so is only scorned by those whose skepticism effectively precludes them from arriving at any acceptable Geschichtsbild at all.

The piece could be a pastiche of the usual opening lines of an early Qur'ān chapter dating to what we now call the first Meccan period. Muslims may be prevented from comparing anything with the Qur'ān on an equal basis due to the doctrine of the "inimitableness" of the Holy Book, but western readers may be struck by certain unmistakable similarities:

For l. 1, see Q. XCI, 5: By Heaven and what it has built; see further LXXXV, 1, and LXXXVI, 1.

For l. 2, see XCI, 6: By the Earth and what it has spread.

For l. 3, see LXXVII, 1–2: By the Winds like horses' manes and the mighty hurricanes.

For l. 4, see LIII, 1: By the Star when it sets, see further LXXVII, 8, and LXXXI, 2.

For l. 5, see LXXXI, 6, and LXXXII, 3.

However, the final two oaths have no obvious Qur'ānic equivalents. If such oaths were ever part of it, they were removed by those responsible for our textus receptus. The word shayṭān in the connotation "inspiring demon" is fairly common in the Qur'ān; compare also the occurrences of the word qarīn, which has the same meaning.

In any case, whatever we assume the breeding ground of this piece of saj' to be, speculations as to who composed it increase with the whole, or even partial, acceptance of the analytical description given of it in the foregoing.

P. 2528: The two hemistichs contain six derivatives of one root ṣana'a "to make."

P. 2536: The first two lines of the first poem contain the stylistic device paranomasia, two words from different but similarly sounding roots, juxtaposed because of the homophonous effect. This did not find expression in my translation.

P. 2536: The second poem does not translate easily. In the first place, it contains several rare words whose meanings can only be guessed.

Jumāhir seems to mean "bulky," "thick"; I rendered it here "big" (l. 4).

'Adīd (l. 4), usually meaning "numerous," here seems to be a noun for "large tribe." My rendering (l. 6) ". . . not even a pin" is, to say the least, tentative; iḥdā 'l-hanāti 'l-bahātiri means literally "one of the short (insignificant?) problems," and even that is not entirely certain. May we rephrase this line as ". . . so there remained (hardly) one insignificant problem for us (to solve) among them"? Recapitulating, ll. 5–6 seem to convey: "We drove the Nabateans away from the Persians and so the only thing that we had to solve among them was (hardly more than) an insignificant little problem."

In line 7 we encounter the words al-'Arab al-'alyā', which is an expression for "Arabs living in high places"; here Tamīm are probably meant. See Lane's introduction, XI, n., and 2147, right column. The word 'ulyā from line 1 can also be understood in this way.

The word buḥūr in ll. 7–8, literally "seas," is here used in the connotation "land with green plants and plenty of water," see Lane, 156, right column, ad finem.

P. 2564: This ṭawīl meter contains an irregularity: the first syllable of the first hemistich is missing. This phenomenon is alluded to in Stanislas Guyard, "Théorie nouvelle de la métrique arabe . . ." in Journal Asiatique, VII série, VIII (1876):120, and is called kharm; see also G. W. Freytag, Darstellung der arabischen Verskunst, 88. In the Leiden manuscript of Ibn Ḥubaysh, this "irregularity" is "rectified" by an added wa- preceding lammā.

Appendix II

A Modern Description of Tustar

"Attack via the outlet of the water, then you will conquer the city." This hint at a secret entrance into the city of Tustar, nowadays Shushtar, intrigued me enough to look for a modern description and see what truth there was in it. In the following I shall briefly quote my findings:

The "outlet" is probably a tunnel dug in the bank of the river through which water was led into the city at the foot of the rock on which the citadel was built. This outlet, or passageway as it is called in the text, seems still to have been in place when a Dutch scientist, D. L. Graadt van Roggen, gave a detailed description of it in Mémoires publiés sous la direction de M. J. de Morgan. Tome VII. Recherches archéologiques, deuxième série, Paris 1905, 177 f [see map provided there].

Under the heading "Tunnels sous la citadelle" we read the following remarkable description:

"A environ 300 mètres en amont du pont, on trouve deux tunnels perçant la roche sur laquelle est bâtie la citadelle de Chouster (=Shushtar/Tustar -J.). Ce châteaufort existait certainement avant l'époque sassanide. Nous en voyons, dans Yakout, le récit de la prise par les troupes arabes sur la garnison persane de Yezdegerd III. [This is erroneous; at the time Yazdajird was presumably in Marw, see p. 2551 above, and al-Hurmuzān was the commander of the city -J.] Ces canaux se réunissent à une centaine de mètres au delà du mur d'enceinte de cette forteresse (fig. 471) pour former un seul canal. . . . Ces tunnels ont de 3 à 4 m.50 de largeur sur environs 100 mètres de longueur; ils étaient munis, d'un cotê, d'une voie de passage qui est en partie éboulée" [italics mine -J].

Furthermore, we read in Early adventures in Persia, Susiana, and Babylonia including a residence among the Bakhtiyari and other wild tribes before the discovery of Nineveh by A. Henry Layard, London 1894, 234:

"The houses [sc. of Shushtar/Tustar -J] are mostly built of stone, and . . . are provided with extensive 'serd-âbs,' or underground apartments, known in Khuzistan as 'shâdrewan,' which are excavated to a considerable depth in the rock, and are ventilated and kept cool by lofty air chimneys."

The word shâdrewan used here is the same as shādhurwān, a word mentioned in Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 848, by which the same water conduit is meant. This connotation is not listed in the major Persian dictionaries.

Figure 1. General plan and detail (above) of Tustar after D. L. Graadt van Roggen, "Notice sur les anciens travaux hydrauliques en Susiane," Délégation en Perse, Mémoires, VII, 2e sér., Paris, 1905, 178.

The History of al-Ṭabarī

VOLUME XIV

The Conquest of Iran

TRANSLATED BY G. REX SMITH

Map I. The Area of the Conquests of Iran, 21–23/641–44

The Events of the Year

21 (cont'd)

(December 10, 641–November 30, 642)

In this year 'Umar [b. al-Khaṭṭāb] gave the armies of Iraq the command to seek out those of Persia,[1] wherever they might be. He commanded some of those Muslim troops who were in al-Baṣrah and its surrounding areas to march on the region of Fārs, Kirmān, and Iṣfahān and some of those who were in the district and regions[2] of al-Kūfah [to march] on Iṣfahān, Azerbaijan, and al-Rayy. Some said that 'Umar did this in the year 18 [January 12, 639–January 2, 640]. This is [also] the version of Sayf b. 'Umar.[3] [2634]

1. Fārs here in the text refers broadly to the land of Persia, not specifically the province of that name, indeed including the provinces of Fārs, Kirmān, Iṣfahān, Azerbaijan, and al-Rayy, listed below. The text of this volume thus begins with this general command on the part of the caliph, 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, to his forces in Iraq to move eastward and begin the conquest of Iran.

2. For the Persian word māh, see Le Strange, Lands, 190; Barthold, Geography, 208.

3. Sayf b. 'Umar (d. ca. 180/796) appears as the major source for Ṭabarī's account of the conquest of Iran; see Translation, XIII, xiii–xviii; XV, xvi–xvii. See also Hinds, "Sources," 3–16, with an assessment on p. 12; Hinds also discusses Sayf in the context of the conquest of the province of Fārs in "Con-

What Happened in This Year, 21—'Umar's Previously Mentioned Orders to the Two Armies

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Muhallab, 'Amr, and Sa'īd:[4] When 'Umar realized that Yazdajird[5] was making war on him every year and when it was suggested to him that he would continue to do this until he was driven out of his kingdom, ('Umar) gave the army permission to penetrate into Persia to wrest from Yazdajird his imperial possessions. He therefore dispatched the commanders of the Basran and Kufan armies after the victory of Nihāwand.[6] Between the appointment of Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ[7] [as commander of al-Kūfah] and that of 'Ammār b. Yāsir,[8] there were two [other] quest," 39, 47–49; Duri, "Iraq School," 49–50; Duri, Rise, especially 46–47. See also Hill, Termination, 26–27.

---

4. Al-Sarī is al-Sarī b. Yaḥyā. It should be noted that he invariably conveys his information in writing. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 460–61; Translation, I, 6–7. Shu'ayb is Shu'ayb b. Ibrāhim al-Tamīmī. Muḥammad is Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. Sawād, first appearing in the account of the year 12/633–634, Ṭabarī, I, 2026; cf. Duri, Rise, 140. Ṭalḥah is Ṭalḥah b. al-A'lam al-Ḥanafī, first appearing in the account of the year 11/632–633, Ṭabarī, I, 1796; cf. Duri, Rise, 140. Al-Muhallab is al-Muhallab b. 'Uqbah al-Asadī, first appearing in the text in the account of the year 12/633–634, Ṭabarī, I, 2023. 'Amr is 'Amr b. Muḥammad (d. 199/814–815), who first appears in Ṭabarī, I, 380; cf. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 98–99. Sa'īd is Sa'īd b. al-Marzubān, Abū Sa'd al-Baqqāl, who first appears in Ṭabarī, I, 19. Cf. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 79–80. All are important sources of Sayf b. 'Umar. Cf. Hill, Termination, 20 no. 23.

5. That is, the last Persian emperor, Yazdgard III, son of Shahriyār, who was killed in 31/651. A brief survey of his career is given in Zarrīnkūb, "Conquest," 18–26. See also Spuler, Iran, 18–20; Translation XIII, passim. For the Sasanian family tree, see Nöldeke, Geschichte, table, 436a. For these and following events, cf. Bal'ami, Chronique, III, 480ff.

6. A town some 40 miles south of Hamadhān (Le Strange, Lands, 196), the site of the famous battle earlier in 21/641–642, in which the Muslims won a resounding victory to pave the way for the later conquests of Iran. Cf. Ṭabarī, I, 2596–2631; Translation, XIII, 179–214; Zarrīnkūb, "Conquest," 16.

7. Sa'd was the Qurashī commander of the Muslim forces at al-Qādisiyyah in 16/637. A relative and Companion of the Prophet, Sa'd had been appointed to lead the forces by 'Umar. See Spuler, Iran, 8; Shaban, History, 30: Zarrīnkūb, "Conquest," 10; Translation, XIII, passim. Cf. Bal'ami, Chronique, III, 386.

8. Son of the client of Abū Ḥudhayfah of Makhzūm, Companion, and later follower of 'Alī. He died at Ṣiffīn in 37/657. Cf. Shaban, History, 69; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I, 234, 241, etc.; *EI*², s.v. "'Ammār b. Yāsir" (Reckendorf).

commanders, 'Abdallāh b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Itbān,[9] in whose time the battle of Nihāwand took place, and Ziyād b. Ḥanẓalah, confederate of B. 'Abd b. Quṣayy,[10] in whose time the order to [2635] penetrate was given. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abdallāh was removed and sent elsewhere. Ziyād b. Ḥanẓalah, an emigrant, was appointed. But he served for [only] a short time, persistently asking to be relieved. So he was relieved of his post, and 'Ammār b. Yāsir appointed after him. ('Umar) reinforced the army of al-Baṣrah with 'Abdallāh b. 'Abdallāh and that of al-Kūfah with Abū Mūsā [al-Ash'arī],[11] appointing 'Umar b. Surāqah[12] in his place. Standards came from 'Umar to certain individuals in al-Kūfah during the time of Ziyād b. Ḥanẓalah.[13] One of (these standards) came to Nu'aym b. Muqarrin.[14] The people of Hamadhān[15] had reneged [on their] peace [agreement], so ('Umar) ordered (Nu'aym) to march on Hamadhān, saying, "If God gives you victory, [go] on beyond, onward to Khurāsān!" ('Umar) also dispatched 'Utbah b. Farqad[16] and Bukayr b. 'Abdallāh,[17] confirming them in charge of Azerbaijan. He divided (the country)

---

9. Companion and military commander. See Translation, XIII, 80, 88–89, and passim; also Zarrīnkūb, "Conquest," 21, erroneously 'Atabān; Donner, Conquests, 436; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, VI, 145.

10. For Ziyād, a prominent commander and administrator, see Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 28; Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 213; Donner, Conquests, 365 (at Yarmūk). B. 'Abd b. Quṣayy is a tribal division (fakhdh) of Kilāb b. Murrah. See Zubayrī, Quraysh, 256; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 14; Kaḥḥālah, Mu'jam, II, 726; Caskel, Gamharat, I, Table 4.

11. Important Companion and commander, who died ca. 42/662. See Morony, Iraq, 433; *EI*², s.v. "Abū Mūsā" (Veccia Vaglieri).

12. That is, over al-Baṣrah. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, VIII, 26, and Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, IV, 79, both giving little information on this military commander.

13. The dispatch of standards from the caliph to Muslim commanders in the field marked the beginning of a general mobilization eastward of their armies.

14. Nu'aym was, with al-Nu'mān and Suwayd, one of the famous Ibn Muqarrin brothers and heroes of the eastern campaigns. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, X, 178. See also note 26, below.

15. A famous town in the Jibāl, northeast of Baghdad and southwest of al-Rayy, about equidistant from both. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 410–17; Le Strange, Lands, 194–95.

16. Al-Sulamī, Companion, military commander, and kharāj official. He was the conqueror of Mosul in 18/639. Cf. Translation, XIII, 60.

17. Al-Laythī, first mentioned in the text in the account of the year 14/635–636, when he was appointed military commander. See Ṭabarī, I, 2232. Cf. also Translation, XIII, 4–5.

between them, ordering one of them to take [troops] there from Ḥulwān[18] to [form] the right section [of the army] and the other to take [troops] from Mosul to [form] the left. Thus one was on the right of his colleague and the other on his colleague's left. ('Umar) sent a standard to 'Abdallāh b. 'Abdallāh, ordering him to march on Iṣfahān. Now he was courageous, a hero of the [2636] noble Companions and a prominent Helper, confederate of Banū al-Ḥublā of Banū Asad.[19] ('Umar) reinforced him with Abū Mūsā from al-Baṣrah and appointed 'Umar b. Surāqah commander of al-Baṣrah.

The account concerning 'Abdallāh b. 'Abdallāh is that, when 'Umar heard of the victory at Nihāwand, he determined to give permission [to his armies] to penetrate [further eastward]. He therefore wrote to ('Abdallāh), giving him instructions to march out of al-Kūfah and halt in al-Madā' in;[20] he should call on [the Muslim commanders to volunteer], not select them, and write to him [to inform him that all] this [had been carried out]. 'Umar was intending to despatch him to Iṣfahān. Among those who answered his call [to volunteer] were 'Abdallāh b. Warqā' al-Riyāḥī and 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥārith b. Warqā' al-Asadī.[21] Those who do not know think one of them was 'Abdallāh b. Budayl b. Warqā' al-Khuzā'ī because of mention of [the name] Warqā'. They were under the [mistaken] impression that (Warqā') was ('Abdallāh al-Riyāḥī's) grandfather. But when he was killed at Ṣiffīn 'Abdallāh b. Budayl b. Warqā' was twenty-four years old and in 'Umar's time he was a young lad.[22]

---

18. A well-known town of the Jibāl province. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 290–94; Le Strange, Lands, 191.

19. Al-Ḥublā was the nickname of pot-bellied Sālim b. Ghanm b. 'Awf b. al-Khazraj, the word meaning "pregnant." Banū al-Ḥublā is a tribal division (baṭn) of al-Khazraj. There would appear to be nothing, however, linking al-Khazraj with a Banū Asad. See Wāqidī, Maghāzī, 166; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 248, 354–55; Kaḥḥālah, Mu'jam, I, 239; Caskel, Ǧamharat, I, Table 189.

20. The Sasanian capital, seven leagues below Baghdad on both banks of the Tigris, the twin towns of Ctesiphon and Seleucia. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 74–75; Le Strange, Lands, 33.

21. The editor of the Cairo edition enters these two under the name 'Abdallāh b. Warqā' al-Riyāḥī al-Asadī in his index (X, 316). This is their first mention in the text, and no further information on them would appear to be available.

22. Ṭabarī here corrects others (e.g., Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 312) who make the error of suggesting Ibn Budayl was playing a major military role at this time.

When 'Umar heard of 'Abdallāh's departure, he sent Ziyād b. Ḥanẓalah [to al-Kūfah]. When he heard of the departure and [continuing] penetration of the troops, he appointed 'Ammār commander, reciting God's words, "And We want to show favor to those who were considered weak on earth, to make them leaders and to make them heirs."[23] Ziyād had been sent in the [2637] middle of Sa'd's period as commander to the office of judge of al-Kūfah after Salmān and 'Abd al-Raḥmān, the sons of Rabī'ah,[24] had been relieved [of the post], to act as judge until 'Abdallāh b. Mas'ūd[25] arrived from Ḥimṣ. Al-Nu'mān and Suwayd, the sons of Muqarrin,[26] had been put in charge on behalf of 'Umar of [the lands] watered by the Euphrates and Tigris, but they asked to be relieved, saying, "Relieve us of a position that is changing and becoming attractive to us like a prostitute!"[27] So he relieved them of their posts, appointing in their places Ḥudhayfah b. Asīd al-Ghifārī[28] and Jābir b. 'Amr al-Muzanī.[29] Then they [too] asked to be relieved, so he relieved them, appointing in their places Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān and

---

However, Ṭabarī himself erroneously mentions Ibn Budayl in connection with the conquest of Kirmān (Ṭabari, I, 2704); see also note 328, below. In 23, when Kirmān was taken by the Muslims, Ibn Budayl would have been only ten years old! Ibn Budayl played a prominent part at the battle of Ṣiffīn in 37/657–658 on the side of 'Alī; see Ṭabarī, I, 3292ff.

23. Qur'ān 28:5. See p. 47, the dismissal of 'Ammār.

24. For Salmān, see Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 34; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 220–21. For 'Abd al-Raḥmān, see Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, VI, 278–79. See also Donner, Conquests, 395–96.

25. Ibn Mas'ūd was a Qur'ān reader who died in 32/652–653; see Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 27ff.; see also Translation, I, 206 n. 280.

26. For the administrative and military activities of the two brothers, see Translation, XIII, passim. Al-Nu'mān has an entry in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 456–57, and is mentioned by Abū Yūsuf; see Ben Shemesh, Taxation, III, 96. For Suwayd, see Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 279–80. This passage would seem to indicate that they were charged with land survey duties in the areas described; see Ṭabarī, I, 2456, and Translation, XIII, 36, where the land-survey aspect of the appointment is clearer. Cf. also Morony, Iraq, 69, 150, 157.

27. This would appear to mean that their official position proved too much of a temptation for them! For the Arabic mūmisah, see Bosworth, Underworld, I, 20.

28. Ḥudhayfah died 42/662–663; see Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 219.

29. Jābir is mentioned in Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 236, though with no further details.

'Uthmān b. Ḥunayf,[30] Ḥudhayfah over [the lands] watered by the Tigris and beyond and 'Uthmān over all [the lands] watered by the Euphrates belonging to the Sawād [of al-Kūfah and of al-Baṣrah] together.[31] ['Umar] wrote to the troops of al-Kūfah, [informing them] that he had sent 'Ammār b. Yāsir to them as commander and appointed 'Abdallāh b. Mas'ūd as teacher and administrative assistant.[32] [He also informed them that] he had appointed Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān in charge of [the lands] watered by the Tigris and beyond, whereas he had appointed 'Uthmān b. Ḥunayf in charge of [the lands] watered by the Euphrates.

Iṣfahān[33]

'Ammār arrived as commander in al-Kūfah and 'Umar's letter [2638] reached 'Abdallāh [b. 'Abdallāh with the order] to march on Iṣfahān, leaving Ziyād in charge of al-Kūfah. 'Abdallāh b. Warqā' al-Riyāḥī was to be over his vanguard and 'Abdallāh b. Warqā' al-Asadī and 'Iṣmah b. 'Abdallāh—that is 'Iṣmah b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Ubaydah b. Sayf b. 'Abd b. al-Ḥārith[34]—over his two wings. 'Abdallāh marched at the head of the army and came to Ḥudhayfah [b. al-Yamān], who returned to his post. 'Abdallāh left Nihāwand at the head of his followers and those of the army of al-Nu'mān who had departed with him to face [another] army that had assembled against him, [comprising] some of the in-

30. Both renowned for their work in land survey and kharāj assessment; see Zarrīnkūb, "Conquest," 20; Morony, Iraq, 101, 108, 121; Ben Shemesh, Taxation, 80, 87, 93, 97, 100, 103.

31. For the general meaning of al-Sawād, see Le Strange, Lands, 24. I have here translated the dual of the Leiden and Cairo texts. The variant reading, al-Sawād, in the singular, however, should be noted, and Abū Yūsuf, when referring to the appointments of Ḥudhayfah and 'Uthmān, also uses the singular, presumably the Sawād of al-Kūfah. See Ben Shemesh, Taxation, 80, 87; Morony, Iraq, 121. Perhaps the following mention that 'Umar wrote only to the Kufans about his appointments also points to the Sawād of al-Kūfah alone being meant here.

32. In this early period, this seems the most appropriate rendering of wazīr; see Morony, Iraq, 536.

33. For the conquest of Iṣfahān, see Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 312–14; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, III, 9; Bal'ami, Chronique, III, 48off. Cf. Donner, Conquests, Appendix N.

34. Ibn Ṭarīf, an early military commander under Khālid b. al-Walīd in Syria, later in the east. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, VII, 8.

habitants of Iṣfahān, led by the district governor.[35] In charge of his vanguard was Shahrbarāz Jādhawayh,[36] an important leader (shaykh) at the head of a large force. The Muslims and the vanguard of the polytheists met in one of the districts[37] of Iṣfahān, and they fought a hard battle. The leader called for single combat, so 'Abdallāh b. Warqā' came out against him and killed him. The army of Iṣfahān fled. The Muslims named this district Rustāq al-Shaykh, and this is its name to this day. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abdallāh called out, "Who's next?!" so the district governor sued for peace, which ('Abdallāh) granted them. This was the first district of Iṣfahān to be taken.

Then 'Abdallāh marched out from Rustāq al-Shaykh in the direction of Jayy and finally arrived there.[38] The ruler in Iṣfahān [2639] was at that time al-Fādhūsafān.[39] ('Abdallāh) settled the army around Jayy. He besieged them, but after a period collecting together a huge army, they came out against him. When they met, al-Fādhūsafān said to 'Abdallāh: "Do not kill my men, and I shall not kill yours. Rather come out against me in single combat. If I kill you, your men will withdraw. If you kill me, my men will make peace with you, but only if no arrow falls on them."[40] So 'Abdallāh came out against him in single combat, saying, "Will you make the [first] attack on me, or shall I on you?" He replied that he would attack. So 'Abdallāh stood still before him, and al-Fādhūsafān made an attack on him, thrusting at him and hitting the pommel of his saddle and breaking it. He also cut through the breast girth and the girth and the saddle

35. Ustandār in the text; see CHIr, 218; Morony, Iraq, 536, suggests Sasanian official in charge of royal property or a crown prince. The first interpretation, however, seems most appropriate to the context. Chronique, III, 483, says that the town was governed by a Persian called Pâdouspân. Cf. EI[2], s.v. "Bādūspānids" (Nikitine).

36. Cf. Justi Namenbuch, 278, where there is brief mention of this Persian general.

37. For the Persian word rustāq, see Steingass, Dictionary, 575; Morony, Iraq, 534.

38. Jayy is the name of one of the two towns making up Iṣfahān; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 202–3; Le Strange, Lands, 203–4, 206.

39. Cf. Nöldeke, Geschichte, 151 n. 2. Cf. also note 35, above.

40. Arabic: wa-in qatalta-nī sālama-ka aṣḥābī wa-in kāna aṣḥabī lā yaqa'u la-hum nushshābah.

cloth, and the saddle came away, with 'Abdallāh still on the horse. But he came off, though he was still standing, then regained a firm seat on the horse, riding bareback. ('Abdallāh) told him to stand still, but (al-Fādhūsafān) agreed with him not to fight [further]. He said: "I do not want to fight you [further], for I see you are a perfect man. Rather I shall come back with you to [2640] your camp and make peace with you. I shall hand over the town to you, allowing anyone who wishes to stay, but [he must] pay tribute, keeping his property, and on condition that you grant anyone whose land you have taken by force equal status with them and they return [to their property]. Anyone who refuses to enter into the same [agreement] as we will go where he wishes, and his land will be yours." ('Abdallāh) replied that he accepted his terms.

Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī arrived [to join] 'Abdallāh from the area of al-Ahwāz[41] when al-Fādhūsafān had already made peace with the latter. All the troops left Jayy and entered into the contract except for thirty Iṣfahānīs who opposed [the majority of] their people. They assembled and made off for Kirmān, along with their dependents, [to join] a group already there. 'Abdallāh and Abū Mūsā entered Jayy, the town of Iṣfahān, and (the former) wrote to 'Umar to this effect. Those who remained rejoiced, whereas those who left regretted [their decision]. 'Umar's reply to 'Abdallāh commanded him to march and join up with Suhayl b. 'Adī[42] to fight with him those in Kirmān. He was also to leave behind in Jayy those who would defend the town. He was to appoint as his deputy over Iṣfahān al-Sā'ib b. al-Aqra'.[43]

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—a group of al-Ḥasan's informants, who included al-Mubārak b. Faḍālah—al-Ḥasan[44]—

41. On the Dujayl, capital of Khūzistān. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 284–86; Le Strange, Lands, 232–34.

42. Al-Azdī. See the brief entry in Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 286.

43. A client of Thaqīf who fought at Nihāwand and was governor of al-Madā'in. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 16ff.; Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 249; Translation, XIII, 182 n. 624.

44. Al-Ḥasan is the famous al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī (b. 22/641 [Ṭabarī, I, 2646], d. ca. 110/728). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 263–70; *EI*², s.v. (Ritter); Sezgin, GAS, I, 591–94. For al-Mubārak (d. ca. 164/780), see Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 28–31; Translation, I, 268 n. 641.

Asīd b. al-Mutashammis, the nephew of al-Aḥnaf:[45] I was with Abū Mūsā at the conquest of Iṣfahān, but he was there only in a supporting role.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Muhallab, 'Amr, and Sa'īd: the Iṣfahān peace document: [2641]

> In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful; a document from 'Abdallāh to al-Fādhūsafān and to the people of Iṣfahān and the surrounding areas. You will [remain] in a state of security as long as you pay the tribute. This is imposed upon you annually at a rate within your capacity [to pay]. You will pay it for everyone who has attained puberty to whoever is governor of your region. The Muslim must be guided, be afforded safe passage; he must be given hospitality for a whole day and a night and given a mount, if he is on foot, up to a distance of one stage. You are not to put [anyone] in authority over a Muslim. The Muslims must have your good counsel and be paid what you are obliged [to pay]. You will have safe-conduct as long as you carry out [all these stipulations]. If you go against [this] in any way or if anyone of you goes against it and you do not hand him over, you will have no safe-conduct. Anyone abusing a Muslim will be dealt with severely. If anyone physically abuses him, we shall kill him.

He wrote [this document] and it was witnessed by 'Abdallāh b. Qays [al-Ash'athī], 'Abdallāh b. Warqā', and 'Iṣmah b. 'Abdallāh.

When 'Umar's letter reached 'Abdallāh, in which he was ordered to join up with Suhayl b. 'Adī in Kirmān, he left at the head of a detachment of cavalry. He appointed al-Sā'ib as his deputy and joined up with Suhayl before he arrived in Kirmān.

According to Ma'qil b. Yasār,[46] it was al-Nu'mān b. Muqarrin who was in command of the Muslim army when it attacked Iṣfahān.

---

45. I find no information on Asīd. Al-Aḥnaf is al-Aḥnaf b. Qays al-Tamīmī, the leader of Tamīm in al-Baṣrah. See *EI*², s.v. "Al-Aḥnaf b. Ḳays" (Pellat).

46. Al-Muzanī (d. 60–70/679–689); see Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 235.

The Account of [the Attack on Iṣfahān]

According to Ya'qūb b. Ibrāhīm[47] and 'Amr b. 'Alī[48]—'Abd al-[2642] Raḥmān b. Mahdī[49]—Ḥammād b. Salamah[50]—Abū 'Imrān al-Jawnī[51]—'Alqamah b. 'Abdallāh al-Muzanī[52]—Ma'qil b. Yasār [al-Muzanī]: 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb consulted al-Hurmuzān,[53] asking him what he thought; should he begin with Fārs, Azerbaijan, or Iṣfahān? He replied: "Fārs and Azerbaijan are the wings; Iṣfahān is the head. If you cut off one of the wings, the other one [can still] work. But, if you cut off the head, the wings collapse. Begin with the head!" 'Umar went into the mosque while al-Nu'man b. Muqarrin was praying and sat down beside him. When he had finished his prayers, ['Umar] told him that he had a job for him to do. [Al-Nu'mān] replied that, if it was collecting taxes, he was unwilling, but, if it was a military task, [he was willing]. ['Umar] told him that he would be engaged in a military matter. He despatched him to Iṣfahān and wrote to the people of al-Kūfah to give him reinforcements. He arrived in [Iṣfahān], but there was the river between him and [the enemy]. So [al-Nu'mān] sent al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah[54] to them, and he reached them. Their ruler, called Dhū al-Ḥājibayn,[55] was told that the envoy of the Arabs was at the door. So he took counsel

---

47. Al-Jūzajānī (d. ca. 256/870); see Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 181–83; Rosenthal, Historiography, 278; Translation, I, 26, note 96.

48. 'Amr b. 'Alī b. Baḥr al-Fallās (d. 249/864); cf. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 80–82; Rosenthal, Historiography, 392; Translation, I, 26 and n. 96.

49. Died 198/814. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 279–81; Translation, I, 201 n. 252.

50. Ḥammād died in 167/783. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 11–16; Rosenthal, Historiography, 518.

51. An unidentified narrator.

52. 'Alqamah died in 100/718. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 275.

53. Ruler of Khūzistān, who, after leading much opposition against the Muslim forces, surrendered to 'Umar earlier in 21/641. Only later did he become a Muslim. See Zarrīnkūb, "Conquest," 14–15. See also Mas'ūdī, Murūj, IV, 230ff., recounting the same anecdotes on the authority of 'Alqamah and Ma'qil. Cf. also Bal'ami, Chronique, III, 481.

54. A veteran Muslim administrator and commander and a Thaqafī (d. 50/670). See Shaban, History, 58, 84, 187; Zarrīnkūb, "Conquest," 19, 21; Translation, XIII, passim.

55. "He of the two eyebrows." See Bal'ami, Chronique, III, 468; Nöldeke, Geschichte, 226 n. 1. On such names, see Goldziher, "Ueber Dualtitel"; see also Translation, XIII, 180 n. 618.

with his advisers, saying: "What do you think? Shall I sit down to [receive] him in royal splendor?" They replied that he should. So he sat on his throne and put the crown on his head, while the royal princes sat in two ranks, wearing earrings, gold bracelets, and silk-brocade garments. Then [the ruler] allowed [al-Mughīrah] to enter, carrying his lance and shield. He began to [2643] poke at their carpets with his lance to unnerve them.[56] Two men took him by the arms, and he stood before their ruler, who spoke to him, saying: "You Arabs, vehement hunger has afflicted you, so you have left [your homelands]. If you wish, we shall give you provisions, and you can return home." Al-Mughīrah spoke, praising and extolling God; then he said: "We Arabs used to eat corpses and carrion; people used to trample us under foot, not we them. God has sent forth from us a prophet, the best of us in rank, the most truthful in what he says." [And he mentioned the Prophet in the fashion he deserves.] "He made us promises that we discovered were [fulfilled] as he had said. He promised us that we would conquer you and take possession of everything here. I see you are wearing [fine] garb and apparel. I do not think that [the Muslim army] coming after me will go away until they seize them." [Al-Mughīrah] continued: "Then I wondered what if I were to collect up my garments, leap up in one bound, and sit with this huge infidel on his throne! Perhaps [then] he would be unnerved." He continued: "I waited for a time when he was not expecting it and jumped. There I was with him on his throne!" [The account] continues: They seized him, beating him repeatedly with their hands and trampling him under foot. [Al-Mughīrah] continued: I said, "Is this how you treat envoys? We do not act thus. We do not do this with your envoys." The ruler replied, "If you wish, you can cross over to us or we over to you [to fight]."[57] [Al-Mughīrah] said that they would cross over to [the army of Iṣfahān]. He continued: "So

56. Li-yataṭayyarū, literally, "so that they might augur evil."

57. An indication that the audience was over and battle would ensue. A similar story involving al-Mughīrah has already appeared in the text in the context of the events leading up to the battle of Nihāwand (Ṭabarī, I, 2601–3). If it is a genuine account in either case, we learn much here and in the anecdote recounted below [about his appointment] of al-Mughīrah, who had clearly failed miserably in his diplomatic mission! He was later appointed governor of al-Kūfah [see p. 4] and remained in office until 'Umar's murder.

[2644] we crossed over against them. They formed themselves into a chains of men, ten in one chain, or five, or three. We drew ourselves out in rank to meet them, and they shot arrows at us, finally rushing in among us." Al-Mughīrah said to al-Nu'mān, "God have mercy upon you, they have rushed in among our men; attack!" But he replied: "You are indeed a man of fine qualities. But I was with the Messenger of God when he went into battle. If he did not fight early on in the day, he would postpone the battle until the sun went down, the winds blew, and victory descended!" Then (al-Nu'mān) said, "I shall wave my standard three times: At the first wave everyone will relieve himself and perform his ablutions; at the second everyone will inspect his weapon and his sandal thong and fasten it tight; at the third attack, with no one turning aside to another. If al-Nu'mān is killed, let no one turn aside to him. I am going to make a single prayer to God. I conjure every one of you to say amen after it: 'O God! Give martyrdom this day to al-Nu'mān in the aid of the Muslims! Grant him victory over (the army of Iṣfahān).'" He waved his standard once, then a second, then a third time. Then he put on his coat of mail and attacked. He was the first man to be struck down.

Ma'qil said:[58] I came over to him and, remembering his conjuring (us all to say amen after his prayer), put a marker over him, then went away. Now (usually) when we kill a man his followers are distracted away from us (to investigate him). Dhū al-Ḥājibayn fell from his mule, his belly split open, so God put (the Iṣfahānī army) to flight. Then I came (back) to al-Nu'mān, bringing with me a skin containing water. I washed the dust from his face, and he said, "Who are you?" I replied I was Ma'qil b. Yasār. He asked how the army had done. I replied that God had given them victory. He said: "Praise be to God! Write to [2645] 'Umar about this." And his soul departed. The (Muslim) army, including Ibn 'Umar,[59] Ibn al-Zubayr,[60] 'Amr b. Ma'dī Karib[61]

58. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, III, 9, on the same authority.

59. This must be 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, who had been sent from Medina to join al-Nu'man's army prior to the battle of Nihāwand; see Ṭabarī, I, 2597, 2601, 2618.

60. 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr, the famous anticaliph (d. 73/692); see EI^{2}, s.v. (Gibb).

61. Al-Zubayrī (d. 16/637 or 21/641); cf. EI^{2}, s.v. (Pellat).

and Ḥudhayfah, rallied to al-Ash'ath b. Qays.[62] They sent for [al-Nu'mān's] concubine[63] and asked her what testament he had left with her. She replied, "Here is a casket containing a document." They took it, and in it was [the following]: If al-Nu'mān is killed, so-and-so [will take over]; if so-and-so is killed, so-and-so [will take over].

Al-Wāqidī[64] said that Khālid b. al-Walīd died during this year—that is 21—in Ḥimṣ. He exhorted [his followers to] continue their support for 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb.[65]

[Al-Wāqidī] also reported: In [this year] 'Abdallāh and 'Abd al-Raḥmān, the sons of 'Amr, and Abū Sirwa'ah made a military expedition and arrived in Egypt. 'Abd al-Raḥmān and Abū Sirwa'ah drank wine, and something happened to them![66]

[Al-Wāqidī] also reported: In [this year] 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ marched on Anṭābulus, which is Barqah. He conquered it and made peace with its inhabitants on [payment] of 13,000 dinars and [on condition] that they sell off what they wanted of their sons as part of their tribute.[67]

---

62. Famous shaykh of Kindah who settled in al-Kūfah and died in 40/661. See Morony, Iraq, p. 93; Donner, Conquests, 433–34; Mad'aj, Yemen, 12, 13, 45–51, and passim; EI^{2}, s.v. [Reckendorf].

63. Arabic: umm walad; strictly speaking a concubine who has given birth to a child by her master; see Translation, XIII, 58.

64. Muḥammad b. 'Umar [d. 207/823], famous author of K. al-Maghāzī and a narrator used extensively by Ṭabarī. See Duri, Rise, 37ff.; Sezgin, GAS, I, 294–97.

65. Khālid b. al-Walīd was a famous early Islamic general; see EI^{2}, s.v. [Crone]. This would appear to be the meaning here of awṣā ilā. See in particular Kazimirski, Dictionnaire, II, 1551.

66. These are perhaps the sons of 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ. Abū Sirwa'ah is perhaps Abū Sirwa'ah 'Uqbah b. al-Ḥārith b. 'Āmir b. Nawfal b. 'Abd Manāf; see Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 238–39, XII, 105; Translation, XII, 105; Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, IV, 42. There appears to be no record of what exactly happened to the offending pair.

67. Also Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 224; and Ya'qūbī, Tārīkh, II, 156; and Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥakam, Futūḥ, 170, with the rather strange suggestion that sons were sold, presumably for the purpose of providing military service to the Muslims, as part of a tribute arrangement. Barqah is ancient Barce in present day Libya; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 224–25; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 388; Abun-Nasr, Maghrib, 315, map. It is spelled Barqā in Wāqidī, Futūḥ, 102. Whereas Balādhurī, ibid. calls Barqah the town of Anṭābulus, Yāqūt, ibid., says the town of Barqah is Anṭābulus.

(Al-Wāqidī) also reported: In (this year) 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb appointed 'Ammār b. Yāsir governor of al-Kūfah, Ibn Mas'ūd treasurer, and 'Uthmān b. Ḥunayf in charge of land survey.[68] But the inhabitants of al-Kūfah complained about 'Ammār, and he asked 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb to be relieved. (The latter) approached Jubayr b. Muṭ'im[69] in confidence and appointed him governor of al-Kūfah, telling him not to mention it to anyone. But al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah heard that 'Umar had held a private meeting with Jubayr b. Muṭ'im, returned to his wife, and told her to go to the wife of Jubayr b. Muṭ'im and offer her some food [prepared especially] for a journey. She came to her and [2646] offered her [the food], but she remained silent [at first], then said, "Yes, give me it." When al-Mughīrah had verified all this, he came to 'Umar and said, "God bless you in the one whom you have appointed governor." "What governor have I appointed?" asked 'Umar. So he mentioned that he had appointed Jubayr b. Muṭ'im. 'Umar said, "I do not know what to do!" He [in fact] appointed al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah governor of al-Kūfah, an office in which he remained until 'Umar died.[70]

(Al-Wāqidī) also said: In [this year] 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ sent 'Uqbah b. Nāfi' al-Fihrī,[71] and he acquired Zawīlah by treaty, the whole area between Barqah and Zawīlah being already pacified in Muslim control.[72]

---

68. See *EI*², s.v. "Misāḥa" (Bosworth and Pellat).

69. A leader of Quraysh and a genealogist, although appearing in the text mainly as an early narrator; see Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 63–64. Cf. a slightly different, and more informative, version of the story that follows in Bal'ami, Chronique, III, 485–86. See also Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 59.

70. This anecdote, which represents 'Umar as somewhat weak and indecisive and al-Mughīrah as ambitious and cunning, is also recounted in Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, III, 10.

71. Famous Muslim military leader on the North African front, entering the Maghrib in 46/666, and founder of al-Qayrawān. Killed in 64/682 near al-Qayrawān. See Abun-Nasr, Maghrib, 68–69; CHIs, I, 79.

72. Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 224, confirms that 'Uqbah took control of the Maghrib and reached Zawīlah. See also Ya'qūbī, Tārīkh, II, 156, who reports the dispatch of 'Uqbah to Nubia. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 159–60, says that Zawīlah was between Bilād al-Sūdān and Ifrīqiyah and also confirms that 'Uqbah took it after the conquest of Barqah. Cf. Hill, Termination, 56, erroneously Zāwilah.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd[73]—Salamah[74]—Ibn Isḥāq:[75] There took place in Syria in the year 21 [December 10, 641–November 30, 642] the campaign of the commander, Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān,[76] while 'Umayr b. Sa'd al-Anṣārī[77] was in charge of Damascus, al-Bathaniyyah,[78] Ḥawrān, Ḥimṣ, Qinnasrīn,[79] and al-Jazīrah and Mu'āwiyah in charge of al-Balqā',[80] the Jordan, Palestine, the coastal regions [al-Sawāḥil], Antioch, Ma'arrat Maṣrīn,[81] and Cilicia. At this point Abū Hāshim b. 'Utbah b. Rabī'ah b. 'Abd Shams[82] made a peace treaty covering Cilicia, Antioch, and Ma'arrat Maṣrīn.

It was said that in [this year] both al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī and 'Āmir al-Sha'bī were born.[83]

Al-Wāqidī said: 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb led the pilgrimage this year, leaving Zayd b. Thābit[84] as his deputy over Medina. His governors of Mecca, al-Ṭā'if, the Yemen, al-Yamāmah, Bahrain, [2647] Syria, Egypt, and al-Baṣrah were the same as those in the year 20

73. Muḥammad b. Ḥumayd al-Rāzī [d. 248/862], one of Ṭabarī's teachers in al-Rayy and one of his leading authorities. See Sezgin, GAS, I, 29ff., 79, 242, 253.

74. Salamah b. al-Faḍl al-Azraq [d. after 190/805]. He transmitted Ibn Isḥāq's Maghāzī and Mubtada'. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 153ff.

75. Muḥammad b. Isḥāq [d. 150/767], author of the famous Sīrah. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 38–46; *EI*², s.v. [Jones].

76. The famous Umayyad governor in Syria and later [41–60/661–680] first Umayyad caliph.

77. Prominent figure in the Syrian conquests. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, VII, 163–64.

78. One of the districts of Damascus; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 338. Le Strange, Palestine, 32–34.

79. A town south of Aleppo precisely described by Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 403; Le Strange, Palestine, 486; *EI*², s.v. [Elisséeff].

80. The area south of Damascus, the principal center of which is 'Ammān; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 489; Le Strange, Palestine, 34–35.

81. A place that is part of the province of Aleppo; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 155. The same as Ma'arrat Qinnasrīn; see Le Strange, Palestine, 39.

82. The maternal uncle of Mu'āwiyah. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XII, 261; Ibn 'Abd Rabbih, 'Iqd, IV, 398.

83. Ibn Sharāḥīl [d. ca. 103/721], the famous narrator; see Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 65–69, especially 68. See also Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 341; Rosenthal, Historiography, 63, 187, 380.

84. Zayd b. Thābit was a famous Companion, who died in 45/665. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 41–43.

[December 21], 640–December 10, 641.[85] The governor of al-Kūfah was 'Ammār b. Yāsir, who was also in charge of the police.[86] 'Abdallāh b. Mas'ūd was in charge of the treasury, 'Uthmān b. Ḥunayf of the land tax, and Shurayḥ reportedly held the office of judge.[87]

---

85. It is in fact necessary to go back to the end of the year 17 (638–39) to find the complete list. Cf. Ṭabarī, I, 2570; Translation, XIII, 150.

86. For this meaning of aḥdāth, see Dozy, Supplément, I, 258, with expressions from Balādhurī. See also Hinds, "Conquests," 50 n. 33; *EI*², s.v. (Cahen).

87. That is, Shurayḥ b. al-Ḥārith al-Kindī, a famous, perhaps "legendary," judge of early Islam (d. 72–99/691–718). See Schacht, Origins, 228–29; Translation, XIII, 159 n. 543.

The Events of the Year

22

(NOVEMBER 30, 642–NOVEMBER 19, 643)

Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī] said: In [this year] Azerbaijan was conquered, according to Aḥmad b. Thābit al-Rāzī—someone he mentioned—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar:[88] Azerbaijan was [conquered] in the year 22, its commander being al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah. Al-Wāqidī also reported thus.

However, Sayf b. 'Umar said, according to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb: The conquest of Azerbaijan took place in the year 18 of the Hijrah after the conquest of Hamadhān, al-Rayy, and Jurjān and after the ruler of Ṭabaristān[89] had sued for peace with the Muslims. He continued: All this took place in the year 18.[90]

---

88. For Aḥmad and Abū Ma'shar, see Sezgin, GAS, I, 292, 796; Translation, I, 6; for Isḥāq (d. 214/829), see GAS, 200 n. 245.

89. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 14–15, explains that isbahbad, the term used here, is that used in Ṭabaristān as the title of the ruler. See also Morony, Iraq, 28.

90. On the question of the date of the conquest of Azerbaijan, see Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 326; also Ya'qūbī, Tārīkh, 156, who gives only the date 22; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, III, 13, under the year 22. For the conquest of Hamadhān, see Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 309–11 [in the year 23]; Ya'qūbī, Tārīkh, II, 157 [also in 23]; Ibn al-Athīr, ibid., 10, sub anno 22.

(Sayf) continued: The reason for the conquest of Hamadhān, so it was claimed, was [as follows]. Muḥammad, al-Muhallab, Ṭalḥah, 'Amr, and Sa'īd had informed (Sayf) that al-Nu'mān was diverted to the two provincial centers [of Nihāwand and al-Dīnawar][91] because the Persians had assembled in Nihāwand. The Kūfans were diverted there too, and they, including Ḥudhayfah, joined up with (al-Nu'mān). When the Kūfans left Ḥulwān and arrived at Māh,[92] they attacked a castle (qal'ah) in a field (marj) in which was a body of armed men. They forced them to come down—and this was the first [step] in the con-[2648] quest—and settled cavalry in their place to keep a hold on the castle. They named their camp after the field, calling it Marj al-Qal'ah. Then they marched from Marj al-Qal'ah in the direction of Nihāwand and reached a[nother] castle containing some men. They left al-Nusayr b. Thawr attacking it with [a group of] 'Ijl and Ḥanīfah,[93] and it was called after him. He took it after the victory of Nihāwand, and thus not one 'Ijlī, or one Ḥanafī, was present at Nihāwand; they remained with al-Nusayr stationed at the castle. Nevertheless, when (the Muslims) made a comprehensive assessment of the immovable booty[94] of Nihāwand and the castles, they gave all of them a share in it, as they had given one another support. From that time on they gave a name according to its characteristics to everything they observed between Marj al-Qal'ah and Nihāwand, [that is,] the area they had already passed through, and what they had observed from al-Marj to it. Some riding camels (rikāb) jostled together on one of the mountain roads (sing. thaniyyah) of Māh, so it was called al-Rikāb, or Thaniyyat al-Rikāb. They came upon another the

---

91. That is, the dual of the Persian word māh = Arabic qaṣabah. The former is south, the latter southwest of Hamadhān. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 48; Le Strange, Lands, 196–97; Translation, XIII, 4, 199; *EI*², s.v. "Māh al-Baṣra," "Māh al-Kūfa" (Morony). See also note 2.

92. That is, Nihāwand, see note 91.

93. That is, al-Nusayr b. Daysam b. Thawr al-'Ijlī, about whom there is no information. 'Ijl here are presumably 'Ijl b. Lujaym b. Ṣa'b, a tribal division (baṭn) of Bakr b. Wā'il, originally occupying an area between al-Yamāmah and al-Baṣrah; see *EI*², s.v. "'Idjl" (Watt). 'Ijl and Ḥanīfah are closely related tribal groups (*EI*², s.v. "Ḥanīfa" [Watt]). See also Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 309, 312; Caskel, Gamharat, I, Tables 141, 156, 157; Kaḥḥālah, Mu'jam, I, 312; II, 757.

94. Arabic fay'. See *EI*², s.v. (Løkkegaard).

track of which went round a rock, so they called it Malwiyyah (twisted). Their original names were obliterated, and they were given names in keeping with their characteristics. (The Muslims) passed by the long mountain overlooking [other] mountains, and one of them said that it was like the tooth of Sumayrah—Sumayrah was a Ḍabbī woman from Banū Mu'āwiyah,[95] one of those who migrated with the Prophet, who had a tooth projecting over her [other] teeth; so this mountain was named after her tooth. Ḥudhayfah had sent Nu'aym b. Muqarrin and al-Qa'qā' b. 'Amr[96] in pursuit of the defeated troops of Nihāwand. The two reached Hamadhān, and Khusrawshunūm[97] made peace with them. They left (the Hamadhānīs) and returned; then later he reneged. When 'Umar's agreement with (Khusrawsunūm) arrived among those dispatched by him, (Nu'aym) bade Ḥudhayfah farewell, and Ḥudhayfah did [likewise], (Nu'aym) making for Hamadhān, while (Ḥudhayfah) made to return to al-Kūfah. (The latter) appointed as deputy of Nihāwand and al-Dīnawar 'Amr b. Bilāl b. al-Ḥārith.[98] [2649]

'Umar's letter to Nu'aym b. Muqarrin [included the instruction] to march on Hamadhān, dispatch Suwayd b. Muqarrin in charge of his vanguard and Rib'ī b. 'Āmir and Muhalhil b. Zayd[99]—the latter a Ṭā'ī, the former a Tamīmī—in charge of the wings. So Nu'aym b. Muqarrin went forth with his [army] in formation. He went down Thaniyyat al-'Asal (the Mountain Road of Honey). It had been given this name because of the honey found there after the battle of Nihāwand, where they pursued the defeated troops. [At that time] al-Fayruzān[100] had

95. That is, Ḍabbah b. Shihāb b. Mu'āwiyah, rather than the better-known Ḍabbah b. Udd; see Caskel, Ǧamharat, I, Table 309.

96. A Tamīmī hero of both Qādisiyyah and Nihāwand, his exploits are much emphasized by Sayf b. 'Umar. See Ṭabarī, I, 2459–64 and 2626–28; Translation, XIII, passim, in particular 39–43, 209–11; EI[2], s.v. (Zetterstéen).

97. The Persian general; see Morony, Iraq, 194.

98. 'Amr b. Bilāl b. al-Ḥārith is unidentified.

99. Rib'ī b. 'Āmir is unidentified. Muhalhil b. Zayd al-Khayl al-Ṭā'ī was a hero of the Riddah wars. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, X, 49.

100. The Persian general in charge of the army defeated at Nihāwand. See Morony, Iraq, 192–93, for earlier events in which he played a part.

reached [the road], which was crowded with beasts of burden carrying honey and other things, so he was hemmed in by them until he dismounted. Then he had gone up the mountain. His horse, [being riderless], had gone back down and was pursued and [eventually] taken. When they stopped at Kinkiwar,[101] some of the Muslims' animals were stolen, so it was given the name Qaṣr al-Luṣūṣ [Stronghold of Thieves].

Then Nu'aym went down the mountain road and stopped at the town of Hamadhān. But they had already fortified it against [the Muslims], so he besieged [the Hamdhānīs], taking the area between there and Jarmīdhān.[102] [The Muslims] took control of the whole area of Hamadhān. When the inhabitants of the town realized this, they sued for peace [with the request] that he treat them and those who had [originally] complied [with his demand to surrender] exactly alike. This he did and accepted tribute from them for their protection. He divided up Dastabā[103] among a [2650] group of Kūfans, [comprising] 'Iṣmah b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḍabbī, Muhalhil b. Zayd al-Ṭā'ī, Simāk b. 'Ubayd al-'Absī,[104] Simāk b. Makhramah al-Asadī,[105] and Simāk b. Kharashah al-Anṣārī.[106] These were the first to be appointed governors over the frontier regions[107] of Dastabā and to fight the Daylam.[108]

But, according to al-Wāqidī: The conquest of Hamadhān and

---

101. Persian Kangavar, a small town between Hamadhān and Qarmīsīn. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 484, who mentions Qaṣr al-Luṣūṣ; Spuler, Iran, 127 and end maps; Barthold, Geography, 195; *EI*², s.v. "Kinkiwar" [Savory]. See also Bal'amī, Chronique, III, 482.

102. Yāqūt's "A place in al-Jabal; I think it is in the regions of Hamadhān" [II, 129] is not very helpful. This must be a small place, not far from the town of Hamadhān.

103. Dastabā is the extensive area between al-Rayy and Hamadhān, and this is clearly what is meant here. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 454; Le Strange, Lands, 220. It is given as a town on Map 1, 60–61, of the CHIr, IV.

104. Warrior in the eastern conquests. Lived until the end of the caliphate of Mu'āwiyah. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 254; Hill, Termination, 125, 129.

105. Died in al-Raqqah in Mu'āwiyah's caliphate. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 254; Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 353.

106. Fought at al-Qādisiyyah. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 253; Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 352–53.

107. Masāliḥ the eastern equivalents of the western thughūr; i.e., the regions on the edge of Muslim control as they pushed eastward.

108. For the land and its people, see *EI*², s.v. [Minorsky]. The territory of Daylam is the highlands of Jīlān.

al-Rayy took place in 23 [November 19, 643–November 7, 644]. According to him also: It is said that Qaraẓah b. Ka'b[109] conquered al-Rayy.

Also according to [al-Wāqidī]—Rabī'ah b. 'Uthmān:[110] The conquest of Hamadhān took place in [the month of] Jumādā I, exactly six months after the murder of 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb. Its commander was al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah.

According to [al-Wāqidī]: It is also reported that the conquest of al-Rayy took place two years before the death of 'Umar. It is also said that 'Umar was killed while his armies were [engaged in hostilities] against it.[111]

To return to Sayf's account: While Nu'aym was at the head of 12,000 troops in the town of Hamadhān, engaged in subduing it, the Daylam, the inhabitants of al-Rayy, and those of Azerbaijan entered into correspondence among themselves. Then Mūtā,[112] at the head of the Daylam, went forth and halted at Wāj Rūdh.[113] Al-Zīnabī Abū al-Farrukhān,[114] at the head of the Rayy army, arrived to join him, and Isfandiyādh, brother of Rustam, did the same at the head of the Azerbaijan army.[115] The commanders of the Dastabā frontier regions[116] fortified themselves and sent to Nu'aym, giving him the news. So he ap- [2651]

109. Qaraẓah b. 'Amr b. Ka'b al-Khuzā'ī died in al-Kūfah during the caliphate of Mu'āwiyah. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, VIII, 151–52.

110. He died in 154/771. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 266–67; Tahdhīb, III, 260; Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, 170.

111. Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 319, says the final conquest of al-Rayy was carried out by Qaraẓah b. Ka'b al-Anṣārī during the governorship of Abū Mūsā over al-Kūfah on behalf of 'Uthmān; see Zarrīnkūb, "Conquest," p. 23, erroneously Qurẓat. Ya'qūbī, Tārīkh, II, 157, agrees, this statement coming under the year 23. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, III, 11–12, who, as always, follows Ṭabarī, mentioning without authority Qaraẓah as conqueror. He mentions too a date of 21 for the conquest. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 170; Kāmil, III, 9. 'Umar died from his wounds on Dhū al-Ḥijjah 3, 23/October 13, 644.

112. This Daylamī leader appears as Mūthā in Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 341.

113. Wāj [al-]Rūdh is situated between Hamadhān and Qazwīn. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 341, gives the date of the battle as 29.

114. I vocalize this Persian proper name thus after reference to Justi, Namenbuch, 386. But see cf. Bal'ami Chronique, III, 489, al-Zīnbī; and Hill, Termination, 128, etc., al-Zaynabī.

115. Isfandiyādh was the brother of Rustam b. Farrukhzādh, the Persian general defeated at al-Qādisiyyah. See Zarrīnkūb, "Conquest," 10.

116. That is, 'Iṣmah, Muhalhil, and the three Simāks; see above.

pointed Yazīd b. Qays[117] as his deputy and went to do battle against [the Persians] at the head of his army, coming down upon them at Wāj al-Rūdh. They fought together there vehemently; it was a great battle like Nihāwand, not at all inferior. Great, incalculable numbers were killed, and the bloody struggle between them was no less then [other] great battles. They had already written to 'Umar of the amassing [of forces] against them. He was disturbed at this [assembly of troops at Wāj al-Rūdh] and was worried about the [outcome of the] battle. He expected [news] of them coming through and was taken by surprise only by the message bearing the good news [of the victory]. He said, "Is that someone bearing good news (bashīr)?" The reply was, "[No], it is 'Urwah!"[118] When he repeated his question, ['Urwah] understood and replied, "[Yes], good news (bashīr)!" 'Umar asked if it was the envoy of Nu'aym and was told it was. He asked for the news and was told the good news of the conquest and victory. He gave him [all] the news. ['Umar] praised God and ordered the letter to be read out to the people, and they too praised God. Then Simāk b. Makhramah, Simāk b. 'Ubayd, and Simāk b. Kharashah arrived at the head of the delegations of the Kūfans with the fifths [of booty for the state treasury] to see 'Umar. He asked them their lineage and all three Simāks told him. He said: "God bless you! O God, raise up (usmuk)[119] Islam through them and strengthen them through Islam!"

Dastabā and its frontier regions as far as [the town of] Hamadhān were [treated as] part of [the province of] Hamadhān until the envoy returned to Nu'aym b. Muqarrin with the reply from 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb. [In it he instructed him] to appoint a deputy over Hamadhān, reinforce Bukayr b. 'Abdallāh [in Azerbaijan] by means of Simāk b. Kharashah, proceed to al-Rayy,

---

117. A Yemeni Arḥabī from Hamdān; see below. See also Mad'aj, Yemen, 124, 141, etc.

118. 'Umar actually said, "A-bashīr?" which can mean either "Is that someone bearing good news?" or "Is that Bashīr?" the latter being a man's name. 'Urwah, the messenger, interpreted the question in the latter meaning; hence his reply.

119. 'Umar makes a pun on their name, Simāk. Cf. Bal'ami, Chronique, III, 488.

face their army in battle, and remain there, as it was the most central and unified part of this territory for his purposes. So Nu'aym established Yazīd b. Qays al-Hamdānī in charge of [2652] Hamadhān and marched out from Wāj al-Rūdh with his army to al-Rayy.

Nu'aym recited the following concerning Wāj al-Rūdh:[120]

When I heard that Mūtā[121] and his tribe,
Banū Bāsil,[122] had driven on their Persian armies,[123]
I roused up my armies against them, competing in glory, that I might deny them with my swords my protection.[124]
We brought upon them our steel [armor]—'twas as if we were mountains looming up through the branches of the qalāsim trees.[125]
When we met them in battle at [Wāj al-Rūdh, the valley] wide and abundant in trees, they having already begun to rear up to fight like a champion,
We repelled them at Wāj Rūdh with our force on the morning we inflicted upon [the Persians] one of the great calamities.[126]
They could not endure for any time at all, as death hovered, against our sharp spears[127] and cutting swords.
When their forces scattered, they were like a wall the baked brick of which has crumbled with destroying blows.

---

120. Meter ṭawīl. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 341, quotes lines 1, 5, 6, 8, and 10.

121. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 341, Mūthā; i.e., the ruler of Daylam.

122. This is the claim that the Daylamites are decended from Bāsil b. Ḍabbah. See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 203 ("wa-Bāsilu bnu Ḍabbah, yuqālu inna al-Daylama min waladi-h"); Caskel, Ǧamharat, I, Table 89.

123. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, has khuyūl for junūd, "their Persian cavalry."

124. Nu'aym is here saying that he intends to slay them all and thus will not have to make arrangements for their protection [dhimmah] after the battle.

125. "Mountains" to signify the strength and bulk of the Muslim forces. I am unable to identify qalāsim, nor indeed find this species of tree in the lexica at my disposal.

126. That is, after the defeats of al-Qādisiyyah and Nihāwand, now Wāj [al]-Rūdh.

127. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, reads bi-ḥaddi for li-ḥaddi.

We killed Mūtā there and his army around him;[128]
there was booty there quickly distributed.[129] [2653] We pursued them until they took refuge in their side wadis, slaughtering them as fierce dogs would!
'Twas as if they in Wāj Rūdh and in its wide valley were sheep killed by the gaping wounds from our spears.[130]

Simāk b. Makhramah's name was given to the mosque of Simāk.[131]

Nu'aym repeated the Hamadhān peace document in their case. He left as his deputy in charge of (Hamadhān) Yazīd b. Qays al-Hamdānī. (Nu'aym) himself marched with his armies and reached al-Rayy. The first Daylamites were [descended] from the Arabs, but Nu'aym disputed (this opinion) with them.[132]

The Conquest of al-Rayy[133]

They report [also]: Nu'aym b. Muqarrin left Wāj Rūdh, having laid it waste, at the head of the army [and made] for Dastabā. He departed thence for al-Rayy when (its inhabitants) had assembled together to [stand against] him. Al-Zīnabī Abū al-Farrukhān came out and met him at a place called Qihā[134] to make peace with him in defiance of the ruler of al-Rayy, once he had seen what the Muslims were like, [comparing their attitude] with the envy of Siyāwakhsh and his family. So (al-Zīnabī) came, together with Nu'aym, while the ruler at that time in [2654] al-Rayy was [this] Siyāwakhsh b. Mihrān b. Bahrām Shūbīn.[135]

---

128. Yāqūt reads liffa-hu for jam'a-hu.
129. Yāqūt reads ghānimi for 'ātimi.
130. Yāqūt reads wa-jarri-hi for wa-jawwi-hi in the first hemistich. The second hemistich is fraught with difficulties and the translation tentative: ḍa'īnun aṣābat-hā furūju al-makhārimi. Yāqūt reads aghānat-hā for aṣābat-hā.
131. Masjid Simāk was in al-Kūfah. See Balādhuri, Futūḥ, 284; Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, X, 85; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 125.
132. This is how I interpret wa-kāna awwalu nasli al-Daylami min al-'Arab wa-qāwala-hum fī-hi Nu'aym.
133. Cf. Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 317ff.; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, III, 11; Bal'ami, Chronique, III, 489.
134. A large village between al-Rayy and Qazwīn; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 417.
135. For the man and his ancestors, see Spuler, Iran, 16; Nöldeke, Geschichte, 139 n. 3; Zarrinkūb, "Conquest," 19; EIr, s.v. (Shahbazi).

(Siyāwakhsh) asked the people of Dunbāwand,[136] Ṭabaristān, Qūmis, and Jurjān for their help, saying, "You are already aware that, once these (Muslim troops) have occupied al-Rayy, there will be no place for you." So they [all] mustered to support (Siyāwakhsh). Siyāwakhsh made to attack (al-Zīnabī). They met at the foot of the mountain of al-Rayy to one side of the town and did battle there. Al-Zīnabī had said to Nu'aym: "The enemy is numerous, whereas you are at the head of a small army. Send some cavalry with me. I shall take them into their town, [al-Rayy], by a way in that [even] (the locals) do not know. You attack them, for if (the cavalry) [with me also] comes out against them, they will not stand firm against you." So Nu'aym despatched some cavalry with him by night under the command of his nephew, al-Mundhir b. 'Amr.[137] Al-Zīnabī took them into the town without the enemy's knowing, and Nu'aym launched a surprise attack on (the latter) by night and distracted them away from [the defense of] their town. Battle was joined, and (the enemy) stood firm against (Nu'aym) until they heard the cry [of the cavalry], "God is great," behind them. Then they were put to flight and were killed in such numbers as to be reckoned in fathoms.[138] God gave the Muslims at al-Rayy about the same amount of spoils as those at al-Madā'in. Al-Zīnabī made peace with (Nu'aym) for the inhabitants of al-Rayy, and (Nu'aym) [2655] appointed him governor (marzaba-hu) over them. The honor of al-Rayy continued to be greatest among the family of al-Zīnabī, including Shahrām and Farrukhān.[139] The family of Bahrām[140] fell from grace, and Nu'aym destroyed their town, which was called al-'Atīqah (the Old Town); that is, the town of al-Rayy. Al-Zīnabī gave orders for the building of the new town of al-Rayy.

Nu'aym wrote to 'Umar about the victory that God had

---

136. The great mountain that dominates Ṭabaristān and a small town, modern Damāvand, to the south of the mountain. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 475; Le Strange, Lands, 371.

137. Al-Mundhir b. 'Amr was an early military leader who had fought with the Prophet. See Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, III, 418–19.

138. Arabic qaṣab. See Dozy, Supplément, II, 353; Glossarium, CDXXIV.

139. The two sons of al-Zīnabī; see Justi, Namenbuch, 276.

140. See note 135.

given him, [dispatching the letter] with al-Muḍārib al-'Ijlī.[141] He also sent the fifth parts [of the booty for the state treasury] with 'Utaybah b. al-Nahhās[142] and Abū Mufazzir,[143] along with some Kūfan notables. ['Umar] sent Simāk b. Kharashah al-Anṣārī to reinforce Bukayr b. 'Abdallāh after al-Rayy had been conquered. So Simāk marched off to Azerbaijan as reinforcement for Bukayr. Nu'aym wrote a document for the inhabitants of al-Rayy:

> In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful. The following is what Nu'aym b. Muqarrin has granted to al-Zīnabī b. Qūlah. He has granted him security for the people of al-Rayy and those others with them on [payment of] tribute, as much as each one who has reached puberty can provide annually. They must give good advice and guidance and must not act treacherously or steal. They must provide hospitality to the Muslims for a whole day and a night and show them respect. Anyone who abuses a Muslim or holds him in contempt will be severely punished. Anyone who physically abuses him will be killed. If anyone of them reneges and is not handed over intact, your [whole] community [is deemed to] have reneged.

He wrote [it], and it was witnessed.

[2656] [Nu'aym] was sent messages by the ruler [of Dunbāwand][144] on the subject of peace, offering what would keep him free of [the Muslims], without [Nu'aym's] demanding from him any aid and protection.[145] [Nu'aym] accepted this and drew up a document between the two of them, without any aid [on the part of the people of Dunbāwand] or any assistance against anyone [being made obligatory]. So they got what they asked for as follows.

---

141. Al-Muḍārib al-'Ijlī was a Companion or Follower, who has brief entries in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 166–67; Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, III, 371.

142. Little information appears to be available on 'Utaybah. See Donner, Conquests, 383; Ibn 'Abd Rabbih, 'Iqd, I, 283; Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, II, 47–48.

143. That is, al-Aswad b. Quṭbah, a poet and warrior who was present at al-Qādisiyyah; see Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 171; Translation, XIII, 11.

144. The title maṣmughān has a religious connotation; see CHIr, 199.

145. Arabic, "fī al-sulḥi 'alā shay'in yaftadī bi-hi min-hum min ghayri an yas'ala-hu al-naṣra wa-al-man'ah."

In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful. This is a document from Nu'aym b. Muqarrin to Mardānshāh, ruler of Dunbāwand and the people of Dunbāwand, al-Khuwār,[146] al-Lāriz,[147] and al-Shirriz.[148] You and those who enter [into this agreement] with you will be secure on condition you refrain [from hostile acts] and on condition that you restrain the people of your territory. You will insure yourself [against military action being taken against you] by [paying] 200,000 dirhams, the weight of seven,[149] annually to whoever is governor of your region. You will not be attacked, nor will you be approached save by permission, as long as you remain within these [conditions] [and] unless you renege. If anyone reneges, he will not [be covered by] any agreement, nor will he who does not hand him over.

He wrote [the document] and it was witnessed.

The Conquest of Qūmis[150]

They reported [also]: When Nu'aym wrote of the conquest of al-Rayy, [despatching the news] with al-Muḍārib al-'Ijlī, and when he submitted the fifths [of booty for the state treasury], 'Umar replied to him that he should send Suwayd b. Muqarrin in advance to Qūmis, posting in charge of his vanguard Simāk b. Makhramah, of his flanks 'Utaybah b. al-Nahhās and Hind b. 'Amr al-Jamalī.[151] Suwayd b. Muqarrin mobilized [his army] and moved from al-Rayy on Qūmis. No one showed him any [2657]

146. The westernmost town of Qūmis and the first important place east of al-Rayy. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 394, with no definite article; Le Strange, Lands, 367.

147. The MSS are far from clear here, and these place names are doubtful. Al-Khuwār is possible; see note 146, above. I can find no reference to a place called al-Lāriz in the sources at my disposal. But see EI^{2}, s.v.v. "Lār" and "Lārijān" (Calmard).

148. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 334, has a Shirriz, without the article, but this is a mountain in al-Daylam.

149. That is, every 10 dirhams weighing seven mithqāls. See Sauvaire, "Matériaux," 460; see also Hinz, Masse, 1ff.

150. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 317ff.

151. An unidentified military leader.

hostility, so he took it peacefully and encamped there. When [his army] drank from a river belonging [to the people of Qūmis] called Malādh,[152] they began to suffer from stiff necks, so Suwayd told them to change their [source of] water until they got used to it like the local inhabitants. They did so and found [the new supply] healthy. Those of [the locals] who had taken refuge in Ṭabaristān and those who had sought safe refuges sent [Suwayd] communications. So he called on them to make peace and [pay] tribute, writing to them as follows:

> In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful. This is the guarantee of safety that Suwayd b. Muqarrin has granted to the people of Qūmis and to their followers, for their persons, their religion, and their possessions, on condition that they pay tribute directly,[153] every one of them who has reached puberty according to his capacity [to pay]; also on condition that they give good, not bad, advice, guide [the Muslims], and give hospitality to any Muslims who settle among them for a period of one day and one night with their ordinary food.[154] If they renege and hold their agreement in contempt, then the covenant no longer applies to them.

He wrote [the document] and it was witnessed.

The Conquest of Jurjān[155]

They reported [also]: Suwayd b. Muqarrin encamped at Bisṭām.[156]
[2658] He wrote to the ruler of Jurjān, Ruzbān Ṣūl.[157] [Suwayd] marched

152. I cannot identify River Malādh, but it must be in Qūmis.

153. Arabic, "'an yadin." See Qur'ān, IX:29. That is, directly without involving a third party. A number of interpretations are possible as well as the one given here: "willingly," "by ready money," or "in token of subjection." See Bayḍāwī, Commentarius, in ibid.; Penrice, Dictionary, 164–65. See also Cahen, "Coran IX-29," passim, and Kister "'An yadin," passim.

154. See Qur'ān, V:89.

155. Cf. Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 334ff.

156. A town less than 50 miles northeast of the capital of Qūmis, Dāmghān, it is the second town of the province. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 421–22; Le Strange, Lands, 364–65 and Map V, opposite 185.

157. Ruzbān Ṣūl himself is not further identified. For Ṣūl, see Translation, XXXIII, 44 n. 148.

on (Jurjān) and Ruzbān Ṣūl entered into correspondence with him. (Ruzbān Ṣūl) hastened to make peace with him, (with the provision) that he should pay tribute and that he would save (Suwayd) the trouble of making war on Jurjān; if (Suwayd) were being defeated, (Ruzbān Ṣūl) would give him assistance. (Suwayd) accepted his terms. He was met by Ruzbān Ṣūl before he entered Jurjān, and he went in with him. He encamped there until the collection of the taxes had been carried out and until he had specified (the various) frontier regions (of Jurjān) by name.[158] He allocated the Turks of Dihistān,[159] (to look after) them, removing the tribute from those who remained to defend them and taking taxes from the remainder of the people of (Jurjān). He drew up a document between them and himself as follows:

> In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful. This is a document from Suwayd b. Muqarrin to Ruzbān Ṣūl b. Ruzbān and the people of Dihistān and all of those of Jurjān. You have our covenant, while it is our duty to protect (you), on condition that you pay tribute annually according to your capacity, everyone who has reached the age of puberty. Any one of you whose help we seek shall pay his tribute in the form of assistance he renders instead of his (regular) tribute. The guarantee of safety covers their persons, their possessions, and their religion and laws. Nothing of all this can be broken; it remains in force for them as long as they pay (their dues), guide the traveler, give good advice, provide hospitality to the 158. I translate the Arabic kharāj "taxes." This term and the word jizyah, which alone of the two has appeared in the text so far, were undoubtedly synonymous in early Islam, with the meaning of tribute. The terms were later refined in Islamic law and kharāj took on the technical meaning of land tax. It should be noted, however, that here both terms are to be found in the same paragraph (and are perhaps not synonymous at all) and that, when it comes to the actual document, only jizyah is used. Here, however, Suwayd not only collected the kharāj, but also busied himself with the assessment of the frontier regions (furūj) of Jurjān, as if for the purpose of levying some sort of tax based on the land. For the two terms, see EI^{2}, s.v.v. "djizya" and "kharadj" (Cahen); Ben Shemesh, Taxation, 19–20.

159. An area to the north of Jurjān is clearly meant here, although the name is given several locations in Yāqūt. See Mu'jam, II, 492; Le Strange, Lands, 379–81.

> Muslims, and perpetrate no theft or any treacherous act. He who stays among them has similar rights to theirs. He who leaves remains in safety until he reaches "his place of safety."[160] There is also the condition that anyone abusing a Muslim will be dealt with very severely. Anyone physically abusing him may be killed.[161]

[2659] It was witnessed by Sawād b. Quṭbah,[162] Hind b. 'Amr, Simāk b. Makhramah and 'Utaybah b. al-Nahhās. It was drawn up in the year 18 [January 12, 639–January 2, 640].

But al-Madā'inī[163] reported on the authority of Abū Zayd:[164] Jurjān was conquered in the time of 'Uthmān in the year 30 [September 4, 650–August 24, 651].

The Conquest of Ṭabaristān[165]

[The same sources] continued: The ruler [of Ṭabaristān] sent messages to Suwayd on the subject of a peace on the understanding that they make a formal pact and that [Suwayd] propose terms to him without his being obliged to render help or assistance against anyone. [Suwayd] accepted these terms and gave [the people of Ṭabaristān] what they wanted. He wrote him a document [as follows]:

> In the name of God, the Compassonate, the Merciful. This is a document from Suwayd b. Muqarrin addressed to al-Farrukhān, ruler of Khurāsān in authority over Ṭabaristān and to the ruler (jīl) of Jīlān,[166] our [previous] enemy. You will be secure in God's safekeeping on condition that you restrain your robbers and the people 160. Qur'ān, IX:6.

161. Arabic, "ḥalla damu-h."
162. Sawād b. Quṭbah al-Tamīmī has a brief entry in Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 375, where these events are mentioned.
163. The famous historian 'Alī b. Muhammad (d. ca. 225/839). See Duri, Rise, 48ff.; Rosenthal, Historiography, 69ff.; Sezgin, GAS, I, 314ff.
164. An unidentified narrator.
165. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 334ff.
166. See EI[1], s.v. "Māzyār" [Minorsky]. Jīlān was a small province at the west end of the southern Caspian shore. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 201; Le Strange, Lands, 172 and Map 5, opposite 185.

on the borders of your territory. You will harbor nobody or nothing we are seeking and you will insure yourself [against military action against you] by [paying] anyone governing your border territory 500,000 dirhams, those [in use] in your territory. If you carry [all] this out, none of us will have a right to attack you, or to invade your territory, or [even] to approach you without your permission. Our way to you, provided that we obtain your permission, will be in safety, just as yours [to us] will be. Do not harbor anybody or anything we are seeking. Do not steal what is ours, [as if acting] against an enemy, or carry out any treacherous act. If you do, there will be no pact between us.

It was witnessed by Sawād b. Quṭbah al-Tamīmī, Hind b. 'Amr al-Murādī, Simāk b. Makhramah al-Asadī, Simāk b. 'Ubayd al-'Ansī and 'Utaybah b. al-Nahhās al-Bakrī. It was drawn up in the year 18 [January 12, 639–January 2, 640]. [2660]

The Conquest of Azerbaijan[167]

[The same sources] made [the following] report. When Nu'aym conquered Hamadhān for a second time and marched on al-Rayy from Wāj Rūdh, 'Umar wrote to him, [instructing] him to despatch Simāk b. Kharashah al-Anṣārī to reinforce Bukayr b. 'Abdallāh in Azerbaijan. But [Nu'aym] delayed [the implementation of] this [instruction] until he had taken al-Rayy. Then [Nu'aym] sent [Simāk] from al-Rayy and he marched to join Bukayr in Azerbaijan. Now Simāk b. Kharashah and 'Utbah b. Farqad were two rich Arabs, having [originally] brought their wealth to al-Kūfah. Bukayr had already set off, when he was sent to [Azerbaijan], but, when he came up opposite Jarmīdhāh b. al-Farrukhzādh, fleeing from Wāj Rūdh, advanced on him [and his men]. [This] was the first fighting [Bukayr] encountered in Azerbaijan. They fought and God put [Isfandiyādh's] army to flight; Bukayr took him prisoner. Isfandiyādh asked him whether he preferred peace or war. He replied that he preferred peace. [Isfandiyādh] said, "Keep me with you, for if I make no peace treaty involving the people of Azerbaijan, nor join [them], they will not stand up to you, but will disperse into the surrounding Caucasus mountains and those of Asia Minor (min al-Qabj wa-al-Rūm). Those who can fortify themselves [there] will do so for some time." So [Bukayr] held [Isfandiyādh] with him, keeping him in his control. [All] the area fell to him except [2661] what was fortified. Simāk b. Kharashah joined him as reinforcement, whereas Isfandiyādh [remained] in [Bukayr's] custody, having taken the regions near him, while 'Utbah b. Farqad had taken those near him. Bukayr said to Simāk, when the latter came to him, joking with him, "What am I to do with you and 'Utbah, with two such rich men?! If I obey my instincts, I shall advance and leave you two behind as deputies. But you can remain with me if you so wish, or you can join 'Utbah if you so wish. I give you a free hand, as I see no alternative but to leave you both and go after something more unpleasant than this!"[168] So [Bukayr] sought permission of 'Umar to be excused, and he wrote to [Bukayr], permitting him to advance on al-Bāb[169] and ordering him to appoint a deputy over his province, [Azerbaijan]. So he appointed 'Utbah deputy over the regions he had conquered. [Bukayr] advanced, having handed over Isfandiyādh to 'Utbah, who took him into his entourage. 'Utbah also appointed Simāk b. Kharashah—not Abū Dujānah[170]—over [that part of] Bukayr's province that he had conquered. 'Umar united the whole of Azerbaijan under 'Utbah b. Farqad.

167. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 325ff; Bal'ami, Chronique, III, 494; CHIr, 20.

[The same sources] report [as follows]. Now Bahrām b. al-Farrukhzādh[171] had taken the route to be used by 'Utbah b. Farqad, and he waited for him at the head of his troops until 'Utbah arrived. Battle was joined and 'Utbah defeated [Bahrām] who fled. When the news reached Isfandiyādh, who was in the custody of Bukayr, of Bahrām's defeat and flight, he said, "Now

168. That is, the enemy.

169. That is, Bāb al-Abwāb or simply al-Abwāb, Darband on the west coast of the Caspian. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 303–6; Le Strange, Lands, 180.

170. That is, not the Abū Dujānah Simāk who appears first in Ṭabarī, I, 1395, under the year 3 and several times afterward.

171. An unidentified Azerbaijani ruler.

the peace is complete and war has been brought to an end." So (Bukayr) made peace with (Isfandyādh), and all (the people of Azerbaijan) agreed to this. The country returned to a state of peace. Bukayr and 'Utbah wrote to inform 'Umar of this and sent the fifth of what booty God had granted them. They also [2662] sent out delegations with this news. Bukayr had conquered the regions near him before 'Utbah and peace was [only] complete after 'Utbah's defeat of Bahrām. 'Utbah drew up a document between himself and the people of Azerbaijan in which Bukayr's province was united with his own:

> In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful. This is what 'Utbah b. Farqad, the governor of 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, Commander of the Faithful, has granted to the people of Azerbaijan, mountains and plains, borders and frontiers, all people of whatever religion, viz., security for their persons, their possessions, their religion and laws, on condition that they pay the tribute according to their capacity [to do so]. There is no [such] obligation for minors, or women, or the chronically poor who have nothing of the present world, or religious devotees remaining in isolation who have nothing of the present world. All this [is granted] to them and to those who live with them. But they are obliged to give hospitality to Muslim soldiers for the period of a day and a night and to guide them. Those who are recruited for military service[172] in any one year are exempt the tribute of that year. He who remains [from now on] shall be granted the same [concessions] and have [the same obligations] as he who has remained [permanently], whereas he who leaves has safe-conduct until he finds his place of refuge.

Jundub[173] wrote down [the document], which was witnessed by Bukayr b. 'Abdallāh al-Laythī and Simāk b. Kharashah al-Anṣārī.

---

172. Arabic, "wa-man ḥushira min-hum fī sanatin." It might also be rendered "Those who suffer distress"; that is, drought, crop failure, etc.

173. Jundub is unidentified.

[The document] was drafted in the year 18 [January 12, 639–January 2, 640].

[The same sources] relate [as follows]. In this year also [22; November 30, 642–November 19, 643] 'Utbah brought 'Umar some sweet date mix that he gave him as a gift. Now 'Umar used to require his governors every year to perform the pilgrimage, thereby restraining them from any [act of] tyranny and preventing them from [doing any such thing].

[2663] In this same year [22; November 30, 642–November 19, 643] [the following] took place.

The Conquest of al-Bāb[174]

According to Sayf, they, that is, those whose names I have previously mentioned, reported [as follows]. 'Umar sent Abū Mūsā back to al-Baṣrah and Surāqah b. 'Amr, known as Dhū al-Nūr,[175] to al-Bāb. He appointed over his vanguard 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Rabī'ah who was also known as Dhū al-Nūr. He appointed over one of the wings Ḥudhayfah b. Asīd al-Ghifārī and named for the other Bukayr b. 'Abdallāh al-Laythī, who was already facing al-Bāb before Surāqah b. 'Amr reached him. ('Umar) wrote to (Surāqah), [instructing] him to join up with (Bukayr). ('Umar) also appointed Salmān b. Rabī'ah in charge of the division of the spoils. Surāqah placed 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Rabī'ah in the van and set out immediately behind him. When he had left Azerbaijan on his way to al-Bāb, he came upon Bukayr at the approaches to al-Bāb. He proceeded slowly with him and entered the region of al-Bāb, as 'Umar had planned it. 'Umar sent him Ḥabīb b. Maslamah[176] as reinforcement, having diverted him from al-Jazīrah. He also sent Ziyād b. Ḥanẓalah in (Ḥabīb's) place in charge of al-Jazīrah. When 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Rabī'ah approached the ruler in al-Bāb (he being at that time

174. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil; CHIr, 226.

175. Mentioned in Ṭabarī only in the context of the conquest of al-Bāb. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 127; Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 264.

176. Al-Fihrī, a Companion who figures quite prominently in military matters in later years under 'Uthmān and who supported the first Umayyad caliph, Mu'āwiyah. He died in 42/662. See Ṭabarī, I, 2808, 2893–94, 3062; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 208–9; Tahdhīb, II, 190–91; Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, I, 373.

Shahrbarāz, a Persian who was in control of this frontier area and whose origins were from the family of Shahrbarāz, the ruler who had routed the Israelites and driven them out of al-Shām],[177] Shahrbarāz sent him messages and sought safe-conduct to come to him. ['Abd al-Raḥmān] agreed, and he came [2664] and said, "I am facing a rabid enemy and different communities who are not of noble descent. It is not fitting for the noble and intelligent to assist such people or to ask their help against those of noble descent and origins. Noblemen [stick] close to noblemen, wherever they are. I am certainly not a Caucasian or an Armenian. You have conquered my land and my community. Now I am one of you; I am completely with you and my inclinations are the same as yours. God bless us and you! Our tribute to you will be the military assistance we render you and our carrying out whatever you desire. But do not humiliate us with tribute, so that you render us weak against your enemy." 'Abd al-Raḥmān replied, "There is someone superior to me who has already taken you into his protection; go to him." So he passed him over to Surāqah. When [Shahrbarāz] came to him, he found a similar attitude on his part. Surāqah said, "I accept this for your followers in this enterprise, as long as they continue to be so engaged. But anyone remaining and not moving off [elsewhere] must pay the tribute." [Shahrbarāz] accepted this, and it became the practice for those polytheists who made war on the enemy and for those who had to provide no tribute other than to be ready to fight and were thus exempt from the tribute [altogether] of that particular year.[178] Surāqah wrote to 'Umar [2665] b. al-Khaṭṭāb on this [point of practice], and he gave him his permission to carry it out and [expressed] his approval of it.

Those territories in the mountainous zone comprised only high ground in which the Armenians remained in readiness for a speedy departure. They were only inhabitants from the immediate vicinity or from more distant parts whose high ground 177. Shahrbarāz, the Persian military commander in question is unidentified. For his ancestors, see Nöldeke, Geschichte, 290–92, 294ff., 299ff. I am unable to provide further information on the incident mentioned in the text.

178. Arabic, wa-fī-man lam yakun 'inda-hu al-jizā'u illā an yustanfarū fatūḍa'u 'an-hu jizā'u tilka al-sanah. That is, whether they actually fight or not is immaterial. If they stand ready to fight, they are exempt the tribute.

had been removed from them by raids from lowlanders.[179] The mountain folk among them took to their refuges in their mountains and pulled out of their lowland territories. So only the military and those supporting them or doing business with them remained there. [The Armenians] received a document from Surāqah b. 'Amr [as follows].

> In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful. This is the safe-conduct Surāqah b. 'Amr, governor of the Commander of the Faithful, 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, has granted to Shahrbarāz, the inhabitants of Armenia, and the Armenians [in al-Bāb]. [He grants] them safe-conduct for their persons, their possessions, and their religion lest they be harmed and so that nothing be taken from them. [The following is imposed] upon the people of Armenia and al-Abwāb, those coming from distant parts and those who are local and those around them who have joined them: that they should participate in any military expedition, and carry out any task, actual or potential, that the governor considers to be for the good,[180] providing that those who agree to this are exempt from tribute but [perform] military service. Military service shall be instead of their paying tribute. But those of them who are not needed for military service and who remain inactive have similar tribute obligations to the people of Azerbaijan [in general]. [These include] guiding and showing hospitality for a whole day. If they perform military service, they are exempt from [all] this.
> [2666] If they abandon [the agreement], they will be punished.

179. The translation of these two difficult, and seemingly corrupt, sentences is tentative. The Arabic reads: wa-laysa li-tilka al-bilādi allatī fī sāḥati tilka al-jibāli nabakun lam yuqim al-Armanu bi-hā illā 'ala awfāzin wa-innamā hum sukkānun mimman ḥawla-hā wa-min al-ṭurrā'i ista'ṣalat al-ghāratu nabaka-hā min ahli al-qarār.

180. Arabic, an yanfirū li-kulli ghāratin wa-yanfudhū li-kulli amrin nāba aw lam yanub ra'ā-hu al-wālī ṣalāḥan.

'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Rabī'ah, Salmān b. Rabī'ah and Bukayr b. 'Abdallāh were witnesses. Marḍī b. Muqarrin[181] drafted it and was a witness.

Thereafter Surāqah despatched Bukayr b. 'Abdallāh, Ḥabīb b. Maslamah, Ḥudhayfah b. Asīd, and Salmān b. Rabī'ah to the people of those mountains surrounding Armenia. He also despatched Bukayr to Mūqān,[182] Ḥabīb to Tiflīs,[183] Ḥudhayfah b. Asīd to the people of the mountains of Allān,[184] and Salmān b. Rabī'ah to the other side. Surāqah wrote to 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb of the conquest and of the circumstances in which he despatched these people. So 'Umar learned of something that he did not think would be accomplished for him so quickly and without trouble. It was a vast frontier region in which there were large numbers of [enemy] military, and the Persians were waiting to see what (the Muslims) would do and then would cease fighting or carry it on [further]. When they had settled down and come to appreciate the fairness of Islam, Surāqah died, leaving 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Rabī'ah as his successor, as all the leaders whom Surāqah had despatched had passed on [to other areas] and none of them had conquered what he had been sent to conquer, with the exception of Bukayr. He had scattered [the people of] Mūqān and then they returned, gradually [agreeing to the payment] of tribute. (Bukayr) drew up a document for them [as follows]:

> In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful. This is what Bukayr b. 'Abdallāh has granted to the 181. This secretary is mentioned only here in the text. He is the brother of Nu'aym and Suwayd. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IX, 168, with a reference to this document.

182. Or Mūghān/Mūghkān. The great plain that extends south of the River Aras along the west coast of the Caspian. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 225; Le Strange, Lands, 175–76 and Map 3, 87.

183. Capital of Georgia (Jurjistān) on the upper reaches of the River Kur. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 35–37; Le Strange, Lands, 181.

184. Allān is one of the districts of the Khazars, north of Georgia. Yāqūt simply says that it is an extensive area on the edge of Armenia, near al-Bāb, its people bordering the land of the Khazars. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 8–9; Le Strange, Lands, 179.

people of Mūqān in the Caucasus Mountains: safe-conduct for their possessions, their persons, their religion, and their laws on the payment of tribute, a dinar or its equivalent on every male who has reached puberty. [He must give] sound advice, guidance, and hospitality for a day and a night to the Muslim. They shall have safe-conduct as long as they submit themselves [to these conditions] and give good advice. We also must carry out [2667] [our obligations] in full, and God's help is to be sought. But, if they abandon this [agreement] and their perfidy becomes evident, they shall have no safe-conduct, unless they hand over every one of those who act perfidiously; otherwise they are [all] aiding and abetting one another.

Al-Shammākh b. Ḍirār,[185] al-Rusāris b. Junādib,[186] and Ḥamalah b. Juwayyah[187] were witnesses. It was drafted in the year 21 [December 10, 641–November 30, 642].

[The same sources] have reported [as follows]. When 'Umar heard of the death of Surāqah and that he had made 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Rabī'ah his successor, he confirmed the latter in charge of the frontier region of al-Bāb, ordering him also to attack the Turks. So 'Abd al-Raḥmān set out with his army and passed through al-Bāb. Shahrbarāz asked him what he intended to accomplish, and he replied that he intended [to take] Balanjar.[188] [Shahrbarāz] said, "We are indeed happy that [the people of Balanjar] leave us with al-Bāb." But ['Abd al-Raḥmān] replied, "But we are not happy with this [situation] in our dealings with them until we get at them in their own territory. We have with us men with whose help, if our commander were to allow us to persevere, I would push on to the rampart."[189]

---

185. The famous Qaysī poet. See Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, VIII, 101–8.

186. This unidentified witness features only in this place in the text.

187. A Kinānī mentioned only on one other occasion in the text under the year 14; see Ṭabarī, I, 2236.

188. A town in the territory of the Khazars, north of the River Aras. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 489–90.

189. I take this to refer to the great wall—reportedly built by Anūshirvān in the sixth century A.D.—which ran westward from the town of al-Bāb over the mountains to keep out the warring tribes to the north. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 303; Le Strange, Lands, 180; Barthold, Historical Geography, 229.

(Shahrbarāz) asked who they were, and ('Abd al-Raḥmān) told him they were men who had accompained the Messenger of God and who had intentionally become involved in this enterprise.[190] Before Islam they were men of good conduct and honor, and both qualities had [since] increased. They were still so involved; victory was still theirs until some conqueror could change them and until they could be deflected from their attitude by someone changing them. So ('Abd al-Raḥmān) made one attack on Balanjar in the time of 'Umar, during which no woman was widowed and no child orphaned. During the attack on it his cavalry reached as far as al-Bayḍā', no nearer than 200 [2668] parasangs from Balanjar.[191] Then he attacked [again] and survived. Later, in the time of 'Uthmān, he made many attacks. 'Abd al-Raḥmān was killed when the Kufans rebelled during the time 'Uthmān was Commander of the Faithful, because [the latter] appointed as governors former apostates in order to seek to reform them. But this did not reform them; rather they became more disobedient, led as they were by those seeking [only] this present world. They caused a great deal of trouble for 'Uthmān, and he used [the following verse] as an example [of their obstructive behavior]:[192]

I, with regard to 'Amr, was like a man who fattened up his dog, but he was [nevertheless bitten] by its canine teeth and scratched by its claws!

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Ghuṣn b. al-Qāsim[193] —a man of B. Kināmah[194]—Salmān b. Rabī'ah: When 'Abd al-

190. The "enterprise" I take to mean Islam itself, although it might refer to the conquests being undertaken by the Muslims.

191. Al-Bayḍā' must be a place name here, although I can trace no further reference to it. A parasang is generally reckoned to be 3 miles, see Hinz, Masse, 62, about 6 kilometers.

192. The meter is ṭawīl.

193. Al-Kināmī. He first appears as a narrator in the year 11; see Ṭabarī, I, 1977.

194. I here include the editorial addition from the Leiden apparatus criticus, because al-Ghuṣn b. al-Qāsim was from Banū Kināmah himself and other similar chains of authority include the added phrase. Banū Kināmah is Kināmah b. Khuzaymah, a large tribal confederation of 'Adnān living in the Hejaz. See Kaḥḥālah, Mu'jam, III, 996–97.

Raḥmān b. Rabī'ah penetrated [their ranks], God prevented the Turks from attacking him. They remarked, "This man has dared to attack us only because the angels are with them protecting them from death!" So they retired and fortified themselves against him. But he came back with the spoils and victory, and this was during the time 'Umar was Commander of the Faithful. Then he made several attacks on them during the time of 'Uthmān; he was victorious, as he had been [previously]. Then the Kufans rebelled because 'Uthmān appointed as governors former apostates. After this he attacked them. The Turks blamed one another, one saying to another, "They are not dying!"; he replied that they should keep watch. They did so and lay in ambush for them in the thickets. One of them shot at a Muslim unexpectedly and killed him, upon which his men fled. So [the Muslims] attacked him at that point, and battle was joined. [The Muslims] fought hard and somebody cried out into the [2669] air, "Stand fast, men of 'Abd al-Raḥmān; you are promised paradise!" 'Abd al-Raḥmān fought until he was killed and the two sides stood apart.[195] But then Salmān b. Rabī'ah took up the standard and fought with it. Someone shouted out into the air, "Stand fast, men of Salmān b. Rabī'ah!" Salmān retorted, "Can you see any lack of resolve?!" Then he went forth with the army. Salmān and Abū Hurayrah al-Dawsī[196] attacked Jīlān and passed through it to arrive in Jurjān. The Turks showed their daring after this and felt no restraint in taking up the body of 'Abd al-Raḥmān, using his [name] until now to seek rain.[197]

According to 'Amr b. Ma'dī Karib—Maṭar b. Thalj al-Tamīmī:[198] I went in to see 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Rabī'ah in al-Bāb, when Shahrbarāz was with him. A man in a state of fatigue

---

195. Arabic, "wa-inkashafa al-nās." I take this difficult phrase to indicate a temporary lull in the fighting after 'Abd al-Raḥmān's death. For this meaning of the Arabic verb, see Dozy, Supplément, II, 470.

196. Famous in particular as a narrator (d. ca. 58/677). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XII, 262–67; *EI*², s.v. [Robson]; Rosenthal, Historiography, 334.

197. It is a common practice even to this day throughout the Middle East to pray for rain in times of drought. These non-Muslim Turks presumably had some kind of rain-seeking ceremony during which 'Abd al-Raḥmān's name was invoked. See *EI*², s.v. "istisḳā'" [Fahd].

198. Maṭar b. Thalj al-Tamīmī, an unidentified narrator. The name means Rain, son of Snow! He appears only in this context in the text.

and emaciation arrived and came in to see 'Abd al-Raḥmān. He sat down next to Shahrbarāz. Now Maṭar was wearing a cloak of striped Yemeni cloth with a reddish ground and black figuring or reddish figuring and a black ground. (The man and Shahrbarāz) questioned one another. Then Shahrbarāz said (to 'Abd al-Raḥmān), "Commander, do you know where this man has come from? I sent him some years ago to the wall[199] to examine what it and the people on the other side of it were like. I gave him great wealth and wrote on his behalf to those (in authority) in [2670] the territories adjoining mine, presenting each with a gift and asking him to write on (my envoy's) behalf to the next one. I gave him a gift for each ruler, and he carried all this out in the case of every ruler until he finally reached the one in whose own land the wall was situated. So (the ruler) wrote on (the envoy's) behalf to his governor of this area, and (the envoy) reached (the governor). (The latter) sent with him his austringer, carrying his eagle, and (the envoy) gave him a piece of silk." (The envoy) reported, "The austringer thanked me, and we eventually arrived at two mountains with a wall in between them that was level with them and even went higher. In front of the wall was a ditch, blacker than night because it was so deep. I looked at all of this and examined it carefully. Then I made to go away. The austringer told me to wait and he would recompense me and that no successive ruler (in this land) ever failed to draw closer to God by bringing with him the best of what he had of this present world and casting it down into this narrow defile. So he cut up a lump of meat that he had with him and threw it into this empty space. The eagle swooped down after it, and he said, 'If she takes it before it falls (to the bottom), there is no (bottom)! But, if she does not, then there is a (bottom there).' The eagle emerged and came to us carrying the meat in her talons. Inside there was a precious stone, which he gave me—and this is it." Shahrbarāz took it, a ruby, and handed it over to 'Abd al-Raḥmān. He looked at it, then returned it to Shahrbarāz, [2671] who said, "This is indeed worth more than this town, al-Bāb. I swear by God, I would rather you be in power than the family of the Persian emperor. Were I in their power and then they heard news of (the ruby), they would snatch it away from me. I swear by God, nothing will stand in your way as long as you remain true to your word and your great ruler does likewise."[200] 'Abd al-Raḥmān turned to the envoy and said, "What was this rampart like?" He replied that [it was like] the garment this man was wearing. And (Maṭar) said, "And he looked at my garment." Maṭar b. Thalj said to 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Rabī'ah, "The man has certainly told the truth! He has been and seen for himself." He replied, "Yes indeed, he has given a description of iron and brass," and he recited "Bring me pieces of iron" right to the end of the verse.[201] 'Abd al-Raḥmān said to Shahrbarāz, "How much was your gift worth?" He replied, "The value of 100,000 in my own country and 3,000,000 or more in these parts."

199. See note 189.

Al-Wāqidī claimed that Mu'āwiyah launched a summer campaign this year and penetrated into Byzantine territory at the head of 10,000 Muslims.

Some authorities report that the death of Khālid b. al-Walīd took place this year.

In [this year] Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah[202] and 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān[203] were born.

During this year 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb led the pilgrimage. His [2672] governor of Mecca was 'Attāb b. Asīd.[204] Ya'lā b. Umayyah[205] [was governor] of the Yemen. Those who were his governors in the previous year whom we have already mentioned [remained] in charge of the rest of the Muslim garrison towns.

---

200. That is, the caliph himself, 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb.

201. See Qur'ān, XVIII:94–97. This is the story of Dhū al-Qarnayn (*EI*², s.v. "al-Iskandar" [Watt]), who keeps out Gog and Magog by building between two mountains a wall made of iron and molten brass. The words sadd and radm used here in the text are both found in this passage in the Qur'ān.

202. The second Umayyad caliph (60–64/680–683).

203. The famous fifth Umayyad caliph (65–86/685–705). See *EI*², s.v. (Gibb).

204. It would seem that 'Attāb b. Asīd b. Abī al-'Īṣ b. Umayyah b. 'Abd Shams remained governor of Mecca from its conquest by the Prophet in 8/629 right through to this year, 22. See Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, II, 440 (Guillaume, Life, 568); Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 889; *EI*², s.v. (ed.).

205. Ya'lā b. Umayyah/Munyah al-Tamīmī died at Ṣiffīn in 37/657 after twenty-four years as governor in the Yemen. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 399; Rāzī, Ṣan'ā', 69–70; Mad'aj, Yemen, 141 and table 4, 148. See also note 781, below.

During this year 'Umar equalized [the material benefits of] the conquests carried out by the Kufans and Basrans.

Information on ['Umar's Division of the Conquered Lands]

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Muhallab, 'Amr and Sa'īd: 'Ammār b. Yāsir remained as governor of al-Kūfah for a whole year and part of another during the caliphate of 'Umar. 'Umar b. Surāqah, at that time governor of al-Baṣrah, wrote to 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, indicating to him how large the population of al-Baṣrah was and how little land tax they received and requesting that he add one of the two Māhs or Māsabadhān to them [as a source of land tax].[206] News of this reached the Kufans, and they asked 'Ammār to write on their behalf to 'Umar, [proposing] that Rāmahurmuz[207] and Īdhaj[208] become theirs [for the purpose of land tax] to the exclusion of [the Basrans], who did not assist them in any way in [fighting against] these two places and who did not join them until they had already conquered them. But 'Ammār replied that he could do nothing about the whole matter. 'Uṭārid[209] said to him, "Why do you not give us [the revenue from] our immovable booty, you slave with the mutilated ear!" He replied, "Now you abuse my good ear!"[210] and he [refused to] write concerning this matter. He was therefore hated by them. When the Kufans were adamant that they should [continue] the dispute concerning the two [places] with the Basrans, certain people gave evidence to [the Basrans] that Abū Mūsā had granted the people of 206. The two Māhs are Nihāwand and Dīnawar. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 48; Le Strange, Lands, 189, 197. Māsabadhān is that part of the Jibāl province due south of Kurdistān. See Le Strange, Lands, 202 and Map 5, opposite 185.

207. A town a little east of al-Ahwāz in Khūzistān. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 17–18; Le Strange, Lands, 243.

208. A town a little north of Rāmahurmuz in Khūzistān. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 288–89; Le Strange, Lands, 245 and Map 2, opposite 25.

209. 'Uṭārid b. Ḥājib b. Zurārah b. 'Udas/'Udus, a leader of Banū Tamīm. He was a member of the Tamīmī delegation to the Prophet in 9/630. See Ṭabarī, I, 1710–11; Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, II, 560–61 [Guillaume, Life, 628]; Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 975.

210. Arabic la-qad sababta aḥabba udhunayya ilayya. That is, "I don't want to hear any more of this!" 'Ammār had lost an ear at the battle of al-Yamāmah; see EI^{2}, s.v. "'Ammār" [Reckendorf].

[2673] Rāmahurmuz and Īdhaj safe-conduct and that the Kufans and the army of al-Nu'mān [b. Muqarrin] had corresponded with them while they were [enjoying this] safe-conduct. 'Umar permitted them to do this to them and for the benefit of the Basrans had his authorization duly witnessed. The Basrans laid claim to certain settlements in Iṣfahān that Abū Mūsā had conquered on this side of Jayy when 'Umar had sent [the Basrans] as reinforcements to [the Kufans] under the command of 'Abdallāh b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Itbān. The Kufans said: "You came to us as reinforcements when we had already conquered the area, but we shared the spoils with you. The covenant is ours; the land is ours." 'Umar confirmed that they were right. Then the Basrans who had taken part in the battles and who were at al-Qādisiyyah took up another matter, saying, "Let them give us our share of their main body of cultivated land and that on its periphery in which we participated with them." 'Umar asked them if they would be satisfied with Māh,[211] at the same time asking the Kufans if they would approve his granting [the Basrans] one of the two Māhs. [212] They replied that he should do as he thought fitting. So he granted them Māh Dīnār[213] with its share for those of them who had taken part in the battles and who were at al-Qādisiyyah as far as the district of al-Baṣrah and Mihrajānqadhaq.[214] All this was for those Basrans who took part in the battles and who were at al-Qādisiyyah. Mu'āwiyah [when he was governor of Syria] was the one who garrisoned Qinnasrīn with a military force from the Iraqs that had refused [to serve 'Alī further] in the latter's time.[215] Qinnasrīn was simply one of the rural districts of Ḥimṣ until Mu'āwiyah made it into a garrison town and garrisoned it with those who had left al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah at that time and he took for them, as their share for the conquests of Iraq, Azerbaijan, Mosul, and al-Bāb, and brought them all together. The population of al-Jazīrah and [2674] Mosul were at that time floating, mixed with all those of the

211. That is, Nihāwand, also known as Māh al-Baṣrah.

212. That is, Nihāwand and Dīnawar. See note 206, above.

213. Māh Dīnār is Nihāwand. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 49.

214. Mihrajānqadhaq is the second of the two parts of the Jibāl province due south of Kurdistān. See Le Strange, Lands, 202 and Map V, opposite 185.

215. Rāfiḍah is not to be taken here in its later meaning; viz., a term of abuse used by the Sunnīs of the Shī'īs.

two areas [al-Baṣrah and al-Kūfah] who had not emigrated [to participate in the conquests]. Al-Bāb, Azerbaijan, al-Jazīrah, and Mosul were conquered by the Kufans.[216] When Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān was appointed governor [of Syria], all this was transferred to those of them who had moved to Syria in the time of 'Alī and to those with whom al-Jazīrah and Mosul were populated who had not emigrated [to participate in the conquests] in the time of 'Alī.

At the time of Mu'āwiyah['s governorship of Syria] the people of Armenia were unbelievers.[217] [Mu'āwiyah] had made Ḥabīb b. Maslamah commander of al-Bāb, he being at that time in Jurzān.[218] He entered into correspondence with the inhabitants of Tiflīs and those mountain areas, but then he fought against them until they indicated their obedience [to him] and obtained an agreement from him. After he had corresponded with them, he wrote to them [as follows]:

> In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful. From Ḥabīb b. Maslamah to the people of Tiflīs in Jurzān, the land of al-Hurmuz.[219] You are at peace. I commend God to you. There is no other god than He. Your envoy, Taflī, has come to us, has brought your message, and has delivered [the gifts] you sent. Taflī has mentioned that, according to your reckoning, we used not to be one community, and indeed we were not thus until God gave us guidance in the form of Muḥammad and strengthened us with Islam after we had been few, lowly, and ignorant. Taflī has mentioned that you desire [2675] > to be at peace with us, and those who believe with me and I are not averse to this. I send you 'Abd al-

216. Ṭabarī presents the temporal clause [Arabic, wa-lammā waliya Mu'āwiyatu bnu Sufyān], which I have relegated in translation to the following sentence, before the three previous sentences that are explanatory material in parenthesis.

217. Although there had been earlier attacks on Armenia by the Muslim forces, it is clear that the major onslaught, led by Ḥabīb came in 24/645 or 31/652 during the caliphate of 'Uthmān. See Ṭabarī, I, 2808, 2871; Translation, XV, 10–11, 78; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 197.

218. Georgia, regarded by Yāqūt as that part of Armenia the chief town of which is Tiflīs. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 125; Le Strange, Lands, Map III, opposite 87; Minorsky, Studies, map, 79.

219. That is, the local ruler.

> Raḥmān b. Jaz' al-Sulamī,[220] who is one of our most knowledgeable religious and Qur'anic scholars. With him I send my document granting you safe-conduct. If you agree, he will hand it over to you; if you do not, he will "declare war" on you "fairly; God does not love the treacherous."[221]

[The document:]

> In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful. This is a document from Ḥabīb b. Maslamah to the people of Tiflīs in Jurzān, the land of al-Hurmuz, [granting you] safe-conduct for your persons, your possessions, your religious buildings (ṣawāmi'), your places of worship, and your prayers, with the imposition of a small tribute, a whole dinar on every household. We [in turn shall have] your good counsel, your help against God's and our enemy, your hospitality for one night for the passerby, [providing] the permitted food and drink of the People of the Book, and guidance along the way insofar as none of you thereby comes to any harm. If you become Muslims, pray, and pay alms; then we shall [all] be brethren within Islam, and [you will be] our clients. But he who turns his back on God, His apostles, His books, and His partisans, we shall "declare war" on you "fairly; God does not love the treacherous."

'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Khālid,[222] al-Ḥajjāj,[223] and 'Iyāḍ[224] were witnesses, and Rabāḥ[225] wrote, "And I call God, His angels, and 220. This scholar remains unidentified, and there is no other mention of him in the text.

---

221. Qur'ān, VIII:58.

222. That is, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Khālid b. al-Walīd al-Makhzūmī, son of the famous early Muslim general, Khālid b. al-Walīd. He died in 46/666, supposedly poisoned at the instruction of a jealous Mu'āwiyah. See Ṭabarī, II, 82–83; Translation, XVIII, 88–89.

223. An unidentified witness.

224. Both the Leiden and Cairo indexes indicate that this is 'Iyāḍ b. Ghanm al-Fihrī, later governor in the Jazīrah and Muslim leader in Syria, who died after 31/651. See Ṭabarī, I, 2505, 2865–66; Translation, XIII, 86; Translation, XV, 72–73. Ibn al-Athīr (Usd, IV, 164–66), however, and Ibn Sa'd (Ṭabaqāt, IV, 269; VII, 398) insist that 'Iyāḍ died in 20/641.

225. A witness mentioned only here in the text.

those who believe to witness; 'God is sufficient as a witness.' "[226]

In this year [22; November 30, 642–November 19, 643] [2676] 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb reportedly removed 'Ammār from al-Kūfah and appointed Abū Mūsā governor. We have, however, already mentioned above what al-Wāqidī had to say on this subject.[227]

The Reason for [the Dismissal of 'Ammār]

I have already mentioned part of the reason for his dismissal, and [now] I shall report on the remainder. According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—those of his shaykhs I have already mentioned:[228] The people of al-Kūfah, this 'Uṭārid, and others with him wrote to 'Umar about 'Ammār, "He is no commander and cannot cope with the situation in which he finds himself." The Kufans put pressure on him, so 'Umar wrote to 'Ammār, [telling him to] present himself. He set out with a delegation of Kufans, taking with him [only] those whom he considered to be his supporters. But they were more against him than those left behind. He became worried and was asked. "What is worrying you, Abū al-Yaqẓān?" He admitted it was something that he was not proud of, but he had indeed been so afflicted.[229] Now Sa'd b. Mas'ūd al-Thaqafī,[230] the uncle of al-Mukhtār, and Jarīr b. 'Abdallāh[231] were with him, and they spread rumors about him and told 'Umar things [about him] of which he disapproved. So 'Umar dismissed him and gave him no [other] governorship.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Walīd b. Jumay'[232]

---

226. Qur'ān, IV:79 and XLVIII:28.

227. See above, note 23.

228. That is, Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Muhallab, 'Amr, and Sa'īd. See note 4, above.

229. Arabic, fa-jazi'a fa-qīla la-hu yā Abā al-Yaqẓān mā hādhā al-jaza'u fa-qāla wa-Allāhi mā uḥmidu nafsī 'alay-hi wa-laqad ubtulītu bi-h.

230. See Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 295. Al-Mukhtār is al-Mukhtār b. Abī 'Ubayd b. Mas'ūd al-Thaqafī, born in the first year of the Hijrah (Ṭabarī, I, 1264; Translation, VII, 10) and leader of the Alid movement in al-Kūfah in 64/683 (Ṭabarī, II, 520ff.; Translation, XX, 105ff.).

231. Al-Bajalī, died ca. 54/674. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 76–77; Tahdhīb, II, 73–75; Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, I, 279–80; Hill, Termination, 103ff.

232. An unidentified narrator.

—Abū al-Ṭufayl:[233] 'Ammār was asked if he was displeased by his dismissal. He replied that he had not in any way been pleased when he was appointed governor, but he was displeased when he was dismissed.

[2677] According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Ismā'īl b. Abī Khālid[234] and Mujālid[235]—al-Sha'bī: 'Umar asked the Kufans which of their two settlements they liked better, that is, al-Kūfah or al-Madā'in. He added, "I am asking you, but I can indeed see in your faces which one of them is preferred." Jarīr replied that the nearer settlement of theirs, [al-Madā'in], was closer to the [fertile] Sawād land, whereas the other was [a place, as if] by the sea, of exhausting, intense heat, with mosquitoes. 'Ammār retorted that he was lying, but 'Umar told him he was a bigger liar than [Jarīr]. ['Umar] also asked them what they thought of their commander, 'Ammār. Jarīr answered that he was indeed inadequate and deficient, with no knowledge of management.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Zakariyyā' b. Siyāh[236]—Hishām b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Thaqafī:[237] Sa'd b. Mas'ūd said, "You, ['Ammār], have no idea of what [territories] you are governor!" 'Umar asked ['Ammār] of what [territories] he had made him governor. 'Ammār replied "Of al-Ḥīrah and its region."[238] ['Umar] said that he had heard of al-Ḥīrah from merchants going frequently to and from there. ['Umar] asked of what [else he was governor]. ['Ammār] replied, "Of Babylon and its region."[239] ['Umar] said, "You have heard mention of it in the Qur'ān!" ['Umar] further asked of what [else he was governor]. "Of al-Madā'in and its surrounding areas," ['Ammār] replied. ['Umar] asked him if this was the Ctesiphon of the Sasanian emperor, and he replied that it was. ['Umar] asked 233. 'Āmir b. Wāthilah, a narrator who died in the early second/eighth century. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 82–84.

---

234. D. 146/763. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 291ff.

235. Mujālid b. Sa'īd b. 'Umayr (d. 144/762). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 39–41.

236. An unidentified narrator.

237. An unidentified narrator.

238. A settlement near al-Kūfah, capital of the Lakhmids and dating from pre-Islamic times. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam II, 328ff.; Le Strange, Lands, 75 and Map 2, 25; *EI*², s.v. (Shahid).

239. About 50 miles south of Baghdad in Iraq; Arabic, Bābil. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 309ff.; Le Strange, Lands, 72; *EI*², s.v. "Bābil" (Awad).

him of what [else he was governor]. ('Ammār) replied, "Of Mihrajānqadhaq and its region."[240] (Sa'd and his companions) said, "We have already told you that he does not know of what [territories] you have sent him [as governor]. So ('Umar) dismissed ('Ammār). He later summoned him and asked him if he had been displeased when he had dismissed him. ('Ammār) replied that he had been in no way happy when he sent him [as governor], but that he was indeed displeased when he dismissed him. ('Umar) commented, "I knew you were not a governor, but [2678] I gave meaning [to the following]: "We wished to show favor to those who were considered weak on earth, make them examples, and make them the inheritors."[241]

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Khulayd b. Dhafarah al-Namarī[242]—his father with an account similar to this and more: ('Umar) asked ('Ammār) if he was inviting approval of himself because of his knowledge of those with whom he had been dealing since his arrival. He added, "You will stop at no limit, 'Ammār, with the result that [this] puts you in a weak position; indeed, if age comes upon you, you will certainly grow weak, and if you are weak, you will indeed be sorely tested. Then ask God for death." Then ('Umar) turned to the Kufans and asked them whom they wanted. They replied, "Abū Mūsā." So ('Umar) appointed him their commander after 'Ammār. He remained their governor for a year. But his servant sold fodder and al-Walīd b. 'Abd Shams[243] heard (Abū Mūsā) say, "I have never kept company with any people without honoring them. Only my association with the witnesses of al-Baṣrah has prevented me from calling them liars.[244] If I befriend you, I shall certainly bring you goodness." Al-Walīd said, "No one other than you has taken away our land; you will certainly not [continue] as our governor." So he and others with him left [al-Kūfah], saying that they had no need of Abū Mūsā. ('Umar)

240. 'Umar had in fact given Mibrajānqadhaq to the Basrans; see p. 44 and note 213, above.

241. Qur'ān, II:102. See p. 44, note 213, above.

242. An unidentified narrator.

243. Al-Walīd b. 'Abd Shams, a Qurashī noble, has brief notices in Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, V, 90, and Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, X, 311.

244. I am unable to clarify this obscure remark.

asked [them] why. They replied, "He has a servant who deals in the fruits of our land!" So ('Umar) dismissed him and sent him [2679] to al-Baṣrah. He also sent 'Umar b. Surāqah to al-Jazīrah. He said to the Kufan followers of Abū Mūsā who went with him when he was dismissed, "Do you prefer someone strong and tough or someone weak, but a believer?" But he got no response from them. So ('Umar) went off on his own to a part of the mosque and went to sleep. Al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah came to him and stood watch over him until he woke up. Then he said, "You have acted in this way, Commander of the Faithful, only because of something very serious. Has some disaster overtaken you?" He replied, "What is happening is more disastrous than 100,000 who are not pleased with a commander, when he is not pleased with them." And he went on for some time on this subject. (Al-Kūfah was originally founded for 100,000 troops.) ('Umar's) followers came to him and asked him what was on his mind. He told them it was the Kufans whose problem was causing him some distress. 'Umar repeated his request for advice from them as before, and al-Mughīrah gave him his answer. He said, "The weak Muslim's weakness is not in your interests, nor in those of the other Muslims [as well as his own]. His excellence [by being a Muslim] is [only] in his own interests. The strong, tough man's strength is in your interests and those of the other Muslims [as well as his own], whereas his toughness works both against him and in his favor." So ('Umar) sent (al-Mughīrah) [as governor] over (the Kufans).

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh—Sa'īd b. 'Amr:[245] 'Umar, before appointing al-Mughīrah governor, asked what his opinion was of making someone [2680] governor who was weak, but a Muslim, as opposed to someone strong and tough. Al-Mughīrah replied, "The faith of a weak Muslim works [only] in his own interests, whereas his weakness works against your interests. The toughness of a strong, tough man will work in his own interests and his strength in those of the Muslims." ('Umar) told him he was sending him [as governor to al-Kūfah]. Al-Mughīrah was in this position until 'Umar died, that is something more than two years. When al-Mughīrah was taking his leave (of 'Umar) to go to al-Kūfah, he said to him, "Let the pious trust you and the wicked fear you, Mughīrah." Later 'Umar wanted to send Sa'd [b. Abī Waqqāṣ] as governor in place of al-Mughīrah, but he was killed before he could do this, leaving the recommendation [that Sa'd should become governor]. Now it was 'Umar's practice and habit to require his governors to make the pilgrimage every year; [this was] for the purpose of good management, to isolate them in this way from their subjects and to provide a time for their subjects to complain and an objective that they could thus accomplish.

245. Sa'īd b. 'Amr b. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ, a Qurashī scholar in al-Kūfah. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 68.

In this year [22; November 30, 642–November 19, 643] according to some reports, al-Aḥnaf b. Qays attacked Khurāsān and made war on Yazdajird. Sayf, however, reported that al-Aḥnaf moved against Khurāsān in the year 18 [January 12, 639–January 2, 640].

Yazdajird's Journey to Khurāsān and the Reason for It

Historians (ahl al-siyar) differ in the reason [they give] for this and how the whole affair happened. There is Sayf's account of this on the authority of his [previous] authorities. Al-Sarī wrote to me on the matter—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Muhallab and 'Amr: Yazdajird b. Shahriyār b. Kisrā, who was at that time ruler of Persia, made for al-Rayy when the [2681] forces at Jalūlā'[246] were defeated. A single litter that could fit on to the back of his camel was provided for him, so as the journey progressed, he could sleep and he did not [need to] camp with his army. While he was asleep in his litter, they brought him to a ford. They woke him up so that he might be aware [of what was happening] and not be afraid when the camel forded over, [as he would be] if he were awakened from sleep. But he reproached (his men), saying, "You were wrong to do this! If you had left me alone, I would have found out how long this [Islamic] community will last. I saw in a dream Muḥammad and myself speaking together alone in the presence of God. (God) told (Muḥammad) that he would give them 100 years' power. He asked for more and (God) made it 110 years. (Again Muḥammad) asked for more and (God) made it 120 years. (Again Muḥammad) asked for more and (God) granted it, but then you woke me up. If you had left me alone, I would have found out how long this community will last!"

246. A town about 70 miles east of Sāmarrā, on the route from Baghdad to Ḥulwān. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 156; Le Strange, Lands, 62 and Map II, opposite 25. The defeat here referred to is that of the Persians at the hands of the Muslim forces under Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ in 16/637. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 264ff.; Ṭabarī, I, 2456ff. (Translation, XIII, 36ff.); Zarrīnkūb, "Conquest," 13.

When he finally reached al-Rayy, where Ābān Jādhawayh was governor, (the latter) seized him and took him prisoner. (Yazdajird) accused him of acting treacherously toward him. He replied, "No, rather you have abandoned your empire, and it has fallen into the hands of someone else. I [only] want to record everything that is mine and nothing more." He took Yazdajird's seal, produced some parchment and made some written statements and records of every thing he wanted. Then he placed the seal on them and returned it. Later he approached Sa'd, and (the latter) returned to him everything [listed] in his document. When Ābān Jādhawayh treated Yazdajird in this way, the latter [2682] left al-Rayy for Iṣfahān, expressing a hatred for Ābān Jādhawayh as he fled from him and not trusting him. He decided to go to Kirmān, taking his fire[247] and intending to install it there. Later he decided to make for Khurāsān. He arrived in Marw[248] and settled there, having also brought his fire, for which he erected a building. He set up a cultivated area and built a passage 2 parasangs long from Marw. It was exactly 2 parasangs. He felt secure within himself and secure from approach. From Marw he corresponded with those Persians remaining in those areas not conquered by the Muslims. They expressed their obedience to him, and finally he induced the people of Fārs and followers of 247. Arabic simply reads nār, fire. I take this to be some kind of sacred flame used in his practice of Zoroastrianism.

248. A famous town about 240 miles due north of Herat, one of the capitals of the Khurāsān province and standing on the River Murghāb. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, Marw al-Shāhijān, V, 112ff.; Le Strange, Lands, 398ff.; EI^{2}, s.v. (Bosworth).

al-Hurmuzān to rebel [against the Muslims], and the people of al-Jibāl and the followers of al-Fayruzān did likewise. This it was that induced 'Umar to permit the Muslims to penetrate farther. The armies of al-Baṣrah and al-Kūfah pushed on farther with the result that they decisively conquered the whole area.

Al-Aḥnaf left for Khurāsān, took Mihrajānqadhaq, then left for Iṣfahān, while the Kufans were besieging Jayy. He entered Khurāsān from al-Ṭabasayn[249] and took Herat[250] by force. He appointed as his deputy there Ṣuḥār b. Fulān al-'Abdī,[251] then marched on Marw al-Shāhijān. He dispatched to Naysābūr,[252] there being no intervening battle, Muṭarrif b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Shikhkhīr,[253] and to Sarakhs[254] al-Ḥārith b. Ḥassān.[255] When al-Aḥnaf drew near to Marw al-Shāhijān, Yazdajird left it for [2683]
Marw al-Rūdh[256] and remained there, while al-Aḥnaf remained

249. For the conquest of Khurāsān, see Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 403ff. Al-Aḥnaf was approaching from the southwest. The dual form, al-Ṭabasayn, is not infrequently used for one of the two towns called Ṭabas, Ṭabas al-Tamr and Ṭabas al-'Unnāb. The two are about 200 miles apart, al-Tamr in the west, al-'Unnāb in the southwest of Qūhistān. Assuming he could march through the Great Desert, more or less as the crow flies, al-Aḥnaf would have passed through Ṭabas al-Tamr on his way from Iṣfahān to Herat. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 20; Le Strange, Lands, 359ff. and Map 8, opposite 335.

250. The famous town in present-day Afghanistan. The town sits on the River Herat in the southwest of the province of Khurāsān and was chief town of one of its quarters. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 396–97; Le Strange, Lands, 407–9, 429–31; EI^{2}, s.v. [Frye].

251. That is, from 'Abd al-Qays. Perhaps his father's name was Ṣakhr, see the Leiden apparatus criticus, Ṭabarī, I, 2682, note o. He figures as a narrator under the year 17, Ṭabarī, I, 2537, and later sub anno 23, I, 2707, delivering the fifths to the caliph from Makrān. There is brief mention of Ṣuḥār b. Ṣakhr in Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, V, 126.

252. In the west of Khurāsān and a chief town of one of its quarters. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 331–33; Le Strange, Lands, 382ff. and Map VIII, opposite 335.

253. Al-Ḥarashī. If this is the Basran jurist who died ca. 86/705, he must have been very young at this time. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 173–74; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 288.

254. A town on the River Herat in Khurāsān, situated about 100 miles east of Naysābūr. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 208–9; Le Strange, Lands, 395ff. and Map 8, opposite 335.

255. Al-Dhuhlī. A Muslim leader who is reported as assuming various military tasks during the conquests. See Ṭabarī, I, 2475, 2477 etc.; Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, I, 323–25; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 152–53; Tahdhīb, 139.

256. About 150 miles south of Marw on the River Murghāb in Khurāsān. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 112; Le Strange, Lands, 397ff. and Map VIII, opposite 335.

in Marw al-Shāhijān. While he was in Marw al-Rūdh, Yazdajird wrote to the ruler of the Turks (khāqān)[257] asking for reinforcements and to the ruler of Soghdia[258] for the same reason. His two envoys to ruler of the Turks and the ruler of Soghdia departed, and he wrote also to the ruler of China asking for assistance. Al-Aḥnaf, when Kufan reinforcements had joined him under the command of four commanders, 'Alqamah b. al-Naḍr al-Naḍrī, Rib'ī b. 'Āmir al-Tamīmī, 'Abdallāh b. Abī 'Uqayl al-Thaqafī, and Ibn Umm Ghazāl al-Hamdānī,[259] departed from Marw al-Shāhijān, leaving Ḥātim b. al-Nu'mān al-Bāhilī[260] as his deputy there. He marched on Marw al-Rūdh. However, when Yazdajird heard of this, he left for Balkh.[261] Al-Aḥnaf stayed in Marw al-Rūdh, sending the Kufans on to Balkh. Al-Aḥnaf followed on after them; and the Kufans and Yazdajird met in battle in Balkh, and God defeated the latter, who made for the river at the head of his Persian army and crossed it. Al-Aḥnaf joined up with the Kufans, when God had already given them victory. So Balkh was one of the victories of the Kufans.

The combatants of Khurāsān between Naysābūr and Ṭukhāristān,[262] in what used to be the territory of the Persian emperor, followed one after the other to make peace, those who had fled and those who had made fortified positions. Al-Aḥnaf returned to Marw al-Rūdh where he remained, having made Rib'ī b. 'Āmir his deputy in charge of Ṭukhāristān. It is he 257. For the title khāqān, see EI[2], s.v. (Boyle).

258. May be taken in the wider sense to cover the area between the rivers Oxus and Jaxartes, of which Bukhārā and Samarqand were the chief towns, or more narrowly the district around Samarqand. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 409–10; Le Strange, Lands, 460ff. and Map IX, opposite 433.

259. Four Muslims leaders sent in 17/638 by 'Umar to reinforce al-Aḥnaf on the eastern front. See Ṭabarī, I, 2569.

260. A Muslim leader who appears in various military roles later in the text. See Ṭabarī, I, 2886–88 etc.

261. Chief town of the fourth quarter of Khurāsān. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 479–80; Le Strange, Lands, 420ff. and Map VIII, opposite 335.

262. A large district of Khurāsān stretching to the east of Balkh on the south side of the River Oxus. Cf. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 23; Le Strange, Lands, 426–27 and Map 8, opposite 335.

about whom al-Najāshī recited the following, linking his name with his mother who was a noble Arab:[263]

Oh, many's the one who is called a young brave who is not really so! [2684]
Oh, Rib'ī b. Ka's is a real young brave![264] [Standing] tall [above them], when those sitting in the yard of his house have taken their fill of what is left in his bowl, he gives them to drink.

Al-Aḥnaf wrote to 'Umar of the conquest of Khurāsān and ['Umar] said, "I wish I had not sent an army there. I wish there were a sea of fire between us."[265] 'Alī asked him why and he replied, "The people [of Khurāsān] will burst forth from it on three occasions and they will be destroyed on the third. I prefer that this should happen to its own people rather than to the Muslims!"

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Fazārī—Abū al-Janūb al-Yashkurī[266]—'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib: When 'Umar heard of the conquest of Khurāsān, he said, "I wish there were a sea of fire between us." 'Alī asked him why he was so distressed by its conquest, when it was a joyful occasion. 'Umar said, "Yes, but I..." and so on until the end of [2685] the [preceding] account.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Īsā b. al-Mughīrah[267] and a member of Bakr b. Wā'il called al-Wāzi' b. Zayd b. Khulaydah:[268] When 'Umar heard of al-Aḥnaf's conquest of the 263. Al-Najashī is Qays b. 'Amr; see Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XII, 73, 76. The meter is ṭawīl.

264. Ka's is not only the name of Rib'ī's mother, but, because it means "cup" or "goblet," a pun is intended; he is generous in entertaining his guests with drink.

265. Perhaps a reference to the Zoroastrian religion and its fire worship practiced in pre-Islamic Iran.

266. Two narrators mentioned only here in the text. Abū al-Janūb 'Uqbah b. 'Alqamah al-Yashkurī has a brief notice in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 247.

267. A narrator mentioned only here in the text and who has only a brief notice in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 231–32.

268. A narrator mentioned only here in the text. Bakr b. Wā'il is a large tribal confederation of 'Adnān, the northern Arabs. See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 307ff., 469; Kaḥḥālah, Mu'jam, I, 93ff., EI^{2}, s.v. (Caskel).

two Marws and Balkh, he said, "He is al-Aḥnaf! He is the lord of the people of the east called by something other than his name!"[269] 'Umar wrote to al-Aḥnaf as follows, "To continue. On no account go beyond the river,[270] keep to this side. You know how you made an entry into Khurāsān, so keep to this method and victory will continue to be yours. Beware of crossing over and dispersing."

When the envoys of Yazdajird reached the ruler of the Turks and Ghūrak,[271] it was not a straightforward matter to give him assistance until he had actually crossed over the river in defeat to meet them. Then it became so, and the ruler of the Turks gave him assistance—for rulers see it as an obligation to assist one another. He came forward at the head of the Turks, assembled the army of Farghānah[272] and Soghdia, and marched them out. Yazdajird returned to Khurāsān and crossed over to Balkh, the ruler of the Turks crossing with him. The Kufan army mustered at Marw al-Rūdh under al-Aḥnaf, and the polytheists left Balkh and fell upon him there. When al-Aḥnaf heard that [2686] the ruler of the Turks had crossed the River Balkh with the Soghdians to attack him, he went out at night among his troops to see if he could pick up any useful ideas. As he passed by two men who were cleaning fodder, either straw or barley, one of them was saying to the other, "If only the commander would send us up into this mountain, with the river forming a ditch between us and the enemy, the mountain at our backs to prevent our being approached from behind and the fighting thus being on one front, I would hope that God would give us victory!" So (al-Aḥnaf) returned, content at (what he had heard). This was one dark night. In the morning he assembled the army and said, "You are few, whereas your enemy are many. Let them not strike terror into you. 'How often a company that is few in number has overcome a company that is many by God's leave, 269. Al-Aḥnaf's name was Ṣakhr. See note 45, above.

270. That is, the River Oxus.

271. The text reads Ghūzak, but see Barthold, Turkestan. 96 etc., "the ikhshīd of Soghd."

272. The province of Farghānah stretched for more than 200 miles along the upper stream of the River Jaxartes. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 253; Le Strange, Lands, 476–77 and Map IX, opposite 433.

God is with those who show patience'.[273] Go from here and up this mountain. Place it at your backs; place the river between you and your enemy, and fight them on one front." They did all this, preparing everything that would give them an advantage, [al-Aḥnaf] being at the head of 10,000 Basrans, while there was a similar number of Kufans. The Turks advanced, together with those whom they had collected together, and fell upon [the Muslim forces], attacking them morning and evening and withdrawing at night; this went on for some time while al-Aḥnaf sought intelligence of their nocturnal position. After he had discovered this, he went out one night, acting as a scout for his men until he came close to the camp of the ruler of [2687] the Turks and halted. At the first light of dawn a Turkish cavalryman came forth, wearing his horsetail and beating his drum. Then he positioned himself where someone of his rank positions himself in relation to the troops. Al-Aḥnaf attacked him and the two exchanged spear thrusts. Al-Aḥnaf pierced him and killed him, as he recited the following in the rajaz meter:

Every chief has a duty to dye his spear [with blood] or [to fight until] it break;
We have a leader here who was made to face up to the sword of Abū Ḥafṣ[274] that remains [intact].

Then he stood where the Turk had stood and took his horsetail. Another Turk came out, did exactly as his colleague had done, then stood near him. Al-Aḥnaf attacked him and they exchanged spear thrusts. Al-Aḥnaf pierced him and killed him, as he recited the following in the rajaz meter:

The chief takes a high, lofty position, keeping away herdsmen if they let [their beasts] pasture.[275]

Then he stood where the second Turk had stood and took his horsetail. A third Turk came out, did exactly the same as the other two had done, then stood near [where] the second [had been]. Al-Aḥnaf attacked him and they exchanged spear thrusts. Al-Aḥnaf pierced him and killed him, as he recited the following in rajaz meter:

273. Qur'ān, II: 250.
274. Abū Ḥafṣ is the kunyah of 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb.
275. Khullā', herdsmen, is the plural of khālin; see Glossarium, CCXXXII. The hemistitch reads, wa-yamna'u l-khullā'a immā arba'ū. Perhaps "let [their beasts] come to water"?

[He ran forward] like al-Shamūs, ready to respond to anything, running at full speed, bad tempered.[276]

[2688] Then al-Aḥnaf went off back to camp. Not one of [his troops] knew anything about this until he returned there and prepared himself [for war].

It was in the nature of the Turks that they did not go out [for battle] until three of their cavalrymen had come forward like these, each one beating his drum. Then, after the third one, they would [all] go out [to do battle]. So on that night the Turks went out after the third horseman had done so, and they came across [all three of] them slaughtered. So the ruler of the Turks found this a bad omen and said, "We have been [here] too long and these men have been killed in a situation such as no one has ever been killed before. There can be no good for us in fighting these men. Let us all retire." So their leaders withdrew. When day broke, the Muslims could see nothing, and news came to them that the ruler of the Turks had retired to Balkh. Yazdajird b. Shahriyār b. Kisrā had originally left the ruler of the Turks in Marw al-Rūdh and departed for Marw al-Shāhijān. Ḥātim b. al-Nu'mān and his followers fortified their positions against [Yazdajird], but he besieged them, removing his treasures from where they were kept, while the ruler of the Turks was in Balkh waiting for him. The Muslims suggested to al-Aḥnaf that they should pursue them, but he told them to remain in their position and leave them alone. When Yazdajird had collected together those of his possessions left in Marw, he did not have enough time to collect them all. He intended to make himself the sole possessor [of the treasures], because they were a large part of [all] the treasures of the Persians. He also intended to join the ruler of the Turks, and the Persians asked him what he intended to do. He replied that he wanted to join the ruler of the Turks and remain with him or [go] to China. They told him to tread warily, for this was a bad idea, going to a people in their [2689] own country, while abandoning his own land and people. [They told him] he should take them back to [the Muslims], so that they could make peace with them. [The Muslims] were completely faithful, men of religion and in control of [the Persians'] land. An enemy ruling over Persians in their own land was a better political arrangement than an enemy ruling over them in his own land, who moreover had no religion, nor would they know how faithful [his people] would be. But he refused [to accept their argument] and they refused [to give in to him]. They told him to leave their treasures alone and they would return them to their own territory and to its ruler. He should not remove them from their land. He [again] refused [to accept their argument]. They told him they would not let him go. They drew on one side and left him alone with his followers. They did battle together and they put him to flight, taking the treasures and assuming complete control over them, abandoning him completely. The [Persian] polytheists wrote to al-Aḥnaf, giving him the news, so the Muslims intercepted them, while the polytheists were in Marw resisting [Yazdajird]. They fought [Yazdajird] and caught up with him at the rear of the army, rushing him away from his treasures (athqāl). He went off to seek refuge, crossed the river to Farghānah and the Turks. [Yazdajird] remained throughout the time of 'Umar corresponding with [the Persians], and they with him, or at least some of them. So the people of Khurāsān rebelled during the time of 'Uthman['s caliphate].

276. Al-Shamūs is the name of the horse of 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir al-Qurashī. Of an animal the word means "recalcitrant." See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, VI, 113–14; Fīrūzābādī, Qāmūs, II, 232; Zabīdī, Tāj, XVI, 175; Lane, Lexicon, VIII, 2770. The expression nājizun bi-nājiz originates in the commercial world, meaning, "ready [merchandise] for ready [money]". I translate "ready to respond to anything." For the meaning of mushāriz, "bad tempered," "hostile," "quarrelsome," see Fīrūzābādī, Qāmūs, II, 185; Zabīdī, Tāj, V, 361.

The Persians came to al-Aḥnaf and made peace with him, exchanging agreements with him and handing over the treasures and monies [mentioned above]. They gradually returned to their lands and wealth in as good a state as they had been at the time of the Sasanian emperors. It was as if they were [still] under their rule except for the fact that the Muslims were more worthy of their confidence and acted more justly toward them. So they rejoiced in their condition and were the object of envy. [The share of the booty that] came to the cavalryman in the battle [2690] against Yazdajird was like that of the cavalryman at the battle of al-Qādisiyyah.[277]

When the Khurāsānīs threw off their allegiance in the time of 'Uthmān, Yazdajird went and settled in Marw. When he, together with his followers, and the Khurāsānīs fell into disagreement, he took refuge in a mill. [The Khurāsānīs] found him eating from a field around the mill and killed him, throwing him into the river.

When Yazdajird was killed in Marw—he was on that day in hiding in a mill seeking to reach Kirmān—the Muslims and polytheists took possession of his immovable booty. Al-Aḥnaf got to hear of this and left immediately at the head of his army for Balkh, making for the ruler of the Turks and arranging for the dependents and family of Yazdajird to follow with both Muslims and non-Muslims of the Persians, while the ruler of the Turks and the Turks [remained] in Balkh. When [the ruler of the Turks] heard of what had happened to Yazdajird and of the Muslims' departure from Marw al-Rūdh with al-Aḥnaf in his direction, he left Balkh and crossed the river. Al-Aḥnaf arrived and remained in Balkh and the Kufans also settled in the four regions [of Khurāsān].[278] Then he returned to Marw al-Rūdh and remained there, writing to 'Umar of the defeat of the ruler of the Turks and Yazdajird. He also sent the fifths to him, and the [official] delegations [from Khurāsān] reached him.

[The same sources] reported as follows. When the ruler of the Turks, together with the dependents of the family of the Persian emperor or those of them who had made their way with Yazdajird to Balkh, had crossed over the river, they met the messenger of Yazdajird, whom he had sent to the ruler of China

277. The famous battle that took place in 16/637 and a decisive victory for the Muslim forces over the Persians.

278. I here take the Arabic kuwar to indicate the four divisions of Khurāsān. It is true that they were officially known as arbā', the plural of rub', and that these quarters were a later development. My explanation would be that suggesting there were such quarters at this early date is an anachronism and that all that is really meant is that the Kufans settled throughout Khurāsān. For the four quarters of Khurāsān and their chief towns of Balkh, Naysābūr, Marw, and Herat, see Le Strange, Lands, 382–83.

and with whom he had sent gifts and who was bringing back a reply to his letter from the ruler of China. They asked him what [2691] had happened to him. He replied that, when he delivered the letter and the gifts to [the ruler], he had presented him in return with what they could see—and he showed them the present he [was carrying]. [The ruler of China] responded to Yazdajird by writing him the following letter, [but only] after he had addressed (the messenger) as follows. "I know that in truth rulers must give aid to [other] rulers against those who overcome them. So describe these people who drove you out of your land to me. I notice that you mention they are few and you are many. Such a small number will not affect you in this way with your great numbers. They can do this only if they are good and you evil." (The messenger) suggested that he ask him whatever he wanted. So he asked him if they kept to their agreement and he replied that they did. (The ruler) asked what they said to them before they made war on them. (The messenger) replied that they called upon us to choose one of three things: [to accept] their faith—and if we do, they treat us as themselves—or [to pay] tribute and [enter] their protection or to be subjected to open warfare. (The ruler) asked about how obedient they were to their leaders. (The messenger) replied that no one was more obedient to him leading them. (The ruler) asked what they permitted and what they forbade, and (the messenger) told him. He asked if they ever forbade what was permitted to them or permitted what was forbidden them. [When] (the messenger) replied that they did not, (the ruler) remarked that they would never perish until they permitted what was forbidden and forbade what was permitted to them. He then asked about their clothes, and (the messenger) told him. [He asked] about their riding animals, and (the messenger) mentioned their pure Arabian horses and described them [to him]. "What fine horses they are!" exclaimed (the ruler). [The messenger then] described camels to him, how they kneel down and go forth to carry [loads]. (The ruler's response was that this was the description of long-necked beasts!) (The ruler of China) sent a letter to Yazdajird with (the messenger) as follows. "I am not prevented from dispatching an [2692] army to you stretching from Marw to China by my not knowing what is proper for me. But if these people described to me by your messenger were to try, they could demolish mountains; if nothing were to stand in their way, they would wipe me out, as long as they are as described! Make your peace with them therefore and accept some modus vivendi with them. Do not stir them up, as long as they do not stir you up." Yazdajird and the royal family remained in Farghānah in [formal] agreement with the ruler of the Turks.

When the messenger brought to 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb [news of] the conquest and the delegation [other] news, carrying the booty with them on behalf of al-Aḥnaf, ['Umar] assembled the people and addressed them. He also ordered the conquest document to be read out to them. In his own address, he spoke as follows:

> God, ever blessed and almighty, has mentioned His Apostle and the guidance He sent with him. He promised, for anyone following Him, immediate and future reward [comprising] the goodness of this world and the next. He said, "He it is who sent His Apostle with the guidance and the true religion that He might make it prevail over any [other] religion, even though the polytheists were averse."[279] Praise be to God who has fulfilled His promise and granted His army victory. Yes indeed, God has destroyed the rule of the Magians and disunited them. They do not possess one single span of their territory that can bring harm to a Muslim. Yes indeed, God "has made you heirs to their land, houses, > [2693] wealth and sons" "in order to see how they behave."[280] Yes indeed, the distance between the garrison towns [of al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah] and the border areas [of Persia] is now the same as [that between] you and the two towns in the past, now that [our armies] have penetrated into the land. "God brings His command to pass"[281] fulfills His promise right through to the last. So apply yourselves and He will carry out His agreement with you in full and fulfill His promise to you. Do not rebel, lest

279. Qur'ān, IX:33 and LXI:9.
280. Qur'ān, X:14 and XXX:27.
281. Qur'ān, LXV:3.

God substitute others for you. My only fear for this community is that it will be put in danger by you.

Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī] reported [as follows]. Then the Khurāsānīs from far and near came out in opposition in the time of 'Uthmān b. 'Affān, two years into his caliphate. We shall mention the remainder of the news of their break-away movement in its [proper] place, God willing, together with the killing of Yazdajird.[282]

'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb led the people on pilgrimage in this year. His governors of the garrison towns then were the same as those in the year 21 [December 10, 641–November 30, 642] except for al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah. His governor of al-Kūfah and [official] in charge of the police was al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah and his governor of al-Baṣrah was Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī.

---

282. See Ṭabarī, I, 2872ff.; Translation, XV, 78ff.

The Events of the Year 23

(NOVEMBER 19, 643–NOVEMBER 7, 644)

The conquest of Iṣṭakhr[283] took place in [this year] according to the report of Abū Ma'shar. According to Aḥmad b. Thābit al-Rāzī—someone else—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar: The first [campaign of] Iṣṭakhr and [that of] Hamadhān were in the year 23 [643–644]. Al-Wāqidī made a similar report, whereas Sayf said that the conquest of Iṣṭakhr came after the second [campaign of] Tawwaj.[284]

The Conquest of Tawwaj[285]

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Muhallab and 'Amr: The Basran army went forth, those

283. The ancient town of Persepolis on the River Pulvar in Fārs province. The district of Iṣṭakhr covered the whole of the northern part of Fārs. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 211–12; Le Strange, Lands, 275ff. and Map 6, opposite 249.

284. A commercial town in Fārs on or near the River Shāpūr only about 40 miles from the Gulf coast. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 56–57; Le Strange, Lands, 259–60.

285. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 386–87; Bal'amī, Chronique, III, 511.

(troops) dispatched to Fārs as commanders there, accompanied by Sāriyah b. Zunaym,[286] and those sent with them beyond, while the army of Fārs was assembled at Tawwaj. But (the Basrans) did not face the army (of Fārs) directly with their own forces; rather each district commander made for his own command and the district to which he had been assigned. This (intelligence) reached the army of Fārs, so they dispersed to their (different) areas—just as the Muslims themselves had done—to defend them. This brought about the defeat of the Fārsīs and the complete dispersal of their forces. The (Fārsī) polytheists regarded all this as a bad omen and it was as if they were staring fate in the face. Mujāshi' b. Mas'ūd[287] headed for Sābūr[288] and Ardashīr Khurrah,[289] at the head of his Muslim followers. They and the army of Fārs met at Tawwaj and fought for a long time. God brought about the defeat for the Muslims of those (who [2695] fought) at Tawwaj and gave the Muslims authority over them. They killed them in every conceivable manner, doing with them whatever they wished. (God) gave (the Muslims) everything in their camp as booty, and they took possession of it. This was the last (battle of) Tawwaj; it never had such military strength after this. The first was that in which the troops of al-'Alā' at the time of (the battle of) Ṭāwūs were rescued, the battle during which they fought together.[290] The first and last battles rival 286. Al-Kinānī, governor and Muslim military leader active in Fārs. See also Ṭabarī, I, 2569; Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 244; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 96–98.

287. Al-Sulamī, Companion and Muslim military leader who died in 36/656. See Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, IV, 300; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IX, 87; Tahdhīb, X, 38.

288. The Persian Shāpūr or Bīshāpūr, the district of Fārs within the basin of the upper reaches of River Shāpūr. The town is about 40 miles northeast of Tawwaj. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 167–68; Le Strange, Lands, 262 and Map VI, opposite 249.

289. One of the five districts of Fārs, of which the chief town is Shīrāz. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 146; Le Strange, Lands, 248 and Map VI, opposite 249.

290. Al-'Alā' was governor of Bahrain under the Prophet and the early caliphs and a participant in the Riddah wars. In 17/638 he took a force from Bahrain over to Fārs, and, although launching a successful raid, his ships were lost and he was cut off and had to be rescued. 'Umar dismissed him for this unauthorized attack. See Wāqidī, Maghāzī, II, 782; Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, II, 576, 600, 607; Donner, Conquests, 86, 327; Zarrīnkūb, "Conquest," 21. The battles with the Fārsīs (Ṭabarī, I, 2546ff.) were fought in Ṭāwūs, a place described by Yāqūt (Mu'jam, IV, 8) as being situated in the coastal region of Fārs.

each other [in importance]. Then [the inhabitants of Tawwaj] were summoned [to pay] tribute and [to make] a compact. So they came back and settled. Mujāshi' divided out the fifth of the spoils and sent them [to 'Umar], sending out a delegation [to him also]. Those bringing the good news [of the victory] and the delegations were provided with gifts[291] and their needs catered for according to a practice instituted by the Messenger of God.

Al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad b. Sūqah[292]—'Āṣim b. Kulayb[293]—his father: We left with Mujāshi' b. Mas'ūd to attack Tawwaj. We besieged it and fought [their army] for a long time. We conquered it, seized much booty and killed a great number. I was wearing a torn shirt, so I took a needle and thread and began to mend my shirt.[294] Then I caught sight of a man among the dead who had on a shirt, so I took it, brought it to some water, beat it between two stones until the dirt was [2696] removed, and put it on. When the spoils had been collected together, Mujāshi' got up to address [us]. He praised and extolled God and said, "Men, do not take what is not yours; anyone who steals will bring what he has stolen on the Day of Resurrection. Return [anything you have stolen], be it only a needle!" When I heard this, I took the shirt off and threw it among the fifth parts [of the booty].

The Conquest of Iṣṭakhr

[The source] continued: 'Uthmān b. Abī al-'Āṣ[295] made for Iṣṭakhr. He and the army of Iṣṭakhr met at Jūr[296] and fought a

---

291. Arabic, "yujāzūna." It might mean "were given sufficient water."

292. An unidentified narrator.

293. A narrator who died in 137/754. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 53ff.

294. For these last two sentences the Arabic reads, "fa-lammā iftataḥnāhā... fa-akhadhtu." I have done away with the temporal clause in translation.

295. Al-Thaqafī, a Muslim military leader and one-time governor of al-Ṭā'if, Bahrain and Oman. He died in ca. 55/675. See Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, III, 372–74; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīd, VII, 128–29; Ṭabarī, I, 2570, 2830 etc.; Hill, Termination, passim.

296. The earlier name for Fīrūzābād, the chief town of the district of Ardashīr Khurrah. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 181–82; Le Strange, Lands, 255 and Map VI, opposite 249.

long battle. Then God granted them Jūr as a conquest, and the Muslims [also] conquered Iṣṭakhr, having killed a great many of [the enemy] and taken what they wanted, though some [of the enemy] fled. Then 'Uthmān called upon the people to [pay] tribute and to [make] a compact. They therefore sent messages to him, and he to them. Their religious leader[297] and all those who had fled or left responded favorably to his [call]. They gradually came back and yielded to [the payment of] tribute. Now when the enemy fled, 'Uthmān collected together all the booty God had granted them and took out a fifth, sending it to 'Umar, and distributing four-fifths of the booty among the army. They abstained from plundering and delivered up what was in their care, considering this lower world to be of little importance. 'Uthmān mustered them to him and rose to speak. He told them that things would continue to advance and that everyone would remain safe and sound from anything distasteful as long as they did not take what was not theirs. If they did, they would experience something unpleasant, and the much they might have had then would not go as far as the little [2697] they had now.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Abū Sufyān[298]—al-Ḥasan: 'Uthmān b. Abī al-'Āṣ said on the day Iṣṭakhr [was conquered], "When God wishes a people to prosper, He restrains them and increases their trustworthiness. Hold on to it, for the first thing you lose of your faith is trustworthiness. Once you do lose it, every day something new will be lost to you."

[A Persian called] Shahrak[299] threw off [his allegiance] at the end of 'Umar's caliphate or at the beginning of 'Uthmān's. He roused up the people of Fārs, calling upon them to break [the peace agreement]. So 'Uthmān b. Abī al-'Āṣ was dispatched against him for a second time, accompanied by reinforcements under the command of 'Ubaydallāh b. Ma'mar[300] and Shibl b.

297. Hirbadh, actually a functionary of the Zoroastrian fire temple. See Christensen, L'Iran, 144; Morony, Iraq, 531.

298. An unidentified narrator.

299. The Persian governor [marzbān] of Fārs. See Zarrīnkūb, "Conquest," 21.

300. Al-Taymī, Companion and Muslim military leader who died in 29/649. See Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, III, 345.

Ma'bad al-Bajalī.[301] [The Muslim forces and the Fārsīs] met in battle in Fārs. On the battlefield 3 parasangs away from one of their settlements called Rīshahr[302] and 12 from their headquarters, Shahrak said to his son, "Son, where will our lunch be, [illegible] or in Rīshahr"? He replied, "Father, if [the Fārsīs] leave us alone, our lunch will be neither here, nor in Rīshahr! It can only be at home.[303] But I certainly do not think they will leave us alone." The two were still talking when the Muslims launched [2698] their attack. They fought together vehemently. Shahrak and his son were both killed in [the battle] and God caused great slaughter, al-Ḥakam b. [Abī] al-'Āṣ b. Bishr b. Duhmān,[304] the brother of 'Uthmān, being entrusted with the killing of Shahrak.

It was Abū Ma'shar who reported that the first [campaign] for Fārs and the last for Iṣṭakhr took place in the year 28 [September 25, 648–September 14, 649]. He also said that the last [campaign] for Fārs and [that of] Jūr took place in the year 29 [September 14, 649–September 4, 650]. This was also according to Aḥmad b. Thābit al-Rāzī—someone who heard Isḥāq b. 'Īsā mention this [same report]—Abū Ma'shar.

According to 'Abdallāh b. Aḥmad b. Shabbawayh al-Marwazī[305]—his father—Sulaymān b. Ṣāliḥ[306]—'Ubaydallāh[307]—

---

301. A Muslim military leader, possibly a Muzanī rather than a Bajalī. See Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 385.

302. There are two places with this name in Fārs. One near Būshahr [Bushire], the other in the north of the province, just south of the River Ṭāb. It is impossible to know for sure which is meant here. Yāqūt (Mu'jam, III, 112–13), however, mentions only the latter and recounts the story of the death of Shahrak, whom he calls Suhrak. Cf. Le Strange, Lands, 261, 271 and Map 6, opposite 249.

303. Arabic, fa-qāla yā abati in tarakū-nā fa-lā yakūnu ghadā'u-nā hāhunā wa-lā bi-Rīshahra wa-lā yakūnanna illā fī al-manzil.

304. Al-Thaqafī. 'Uthmān employed his brother in a senior military role mainly in the area of Fārs. Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 271, gives his full name as Ibn al-'Āṣ b. Nasr b. 'Abd b. Duhmān. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 35, gives Ibn Abī al-'Āṣ b. Bashīr b. Duhmān. Cf. Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 362, 386–87; Hill, Termination, 122, 135.

305. An unidentified narrator.

306. Sulaymān b. Ṣāliḥ al-Laythī died before 110/728. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 199–200.

307. 'Ubaydallāh is impossible to identify. 'Ubayd, rather than the 'Abd of the Leiden text is from the Cairo edition and the Leiden Addenda. It must be 'Ubaydallāh b. Sulaymān:[308] 'Uthmān b. Abī al-'Āṣ was sent to Bahrain, so he dispatched his brother, al-Ḥakam b. Abī al-'Āṣ at the head of 2,000 [men] to Tawwaj. The Persian emperor had already fled from al-Madā' in and had reached Jūr in Fārs.

[The source] continued: According to Ziyād, the client of al-Ḥakam b. Abī al-'Āṣ—al-Ḥakam b. Abī al-'Āṣ: Shahrak came at me. 'Ubayd[309] added that he had been sent by the Persian emperor. Al-Ḥakam continued: He came up against me at the head of his troops. Then they came down a mountain road, having donned their armor. I was afraid that my men [2699] would be blinded [by the reflection of the sun off their armor]; so I had the order shouted out that all those wearing a turban should wrap it over their eyes and all those not wearing a turban should close their eyes. I called out that they should dismount, and when he saw this, Shahrak did the same. Then I called out that [my men] should mount, and we stationed ourselves in ranks against [Shahrak's men]. [The latter] also mounted and I put al-Jārūd al-'Abdī[310] in command of the right wing and Abū Ṣufrah of the left; that is, the father of al-Muhallab. [The enemy] attacked the Muslims, but [the latter] put them to flight; I could not hear a single sound from them. Al-Jārūd informed me that the army had disappeared. But I replied that he would see what would happen. Their horses soon returned, riderless, whereas the Muslims were pursuing [the enemy] and killing them. Heads were scattered around in front of me. Now I had with me one of their rulers, called al-Muka'bir,[311] who had deserted the emperor and joined me. I was brought a huge head, and al-Muka'bir told me it was that of al-Azdahāq, meaning asked if the text is corrupt here and whether this 'Ubaydallāh and 'Ubaydallāh b. Sulaymān are not one and the same. See next note.

---

308. Perhaps more correctly 'Ubayd b. Sulaymān. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīd, VII, 67; Translation, I, 227 n. 402.

309. That is, the same authority as the 'Ubaydallāh b. Sulaymān above in the text; see preceding note.

310. That is, Abū al-Mundhir al-Jārūd b. 'Amr b. Ḥanash b. al-Mu'allā al-'Abdī was a convert from Christianity and a leader of 'Abd al-Qays. Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 51, says he died in 21/642, or at Nihāwand, or in 'Uthmān's caliphate. See also Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 260–61; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 53–54.

311. Al-Muka'bir was Āzādh Furūz b. Jushnas. See Justi, Namenbuch, 53.

Shahrak.[312] [Finally] they were besieged in the town of Sābūr and (al-Ḥakam) made peace with them. Their ruler was Ādharbiyān[313] and al-Ḥakam asked his assistance in the fight against the army of Iṣṭakhr. [At this point] 'Umar died and 'Uthmān sent 'Ubaydallāh b. Ma'mar in place of (al-Ḥakam) [as commander]. 'Ubaydallāh heard that Ādharbiyān was intending to betray them, so he told him he wanted him to prepare some food for his men and slaughter a head of cattle for [2700] them, putting its bones on the bowl next to ['Ubaydallāh]. [The latter further] told him that he wanted to suck out the marrow from the bones. (Ādharbiyān) did this and ('Ubaydallāh)—one of the strongest of all men—took hold of a bone that could be chopped up only by means of an axe and broke it in his hand to suck out the marrow. The ruler, [Ādharbiyān], got up, seized his foot and said, "This is the position of one seeking refuge!" So ('Ubaydallāh) granted him a [peace] agreement. 'Ubaydallāh was wounded by a mangonel, but [before he died] predicted to them that they would conquer this town, God willing. [He also urged them] to kill (the enemy) there for a while for his sake. (The Muslims) did this and killed many men.

'Uthmān b. Abī al-'Āṣ had joined al-Ḥakam, after he had defeated Shahrak, and he wrote to 'Umar informing him that there was a breach between him and al-Kūfah and that he was afraid that the enemy would attack him through it. The lord of al-Kūfah wrote a similar letter that there was a breach between him and such and such a place. The two letters reached ('Umar) at the same time, so he dispatched Abū Mūsā at the head of 700 [men] and settled them in al-Baṣrah.

The Conquest of Fasā and Darābjird[314]

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Muhallab and 'Amr: Sāriyah b. Zunaym made in the direction 312. In Persian mythology Azhd Dahāk was the tyrant who overthrew Jamshād and ruled for 1,000 years. He was the personification of evil. See CHIr, III, especially pp. 426–27.

313. For Ādharbiyān, see Justi, Namenbuch, 42, Arzanbān.

314. Darābjird is the easternmost district of Fārs, and the chief town has the same name. Fasā is a town in the district less than 60 miles west of the town of of Fasā and Darābjird and finally reached the camp of their (army). He positioned himself against them and besieged them for some time. They then sought reinforcements, themselves rallying together, and the Kurds of Fārs joined them. The Muslims were unexpectedly faced with a serious situation [in the form of] a huge army. On the very eve [of these events], 'Umar saw in a dream (the Muslims') battle and the [large] [2701] number [of enemy forces] at a particular hour of the day. The next day he gave the call for congregational prayers. When the hour arrived that he had noted in his dream, he came out to the (people). The Muslims had been shown to him in a desert area; if they remained there, they would be surrounded. If they retreated to a mountain behind them, they could be attacked only on one front. ('Umar) then stood up and told his people that he had seen these two armies and described their situation. He then declared, "[To] the mountain, [to] the mountain, Sāriyah!" Turning to the (people), he said, "God has armies; perhaps one of them will bring them the message [of my dream]!" When this particular hour did actually arrive on the day, Sāriyah and the Muslims all agreed to make for the mountain. This they did and fought the enemy on one front [only]. God routed (the enemy) for (the Muslims) and they wrote to 'Umar [informing] him of all this, of their capture of the region, of the call of its people [to accept an agreement] and their [consequent] pacification.

Al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Abū 'Umar Dithār b. Abī Shabīb[315]—Abū 'Uthmān[316] and Abū 'Amr b. al-'Alā'[317]—a member of B. Māzin:[318] 'Umar sent Sāriyah b. Zunaym al-Du'alī to Fasā and Darābjird. He besieged [the inhabitants], but they later prepared themselves for war and sought him out in the desert

---

Darābjird. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 446; IV, 260–61; Le Strange, Lands, 288ff. and Map VI, opposite 249. For the conquests in Balādhurī, see Futūḥ, 388–90.

315. An unidentified narrator.

316. Al-Nahdī, famous figure in early Islam who died about 100/718. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 277ff.

317. Abū 'Amr b. al-'Alā' was himself of Māzin of Tamīm. He died in 57/677. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XII, 178–80.

318. That is, Māzin b. Mālik of Tamīm. See Kaḥḥālah, Mu'jam, III, 1023–24. Cf. preceding note.

area [where he was], outnumbering him and coming against him on every side. 'Umar proclaimed, as he gave the address one Friday, "[To] the mountain, [to] the mountain, Sāriyah b. Zunaym!" When that day came, the Muslims had a mountain to one side; if they took refuge in it, they could be attacked only on [2702] one front. So they did so. Then [the Muslims] fought them and defeated them. [Sāriyah] took the spoils from them, including a casket containing a precious stone. He asked the Muslims' permission to hand it over to 'Umar as a gift and they agreed, so he sent it off with a man who also [announced news of] the conquest. [Now the envoys and delegations were given gifts and [all] their needs were catered for.] Sāriyah said to [the man], "Borrow what will enable you to reach ['Umar] and what you can leave behind for your family against the gift you [will get from 'Umar]." So the man arrived in al-Baṣrah and did this. Then he left [al-Baṣrah] and came to 'Umar [in Medina]. He found him feeding the people carrying the stick that he used to drive his camel. [The messenger] went toward him, and he turned toward him with [the stick] and told him to sit down. So he sat down and when the people had eaten, 'Umar went off. [The messenger] got up and followed him, so 'Umar thought he was somebody who had not had his fill. He told him, when he had finally got to the door of his house, to come in, already having ordered the baker to take the food tray to where the baking was done for the Muslims. So when he sat down in the house, some lunch was brought for him, bread, olive oil, and coarsely ground salt, and put down. ['Umar] asked [his wife] whether she would come out and eat [with them]. She replied, "I can hear the voice of a man!" He said, "Yes, indeed," to which she replied, "Had you wanted me to show myself off in front of men, you would have bought me another dress!" He said, "Are you not pleased that people say, 'Umm Kulthūm is the daughter of 'Alī and the wife of 'Umar!'" She replied, "A lot of good that does me!" Then 'Umar told the man to come near and eat. "If she were in a good mood, [the food] would be better than what you can see!" So they both ate [together], and when he had finished, the messenger of Sāriyah b. Zunaym exclaimed, "O [2703] Commander of the Faithful!" He replied that he was very welcome. He then brought him close until their knees were touching and asked him about the Muslims [in Fārs], then about Sāriyah b. Zunaym. He gave ('Umar) the information. Then he told him of the story of the casket, but ('Umar) took one look at it and shouted at him, "No, I'll give you nothing[319] until you return to this army and make a [fair] distribution among them." And he dismissed him. But he told the Commander of the Faithful, that he had exhausted his camels and borrowed against a gift from him. He asked him to give him what would satisfy him. He would not leave ('Umar) alone until he exchanged his own camel for one of the camels given as alms, and he took his camel and put it with the alms camels. The messenger set off back, an object of anger and denied any gift. He came to al-Baṣrah and [onward to the army and finally] carried out 'Umar's order. [While he was in Medina], people asked him about Sāriyah, about the conquest and whether they had heard anything on the day of the battle. He replied that they had heard, "[To] the mountain, Sāriyah." [He added] that they were almost done for, so they took refuge on it and God granted them the conquest.

Al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Mujālid—al-Sha'bī gave an account similar to that of 'Amr.

The Conquest of Kirmān[320]

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Muhallab and 'Amr: Suhayl b. 'Adī made for Kirmān and was joined by 'Abdallāh b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Itbān. In charge of the vanguard of Suhayl b. 'Adī was al-Nusayr b. 'Amr al-'Ijlī.[321] [2704]
Now the Kirmānīs had massed against (Suhayl), they having sought assistance in the [region of] the Qufs.[322] They fought (the Muslims) just within their own territory, but God scattered them. (The Muslims) seized the road against them and al-Nusayr killed the [local] governor (marzbān). Suhayl advanced along 319. Arabic, lā wa-lā karāmata.

320. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ, especially 391–92, in which Suhayl b. 'Adī does not feature; Bal'ami, Chronique, III, 516–17.

321. An unidentified military leader.

322. An extensive mountain area to the southeast of Jīraft (see next note). See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 380–82; Le Strange, Lands, 317 and Map VI, opposite 249; EI2, s.v. "Ḳufṣ" (Bosworth).

what is today the settlement road as far as Jīraft,[323] while 'Abdallāh b. 'Abdallāh [came] from the desert region of Shīr.[324] They seized what camels and ewes they wished, putting a value on the camels and sheep and dividing them up among themselves according to the prices [they would fetch], because the Bactrians were bigger than the Arabians and they did not want to value [them] too highly.[325] They wrote to 'Umar and he replied to them that the Arabian could be valued only according to the amount of meat, [the Bactrian] being [treated] in the same way. [He added that], if they were of the opinion that the Bactrians had more meat, then they should value them more highly, for [prices] can be only in accordance with value.

According to al-Madā'inī—'Alī b. Mujāhid[326]—Ḥanbal b. Abī Ḥarīdah, judge of Qūhistān[327]—the governor of Qūhistān: 'Abdallāh b. Budayl b. Warqā' al-Khuzā'ī[328] conquered Kirmān during the caliphate of 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb. He then went on to al-Ṭabasayn from Kirmān, then came to 'Umar. He said that he [2705] had conquered al-Ṭabasayn and asked that it be granted to him as a land concession.[329] ('Umar) was willing to do this, but was told it was an important district. He therefore did not grant it to ('Abdallāh) as a land concession. It is [in fact] the gateway [from Kirmān] to Khurāsān.

---

323. I take the Arabic qurā here to mean the settlements of the Kirmānīs and translate accordingly. There might, however, be a place named al-Qurā, in which case the translation would need amendation to "Suhayl advanced along what is today the road to al-Qurā as far as Jīraft." There is no reference to such a toponym in the geographical sources at my disposal. Jīraft is spelled Jīruft by Le Strange. The town is situated south of the town of Kirmān, and its district was the whole of southern Kirmān province. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 198; Le Strange, Lands, 314ff. and Map VI, opposite 249.

324. An unidentified place.

325. That is, instead of the usual division of the animals as spoils by numbers.

326. D. ca. 182/789. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 377ff.; Sezgin, GAS, I, 312.

327. Ḥanbal b. Abī Ḥarīdah is unidentified. Qūhistān is the province to the southwest and west of Khurāsān. See Le Strange, Lands, 352ff. and Map VIII, opposite 335.

328. Ibn Budayl must in fact have been only ten years old in the year 23; see note 22, above.

329. Arabic verb aqṭa'a; see EI[2], s.v. "Iḳṭā'" (Cahen). For al-Ṭabasayn, see note 249, above.

The Conquest of Sijistān[330]

[The same sources] reported as follows: 'Āṣim b. 'Amr[331] made for Sijistān and was joined by 'Abdallāh b. 'Umayr.[332] The people of Sijistān met them, and they joined battle just within their own territory. [The Muslims] defeated them, then pursued them and besieged them in Zaranj,[333] crossing through the region of Sijistān at will. [The Sijistānīs] then sought a peace treaty covering Zaranj and [all] the lands [the Muslims] had taken. This they were granted. [The Muslims] also stipulated in the peace treaty they made [with the Sijistānīs] that the desert regions of [Sijistān] should be out of bounds [to the Muslims]. When the latter went out anywhere, they would warn each other for fear they encroach on any of [these desert regions] and so break the [peace agreement]. So the Sijistānīs paid the land tax and the Muslims granted [them what they had requested].[334]

[The districts] of Sijistān were greater and spread further afield than [those of] Khurāsān. [The Muslims] made war [there] against Kandahar,[335] the Turks, and many [different] communities. [Sijistān] covered the whole area between Sind and the river of Balkh.[336] It remained the greater of the two provinces, the more difficult and larger in terms of numbers and fighting men of the

---

330. For the conquest, see Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 392ff.; Bal'ami, Chronique, III, 517ff. Sijistān is the province to the south of Khurāsān. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 1902; Le Strange, Lands, 334ff. and Maps VII and VIII.

331. Al-Tamīmī, a Muslim military leader renowned for his courage, the brother of al-Qa'qā'. See Ṭabarī, I, 2433ff. etc.

332. An unidentified narrator.

333. The capital of Sijistān, E of Lake Zarah. Cf. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 138; Le Strange, Lands, 335ff. and Maps VII and VIII. Cf. also Bosworth, Sīstān and map, in the district of al-Rukhkhaj.

334. This sentence and the first two of the following paragraph read in Arabic, fa-tamma ahlu Sijistāna 'alā al-kharāji wa-al-Muslimūna 'alā al-'aṭā' fa-kānat Sijistānu a'ẓama min Khurāsāna wa-ab'ada furūjan yuqātilūna al-Qandahār. The translation might therefore be, "So the Sijistānīs paid the land tax, while the Muslims on stipends [[the districts] of Sijistān were greater and spread further afield than [those of] Khurāsān], were making war on Kandahar, . . ."

335. Arabic al-Qandahār, east of Zaranj. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 402–3; Le Strange, Lands, 347 and Map VIII, opposite 335; Bosworth, Sīstān, map.

336. Something of an exaggeration, as a glance at the map in the CHIr, 60–61, shows! "The river of Balkh" must be the Oxus, which is in fact north of the town.

[2706] two frontier districts until Mu'āwiyah's time. At that time the ruler (shāh) fled from his brother, who was called Zunbīl,[337] to an area called Āmul,[338] and (he and his followers) paid allegiance to Salm b. Ziyād,[339] at that time governor of Sijistān. (The latter) was pleased with this (development), made a pact with (the ruler and his followers), and allowed them to settle in this area. He wrote to Mu'āwiyah about this, indicating that it had been conquered. But Mu'āwiyah replied that his cousin might be pleased, but that he was not and that it was not indeed proper that (his cousin) should be pleased. Mu'āwiyah was asked why this was and replied it was because the area between Āmul and Zaranj was where there were difficulties and trouble. These were people who were wily and treacherous, so there would be discord in future. The very least they would do would be to take over the whole region of Āmul. But Ibn Ziyād concluded an agreement with them. After Mu'āwiyah's death when there was civil war, the ruler rebelled and conquered Āmul. Zunbīl was afraid of the ruler, so he took refuge from him in a particular place in which he remains to this day. But he did not take kindly to this, when the people just ignored him, and he began to covet Zaranj. So he attacked (the town) and besieged (its inhabitants) until reinforcements arrived from al-Baṣrah. Zunbīl and all those who came with him and settled in this area became "a bone in the throat" that has remained unremoved to this day. This region had been subdued until Mu'āwiyah died.

---

337. The text has Rutbīl, but cf. Bosworth, Sīstān, 34–36. Cf. Bal'ami, Chronique, III, 518.

338. This place must be in or near Sijistān and cannot be either the Āmul in Ṭabaristān or that between Marw and Bukhārā on the Oxus. Perhaps Kābul to the northeast of Sijistān is meant. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 397 and Addenda, DCXXIII.

339. Salm, according to Ṭabarī elsewhere (Ṭabarī, II, 391), was appointed governor of Sijistān in 61/680 by Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah (reigned 60–64/680–683), after Mu'āwiyah's death. Yazīd too would have been Salm's cousin, whereas Mu'āwiyah would have been his uncle. It seems we should read Yazīd throughout this passage rather than Mu'āwiyah. Another possible explanation is that Salm's brother, 'Abbād, was appointed governor of Sijistān by Mu'āwiyah about the year 59/679 (Ṭabarī, II, 189), and perhaps he is meant rather than Salm. See also Bosworth, Sīstān, 44–45.

The Conquest of Makrān[340]

(The same sources) reported as follows: Al-Ḥakam b. 'Amr al-Taghlibī[341] made for Makrān and finally arrived there. He was joined by Shihāb b. al-Mukhāriq b. Shihāb[342] and reinforced by Suhayl b. 'Adī and 'Abdallāh b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Itbān themselves. They came to a point just this side of the river[343] where the Makrān army had assembled, halted on its bank, and made camp. Rāsil, their ruler,[344] had the ruler of Sind cross over toward (the Muslims), and he drew near with (his men), facing the Muslims. So they met and fought together at a place on the Makrān side, some days' journey from the river, after the advanced party of (the Makrān army) had arrived and camped there to allow the rest to catch up. God defeated Rāsil and took spoils from him. He permitted the Muslims to despoil his camp. In the battle they killed many and pursued (the remainder), killing them off for some days until they finally reached the river. Then (the Muslims) returned and remained in Makrān. Al-Ḥakam wrote to 'Umar of the conquest and sent the fifths with Ṣuḥār al-'Abdī, also asking ('Umar's) instruction concerning the elephants [that they had captured]. Suḥār brought 'Umar the news and the spoils and 'Umar asked him about Makrān, [for] no one came to him without his enquiring of him about the area from which he was coming. He replied, "Commander of the Faithful, it is a land whose plains are mountains (jabal); whose water is scarce (washal); whose [only] fruit is poor quality dates (daqal); whose enemies are heroes (baṭal); whose prosperity is little (qalīl); whose evil is long-lasting (ṭawīl); what is much there is little; what is little there is nothing; as for what lies beyond, it is even worse!" "Are you a rhymed prose reciter or someone [2707] [2708]

340. Brief mention is made of Makrān in Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 433ff.; Bal'ami, Chronique, III, 518. Makrān or Mukrān is the large coastal province, mainly arid and economically poor, situated between Kirmān in the west and Sind in the east. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 179–80; Le Strange, Lands, 329ff. and Map VII, opposite 323.

341. An unidentified military leader.

342. An unidentified military leader.

343. It is not clear which river is here meant, but it is likely it is the Indus.

344. For Rāsil b. Basāyah, see Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 438; Lambrick, Sind, 158–59; Fatḥnamah, 118–19, 124–26.

bringing [accurate] information?!" retorted 'Umar.[345] He said he was really bringing [accurate] information, so 'Umar insisted that not one of his armies should attack [Makrān], as long as he remained in authority. He wrote to al-Ḥakam b. 'Amr and Suhayl, [forbidding] any of their armies from passing beyond Makrān. [He ordered them] to restrict themselves to [territory] on this side of the river and al-Ḥakam to sell the elephants within Muslim territory and distribute the price obtained among all those to whom God had granted the booty of Makrān.

Al-Ḥakam b. 'Amr composed the following on this subject:[346]

Without boasting, those whose provisions were exhausted had their fill of booty brought to them from Mukkurān.[347]
It came to them after total exhaustion and effort, when there was no food to cook during the winter.
The army can place no blame on what I did; nor can my sword or my lance tip be blamed,
On the morn when I had their diverse troops[348] pushed back into extensive Sind and the neighboring regions.
We had a body of troops, in what we wanted obedient, not allowing their [horses'] bridles to be slack.[349]
Were it not for my Commander's veto,[350] we would have passed over to [those] ample[-bodied] whores![351]

Bayrūdh in al-Ahwāz[352]

[The same sources] report: When the [Muslim] cavalry dispersed throughout the various districts, a large force of Kurds and

345. As the Arabic terms given in the text indicate, Ṣuḥār gave 'Umar his description of Makrān in rhymed prose.

346. The meter of the poem is wāfir.

347. A variant spelling of Makrān used to fit the metre of the poem.

348. It should be recalled that the forces opposing the Muslims were a mixture of Makrānīs and Sindīs.

349. That is, they kept their horses and, by implication, themselves under complete control.

350. A reference to 'Umar's express order that the Muslims should penetrate no farther than Makrān.

351. Arabic, al-bududi 'l-zawānī, that is, feminine plural, hence the translation. It is a reference to Sind where perhaps the women had such a reputation.

352. A town in the northwest of Khūzistān, north of al-Ahwāz, variously spelled Bayrūdh by Yāqūt (Mu'jam, I, 526) and Bayrūt and Bīrūdh by Le Strange others assembled in Bayrūdh. Now 'Umar had already ordered Abū Mūsā, when the (Muslim) armies had left for the outlying areas, to march out to [the areas of] those in compact with al-Baṣrah, so that the Muslims could not be attacked in the [2709] rear. ['Umar] was also afraid that some of his armies might be completely surrounded, or others cut off, or left behind. What ['Umar] was afraid of happened with the assembly of the army of Bayrūdh, when Abū Mūsā had been slow [to act] until they had actually mustered. He then marched out, finally stopping in Ramaḍān in Bayrūdh [to face] the army that had collected there. They met in battle between Nahr Tīrā[353] and Manādhir,[354] when the powerful Persian and Kurdish troops had all come together there, with the purpose of laying traps for the Muslims and effecting a breach in their ranks—[the former coalition] never doubting [that at least] one of the two eventualities [would come to pass]. Al-Muhājir b. Ziyād,[355] having perfumed himself and expressed his willingness to die, rose and said to Abū Mūsā, "Get everyone who is fasting to swear that he will return [from the battle] and break his fast." So [al-Muhājir's] brother returned with others and carried out the provision of the oath. By this he intended simply to distract his brother away from him so that he would not prevent him from exposing himself to death. [Al-Muhājir] advanced and fought until he was killed. God weakened the polytheists, and reduced to a small number and humiliated, they fortified themselves. [Al-Muhājir's] brother, al-Rabī',[356] arrived and, his grief intense, exclaimed [to himself], "O you addicted to this lower world!" Abū Mūsā felt compassion for al-Rabī' because of the effect of his brother's tragic death. So he left him behind at the head of an army in authority over [the habitants]. Abū Mūsā [himself] left for Iṣfahān, where he found [Lands, 241]. See also Le Strange, Lands, Map 2, opposite 25. For the battle, Bal'ami, Chronique, III, 520.

---

353. A town standing on the canal of the same name, northwest of al-Ahwāz. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 66; Le Strange, Lands, 241 and Map II, opposite 25.

354. Strictly speaking, two towns lying in the fertile regions of al-Ahwāz, just north of the town of al-Ahwāz. See, Yāqūt, Mu'jam V, 199; Le Strange, Lands, 239 and Map II, opposite 25.

355. He has a brief entry in Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, IV, 423.

356. He was later governor of Sijistān. See Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 164.

[2710] the Kufan armies besieging Jayy. Then he made off for al-Baṣrah after the victory of the [Muslim] troops and when God had given victory to al-Rabī' b. Ziyād over the army of Bayrūdh in Nahr Tīrā and [Abū Mūsā] had taken the captives that they had. Abū Mūsā chose some of them for whom there would be a ransom, as a ransom was more profitable to the Muslims than [holding captive] their prominent leaders and their value [in themselves]. He sent delegations and the fifths [to 'Umar]. A man of 'Anazah[357] stood up and asked him to send him in the delegation, but [Abū Mūsā] refused. But [the man] left [nevertheless], charging [Abū Mūsā] falsely, and 'Umar asked [Abū Mūsā] to present himself. ['Umar] brought them together, finding that Abū Mūsā had an excuse except in the matter of his servant.[358] He lessened his authority, but sent him back to his post. But the other he charged with unrighteousness and ordered him not to do such a thing again.

Al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Muhallab and 'Amr: When Abū Mūsā returned from Iṣfahān after the [Muslim] armies had gone out into the various provinces and al-Rabī' had defeated the army of Bayrūdh and [Abū Mūsā] had collected together the captives and their possessions, [the latter] came out next morning to sixty young sons of village headmen,[359] whom he had selected and sent them back in return [for their ransom]. He sent news of the conquest to 'Umar, choosing a delegation [to take it]. A 'Anazī came to him and asked him to write down his name [for inclusion] in the delegation. [Abū Mūsā] replied that he had already registered [names of] those who were more worthy [of participation in the delegation] than he was. So [the 'Anazī] withdrew in anger. Abū Mūsā wrote to 'Umar about the matter of a 'Anazī called Ḍabbah b. Miḥṣan[360]—and he told him all about him. When the letter [brought by] the delegation [with the news of] the 357. This in all probability refers to Banū 'Anazah b. Asad, a large tribal group in central Arabia. See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 294; Caskel, Ǧamharat, I, Table 172; Kaḥḥālah, Mu'jam, III, 846–47; *EI*², s.v. [Graf].

358. A reference to the slave girl, 'Aqīlah, mentioned, page 81, below.

359. The text has dihqān. See *EI*², s.v. [Lambton]. For this anecdote, see Ṭanṭāwī, Akhbār, 179ff.

360. The text at last gives us the name of this 'Anazī bedouin.

conquest reached 'Umar, the 'Anazī arrived. He came to 'Umar and greeted him. "Who are you?" ('Umar) asked; and the ('Anazī) told him. ('Umar) told him there was no welcome for him there, to which he replied, "A welcome comes from God! And there is certainly no family [here]!"[361] He returned to ('Umar) on three occasions, ('Umar) repeating what he had said to him, and (he) giving him the same response. Finally on the fourth day, he entered and ('Umar) said, "What are you accusing your commander, [Abū Mūsā], of?" He replied that he had chosen sixty young sons of landowners for himself, and he also had a slave girl called 'Aqīlah who was given a bowl of food for lunch and supper. "None of us can do this and he also has two measures [of grain][362] and two seals," (the 'Anazī) added. He further, [said the 'Anazī], delegated [matters] to Ziyād b. Abī Sufyān,[363] who was governor of al-Baṣrah, and he gave al-Ḥuṭay'ah[364] a gift of a thousand [dirhams]. [2711]

'Umar wrote down everything (the 'Anazī) said and sent for Abū Mūsā. When he arrived, ('Umar) kept him waiting for some days, then summoned him, together with Ḍabbah b. Miḥṣan. He handed the document over to (Ḍabbah), telling him to read what he had written. He read, "He has taken sixty young [captives] for himself." Abū Mūsā replied, "I was shown those who had a ransom [on their head]. I took a ransom for them and divided it out among the Muslims." Ḍabbah agreed that he had not lied, but said that neither had he himself lied. Ḍabbah continued, "He has two measures [of grain]." Abū Mūsā replied, "One for my family with which to feed them and another to give to the Muslims, where they take their provisions." Ḍabbah agreed that he had not lied, but said that neither had he himself lied. When (Ḍabbah) mentioned 'Aqīlah, Abū Mūsā remained silent and made no attempt to justify himself. ('Umar) knew that Ḍabbah had told him the truth. (The 'Anazī) continued that Ziyād was

361. 'Umar says, lā marḥaban wa-lā ahlan! The reply reads, ammā al-marḥabu fa-min Allāh; wa-ammā al-ahlu fa-lā ahla!

362. Arabic qafīz; see Hinz, Masse, 49.

363. The famous governor of the Umayyad Mu'āwiyah and often called Ziyād b. Abīhi. See Shaban, History, 86–89.

364. Al-Ḥuṭay'ah is the famous poet born before Islam, Abū Mulaykah Jarwal b. Aws. See Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, II, 43–62.

in charge of the people's affairs [in al-Baṣrah], but this man did not know what kind of a governor he was. [Abū Mūsā] said, "I found that he was a man of merit and perception, so I handed over responsibility for my governorate to him." "And he gave al-Ḥuṭay'ah a thousand!" [Abū Mūsā] said, "I stuffed his mouth [2712] with money so he would not revile me!" ['Umar] said, "Now you have done something!"[365] He sent [Abū Mūsā] back [to al-Baṣrah] and told him when he arrived there to send Ziyād and 'Aqīlah to him. This he did. 'Aqīlah arrived before Ziyād, then he came and stood at the door. 'Umar went out while Ziyād was standing at the door, dressed in white linen clothes, and said to him, "What clothes are these?" So he told him. "How much did they cost?" asked ['Umar], and he told him they cost little. ['Umar] believed him and said, "How much is your stipend?" He replied, "Two thousand." ['Umar] asked him what he had done with the first stipend he got. He replied that he had bought his mother and set her free. With the second, [he said], he bought his stepson, a young slave, and set him free. ['Umar] wished him success and questioned him about the ordinances of God, the religious practices and the Qur'ān and found him well versed in religious knowledge. He sent him back, ordering the Basran commanders to follow his advice. He held 'Aqīlah back in Medina. ['Umar] commented, "Indeed Ḍabbah al-'Anazī was angry with Abū Mūsā with some justification, that he came to him, but left him in anger that he received no worldly gain. [Ḍabbah] has told the truth [about Abū Mūsā], but also lied, and his lying has marred his telling the truth. Beware of lying; lying leads [one] into hellfire!"

Now al-Ḥuṭay'ah had met [Abū Mūsā] and he had given him a [2713] gift during the attack on Bayrūdh. Abū Mūsā had begun to besiege them and attack [the Persians and Kurds], and he finally defeated them. Then he passed on from them, leaving al-Rabī' as his representative among them. Then after the conquest he returned to them and took charge of the division [of the spoils].

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Abū 'Amr[366]—al-

365. Arabic, fa-qāla qad fa'alta mā fa'alta!

366. Abū 'Amr was the client of the unidentified Ibrāhīm b. Ṭalḥah. See notes 664 and 665, below.

Ḥasan—Asīd b. al-Mutashammis, nephew of al-Aḥnaf b. Qays: I was present with Abū Mūsā on the day Iṣfahān [was taken] at the conquest of the settlements, in charge of which were 'Abdallāh b. Warqā' al-Riyāḥī and 'Abdallāh b. Warqā' al-Asadī. Then Abū Mūsā was sent to al-Kūfah and 'Umar b. Surāqah al-Makhzūmī[367] was appointed governor of al-Baṣrah. Then Abū Mūsā was reappointed governor of al-Baṣrah, and 'Umar died while he was in charge of prayer there. [His] governorship of [al-Baṣrah] was by turns, not continuous. 'Umar would sometimes summon [Abū Mūsā] to send him as reinforcement to one of the armies, and he would carry out that role.

Salamah b. Qays al-Ashja'ī[368] and the Kurds

According to 'Abdallāh b. Kathīr al-'Abdī[369]—Ja'far b. 'Awn[370]—Abū Janāb[371]—Abū al-Muḥajjal al-Rudaynī[372]—Makhlad al-Bakrī[373] and 'Alqamah b. Marthad[374]—Sulaymān b. Buraydah:[375] Whenever an army of Believers had been assembled under his [2714] instructions, the Commander of the Faithful appointed as their commander someone versed in religious knowledge and law. [Now such] an army assembled under his instructions, so he despatched Salamah b. Qays al-Ashja'ī in command. ('Umar) addressed [him as follows]:

> Go forth in God's name and fight in God's cause against all those who do not believe in God. If you meet your polytheist enemy, call upon them to take [one of]

---

367. Following the advice of the Leiden editor, I omit the word badawī [or Badrī, according to two MSS], because neither would seem to make sense.

368. Salamah b. Qays al-Asja'ī has a brief notice in Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 339.

369. An unidentified narrator.

370. Ja'far b. 'Awn was a narrator who died in 206–207/821–823. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 101.

371. An unidentified narrator.

372. An unidentified narrator.

373. An unidentified narrator.

374. 'Alqamah b. Marthad al-Ḥaḍramī has an entry in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 272–73.

375. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 174–75, says that Sulaymān b. Buraydah b. al-Ḥasīb al-Marwazī died in 105/723. He must, however, have been a contemporary of 'Umar and Salamah.

three courses of action. Summon them to Islam and if they accept, and choose [to remain] in their lands, they will have alms obligations[376] [to be paid] from their own wealth and have no share in the immovable booty [accruing to] the Muslims. If, [having accepted Islam], they choose to join you, they will have similar privileges and obligations to your own. But if they refuse [to accept Islam], then summon them to [pay] the land tax. If they declare that they will pay the land tax, fight their enemy beyond them and leave them free to pay—but do not impose on them more than they have the capacity [to pay]. If they refuse [to pay the land tax], then fight them, for God will be your helper against them. If they fortify themselves against your [attack] in some fortified place and request you to [allow them] to surrender under the terms of God's and His Apostle's judgment, do not allow them to do so, for you do not know what these judgments are as they affect them. If, however, they request you to [allow them] to surrender under the terms of God's and His Apostle's covenant, do not grant them these, but rather grant them your own covenants. If they fight you, do not act unfaithfully or treacherously; do not inflict exemplary punishment [on them] or kill minors.

Salamah reported [as follows]. We marched on and met up [2715] with our polytheist enemy and summoned them to [act as] the Commander of the Faithful had instructed. But they refused to accept Islam. So we called upon them to [pay] land tax, but they refused to declare [their willingness to pay], so we fought them and God gave us victory over them. We killed their military, but made their children captive. We collected the spoils together. Now Salamah b. Qays spotted an ornament [among the spoils] and said, "You are not interested in this; would you be willing to send it to the Commander of the Faithful? [We] owe [this] to him and [should go to] some trouble for him." They replied that they would be willing. [Salamah] continued: So he put this ornament into a casket and sent off one of his men, saying, "Take it and, when you come to al-Baṣrah, against the gifts the Commander of the Faithful [will give you], buy two baggage camels and load them up with provisions for yourself and your young slave. Then make your way to the Commander of the Faithful."

376. Arabic zakāh; see SEI, s.v. [Schacht].

[The messenger] reported as follows: I did this and came to the Commander of the Faithful as he was feeding lunch to the people, leaning on a stick, as a shepherd does, and walking round the huge bowls, saying, "Some more meat for this lot, Yarfa';[377] [2716] some more bread for these; some more soup for these." When I was pushed [through the crowd] into his presence, he told me to sit down. I did so among those people nearest [to him]. There was some rough food—even the food I had with me was better! When the people had finished, he told Yarfa' to take away his bowls, then he turned away. I followed, and he entered the room of a house. I asked permission to enter and gave my greetings. He gave me permission, and I entered to where he was. He was sitting on a hair cloth leaning against two leather cushions stuffed with palm fibres. He threw one over to me and I sat down on it, [finding myself] in a space inside a vestibule in which there was a compartment with a small curtain. ['Umar] asked [his wife], Umm Kulthūm [to bring us] our lunch. She brought out to him a piece of bread with some olive oil by the side of which was some unground salt. ['Umar] asked Umm Kulthūm to join us and eat some of this [food] with us. She replied, however, that she could hear the voice of a man with [2717] ['Umar]. He confirmed that this was true, [adding that] he did not think he was a local.[378] [The messenger] added that this was when he realized that ['Umar] did not know him. [Umm Kulthūm] said, "If you had intended me to come out to join the men, you would have dressed me up, as Ibn Ja'far[379] does his wife, as al-Zubayr[380] does his wife, and as Ṭalḥah[381] does his wife!" "Is it not enough for you," replied ('Umar), "that you are called Umm Kulthūm, daughter of 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib and wife of the Commander of the Faithful, 'Umar?!" [To me] he said, "Eat; if she were willing [to join us], she would have given you better food than this!" [The messenger] continued: So I ate a little, but the food I had with me was better than this! He ate, and I have never seen a heartier eater than he. No food stuck to his hand or his mouth! Then he asked for drink, and they brought a bowl of a barley-meal drink. "Give the man a drink," said ('Umar). [The messenger] continued: So I drank a little—the barley-meal drink I had with me was better than this! Then he took hold of it and drank down to the dregs,[382] saying, "Praise be to God who has filled us up with food and quenched our thirst!" I said, "The Commander of the Faithful has eaten and drunk his fill. There is something you can do for me, Commander of the Faithful." He asked what it was. I replied, "I am the envoy of Salamah [2718] b. Qays." ('Umar) said, "Both Salamah b. Qays and his envoy are welcome. Tell me how the emigrants are."[383] "They are as safe and have conquered as many of their enemies as you would wish, Commander of the Faithful." "What are their prices like?" ('Umar) asked. [The messenger] continued: I said, "The very cheapest." "What about their meat?" he asked, "for this is the mainstay of the Arabs; they will never thrive without their mainstay." I replied, "Beef is such and such a price, mutton such and such. On we went, Commander of the Faithful, and we met up with our polytheist enemy. We called upon them to accept Islam, as you commanded us, but they refused. So we called upon them to [pay] land tax, but they refused, so we fought

377. He is 'Umar's personal servant.

378. Implying that she could join the men because the visitor was an outsider and someone who did not know her.

379. 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far b. Abī Ṭālib, the nephew of 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib died in 80/699 or 85/705. See *EI*², s.v. [Zeterstéen].

380. Al-Zubayr b. al-'Awāmm, the famous Companion, was killed by 'Alī at the battle of the Camel in 36/656 after his revolt with Ṭalḥah (see the next note) and the wife of the Prophet, 'Ā'ishah. A member of the electoral council after the assassination of 'Umar. See Shaban, History, 71–72; CHIs, 70.

381. Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh, a Companion also killed with al-Zubayr in 36/656. A member of the electoral council after the assassination of 'Umar. See Shaban, History, loc. cit., and CHIs, loc, cit. and preceding note.

382. Arabic, fa-shariba-hu ḥattā qara'a al-qadaḥu jabhata-h, literally "he drank it until the bowl knocked against his forehead".

383. Arabic, muhājirūn. I take this as a euphemism for the Arab troops on the front line.

against them and God gave us victory over them. We killed their military, but took their women captive, and we collected together the spoils. Salamah spotted an ornament among the spoils and said to the men, "You are not interested in this. Are you willing to send it to the Commander of the Faithful?" They replied that they were." I took out my casket. But when he saw the gems, red, yellow and green, he leapt up, put his hand on his waist and said, "May God never, [if I were to accept this,], fill 'Umar's belly again!" (The messenger) continued: The womenfolk thought I was intending to assassinate him, so [2719] they came to the curtain. He said (to the messenger), "Keep what you brought. Yarfa', strike him on the neck!"[384] So I was [re]arranging my casket, while he was striking me on the neck. I said, "Commander of the Faithful, my camels are exhausted. I need replacements." He replied, "Yarfa', give him two baggage camels from the alms. If you meet anyone who has a greater need of them than you, hand them over to him." I said I would obey his orders. He added, "I swear that, if the Muslims disperse to their winter quarters before this is distributed among them, I shall certainly bring about calamity for you and your master!" (The messenger) continued: "So I left and came to Salamah and said, May God not grant His blessing for what you have done to [2720] me in this particular case! Distribute this among the men before some calamity befalls us both." So he did. A gem was sold at 5 and 6 dirhams, although it was worth more than 20,000!

According to al-Sarī's version—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Abū Janāb—Sulaymān b. Buraydah: I met the messenger of Salamah b. Qays al-Ashja'ī who said, "When an Arab army assembled under the instructions of 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, . . . ," and then he reported an account similar to that of 'Abdallāh b. Kathīr on the authority of Ja'far b. 'Awn, except that he said in his report, on the authority of Shu'ayb, on the authority of Sayf [with the following variants], "Grant them your own covenants." He continued, "We met up with our Kurdish enemies, and we called upon them . . ."

(The same source) also reported: We collected the spoils together and Salamah found two boxes of jewels among them, so he put them in a casket.

384. That is, to frighten and scold him.

He also reported as follows: "Is it not enough for you that you are called Umm Kulthūm, daughter of 'Alī b. Abī Ṭalib, wife of 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb?" She replied, "This is of little use to me!" He said [to the messenger], "Eat."

He also reported as follows: They brought a bowl of barley-meal drink. Whenever they moved it, some of its contents fizzed up over [the top]. When they left it alone, it was still. Then he told [the messenger] to drink. So I drank a little—my own drink I had with me was better than this! He took the bowl, drinking [2721] it down to the dregs, then he said, "You are indeed a poor eater and drinker!"

He also reported as follows: I said, "[I am] the messenger of Salamah." He replied, "Welcome, Salamah and his messenger. It is as if you were a product of his loins. Tell me about the emigrants."

He also reported as follows: Then he said, "May God never, [if I were to accept this], fill 'Umar's belly again!" He continued: The womenfolk thought I had assassinated him, so they drew the curtain. He said, "Strike him on his neck, Yarfa'." So he struck my neck, as I cried out, and exclaimed, "Get out of here and be quick about it!"[385] He continued, "By God, there is no other god but He! If the army disperses to its winter quarters . . . ," and the rest of the account was similar to that of 'Abdallāh b. Kathīr.

According to al-Rabī' b. Sulaymān[386]—Asad b. Mūsā[387]—Shihāb b. Khirāsh al-Ḥawshabī[388]—al-Ḥajjāj b. Dīnār[389]—Manṣūr b. al-Mu'tamir[390]—Shaqīq b. Salamah al-Asadī[391]—the

---

385. Arabic, "al-janā'a wa-aẓunnu-ka sa-tubṭi'u."

386. An Egyptian narrator who died in 270/884. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 245ff.; Rosenthal, Historiography, 416.

387. He died in Egypt in 212/827. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 260.

388. He has an entry in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 366–67.

389. Al-Ḥajjāj b. Dīnār al-Ashja'ī has an entry in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 200–1.

390. Abū 'Attāb Manṣūr b. al-Mu'tamir al-Sulamī died in 132/749. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 312–15.

391. Abū Wā'il, who died in 79/698 or 99/717. See Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, III, 3; Rosenthal, Historiography, 278.

intermediary between 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb and Salamah b. Qays: 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb sent the army to Salamah b. Qays al-Ashja'ī in al-Ḥīrah, saying, "Go forth in God's name . . . ," and he gave an account similar to that of 'Abdallāh b. Kathīr on the authority of Ja'far.

Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī] reported as follows: 'Umar led the wives of the Messenger of God on the pilgrimage this year and this was the last pilgrimage in which he led the people. This is also according to al-Ḥārith[392]—Ibn Sa'd[393]—al-Wāqidī.

('Umar's) death took place during this year, [23; November 19, 643–November 7, 644].

'Umar's Assassination[394] [2722]

According to Salm b. Junādah[395]—Sulaymān b. 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Abī Thābit b. 'Abd al-'Azīz b. 'Umar b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf[396]—his father—'Abdallāh b. Ja'far[397]—his father—al-Miswar b. Makhramah (whose mother was 'Ātikah, daughter of 'Awf).[398] 'Umar went out one day to wander around the market. He was met by Abū Lu'lu'ah,[399] a young Christian slave of al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah, who said, "Help me, Commander of the Faithful, against al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah, for 392. Ibn Muḥammad, who died in 282/896. See Rosenthal, Historiography, 128; Translation, I, 247.

393. Abū 'Abdallāh Muḥammad b. Sa'd, who died in 230/845, the famous author of the Ṭabaqāt. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 182ff.; Duri, Rise, 40; Sezgin, GAS, I, 300ff.; *EI*², s.v. "Ibn Sa'd" (Fück); Translation, I, 215 n. 337.

394. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, III, 24ff.; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, IV, 226ff.; Ibn 'Abd Rabbih, 'Iqd, IV, 272; Bal'ami, Chronique, III, 528ff. See also Ṭabarī, Selection, which begins at this point in the text.

395. Abū al-Sā'ib Salm b. Junādah died in 254/868. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 128–29.

396. An unidentified narrator.

397. 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far al-Zuhrī died in 170/786. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 171.

398. Al-Miswar b. Makhramah died in 64/683. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 234. 'Ātikah was the sister of 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf. See also Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 429.

399. Abū Lu'lu'ah Fayrūz al-Nihāwandī. He is believed to have originated in Nihāwand, hence his nisbah, and to have been captured by the Byzantines during the Perso-Byzantine wars before Islam. He became a Christian when held by the Byzantines. See Ṭabarī, I, 2632.

I pay a great deal of tax." "How much?" enquired ('Umar). "Two dirhams a day," was the reply. "What is your trade?" asked ('Umar). "[I am] a carpenter, stone mason, and smith," he replied. "I do not think your tax is a lot in view of the work you do," ('Umar) said. "I have heard that you claim you could make a mill that will grind by wind power if you wished." He replied that he could. ('Umar) asked him to make him a mill. (Abū Lu'lu'ah) replied, "If you survive, I shall certainly make you a mill that will be the talk of everyone in both East and West!" Then (Abū Lu'lu'ah) left ('Umar), who said [to himself], "[That] slave has just threatened me!" Then he went off home. The next day Ka'b al-Aḥbār[400] came to him and said, "Appoint your successor, Commander of the Faithful, for you are going to die in three days." ('Umar) asked him how he knew this. He replied, [2723] "I find it in God's book, the Torah." 'Umar said, "Can you actually find 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb in the Torah?" (Ka'b) replied, "Indeed no, but I do find a complete description of you and also that your allotted life span has come to an end." (The source) continued: And 'Umar was experiencing no sickness or pain. Next day Ka'b came to him and said, "One day gone and two to go, Commander of the Faithful!" Then he came to him on the day after that and said, "Two days gone, one and a night to go! You have got until tomorrow morning!" That morning 'Umar went out to prayers; he used to assign certain men to [see to] the lines [of those praying] and when they were straight, he would come and proclaim "God is great!" Abū Lu'lu'ah slipped in among the people, carrying in his hand a dagger with two blades and its haft in the middle. He struck 'Umar six blows, one of which was below his navel, and this was the one which killed him. (Abū Lu'lu'ah) also killed Kulayb b. Abī al-Bukayr al-Laythī,[401] who was behind ('Umar). When ('Umar) felt the heat of the weapon, he fell and said, "Is 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf[402]

400. Ka'b al-Aḥbār was a Yemenite Jewish scholar who converted to Islam in ca. 17/638. He died ca. 35/655. See *EI*², s.v. (Schmitz).

401. Kulayb b. Abī al-Bukayr al-Laythī has an entry in Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, VIII, minus the Abī, where this event is mentioned.

402. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf was a prominent early Muslim convert and merchant. He died ca. 31/652. See *EI*², s.v. (Houtsma-Watt).

among the crowd?" They said, "Yes, Commander of the Faithful, he is here." ('Umar) said [to 'Abd al-Raḥmān], "Come forward and lead the people in prayer." So 'Abd al-Raḥmān led the people in prayer, while 'Umar lay prostrate. Then he was carried away and brought into his house. He called for 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf and said, "I want to appoint you my successor." He replied, "Indeed, Commander of the Faithful, I accept. If you order me, I shall accept [the appointment] from you." ('Umar) said, "What do you want?" ('Abd al-Raḥmān) said, "I beseech you by God. Do you order me to accept this (appointment)?" ('Umar) replied, "No, indeed." ('Abd al-Raḥmān) said, "I shall never have anything to do with [accepting] (the appointment)." ('Umar) said, "Give me some peace and quiet so that I can appoint those who still met with the Messenger of God's approval when he died. Call 'Alī for me, 'Uthmān, al-Zubayr, and Sa'd." [When they had arrived, he said], "Wait for your brother Ṭalḥah for three [nights]. If he does not come, do what you have to do. If you should take authority over the people, 'Alī, I implore you not to bring them under the power of Banū Hāshim.[403] If you should take authority over the people, 'Uthmān, I implore you not to bring them under the power of Banū Abī Mu'ayṭ.[404] If you should take authority over the people, Sa'd, I implore you not to bring them under the power of your relatives.[405] Off you go! Consult together, then do what you have to do. Let Ṣuhayb[406] lead the people in prayer." [2724]

Then he called for Abū Ṭalḥah al-Anṣārī[407] and said, "Stand at 403. Hāshim b. 'Abd Manāf, a tribal group (baṭn) of Quraysh in Mecca to which the Prophet and 'Ali, Muḥammad's cousin and son-in-law, belonged. See Zubayrī, Quraysh, 14ff.; Kaḥḥālah, Mu'jam, III, 1207; Watt, Mecca, 7; *EI*², s.v. (Watt).

404. 'Uthman also belonged to Quraysh, but through 'Abd Shams, a brother of Hāshim, and Umayyah. Abū Mu'ayṭ was Abān b. Abī 'Amr b. Umayyah b. 'Abd Shams. See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 114.

405. Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ was a famous figure in early Islam. He fought at Badr and acted as personal bodyguard to the Prophet. He led the Muslim forces in their defeat of the Persians at al-Qādisiyyah. He died in 51/671. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 483–84.

406. Ṣuhayb. b. Sinān was a Byzantine slave emancipated after his move to Mecca. He died in 38/658. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 438–39.

407. Abū Ṭalḥah Zayd b. Sahl al-Anṣārī died in 32/653 or 34/655. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 414–15.

their door and do not let anyone enter into their presence. I commend to the caliph after my death the Helpers, 'Who have made their abode in the city [of the Prophet] and in the Faith,'[408] that he do good to him who does good among them and forgive him who does evil among them. I commend to the caliph after my death the Arabs—for they are the very substance of Islam—that what is their due of alms be taken and assigned to their poor. I commend to the caliph after my death the covenant of the Messenger of God that [non-Muslims] be given a compact faithfully fulfilled. O God, have I done what I ought to do?! I leave the caliph after my death in a cleaner [condition] than the palm of the hand.[409] 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar,[410] go and find out who has murdered me." He replied, "Commander of the Faithful, you [2725] have been murdered by Abū Lu'lu'ah, slave of al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah." ['Umar] exclaimed, "Praise be to God who has never put my fate into the hands of someone who has bowed down to Him on one single occasion![411] Go to 'Ā'ishah, 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar, and ask her to permit me to be buried with the Prophet and Abū Bakr. If the council is divided, 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar, you should vote with the majority. If they are [split] three against three, follow the faction that 'Abd al-Raḥmān supports. Allow the people to enter, 'Abdallāh." So the Emigrants and the Helpers came in to see him, offering him their greetings. He would ask them if the [assassination] was the result of some conspiracy among them and they would reply, "God protect [us]!" [The source] continued: Ka'b entered with the others and when he saw him, 'Umar began to recite the following:[412]

Ka'b gave me an evil prediction on three distinct occasions;
there can be no doubt that what Ka'b told me was right.
I am not afraid of death; I shall surely die;

---

408. Qur'ān, LIX:9.

409. That is, with no money in the treasury and not keeping back what was due to the Muslims.

410. The famous son of 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb who died in 73/692. See Rosenthal, Historiography, 287; *EI*², s.v. [Veccia Valgieri].

411. That is, a non-Muslim.

412. The meter is ṭawīl. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, III, 25, where we find tawa'adda-nī instead of fa-aw'ada-nī in line 1.

but I am afraid of the one transgression followed by another.[413]

(The source) continued: It was suggested to the Commander of the Faithful that he should call a physician. So one from Banū al-Ḥārith b. Ka'b[414] was summoned and he gave him date wine to drink. But the date wine came back up mixed with blood. (The physican) told [them] to give him milk. (The source) continued: But the milk came back up too, [though] white. It was suggested to the Commander of the Faithful that he should appoint a successor, but he replied that he had already finished [arrangements for this].[415]

He died later, on Tuesday evening, Dhū al-Ḥijjah 27, 23 [November 5, 644]. They took him out early the following day, Wednesday, and he was buried in 'Ā'ishah's house along with the Prophet and Abū Bakr. Ṣuhayb came forward and prayed over him, but before this two of the Companions of the Messenger of God had come forward, 'Alī and 'Uthmān. One came forward from [his position] at his head, the other from [his position] at his feet. 'Abd al-Raḥmān exclaimed, "There is no god but God! How eager you both are to get hold of the caliphate! Are you not aware that the Commander of the Faithful left instructions for Ṣuhayb to lead the people in prayer?" Ṣuhayb came forward and performed this task. (The source) added that all five [members of the electoral council] went down into ('Umar's) grave.[416] [2726]

Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī] said that it is also reported that ('Umar) died at the beginning of al-Muḥarram, 24 [November 7, 644].

The Sources of [the Conflicting Report of 'Umar's Death]

According to al-Ḥārith—Muḥammad b. Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar [al-Wāqidī]—Abū Bakr b. Ismā'īl b. Muḥammad b. Sa'd[417]—his father: 'Umar was stabbed on Wednesday, Dhū al-

413. The evil prediction itself followed by the assassination?

414. It would seem to be the Yemenite tribe from the Najrān area in question here. They are a tribal group of Madhḥij. Ibn Rasūl, Ṭurfah, 35; Qalqashandī, Ṣubḥ. I, 326; Kaḥḥālah, Mu'jam, I, 231–32; *EI*², s.v. (Schleifer).

415. That is the appointment of the electoral council (shūrā).

416. See page 155, below.

417. An unidentified narrator, the great-grandson of Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ.

Ḥijjah 26, 23 [November 4, 644], and was buried on Sunday morning the beginning of al-Muḥarram, 24 [November 7, 644]. His rule lasted for ten years, five months, and twenty-one nights after the death of Abū Bakr, exactly twenty-two years, nine months, and thirteen days after the Hijrah. The oath of allegiance was given to 'Uthmān b. 'Affān on Monday, al-Muḥarram 3 [November 9, 644]. [The source] continued: I mentioned this to 'Uthmān al-Akhnasī,[418] but he replied, "I think you are very much mistaken! 'Umar died on Dhū al-Ḥijjah 26 [November 4, 644] and the oath of allegiance was given to 'Uthmān b. 'Affān on Dhū al-Ḥijjah 29 [November 7, [2727] 644]. He began his caliphate on al-Muḥarram, 24."

According to Aḥmad b. Thābit al-Rāzī—a traditionist—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā[419]—Abū Ma'shar: 'Umar was killed on Wednesday, Dhū al-Ḥijjah 26, as the year 23 was coming to a close [November 4, 644]. His caliphate lasted ten years, six months, and four days, then the oath of allegiance was given to 'Uthmān b. 'Affān.

Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī] said: According to al-Madā'inī's version—'Umar [b. Shabbah]—Sharīk[420]—al-A'mash[421] [or Jābir al-Ju'fī][422]—'Awf b. Mālik al-Ashja'ī[423] and 'Āmir b. Abī Muḥammad[424]—some shaykhs of his people, and 'Uthmān b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān[425]—Ibn Shihāb al-Zuhrī:[426] 'Umar was stabbed on Wednesday, Dhū al-Ḥijjah 23 [November 1, 644]. [The source] continued: Others say that it was Dhū al-Ḥijjah 24 [November 2, 644].

---

418. 'Uthmān b. Muḥammad al-Akhnasī has a brief notice in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 153–54.

419. An unidentified narrator.

420. Ibn 'Abdallāh al-Nakha'ī, who died ca. 178/793. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 333–37.

421. Sulaymān b. Mihrān, who died ca. 148/765. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 222–26.

422. Ibn Yazīd, who died in 128/745. See Rosenthal, Historiography, 517.

423. 'Awf b. Mālik al-Ashja'ī died in Damascus in 73/692. See Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, IV, 156.

424. An unidentified narrator.

425. 'Uthmān b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān. Several persons of this name are listed in the biographical dictionaries, and it is not possible to identify the one in question with any certainty.

426. The famous historian Muḥammad b. Muslim b. Shihāb, who died ca. 125/743. Cf. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 445–51; Sezgin, GAS, I, 280–83; Duri, Rise, especially 98ff., 118–19, and passim.

According to Sayf's version—al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Khulayd b. Dhafarah and Mujālid: 'Uthmān became caliph on al-Muḥarram 3, 24 [November 9, 644]. He went out and led the people in the early evening prayer. He increased [stipends] and sent out envoys, and that practice was thereby established.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Amr—al-Sha'bī: The members of the electoral council agreed upon 'Uthmān on al-Muḥarram 3 [November 9, 644] when the time of early evening prayer had begun and after the call to prayer had been given by [2728] Ṣuhayb's muezzin. They reached agreement between the first and second calls to prayer.[427] ['Uthmān] went out and led the people in prayer and provided them with an extra 100 [dirhams]. He also sent out delegations to the garrison towns, treating them with generosity. He was the first one to do this.

According to [the same source]—Hishām b. Muḥammad:[428] 'Umar was killed on Dhū al-Ḥijjah 27, 23 [November 5, 644]. His caliphate lasted ten years, six months, and four days.

'Umar's Genealogy[429]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq; according to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar and Hishām b. Muḥammad; according to 'Umar [b. Shabbah]—'Alī b. Muḥammad [al-Madā'inī]:[430] They all agreed that 'Umar's genealogy was as follows: 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb b. Nufayl b. 'Abd al-'Uzzā b. Riyāḥ b. 'Abdallāh b. Qurṭ b. Razāḥ b. 'Adī b. Ka'b b. Lu'ayy. His kunyah was Abū Ḥafṣ and his mother was Ḥantamah bt. Hāshim b. al-Mughīrah b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar b. Makhzūm.

Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī] said: ['Umar] was called al-Fārūq.[431]

---

427. The iqāmah is the second call to prayer, after the adhān, given by the muezzin and it marks the beginning of the prayer proper. See SEI, s.v. "Iḳāma" [Juynboll].

428. Abū al-Mundhir Hishām b. Muḥammad b. al-Sā' ib al-Kalbī, the famous historian who died ca. 206/822. See Sezgin, GAS, I, 268–71; Duri, Rise, 51ff. and passim; EI^{2}, s.v. [Atallah].

429. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, III, 26; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, IV, 192ff.; Bal'ami, Chronique, III, 533.

430. That is there are three separate chains of authority.

431. Meaning "he who distinguishes between truth and falsehood."

Preceding generations were in dispute about who called him by this name. Some of them have reported that the Messenger of God gave him this name.

The Sources of [the Report that Muḥammad First Called 'Umar al-Fārūq]

[2729] According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Abū Ḥazrah Ya'qūb b. Mujāhid[432]—Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm[433]—Abū 'Amr Dhakwān:[434] I asked 'Ā'ishah who gave 'Umar the name al-Fārūq. She replied that it was the Prophet.

Some people reported that the first to call ('Umar) by this name were the People of the Book.

The Sources of [the Report that the People of the Book Did That]

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Ya'qūb b. Ibrāhīm b. Sa'd[435]—his father—Ṣāliḥ b. Kaysān[436]—Ibn Shihāb: We heard that the People of the Book were the first to call 'Umar al-Fārūq. The Muslims did relate this in their reports, but we have never heard that the Messenger of God made any such reference.

A Description of 'Umar

According to Hannād b. al-Sarī[437]—Wakī'[438]—Sufyān[439]—'Āṣim b. Abī al-Najjūd[440]—Zirr b. Ḥubaysh:[441] 'Umar went out one

---

432. He died ca. 150/767. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 394–95.

433. He died in 120/738. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 5–7.

434. Abū 'Amr Dhakwān was 'Ā'ishah's client who died in 63/682. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 220.

435. He died 208/823. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 380–81.

436. He died after 140/757. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 399–401.

437. Hannād b. al-Sarī b. Muṣ'ab b. Abī Bakr who died 243/857. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 70ff.

438. Wakī' b. al-Jarrāḥ b. Malīḥ who died in 197/812. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 123–31; Sezgin, GAS, I, 96ff.

439. Probably Sufyān b. Sa'īd al-Thawrī, died 161/778 (Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 111–15); Sezgin, GAS, I, 96.

440. 'Āṣim b. Abī al-Najjūd al-Muqrī, a Kufan Qur'ān reader who died ca. 128/746. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 38–40; Sezgin, GAS, I, 7.

441. He died ca. 83/702. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 321–22.

festival day or to the funeral of Zaynab,[442] [showing] a dark complexion, very tall, bald, and ambidextrous, walking [head and shoulders above the people] as if he were mounted.

According to Hannād—Sharīk—'Āṣim—Zirr: I saw 'Umar coming to the festival, walking barefoot, ambidextrous, and wearing a striped garment tucked up. He was towering over the people as if he were mounted and was saying, "People, perform [2730] the hijrah [with sincerity], and do not pretend to be like those who do!"

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—'Umar b. 'Imrān b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Bakr[443]—'Āṣim b. 'Ubaydallāh[444]—'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir b. Rabī'ah:[445] I noticed 'Umar was a wan man, pale with an overlay of red. [He was also] very tall and with a bald patch.

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Shu'ayb b. Ṭalḥah[446]—his father—al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad:[447] I heard ['Abdallāh] b. 'Umar describe 'Umar as follows, "He is wan with an overlay of red. Very tall, white-haired, and with a bald patch."

According to al-Ḥārith—Muḥammad b. Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Khālid b. Abī Bakr:[448] 'Umar used to dye his beard yellow and comb his hair with henna.

His Birth and Age

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Usāmah b. Zayd b. Aslam[449]—his father—his grandfather: I

---

442. This is probably Zaynab bt. [al-]Jaḥsh, one of the Prophet's wives, who died in 20/641. Cf. Ṭabarī, I, 2595. 'Umar did however have a wife named Zaynab and also a daughter; see pages 100–1, below.

443. An unidentified narrator.

444. 'Āṣim b. 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb died at the beginning of the caliphate of Abū al-'Abbās; that is, ca. 132/750. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 46–49.

445. 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir b. Rabī'ah died after 80/699. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 270–71.

446. An unidentified narrator.

447. Al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad is perhaps the grandson of Abū Bakr who died ca. 105/723. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 333–35.

448. Khālid b. Abī Bakr died in 162/778. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 81–82.

449. Usāmah b. Zayd al-Laythī died in the caliphate of Abū Ja'far; that is, 136–158/754–775. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 207–8.

heard 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb say, "I was born four years before the last great Conflict."[450]

Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī] reported: The early scholars differed on the subject of 'Umar's age: some said that on the day he was killed he was fifty-five years old.

Some of the Sources of [the Report that He Was Fifty-Five Years Old]

According to Zayd b. Akhzam al-Ṭā'ī[451]—Abū Qutaybah[452]— [2731] Jarīr b. Ḥāzim[453]—Ayyūb[454]—Nāfi'[455]—['Abdallāh] Ibn 'Umar: 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb was killed when he was fifty-five years old.

According to 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Ḥakam[456]—Nu'aym b. Ḥammād[457]—al-Darāwardī[458]—'Ubaydallāh b. 'Umar[459]—Nāfi'—Ibn 'Umar: 'Umar died when he was fifty-five years old.

According to 'Abd al-Razzāq[460]—Ibn Jurayj[461]—Ibn Shihāb: 'Umar died at the age of fifty-five exactly.

Others said he was on the day he died fifty-three years old and some months.

---

450. Reference to the last of the four "conflicts" (fijār) in pre-Islamic times, that of al-Barrād b. Qays, who killed 'Urwah al-Raḥḥāl during one of the sacred months when no fighting was permitted. See Lane, Lexicon, 2341; *EI*², s.v. (Fück).

451. He died in 257/870. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 393.

452. Abū Qutaybah is probably Salm b. Qutaybah, who died in 201/816. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 133–34.

453. Jarīr b. Ḥāzim died in 175/791. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 69–72.

454. Ayyūb al-Sakhtiyānī died ca. 131/748. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 397–99.

455. Nāfi', the client of 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar, died ca. 120/738. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 412–15.

456. Al-Miṣrī, the famous Egyptian historian, who died 257/871. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 208; *EI*², s.v. "Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥakam" (Rosenthal).

457. Nu'aym b. Ḥammād died ca. 229/844. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 458–63; Sezgin, GAS, I, 104ff.

458. 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Muḥammad b. 'Ubayd al-Darāwardī died in 82/701. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 353–55.

459. 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Umar b. Ḥafṣ b. 'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, who died in 147/764. See Sezgin, GAS, I, 89.

460. 'Abd al-Razzāq b. Hammām died 211/827. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 310–15; Sezgin, GAS, I, 99.

461. 'Abd al-Malik b. 'Abd al-'Azīz died in 151/768. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 402–6; Sezgin, GAS, I, 91.

The Sources of [the Report that He Was Fifty-Three Years Old]

This was reported to me by Hishām b. Muḥammad b. al-Kalbī.

Yet others said he died when he was sixty-three.

The Sources of [the Report that He Was Sixty-Three Years Old]

Ibn al-Muthannā[462]—Ibn Abī 'Adī[463]—Dāwūd[464]—'Āmir [al-Sha'bī]: 'Umar died when he was sixty-three.

Yet others said he died at the age of sixty-one.

The Sources of [the Report that He Was Sixty-One Years Old]

This was reported to me on the authority of Abū Salamah al-Tabūdhakī[465]—Abū Hilāl[466]—Qatādah.[467]

Yet others said he died when he was sixty. [2732]

The Sources of [the Report that He Was Sixty Years Old]

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Hishām b. Sa'd[468]—Zayd b. Aslam—his father: 'Umar died when he was sixty. Muḥammad b. 'Umar reported that this is the most accurate account in our opinion.

It is reported on the authority of al-Madā'inī that 'Umar died when he was fifty-seven.

---

462. Abū Mūsā Muḥammad died ca. 252/866. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 425–27.

463. Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Abī 'Adī al-Qasmalī died ca. 194/810. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 12ff.

464. Probably Dāwūd b. Abī Hind, who died ca. 141/759. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 204ff.

465. Mūsā b. Ismā'īl died in 223/838. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 333–35; Sam'ānī, Ansāb, III, 18–19.

466. An unidentified narrator.

467. Qatādah b. Di'āmah al-Sadūsī died in 117/735. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 351–56; Sezgin, GAS, I, 31ff.

468. Hishām b. Sa'd died ca. 160/776. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 39–41.

The Names of His Children and Wives

According to Abū Zayd 'Umar b. Shabbah—'Alī b. Muḥammad [al-Madā'inī] and al-Ḥārith—Muḥammad b. Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar, and according to Hishām b. Muḥammad [al-Kalbī], all of whose accounts agree, even if there are differences of expression: In the pre-Islamic era 'Umar married Zaynab bt. Maẓ'ūn b. Ḥabīb b. Wahb b. Ḥudhāfah b. Jumaḥ. She bore him 'Abdallāh, 'Abd al-Raḥmān the elder, and Ḥafṣah.

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad [al-Madā'inī], ['Umar] also married Mulaykah bt. Jarwal al-Khuzā'ī in the pre-Islamic era. She bore him 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Umar. He became separated from her at the time of the Truce.[469] After 'Umar, Abū al-Jahm b. Ḥudhayfah[470] married her.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar [al-Wāqidī], the mother of Zayd the younger and 'Ubaydallāh, who was killed at the battle of Ṣiffīn[471] [fighting] with Mu'āwiyah, was Umm Kulthūm bt. Jarwal b. Mālik b. al-Musayyib b. Rabī'ah b. Aṣram [2733] b. Ḍabīs b. Ḥarām b. Ḥabashiyyah b. Salūl b. Ka'b b. 'Amr b. Khuzā'ah. However, Islam brought about a separation between her and 'Umar.

'Ali b. Muḥammad [al-Madā'inī] reported that ['Umar] also married Quraybah bt. Abī Umayyah al-Makhzūmī in the pre-Islamic era. He became separated from her also at the time of the Truce. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Bakr al-Ṣiddīq[472] married her after ['Umar].

There were also other reports that he married Umm Ḥakīm bt. al-Ḥārith b. Hishām b. al-Mughīrah b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar b. Makhzūm after the advent of Islam. She bore him Fāṭimah, but he divorced her. But al-Madā'inī reported that it was said he did not divorce her.

He also married after the advent of Islam Jamīlah, the sister of 469. That is, the truce of al-Ḥudaybiyah in 6/627 between the Prophet and the Meccans. See Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, II, 316ff. [Guillaume, Life, 499ff.].

---

470. Abū [al-]Jahm 'Āmir/'Ubayd b. Ḥudhayfah. See Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, V, 162–63. No date of death is given in the entry, but he accepted Islam when Mecca was conquered in 8/629. He was renowned as a genealogist.

471. The battle of Ṣiffīn took place between 'Alī and Mu'āwiyah in 37/657.

472. A son of the first caliph.

'Āṣim b. Thābit b. Abī al-Aqlaḥ, whose name was Qays b. 'Iṣmah b. Mālik b. Ḍubay'ah b. Zayd b. al-Aws of the Helpers. She bore him 'Āṣim, but he divorced her.

He also married Umm Kulthūm bt. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib, whose mother was Fāṭimah, the daughter of the Messenger of God. He reportedly gave her 40,000 [dirhams] as a dowry. She bore him Zayd and Ruqayyah.

He also married Luhayyah, a Yemeni woman, who bore him 'Abd al-Raḥmān. Al-Madā'inī reported that she bore him 'Abd al-Raḥmān the youngest. He added that there was a report that [Luhayyah] was a concubine. Al-Wāqidī also said this Luhayyah was a concubine. He added that Luhayyah bore him the middle 'Abd al-Raḥmān. [Al-Wāqidī] also reported that the mother of the youngest 'Abd al-Raḥmān was a concubine. He also had Fukayhah as a concubine, and, according to several reports, she bore him Zaynab. [Al-Wāqidī] also reported that she was 'Umar's youngest child.

He also married 'Ātikah bt. Zayd b. 'Amr b. Nufayl. Before him she had been married to 'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr.[473] When 'Umar died, al-Zubayr b. al-'Awwām married her. [2734]

Al-Madā'inī said:[474] ['Umar] asked for the hand of Umm Kulthūm bt. Abī Bakr when she was young, and he sent a message regarding her to 'Ā'ishah. The latter told [Umm Kulthūm] that the [marriage] was up to her. Umm Kulthūm replied that she did not want him. "You are turning down the Commander of the Faithful!" 'Ā'ishah exclaimed. "Yes," [Umm Kulthūm] said, "he leads a rough life and is severe with his womenfolk." So 'Ā'ishah sent a message to 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ, telling him [of Umm Kulthūm's decision]. "Leave it to me," was his reply. ['Amr] came to 'Umar and said, "Commander of the Faithful, I have heard some news from which I invoke God's name to protect you!" "What is it?" he asked. ['Amr] continued, "You are seeking the hand of Umm Kulthūm bt. Abī Bakr." ['Umar] replied, "Yes, do you think I am not good enough for her or she for me?" ['Amr] said, "Neither, but she is young and grew up with kindness and gentleness under the protection of the Mother of the Believers.[475] You are rough and ready. But we are in awe of you and we cannot turn you away from something that is natural to you. How will it be with [Umm Kulthūm] if she disobeys you on any matter and you punish her physically? You will have taken Abū Bakr's place as his child's [guardian] in a fashion that does not befit you." ['Umar] replied, "But how will all this be with 'Ā'ishah? I have already told her [I am going to marry Umm Kulthūm]." ['Amr] said, "I shall deal with her on your behalf. Also I shall show you someone better than [Umm Kulthūm bt. Abī Bakr], [namely] Umm Kulthūm bt. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib through whom you will acquire a relationship with the Messenger of God."

473. A son of the first caliph.
474. See the account in Bal'ami, Chronique, III, 535–36.

Al-Madā'inī said: ['Umar] was seeking the hand of Umm Abān bt. 'Utbah b. Rabī'ah. However she did not like him and said, "He closes his door, keeping away any goodness he has [from others];[476] he enters wearing a frown and comes out wearing a frown!"

[2735]

When He Became a Muslim

Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī] said: It is reported that ['Umar] embraced Islam after forty-five men and twenty-one women.

The Sources of This Report

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar [al-Wāqidī]—Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh[477]—his father: I mentioned the account about 'Umar to [my son] and he said that 'Abdallāh b. Tha'labah b. Ṣu'ayr[478] had told him that 'Umar embraced Islam after forty-five men and twenty-one women.

---

475. That is, 'Ā'ishah, the wife of the Prophet.

476. An accusation of miserliness.

477. Abū Aḥmad al-Zubayrī, who died in 203/818. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 254–56.

478. 'Abdallāh b. Tha'labah b. Ṣu'ayr al-'Udharī died ca. 93/711. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 165.

Some of His Memorable Deeds

According to Abū al-Sā'ib [Salm b. Junādah]—Ibn Fuḍayl[479]—Ḍirār[480]—Ḥuṣayn al-Murrī:[481] 'Umar said, "The Arabs are like a tractable camel that follows its leader. So its leader should watch where he is leading it. By the Lord of the Ka'bah, I shall certainly carry them along the [straight] road.

According to Ya'qūb b. Ibrāhīm—Ismā'īl b. Ibrāhīm[482]—Yūnus[483]—al-Ḥasan [al-Baṣrī]: 'Umar said, "When I find myself in a position when I feel comfortable, but that means my people have no access [to me], then this [can]not [continue] to be my position; I [must once again] be on the same level as my people. [2736]

According to Khallād b. Aslam[484]—al-Naḍr b. Shumayl[485]—Qaṭan[486]—Abū Yazīd al-Madīnī[487]—a client of 'Uthmān b. 'Affān: I was riding behind 'Uthmān b. 'Affān one hot day when there was an extremely hot wind blowing and he came to the alms-animal pen. There was a man wearing a waist wrapper and an upper garment with another wrapped around his head. He was driving camels into the pen; that is, the alms-camel pen. 'Uthmān said, "Who do you think this is?" We finally reached him and he was 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb. ['Uthmān] said, "He is indeed 'the strong, the trustworthy one'!"[488]

According to Ja'far b. Muḥammad al-Kūfī[489] and 'Abbās b.

---

479. Muḥammad b. Fuḍayl b. Ghazwān al-Ḍabbī died ca. 195/811. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 405ff.

480. Ḍirār is perhaps Ibn Murrah al-Kūfī, who died in 132/749. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 457.

481. An unidentified narrator. For the following reports, see Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, III, 27ff.

482. It is not possible to provide more information on Abū Sa'īd Ismā'īl b. Ibrāhīm al-Asadī. See Translation, I, 255.

483. Possibly Yūnus b. 'Ubayd, who died in 140/757. See Juynboll, Tradition, 52.

484. Died ca. 249/863. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 171ff.

485. Died ca. 204/820. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 437ff.; Sezgin, GAS, I, 262.

486. Qaṭan b. Ka'b al-Quṭa'ī appears in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 381–82, but no date of death is given.

487. Abū Yazīd al-Madīnī appears in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XII, 280, as al-Madanī, whose date of death is not given.

488. As mentioned in Qur'ān, XVIII:26.

489. An unidentified narrator.

Abī Ṭālib[490]—Abū Zakariyyā' Yaḥyā b. Muṣ'ab al-Kalbī[491]—'Umar b. Nāfi'[492]—Abū Bakr al-'Absī:[493] I entered the alms-animal enclosure with 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb and 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib. 'Uthmān sat down in the shade to write while 'Alī stood by him, dictating to him what 'Umar was saying. On a very hot day 'Umar was standing in the sun and wearing two black garments, one as a waist wrapper, another wrapped around his [2737] head, as he counted the alms camels, recording their colors and their ages. 'Alī spoke to 'Uthmān, and I heard him quoting the description of the daughter of Shu'ayb in God's Book, "O father, hire him; the best of those you hire will be the strong, the trustworthy one!" 'Alī pointed at 'Umar and said, "This is 'the strong, the trustworthy one'!"

According to Ya'qūb b. Ibrāhīm—Ismā'īl—Yūnus—al-Ḥasan:
[2738] 'Umar said,[494]

> If I live, I shall certainly travel for a whole year among my subjects, God willing. I know that people have needs that do not reach me. Their governors will not refer them to me, nor will they themselves come to me. I shall travel to Syria and stay there two months. Then I shall travel to the Jazīrah and stay there two months. Then I shall travel to Egypt and stay there two months. Then I shall travel to Bahrain and stay there two months. Then I shall travel to al-Kūfah and stay there for two months. Then I shall travel to al-Baṣrah and stay there for two months. Indeed, what a fine year this will be!

According to Muḥammad b. 'Awf[495]—Abū al-Mughīrah 'Abd al-Quddūs b. al-Ḥajjāj[496]—Ṣafwān b. 'Amr[497]—Abū al-Mukhāriq 490. 'Abbās b. Abī Ṭālib died in 258/871. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 115–16.

---

491. An unidentified narrator.
492. 'Umar b. Nāfi' al-Thaqafī has a short notice in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 500, which gives, however, no date of death.
493. The text has Abū Bakr al-'Absī, but Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XII, lists an Abū Bakr al-'Ansī, associating him with 'Umar b. Nāfi' (see preceding note).
494. Cf. Bal'ami, Chronique, III, 538.
495. Died ca. 273/886. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 383ff.
496. Abū al-Mughīrah 'Abd al-Quddūs b. al-Ḥajjāj al-Khawlānī died in 212/827. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 369–70.
497. It is not possible to identify this narrator with certainty.

Zuhayr b. Sālim[498]—Ka'b al-Aḥbār: I stayed with a man called Mālik who was under the protection of 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb. I asked him how one could get access to the Commander of the Faithful. He replied that there was no door barring the way to ('Umar) or any obstacle, that he would say his prayers, would then sit down, and anyone who wished could talk to him.

According to Yūnus b. 'Abd al-A'lā—Sufyān [b. 'Uyaynah]—Yaḥyā[499]—Sālim[500]—Aslam: 'Umar sent me off with some alms camels to the designated pasturage and I put my baggage on one of the she-camels. When I was intending to lead them away, he asked me to show him them. I did so and he saw my baggage on a fine she-camel in among them and said, "You wretch! You make use of a she-camel that will provide goodness to a Muslim family! Why not a two-year-old camel constantly discharging urine, or a she with little milk?"[501]

According to 'Umar b. Ismā'īl b. Mujālid al-Hamdānī[502]— [2739]
Abū Mu'āwiyah[503]—Abū Ḥayyān[504]—Abū al-Zinbā'[505]—Abū al-Dihqānah:[506] 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb was told that there was someone from al-Anbār[507] who had some knowledge of the state register [and was asked] if he would take him on as a secretary. 'Umar replied, "In this case, I would be taking on as a confidant [someone] from outside the [community of the] Believers!"

According to Yūnus b. 'Abd al-A'lā—Ibn Wahb[508]—'Abd

498. He has a brief notice in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 344, although no date of death is given.

499. Yaḥyā b. Kathīr died in 129/746. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 268–69.

500. Sālim b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar died in 106/724. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 438.

501. That is, why do you have to choose a good beast as your baggage camel, when there are inferior ones that could be used?

502. He has a brief notice in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 427–28.

503. Abū Mu'āwiyah Muḥammad b. Khāzim al-Ḍarīr died in 195/810. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 137–39.

504. Perhaps Abū Ḥayyān Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd, who died in 145/762. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 214–15.

505. An unidentified narrator.

506. An unidentified narrator.

507. A town on the Euphrates about 45 miles west of Baghdad. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 257–58; Le Strange, Lands, 25 and Map II, opposite 25.

508. 'Abdallāh b. Wahb died in 197/813. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 71–74; Sezgin, GAS, I, 466.

al-Raḥmān b. Zayd[509]—his father—his grandfather: 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb addressed the people and said, "By Him who sent Muḥammad with the Truth, if one camel were to perish untended on the bank of the Euphrates, I would fear that God would hold the Khaṭṭāb family responsible for it." Abū Zayd[510] added that the Khaṭṭāb family meant himself, no one else.

According to Ibn al-Muthannā—Ibn Abī 'Adī—Shu'bah[511]—Abū 'Imrān al-Jawnī: 'Umar wrote to Abū Mūsā,[512] "There are still prominent men who refer the needs of the people [to me] on their behalf. So honor those prominent men who are in your jurisdiction. It is justice enough for an uninfluential Muslim that he be treated fairly in juridical decisions and in the division [of spoils after being referred to me]."

According to Abū Kurayb[513]—Ibn Idrīs[514]—Muṭarrif[515]—al-Sha'bī: A bedouin came to 'Umar and said, "My stallion camel has both mange and saddle sores; give me a mount." 'Umar replied to him, "Your camel does not have mange and saddle sores!" [The bedouin] turned away, reciting the following:[516]

Abū Ḥafṣ 'Umar has sworn by God's name
That no mange or saddle sores have afflicted [my mount].
Forgive him, God, that he has given a false oath!

['Umar] exclaimed, "O God, forgive me!" He called the bedouin back and gave him a [fresh] mount.

[2740] According to Ya'qūb b. Ibrāhīm—Ismā'īl—Ayyūb—Muḥammad: I was informed that a man who was related to 'Umar asked him [for money]. But he chided him and sent him away. People spoke to ['Umar] about him, and he was asked why he 509. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Zayd b. Aslam died in 182/798. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 177–79.

510. Perhaps this is the grandfather, the original source.

511. Shu'bah b. al-Ḥajjāj died in 160/776. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 338–46.

512. His provincial governor in al-Baṣrah.

513. Muḥammad b. al-'Alā' died ca. 248/862. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 385ff.

514. Probably 'Abdallāh b. Idrīs, who died in 192/807 [Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 144–46], rather than 'Abd al-Mun'im b. Idrīs, who died in 228/843 [I, 286 n. 760].

515. It is not possible to identify this narrator with certainty.

516. The meter is rajaz.

chided him and sent him away when he begged from him. He replied, "He asked me for some of God's money. What will be my excuse if I meet Him when I am a treacherous ruler? Why did he not ask for some of my money?" (The source) added that ('Umar) sent him 10,000 [dirhams].

According to Muḥammad b. al-Muthannā—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mahdī—Shu'bah—Yaḥyā b. Ḥuḍayn[517]—Ṭāriq b. Shihāb:[518] Whenever 'Umar sent governors in charge of provinces, he would say about them, "O God, I have not sent them to take the property (of the people), nor to abuse them physically. Anyone oppressed by his commander has no commander except me."

According to Ibn Bashshār[519]—Ibn Abī 'Adī—Shu'bah—Qatādah—Sālim b. Abī al-Ja'd[520]—Ma'dan b. Abī Ṭalḥah:[521] 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb gave an address to his people and said, "O God, I call You to bear witness to the commanders of the garrison towns that I have sent them only to teach the people their religion and the practice of their Prophet, to distribute among them their spoils and to act with justice. If they have any doubt about any matter, they will refer it to me."

According to Abū Kurayb—Abū Bakr b. 'Ayyāsh[522]—Abū Ḥaṣīn:[523] Whenever 'Umar appointed his governors, he would go out with them to bid them farewell, saying, "I have not appointed you governor over Muḥammad's community with limitless authority.[524] I have made you governor over them only to lead them in prayer, to make decisions among them based on what is right, and to distribute [the spoils] among them justly. I have not given you limitless authority over them. Do not flog [2741]

517. An unidentified narrator.

518. Ṭāriq b. Shihāb al-Bajalī died in ca. 84/703 or 123/741. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 3–4.

519. Muḥammad b. Bashshār died in 252/866. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 70–73.

520. Al-Ashja'ī died ca. 98/716. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 432–33.

521. Ma'dan b. Abī Ṭalḥah has a short notice in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 228, which, however, gives no date of death.

522. He died ca. 194/810. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 34–37.

523. 'Uthmān b. 'Āṣim died ca. 132/750. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 126–28.

524. For the expression 'alā ash'ārī-him wa-abshārī-him, literally "over their hair and their skins," see Glossarium, CCCXII.

the Arab [troops] and humiliate them; do not keep them long from their families and bring temptation upon them; do not neglect them and cause them deprivation. Confine yourselves to the [actual text of the] Qur'ān, and do not frequently cite prophetic traditions. I am your partner." He would also allow vengeance to be taken on his governors. If there was a complaint against a governor, he would bring together the governor and the complainant. If there was a genuine case against [the governor] for which punishment was obligatory, he would punish him.

According to Ya'qūb b. Ibrāhīm—Ismā'īl b. Ibrāhīm—Sa'īd al-Jurayrī[525]—Abū Naḍrah[526]—Abū Firās:[527] 'Umar b. al-[2742] Khaṭṭāb made the Friday address and said, "O people, I do not send governors to you to flog you or to take your possessions. I send them to you to teach you your religion and the way you should follow. If anything other than these is done to anyone, he should refer [the matter] to me. By Him in whose hand is my soul, I shall certainly permit the law of retaliation to be used against [any governor]." Up jumped 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ and said, "Do you really think you will allow the law of retaliation to be used against any commander appointed over your subjects who disciplines one of them?" ['Umar] replied, "Yes indeed, I shall certainly allow that. Why not, as I have seen the Messenger of God allow the law of retaliation against himself? Do not beat Muslims and humiliate them; do not keep them long from their families and bring temptation upon them; do not deny them their rights and turn them into infidels; do not settle them among thickets so that you lose them."[528]

'Umar reportedly would himself patrol at night, seeking out the Muslims' dwellings and personally finding out how they were faring.

---

525. Sa'īd b. Iyās al-Jurayrī died in 144/761. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 5–7.

526. Al-Mundhir b. Mālik al-'Abdī al-'Awqī died ca. 109/728. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 302ff.

527. Abū Firās al-Rabī' b. Ziyād al-Nahdī has a brief entry in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XII, 201.

528. Perhaps figurative, "do not take them to places they do not know, where they feel ill at ease, and do not lose control of them."

Relevant Information on ['Umar's Night Visits]

According to Ibn Bashshār—Abū 'Āmir[529]—Qurrah b. Khālid[530]—Bakr b. 'Abdallāh al-Muzani:[531] 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb came to the door of 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf and knocked on it. His wife came and opened it, saying to him, "Do not enter until [2743] I have entered and sat down." So he did as she had said and entered only after she had told him to do so. He then said, "Is there anything [to eat]?" So she brought him some food and he ate it, while 'Abd al-Raḥmān was standing saying his prayers. ['Umar] asked him to cut them short, so 'Abd al-Raḥmān then recited the blessing [on the Prophet to finish his prayers]. Turning toward him, he asked the Commander of the Faithful what brought him at that time. ['Umar] replied that there was a group of travelers who had stopped in the area of the market and that he was afraid they might be about to be robbed. [He urged 'Abd al-Raḥmān] to go [with him] and that they should both stand guard over them. So off they went and came to the market. They sat down on some elevated ground to talk and, [when it became dark], saw [the light of] a lamp from afar. 'Umar said, "Did I not forbid the [use of] lamps after bedtime?" They went off [toward the light] and came across a group of people drinking. ['Umar] said [to 'Abd al-Raḥmān], however, "You go on your way, for I know who it is." In the morning ['Umar] sent for [the culprit] and said, "So and so, you and your pals were drinking last night!" He replied, "How do you know, Commander of the Faithful?" ['Umar] said, "It was something which I saw with my own eyes." [The man] replied, "Did God not forbid you to spy [on people]?" [The source] continued: So he forgave him.

According to Bakr b. 'Abdallāh al-Muzanī: 'Umar banned [the use of] lamps because the mice would take the wicks [to get at the oil] and drop them on the roofs of houses and they would catch fire. The roofs of houses at that time were made of palm-branches.

529. 'Abd al-Malik b. 'Amr al-'Aqadī died ca. 205/821. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 409ff.

530. Qurrah b. Khālid al-Sadūsī died ca. 170/786. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 371–72.

531. Bakr b. 'Abdallāh al-Muzanī died in 108/726. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 484–85.

According to Aḥmad b. Ḥarb[532]—Muṣ'ab b. 'Abdallāh al-Zubayrī[533]—his father—Rabī'ah b. 'Uthmān—Zayd b. Aslam—his father: I was going with 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb to Ḥarrat Wāqim,[534] and when we reached Ṣirār[535] there suddenly appeared a fire which had been lit. He said, "I think, Aslam,[536]
[2744] these people must be riders overtaken by nightfall and cold. Let's go!" So off we went at a good pace and we drew near to them. They were a woman with some young boys, and there was a pot set up over the fire. Her boys were all screaming. 'Umar said, "Greetings, people of the light," not wishing to call them people of the fire.[537] (The woman) returned the greeting. He asked if he might approach. She replied, "Bring us some good or leave [us] alone." ('Umar) asked what was the matter. She told him that nightfall and cold had overtaken them. He asked what was making her children cry. She told him it was hunger. "What is in this pot?" he asked. "Water," she replied, "to keep them quiet until they fall asleep. [I ask] God [to judge] between us and 'Umar!" 'Umar said, "God have mercy upon you, how can 'Umar know anything about you?" She told him, "He is in authority over us, and yet he neglects us." ('Umar) turned to me and said, "Let's go." So off we went at a good pace and reached the flour store. He took out a measure [of flour and put] a ball of fat into it. Then he said, "Let me carry [all this]." But I replied, "I will carry it on your behalf." But he insisted twice or three times, "Let me carry all this," while I was saying, "I will carry it on your behalf." He finally said to me, "Will you carry

532. Perhaps Aḥmad b. Ḥarb al-Ṭā'ī, who died in 263/876. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 23.

533. Died ca. 235/851. See Rosenthal, Historiography, 379.

534. The lava field (ḥarrah) east of Medina and still known by this name today. See Bilādī, Mu'jam, II, 283ff. For this anecdote, see Ṭanṭāwī, Akhbār, 439ff.

535. Three miles from Medina into the area of Ḥarrat Wāqim. See Hamdānī, Ṣifah, 124; Bilādī, Mu'jam, V, 138ff.

536. That is, the source of the story, Zayd's father.

537. Aṣḥāb al-nār would indicate those in Hell, so 'Umar uses the expression aṣḥāb al-ḍaw' for this family party.

my burden for me on the Day of Resurrection, you wretch?!" So I allowed him to carry (all the food). He made off and I with him, hastening to get back to (the woman). He gave her this (food), taking some of the flour and saying to her, "Sprinkle (it) over (the contents of the pot), while I stir it for you." He also began to blow beneath the pot—now because he had a large beard, I could see the smoke through it—until it was cooked and (the contents [2745] of) the pot were fit to eat. He put (the pot) down (off the fire) and said, "Get something for me." So she brought a large bowl and he emptied (the contents of the pot) into it. He then said, "Feed them, while I flatten (the bread in the bowl) for you." And he continued to do this until they were satisfied. Then he left what remained of this (food) with her. He got up and I with him. "God give you a good reward," she said, "you have done better in this matter than the Commander of the Faithful!" He replied, "Speak well (of him), for when you come to the Commander of the Faithful, you will find me there, God willing." He stepped away from her a little, then faced her and lay down as a wild beast does. I told him that he had other things to do, but he did not speak to me until I saw that the children were romping around and laughing, and then they fell quiet and went to sleep. He then got up, praising God, then he turned to me and said, "Aslam, hunger kept them awake and made them cry. I did not want to leave until I could see them doing what I see (now)!"

When 'Umar wanted to order the Muslims to do something that was of benefit to them or to forbid them doing something that was not, he would begin with his own family. He would come to them, exhorting them and threatening (them) not to go against his order. According to Abū Kurayb Muḥammad b. al-'Alā'—Abū Bakr b. 'Ayyāsh—'Ubaydallāh b. 'Umar in Medina —Sālim: When 'Umar went up into the minbar and forbade the people from doing something, he would (first) bring together his own family and say, "I have forbidden the people from doing so and so. They all look at you as birds look—that is, at their [2746] prey—and I swear in God's name that if I find anyone of you doing (whatever is forbidden) I shall double his punishment!"

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) said: ('Umar) was hard on those of dubious reputations and severe in (seeking out) God's truth until he extracted it, but easygoing in what was owed to him until it was handed over to him and compassionate and full of pity for the weak.

According to 'Ubaydallāh b. Sa'd al-Zuhrī[538]—his paternal uncle—his father—al-Walīd b. Kathīr[539]—Muḥammad b. 'Ijlān[540]—Zayd b. Aslam—his father: Some Muslims had a word with 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf and said, "Speak to 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, for he has inspired so much fear in us that indeed we cannot look him in the face." 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf mentioned this to 'Umar and he said, "Did they really say this?! I was indeed lenient with them to such as extent that I was afraid of God. I became severe with them to such an extent that I was afraid of God. I swear an oath in God's name that I am more afraid of them than they are of me!"

According to Abū Kurayb—Abū Bakr—'Āṣim [b. Kulayb]:
[2747] 'Umar appointed someone governor of Egypt. While 'Umar was walking through one of the streets of Medina, he heard someone say, "Good heavens, 'Umar, you appoint someone governor who acts treacherously and you say that you have no responsibility in the matter, when your governor is doing so and so!" So ('Umar) sent for (the governor) and when he arrived gave him a staff, a woolen coat, and sheep, saying to the man whose name was 'Iyāḍ b. Ghanm,[541] "Pasture them, for your father was a shepherd." Then he called him back and mentioned what had been said [about him]. He added, "What if I send you back!" He returned him to his post, saying, "I must have your word that you will not wear any fine cloth, nor ride an expensive horse (birdhawn)."[542]

According to Abū Kurayb—Abū Usāmah[543]—'Abdallāh b. al-

538. 'Ubaydallāh b. Sa'd al-Zuhrī died in 260/873. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 15–16.

539. Perhaps al-Walīd b. Kathīr al-Makhzūmī, who died in 151/768. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 148.

540. Muḥammad b. 'Ijlān died in 149/766. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 341–43.

541. There is perhaps a play on words here: ghanam is used for sheep—a strange gift anyway—and the governor's father was called Ghanm. For 'Iyāḍ b. Ghanm, see note 224, above.

542. The word cannot mean "nag" or some such inferior horse here. See Morony, Iraq, 211.

543. Ḥammād b. Usāmah died in Baghdad in 244/858. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 1–4.

Walīd[544]—'Āṣim—Ibn Khuzaymah b. Thābit al-Anṣarī:[545] When 'Umar appointed a governor, he would write him a certificate of investiture that would be witnessed by a group of both Emigrants and Helpers, stipulating that he should not ride an expensive horse, or eat white bread, or wear any fine cloth, or prevent the people's needs [from being satisfied].

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muslim b. Ibrāhīm[546]—Sallām b. Miskīn[547]—'Imrān:[548] When 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb was in need, he would go to the treasurer and ask him for a loan. Sometimes he was short of money, and the treasurer would come to ('Umar) and demand payment of his debt and would insist on its payment. So 'Umar would use his wiles against him. At other times his stipend was disbursed [to him], so he paid back (the debt).

According to Abū 'Āmir al-'Aqadī —'Īsā b. Ḥafṣ[549]—a man of Banū Salimah[550]—Ibn al-Barā' b. Ma'rūr:[551] 'Umar went out one day to go to the minbar. He complained of being sick and some honey was prescribed for him, there being a skin receptacle [full of it] in the treasury. He said, "If you give me permission [to take] it, I shall do so; otherwise it is forbidden to me." [2748]

'Umar's Being Called Commander of the Faithful

Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī] said: The first person to be called Commander of the Faithful was 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb. Then this practice continued and the caliphs have used (the title) to this day.

---

544. Perhaps 'Abdallāh b. al-Walīd b. Maymūn, whose date of death is unrecorded in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 70.

545. 'Umārah b. Khuzaymah b. Thābit al-Anṣārī died in 105/723. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 416.

546. It is not possible to identify this narrator with certainty.

547. Died ca. 167/784. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 286ff.

548. It is not possible to identify this narrator with certainty.

549. 'Īsā b. Ḥafṣ died in 157/773. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 208–9.

550. Salimah b. Sa'd, a tribal division (baṭn) of the Khazraj, one of the two Arab tribes in Medina in early Islam. See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 358–59; Kaḥḥālah, Mu'jam, II, 537.

551. An unidentified narrator.

Information on This Matter

According to Aḥmad b. 'Abd al-Ṣamad al-Anṣārī[552]—Umm 'Amr bt. Ḥassān al-Kūfiyyah[553]—her father: When 'Umar assumed power, he was addressed, "O Caliph of the Caliph of the Messenger of God." 'Umar said, "This is too long winded. When another caliph comes along, they will say, 'O Caliph of the Caliph of the Caliph of the Messenger of God!' But you are the faithful and I am your commander." So he was called Commander of the Faithful. Aḥmad b. 'Abd al-Ṣamad said: I asked (Umm 'Amr) how many years she had lived. She replied, "133 years."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Yaḥyā b. Wāḍiḥ[554]—Abū Ḥamzah[555]—Jābir: Some one addressed 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, "O [2749] Caliph of God." He replied, "God turn you away [from such a remark]!"[556] (The man) said, "May God make me your ransom!" ('Umar) said, "In that case, God will humiliate you!"[557]

His Institution of the [Islamic] Dating System

Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī] said: ('Umar) instituted the [Islamic] dating system and recorded it. According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar: This was in 16 in Rabī' I [April 637]. I have already mentioned the reason for his recording this and the circumstances surrounding it.[558] 'Umar was also the first to date documents and to stamp them with clay.

He was also the first to assemble the people to one imam to lead them in the special Ramaḍān prayers.[559] He sent out written instructions to the provinces to carry this out. According

552. An unidentified narrator.
553. An unidentified narrator.
554. Yaḥyā b. Wāḍiḥ has no date of death provided in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 293ff.
555. Abū Ḥamzah Muḥammad b. Maymūn al-Sukkārī died ca. 168/785. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 486ff.
556. Arabic, khālafa Allāhu bi-ka. A pun with khalīfah, caliph, is intended.
557. The man's reply is meant as an apology, but 'Umar is not appeased.
558. See in the text, Ṭabarī, I, 2480; Translation, XIII, 59.
559. Arabic, tarāwīḥ, the special prayers said after the evening prayer in Ramaḍān. See SEI, s.v. (Wensinck).

to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar: This was in the year 14 [February 25, 635–February 14, 636]. He also appointed two public Qur'ān readers, one to lead the men in prayer, the other the women.

['Umar's] Carrying a Whip and His Instituting the State Registers[560]

He was the first to carry a whip and to use it. He was the first to institute the state registers for the people in Islam. He recorded the [names of] people according to their tribes and assigned them stipends. [2750]

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—'Ā'idh b. Yaḥyā[561]—Abū al-Ḥuwayrith[562]—Jubayr b. al-Ḥuwayrith b. Nuqayd:[563] 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb sought the advice of the Muslims on the matter of establishing state registers. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib advised him to distribute all the wealth that accrued to him every year, without keeping any. 'Uthmān b. 'Affān remarked on the large amount of wealth that was coming to the people in ample quantities. He said, "If they are not subjected to an official census so that you know who has received [wealth] and those who have not, I am afraid things will get out of hand." Al-Walīd b. Hishām b. al-Mughīrah[564] said to him, "O Commander of the Faithful, I have been to Syria and seen how the rulers there have instituted a state register and conscripted a regular army. So you do the same." ['Umar] took his advice and summoned 'Aqīl b. Abī Ṭālib,[565] Makhramah b. Nawfal,[566] and 560. For dīwān, see Puin, Dīwān, passim; *EI*², s.v. (Duri).

561. An unidentified narrator.

562. Abū al-Ḥuwayrith 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mu'āwiyah died ca. 130/747. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 272–73.

563. Jubayr b. al-Ḥuwayrith b. Nuqayd has a brief notice in Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, I, 270.

564. He is unidentified.

565. 'Aqīl b. Abī Ṭālib was the brother of 'Alī. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 254. For this account, see Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 153.

566. Makhramah b. Nawfal b. Ahīb b. 'Abd Manāf al-Zuhrī was the father of al-Miswar and the cousin of Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ. He died in 54/674. See Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, IV, 337–38.

Jubayr b. Muṭ'im, genealogists of Quraysh, telling them to register people according to their ranks. So they made the registers, beginning with Banū Hāshim,[567] followed by Abū Bakr and his family, then 'Umar and his family as the first two caliphs. When 'Umar looked into (the matter), he said, "I would indeed like it to be thus, but begin with the relatives of the Messenger of God, the closest, then the next, until you register 'Umar in the appropriate place."[568]

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Usāmah b. Zayd b. Aslam—his father—his grandfather: I saw [2751] 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, when it was being proposed to him that he should register [the people], with Banū Taym[569] coming after Banū Hāshim and Banū 'Adī[570] coming after Banū Taym, and I could hear him say, "Put 'Umar down in the appropriate place. Begin with the closest related to the Messenger of God, then the next." Then Banū 'Adī came to 'Umar and said, "You are the caliph of the Messenger of God." He replied, "Or the caliph of Abū Bakr and Abū Bakr was the caliph of the Messenger of God." "This is so," they replied, "What if you placed yourself where these people [who are carrying out the registration] place you!" "Excellent, excellent, Banū 'Adī," exclaimed ['Umar], "You want to take advantage of my position![571] You want me to transfer my good fortune to you. No, indeed, [you must wait] until the call comes to you, even if you come last in the register, even if you are registered after everyone else. I have two

567. That is, the Prophet's clan, a division of Quraysh.

568. 'Umar is thus refusing to allow his position as caliph to promote his own name in the register and is insisting that relationship to the Prophet alone should be the criterion of order of listing.

569. Banū Taym b. Murrah, the branch of Quraysh to which Abū Bakr al-Ṣiddīq, the first caliph, belonged, hence its position in the register after Banū Hāshim, the Prophet's branch. See Zubayrī, Nasab Quraysh, 275ff.; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 135ff.; Kaḥḥālah, Mu'jam, I, 138.

570. Banū 'Adī b. Ka'b, the branch of Quraysh to which 'Umar belonged, hence its position in the register after Banū Taym and Banū Hāshim, the branches of Abū Bakr and Muḥammad, respectively. See Zubayrī, Nasab Quraysh, 346ff.; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 150ff.; Kaḥḥālah, Mu'jam, II, 766.

571. 'Umar's exclamation (bakhin bakhin) to his own tribe, Banū 'Adī, is sarcastic. The Arabic then reads aradtum al-akla 'alā ẓahrī; literally, "You want to eat off my back!".

colleagues who have gone down a [particular] road already.[572] If I am at variance with them, I myself will be led off in another direction. Indeed, we have achieved excellence only in this world, and we can only hope for God's reward in the hereafter for what we have done through Muḥammad. He is our nobility; his family are the noblest of the Arabs, then the closest related to him, then the next. The Arabs are noble through the Messenger of God. Some of them may share many ancestors with him. We ourselves meet his line of descent after [going back] only a few generations, then do not diverge from it as far back as Adam.[573] Moreover, if non-Arabs carry out [good] deeds and we do not, then they are nearer to Muḥammad than we on the Day of Resurrection. Let no one rely on close relationship, rather let him act for God's reward. For he whose effort falls short cannot get ahead by means of his ancestry."

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Ḥizām b. Hishām al-Ka'bī[574]—his father: I saw 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb carry the Khuzā'ah[575] register and stop at Qudayd.[576] (Khuzā'ah) would come to him there, where all the women, virgin or otherwise, came to him and he would hand over stipends directly to them, then move on and stop in 'Usfān[577] where he would do the same also. [All this he did] until he died. [2752]

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—'Abdallāh b. Ja'far al-Zuhrī and 'Abd al-Malik b. Sulaymān[578]—

572. That is, the Prophet and Abū Bakr before him, whose policies, he is explaining, he must at all costs follow.

573. Arabic, wa-la'alla ba'ḍa-hā [al-'Arab] yalqā-hu ilā ābā'in kathīratin wa-mā bayna-nā wa-bayna an nalqā-hu ilā nasabi-hi thumma lā nufāriqu-hu ilā Ādama illā ābā'an yasīratan.

574. Ḥizām b. Hishām al-Ka'bī is unidentified.

575. A large tribal group of al-Azd inhabiting the general area of Mecca. See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 331; Hamdānī, Ṣifah, 120, 179, 211; Kaḥḥālah, Mu'jam, I, 338–40.

576. An agricultural area north of Mecca, 23 miles from 'Usfān (see next note). See Hamdānī Ṣifah, 120, 185; al-Manāsik, 415, 457, etc.; Bilādī, Mu'jam, VII, 97.

577. An area of cultivation 36 miles from Mecca. See Hamdānī, Ṣifah, 185; Bilādī, Mu'jam, VI, 100.

578. An unidentified narrator.

Ismā'īl b. Muḥammad b. Sa'd—al-Sā'ib b. Yazīd:[579] I heard 'Umar say three times, "By God, there is no other god but He!" [He added], "Everyone has a right to some of this [community] wealth, whether he has been granted it or not. No one has more right to it than another, except a slave. I am exactly like other people in [this matter of wealth]. But we [are eligible] according to our ranks [as derived] from God's book and our allotments from the Messenger of God. [It is] a man's achievement in Islam, his precedence in Islam, his usefulness in Islam, and his need [that count]. If indeed I remain alive, the shepherd where he is on the mountain of Ṣan'ā' shall certainly receive his share of this wealth!"[580] Ismā'īl b. Muḥammad said that he mentioned this to his father and he knew the account also.

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh—al-Zuhrī—al-Sā'ib b. Yazīd: I discovered that 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb had some horses that had the following brand on their thighs: To be used only in God's [2753] cause.

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Qays b. al-Rabī'[581]—'Aṭā' b. al-Sā'ib[582]—Zādhān[583]—Salmān:[584] 'Umar said to him, "Am I a king or a caliph?" Salmān replied, "If you collect from Muslim territory 1 dirham—or less or more—then you put it to use other than for what it is by right intended, you are a king, not a caliph." 'Umar wept.

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—

---

579. Al-Sā'ib b. Yazīd died in the 80s/ca. 700. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 450–51. If this is a correct identification, he must have been very young when he heard 'Umar's words.

580. Ṣan'ā' in the Yemen has in fact two mountains: Nuqum in the east and 'Aybān in the west. See Hamdānī, Ṣifah, 125. Here, however, 'Umar means anyone anywhere will receive his fair share of community wealth.

581. Qays b. al-Rabī' died in the late 160s/early 780s. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 391–95.

582. 'Aṭā' b. al-Sā'ib died in the 130s/747–757. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 203–7.

583. Zādhān is Abū 'Abdallāh/'Umar al-Kindī, who died in 82/701. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 302–3.

584. Salmān al-Fārisī died in the 30s/650s. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 137–39.

Usāmah b. Zayd—Nāfi', the client of Āl al-Zubayr:[585] I heard Abū Hurayrah say, "God have mercy on Ibn Ḥantamah.[586] I saw him in the Year of the Distruction[587] carrying on his back two provision bags with a skin of olive oil in his hand. He and Aslam were taking it in turns. When he saw me, he said, 'Where are you coming from, Abū Hurayrah?' I told him from near at hand, and I began to take my turn to carry. So we all eventually came to Ṣirār where there were about twenty isolated tents of Muḥārib.[588] 'Umar said, 'What has brought you here?' They replied it was exhaustion. They brought out for us some broiled carrion skin that they were eating and some powdered old bones that they were scooping into their mouths with their hands. I saw 'Umar throw his upper garment [over his shoulder], then adjust his waist wrapper. He continued cooking for them until they were satisfied. Then he sent Aslam to Medina and he brought some stallion camels on which he mounted them and set them down in al-Jabbānah.[589] He then gave them clothes, visiting them and others [in similar circumstances] frequently until God relieved the people of this drought."

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar— [2754]
Mūsā b. Ya'qūb[590]—his paternal uncle—Hishām b. Khālid:[591] I heard 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb say, "None of you [women] should sprinkle flour [into it] before the water is hot. Then you can sprinkle a little at a time and stir it in with a stirrer. This makes it more abundant and it is less apt to go lumpy."

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. Muṣ'ab al-

---

585. Āl al-Zubayr b. al-'Awāmm is a tribal group (baṭn) of Banū Asad b. 'Abd al-'Uzzā of Quraysh. See Zubayrī, Nasab Quraysh, 236ff.; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 121–22; Kaḥḥālah, Mu'jam, II, 467.

586. Ḥantamah was 'Umar's mother, so Ibn Ḥantamah means 'Umar himself. See page 95, above.

587. 'Ām al-Ramādah [the "Year of Destruction"] occurred in the year 17 or 18/638–639, a year in which much destruction took place as a result of drought. See Lane, Lexicon, III, 1154–55; Ṭanṭāwī, Akhbār, 140.

588. Muḥārib is probably Muḥārib b. Fihr of 'Adnān, but Kaḥḥālah, Mu'jam, III, 1042–44, lists several tribes of this name.

589. I take this to be a place name here, as Bilādī (Mu'jam, II, 115) indicates that the area near the burial ground of Medina was known by this name. Apart from "burial ground", the word jabbānah also means "place of prayer."

590. Mūsā b. Ya'qūb al-Zam'ī's death date is not recorded. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 378ff.

591. An unidentified narrator.

Qarqasāni[592]—Abū Bakr b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Maryam[593]—Rāshid b. Sa'd:[594] 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb was brought some wealth and he began to distribute it among the people who all thronged around him. Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ pushed his way roughly through the people and reached 'Umar. (The latter) assailed him with his whip, saying, "You come here showing no respect for God's authority on earth! I want to teach you that God's authority will show you no respect!"

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—'Umar b. Sulaymān b. Abī Ḥathmah[595]—his father: al-Shafā bt. 'Abdallāh[596] said, "I saw some young men walking along at a moderate pace, talking softly." She asked who they were and was told they were ascetics. She said, "When 'Umar spoke, he made [people] hear; when he walked, he moved quickly; when he beat [someone], he brought pain. He in truth was the ascetic!"

[2755] According to 'Umar—'Alī b. Muḥammad [al-Madā'inī]—'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir: 'Umar helped a man carry something, so the man blessed him, saying, "May your sons be of benefit to you, Commander of the Faithful!" ('Umar) replied, "Rather may God enable me to do without them!"

According to 'Umar—'Alī b. Muḥammad—'Umar b. Mujāshi':[597] 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb said, "Strength in what one does [comes only] when you do not put off today's deed until tomorrow. Trustworthiness [comes only] when what is kept secret does not run counter to what is made public. Fear God; piety [comes only] through fear; anyone fearing God will be preserved by Him."[598]

---

592. Muḥammad b. Muṣ'ab al-Qarqasānī's nisbah I vocalize from the Leiden text and from Yāqūt (Mu'jam, IV, 327), who briefly mentions a place called Qarqasān. His date of death is given in Ibn Ḥajar's Tahdhīb, IX, 458–60, as 280 or 288/893 or 901. Cf. Translation, I, 267 n. 633.

593. According to Ibn Ḥajar's Tahdhīb, XII, 28–30, Abū Bakr b. 'Abdallāh died in 256/870, but this does not find universal support. Cf. Translation, I, 217 n. 350.

594. It is not possible to identify this narrator with certainty.

595. An unidentified narrator.

596. An unidentified narrator.

597. An unidentified narrator.

598. Arabic, man yattaqi Allāha yaqi-hi.

According to 'Umar—'Alī—'Awānah[599]—al-Sha'bī and someone other than 'Awānah, one adding to what the other had to say: 'Umar used to wander around the markets, reciting the Qur'ān and making judgments among the people wherever litigants caught up with him.

According to 'Umar—'Alī—Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ[600]—Mūsā b. 'Uqbah:[601] A group of people came to 'Umar and said, "Our family is large and the burden is heavy. Increase our stipends." He replied, "You are responsible (for your own problems)! From God's wealth you have married fellow wives and have taken servants. Yes indeed, I would like to be on a ship[602] with you [2756] out at sea, traveling east and west. It would not then be difficult for those (on board) to appoint one of them as their leader. If he went straight, they would follow him. If he deviated from the right course, they would kill him." Ṭalḥah said, "Why did you not say, 'If he deviated, they would dismiss him.'?" ('Umar) replied, "No, killing is a better deterrent to anyone coming after him. Beware of the young man of Quraysh and the son of their nobleman[603] who always sleeps content and who laughs when angry, dealing with those above him and those below him [in the same way]."

According to 'Umar—'Alī—'Abdallāh b. Dāwūd al-Wāsiṭī[604]—Zayd b. Aslam: 'Umar said, "We used to reckon that someone lending [money] was stingy, but it was only showing friendly concern."[605]

---

599. 'Awānah b. al-Ḥakam al-Kalbī died ca. 150/767. See Rosenthal, Historiography, 89ff.

600. Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ b. Dīnār died in 168/785. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 225ff.

601. Mūsā b. 'Uqbah, the famous maghāzī writer, died in 141/759. See Duri, Rise, 32–33; Guillaume, Life, xvi, xliii etc.; Rosenthal, Historiography, 131ff., 393ff.

602. Although there seems to be no convincing support for the Cairo reading fī safīnatin (singular) rather than the Leiden fī safīnatayn (dual), I accept the former as it clearly makes more sense and the following verb tadhhabu is singular.

603. The reference here eludes me.

604. He has a short notice in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 200–1, although no date of death is given.

605. Or "[a means of] sharing [wealth]."

According to 'Umar—'Alī—Ibn Da'b[606]—Abū Ma'bad al-Aslamī[607]—Ibn 'Abbās:[608] 'Umar said to a group of Quraysh, "I have heard that you are all sitting apart, no two of you sitting together, until it is asked who so-and-so's friends are, who are the people who usually sit with so-and-so. The result is that meetings are being avoided. I swear by God that this will quickly damage your faith and your honor and will quickly damage also the state of friendship among you. It is indeed as if I can see those who will come after you saying, 'This is so-and-so's opinion; they have divided Islam.' Make your meetings accessible to you all and sit together, for this will make your fellowship last longer and increase your respect for one another. O God, they have had enough of me and I of them. I am fed up with myself and they are fed up with me also. I do not know through which one of us the [real] calamity will come about. But I am aware that they have others on their side, so take me unto Yourself!"

According to 'Umar—'Alī—Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad[609]—his father: 'Abdallāh b. Abī Rabī'ah[610] took delivery of some mares [2757] in Medina, but 'Umar forbade him [to keep them]. He was urged to allow him, [but] he said, "I shall only allow him [to keep them] if he brings in fodder from outside Medina." So he kept them tethered and brought in fodder from some land he had in the Yemen.[611]

According to 'Umar—'Alī—Abū Ismā'īl al-Hamdānī[612]—Mujālid: I heard that some people mentioned a certain man to 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, saying, "Commander of the Faithful, [he is]

606. An unidentified narrator.

607. Abū Ma'bad Nāfidh al-Aslamī was Ibn 'Abbās's client; he died in Medina in 104/722. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 404.

608. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, the cousin of the Prophet and 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib, died ca. 70/689. See EI[2] s.v. [Veccia Vaglieri].

609. An unidentified narrator.

610. He was governor of the Yemen. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 208.

611. It seems unlikely that 'Abdallāh would go all the way to the Yemen to provide fodder, and it should be noted, the word yaman is used all over the Arabian Peninsula to indicate the south, whether near or far, just as al-shām indicates the north. This may, therefore, mean "in the south [of Medina]."

612. An unidentified narrator.

excellent; he knows nothing of evil." ['Umar] replied, "In this case there is more likelihood of evil happening to him!"[613]

Some Excerpts from His Addresses

According to 'Umar—'Alī—Abū Ma'shar—Ibn al-Munkadir[614] and others, and Abū Mu'ādh al-Anṣārī[615]—al-Zuhrī, and Yazīd b. 'Iyāḍ[616]—'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr,[617] and 'Alī b. Mujāhid—Ibn Isḥāq—Yazīd b. 'Iyāḍ[618]—'Abdallāh b. Abī Isḥāq[619]—Yazīd b. Rūmān[620]—'Urwah b. al-Zubayr:[621] 'Umar delivered an address. He praised and extolled God in a worthy manner. Then he reminded the people of God and the last day. He then said,

> O people, I have been appointed over you; were it not for the hope that I shall prove to be the best of you for you, the toughest on you, and best able of you to undertake your constantly changing and preoccupying affairs, I would not have undertaken this [responsibility] from you. Waiting to meet the [day of] reckoning for taking your rights as I do and placing them where I do and for conducting myself among you as I do is enough to preoccupy and sadden 'Umar. My Lord is the One whose help must be sought. For 'Umar no longer trusts in strength and strategem if God does not continue to extend to him His mercy, help and support. [2758]

---

613. The text of De Goeje's Selection ends at this point. See note 394.

614. Muḥammad b. al-Munkadir died ca. 130/748. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 473–75; Sezgin, GAS, I, 65.

615. His date of death is not given in the biographies. He has an entry in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 168–69.

616. Yazīd b. 'Iyāḍ b. Ju'dubah died in al-Baṣrah during the caliphate of the Abbasid al-Mahdī [158–169/775–785]. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 352–54.

617. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr b Muḥammad b. 'Amr b. Ḥazm al-Anṣārī died ca. 135/752. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 164–65.

618. I have retained this name in translation, although there appears to be dittography here.

619. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Isḥāq died in 129/746. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 148. This could, however, be dittography, the "'Abdallāh b." from 'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr and the "Isḥāq" from Ibn Isḥāq.

620. Yazīd b. Rūmān al-Asadī died in 130/747. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 325.

621. 'Urwah b. al-Zubayr, the famous early historian, died ca. 95/714. See Duri, Rise, 76–8 and passim; Rosenthal, Historiography, 130ff., 395; Sezgin GAS, I, 278ff.

Another Address

God has put me in charge of your affairs, because I am aware of what is most advantageous for you in your present situation. I ask God to assist me to carry out (this task) and to preserve me as I do it as He has preserved me in other (tasks) and to inspire me with justice when I make distributions among you in the way He has commanded. I am a Muslim, but am a weak servant, except for as long as God assists me. What I have undertaken in my position as your caliph will never change anything of my nature, God willing. Greatness belongs to God, not to (His) servants. Let none of you say that 'Umar has changed for the worse since he took office. I shall ascertain what is right by myself and I shall proceed [on this basis]. I shall explain to you what I am doing. So any man who has a need, or who suffers any oppression, or who blames us for our behavior, should inform me. I am only a man from among you. You must show piety toward God in your secret and open dealings, and as far as what is inviolable and your honor are concerned. Proclaim what is right on your own and do not compel one another to seek litigation before me, for I show no particular leniency in my dealings with any person. Your welfare is dear to me; your criticism is of concern to me; you are people the general mass of whom are settled dwellers in God's land and people of a region without crops and livestock except for what God provides. God has promised you much bounty. I am responsible for the trust placed in me and for the position I am in. I shall personally inspect closely what faces me at the present time, God willing. I shall not [2759] delegate responsibility to anyone else. I can do only what is remote from (what immediately faces me at the present time) with the help of trusty supporters and those who give good advice from among you to the people at large. I shall not place my trust in anyone else's hands, God willing.

Another Address

After praising and extolling God and blessing the Prophet, ('Umar) said,

> O people, some greed [breeds a sense of] poverty; some despair [of not getting what one wants breeds a sense of] freedom from want. You bring together what you do not consume and you hope for what you do not attain. You have been placed for a defined period of time in a "deceiving abode."[622] You were dealt with through the revelation in the time of the Messenger of God: those who kept things secret were dealt with according to their secrecy. Those who did things openly were dealt with according to their openness. But [now] show us the best of your character, while God knows your secrets well. For those who show us what is bad,[623] yet claim that what they keep secret is good, will not be believed by us; as for those who show us something good openly, we shall think good of them. You should know that some avarice is a part of hypocrisy. "Spend what is good for yourselves; those who are saved from their own avarice, they are the successful ones."[624]
>
> O people, make good your abode, put your affairs aright, and fear God, your Lord. Do not dress your womenfolk in fine cotton clothes (qabāṭī), for [even] if they are not transparent, yet they will allow [the shape of their bodies] to be visualized.
>
> O people, I would indeed like to be delivered on a completely even basis, neither to my advantage nor to my disadvantage. I do also hope that, however long I am permitted to live, I do what is right among you, God willing, and that no Muslim will remain—even if he is in his own home—to whom his right and his share of [2760] God's wealth has not come, nor [that] he exerts himself

622. That is, the lower world. See Qur'ān, III:185.
623. The texts read shay'an, which is emended to sayyi'an.
624. Qur'ān, LXIV:16.

for it without his having it allotted to him. Put your wealth that God has provided for you in good order. A little [gained] gently is better than much violently. Being killed is one form of death that afflicts the pious and the impious alike. The [true] martyr is he who sacrifices himself [to seek God's reward]. If one of you wants a stallion camel, he should go for a large, tall one. He should strike it with his stick and if he finds it is spirited, he should buy it.[625]

Another Address

God has imposed upon you gratitude and instituted the pilgrimage for you as part of the bounty of the hereafter and this world that He has provided for you, without your asking Him or wishing it from Him. He created you, after you were nothing, for Himself and for you to worship Him. He had the power to make you subservient to the weakest of His creation, but rather He made subservient to you the general mass of His creation. He did not make you subservient to anything other than He. And He "subjected to you what is in the heavens and on earth and made His favors abound upon you, both open and hidden."[626] "He carried you by land and sea."[627] "And He gave you of good things, perchance you might be grateful."[628] Then He made for you hearing and sight. Of God's favors to you are those that He granted to mankind in general and others that He granted exclusively to the people of your faith. These general and special favors are continued during your turn of fortune, your time, and your generation. None of these favors has come to anyone in particular without, if he were to share out what he received among all the people, their

625. The abrupt change of subject may indicate that the camel here is metaphorical, rather than real. The meaning would therefore be: if you want something in life, go for the best and do all you can to acquire it.

626. Qur'ān, XXXI:20.

627. After Qur'ān, XVII:70.

628. Qur'ān, VIII:26.

gratitude for it being difficult for them and their right to have it overburdening them, except with God's help along with faith in God and His Messenger. You are appointed successors on earth and conquerors of its people. God has given your faith victory. No other community who differs from you in faith is left except two: one rendered submissive to Islam and to those who follow it, they paying you tribute, while [the Muslims] take the best of their livelihood, what they have earned and [produced with] the sweat of their brow; they must work hard, while you have the benefit;[629] and a [second] community waiting for God's battles and attacks every day and night. God has filled their hearts with terror. They have no refuge to which they can flee or an escape by means of which they can guard against attack.[630] God's armies came upon them suddenly and right into their own territory. [All this you have been granted] along with an abundance of food, a pouring out of wealth, the repeated dispatch of [victorious] troops and the [successful] defense of the frontier areas with God's permission, together excellent general security better than which this community had not experienced since Islam came into existence—God be praised!—along with the great conquests in every land. With all this, what might the gratitude of the grateful, the utterances of those who mention [God] and the striving of those who strive, along with these favors that are innumerable, incalculable and the debt that cannot be paid except with God's help, mercy, and kindness, achieve? We ask God—there is no other than He—who has conferred this upon us to grant us that we act in obedience to Him and hasten to do what pleases Him. [2761]

Remember, o servants of God, God's favor among you and seek to have an increase in His favor to you and in

629. That is, the Persians in the east, most of whom have been subjugated by the Muslims.

630. That is, the Byzantines in the west, so far subjugated only in Syria.

your meeting places "in twos and singly."[631] God said to Moses, "Bring out your people from the darkness into the light and remind them of God's days."[632] To Muḥammad he said, "Remember when you were few [2762] and considered weak in the land."[633] Even if, when you were weak and deprived of the goodness of this lower world, you had been following a part of the truth, believing in it, secure in it with knowledge of God and His faith, and thereby hoping for goodness after death, this would be so. But [in fact] you struggled the most for a livelihood [in this world] and were [at the same time] the most confirmed in your ignorance of God. If (Islam) that He [sent] to save you had come without affluence in this world, but were nonetheless a security for you in the hereafter to which you will return, while you continued to struggle for your livelihood as you had before, you would still do your best to hold fast to your share of Islam and put it above others. [All the more is this true], as He has [in fact] combined for you the excellence of the lower world and the bounty of the hereafter. He [then] among you who wishes to combine it for him, I would remind of God who intervenes between [a man and his] heart, charging you to recognize God's right and act accordingly, to force yourselves to obey Him and to combine your pleasure in His favors with a fear of them and their being removed and a feeling of unease because of them and their being changed. For there is nothing that deprives you more of favor than not being grateful for it. Gratitude is a safeguard against [what] the changing fortunes of time [will bring about], a way of increasing favor and establishing a claim to more. [All] this is for God binding upon me in the orders I give you and in the prohibitions I make.

631. Qur'ān, XXXIV:46.
632. Qur'ān, XIV:5.
633. Qur'ān, VIII:26.

Those Who Have Lamented and Elegized 'Umar— Some of the Elegies Written about Him

According to 'Umar—'Alī—Abū 'Abdallāh al-Burjumī[634]—Hishām b. 'Urwah:[635] A woman weeping for 'Umar said, "Alas, my heart burns for 'Umar; a burning sensation that has spread and filled all mankind!" Another woman said, "Alas, my heart burns for 'Umar; a burning sensation that has spread until it has become known throughout the whole of mankind!" [2763]

According to 'Umar—'Alī—Ibn Da'b and Sa'īd b. Khālid[636] —Ṣāliḥ b. Kaysān—al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah: When 'Umar died, Ibnat Abī Ḥathmah[637] said, "Alas for 'Umar; he straightened whatever was crooked; he made better anyone suffering pain; he put an end to dissensions; he revived the [true] practices [of religion]; he went out in clean clothes, free from blemish."[638]

According to al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah: When 'Umar was buried, I came to 'Alī, wanting to hear something about 'Umar from him. He came out shaking his head and his beard, having washed himself and wrapped himself in a garment and not doubting that the caliphate would finally be his. He said, "God have mercy on Ibn al-Khaṭṭāb! Ibnat Abī Ḥathmah was right. [In death,] he has taken away the good of [the lower world][639] and escaped from its evil. Oh indeed, she did not [herself] speak; but rather she was inspired."

'Ātikah bt. Zayd b. 'Amr recited the following about 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb:[640]

---

634. An unidentified narrator.

635. Hishām b. 'Urwah b. al-Zubayr died in 146/763. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 48–51.

636. It is not possible to identify this narrator with certainty.

637. She is unidentified.

638. The speaker delivers her elegy in rhymed prose: al-awad (crooked)/al-'amad (suffering pain); al-fitan (dissensions)/al-sunan (religious practices); al-thawb (clothing)/al-'ayb (blemish).

639. I take this vague feminine pronoun to refer to dunyā.

640. The meter is ṭawīl. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, III, 30. The poetess 'Ātikah bt. Zayd b. 'Amr had, according to Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XVI, 133ff., some famous husbands in her time on whose deaths she composed elegies: Zubayr b. al-'Awwām, 'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr, 'Umar himself, and Ḥusayn b. 'Alī. See page 101, above.

Fayrūz[641]—may his wealth not be abundant!—has caused me distress by [the death of] one full of honor,[642] who recited the Book and was obedient to God; Compassionate to those closest [to him], tough against his enemies, someone to trust in times of bad fortune and answering [the demands of his people].
Whenever he gave his word, his deeds did not belie his word;
[he was] swift to [perform] good deeds, and not with a frown.

[2764] She also recited as follows:[643]

O my eye, shed all your tears copiously and weary not of [weeping] for the noble imam.
Fate brought me distress with [the death of] the horseman wearing the badge of courage on the day when there was agitation and [much] to-ing and fro-ing.
[He was] the protection of his people, their helper against Fate, the succor of the afflicted and the deprived.
Tell those who are happy and those in distress, "Die!
Fate has given ('Umar) Death's cup from which to drink."

Another woman recited the following, weeping over him:[644]

The women of the tribe will weep for you;
grieving, they will weep,
Scratching their faces, [previously] like [shining] dinars, [all] pure,
And wearing clothes of grief after their finery (qaṣabiyyāt).

641. That is, Abū Lu'lu'ah, the assassin of 'Umar; see note 399.
642. That is, 'Umar himself.
643. The meter is khafīf. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, III, 30.
644. The meter is hazaj.

Some of 'Umar's Meritorious Deeds Not Previously Recorded

According to 'Umar b. Shabbah—'Ali b. Muḥammad [al-Madā'inī]—Ibn Ju'dubah[645]—Ismā'īl b. Abī Ḥakīm[646]—Sa'īd b. al-Musayyab:[647] 'Umar went on the pilgrimage and when he was at Ḍajnān,[648] he said, "There is no god but God, the Great, the Sublime, the Giver of what He wishes to whomsoever He wishes. I used to pasture the camels of al-Khaṭṭāb in this wadi, wearing a woolen tunic. (My father) was a harsh man and used to wear me out when I was working and beat me when I slacked off. Now I find myself in a situation in which there is no one between me and God." Then he quoted the following verses as an example [of his own situation]:[649]

There is nothing of what you see whose joy lasts; [2765]
God endures, whereas wealth and children perish.
His treasures have never been of any avail to any Persian ruler, and 'Ād[650] have tried to achieve eternal life, but they were not eternal.
There is no Solomon, despite the fact that the winds swept for him,[651] while men and jinn mixed together hastened [to his command].
Where are the rulers to whose gifts riders came from all directions?
At the inevitable pool of death there [we] must drink one day, as [others already] have.

---

645. Ibn Ju'dubah is Yazīd b. 'Iyāḍ. See note 616, above.

646. Ismā'īl b. Abī Ḥakīm al-Qurashī died in 130/747. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 289.

647. Sa'īd b. al-Musayyab died ca. 94/713. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 84–88; Sezgin, GAS, I, 276.

648. A small mountain 25 miles north of Mecca on the Medina road. See Bilādī, Mu'jam, V, 189–91.

649. The meter is basīṭ. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, III, 30.

650. One of the pre-Islamic tribes mentioned in the Qur'ān who refused to accept the message to abandon their gods and worship God. See Qur'ān, XXVI:129, where they are accused by their messenger, Hūd, of "taking to yourselves strongholds, perchance you might live forever."

651. In the Qur'ān (XXXIV:12) Solomon is given the wind by God, and (XXXVIII:36) God made the wind subservient to him.

According to 'Umar b. Shabbah—'Alī—Abū al-Walīd al-Makkī:[652] While 'Umar was sitting down a lame man came up to him leading a limping she-camel. He stopped and recited the following:[653]

You have been made our ruler whereas we are the subjects;
you, 'Umar, are summoned by virtue of your mark of distinction.
When the evil of an evil day falls on its evil men, [then, by contrast] Muḍar[654] has today placed upon you [the glory] of their noble deeds.

['Umar] exclaimed, "There is no might and power except in God!"[655] The man complained that his she-camel was lame. So
[2766] 'Umar took the she-camel, gave him a red camel as a fresh mount and provisioned him, and he went on his way. 'Umar left later on pilgrimage, and while he was traveling along, he came across a rider who was reciting the following:[656]

No one has ruled over us like you, Ibn al-Khaṭṭāb, [no one] more beneficent to those distant [from you], nor to his friends, after the Prophet, him of the Book.

So 'Umar prodded him with a stick he was carrying and said, "What about Abū Bakr?"

According to 'Umar—'Alī b. Muḥammad—Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ—'Abd al-Malik b. Nawfal b. Musāḥiq:[657] 'Umar appointed 'Utbah b. Abī Sufyān[658] as governor of Kinānah.[659] He 652. Abū al-Walīd al-Makkī is Yasār b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XII, 274.

653. The meter is ṭawīl.

654. Muḍar is a huge tribal conferation amounting to a very large proportion of all the northern Arab tribes known collectively as 'Adnān. See Kaḥḥālah, Mu'jam, III, 1107.

655. 'Umar is apologizing for not having done his duty.

656. The meter is rajaz.

657. 'Abd al-Malik b. Nawfal b. Musāḥiq has a brief notice without date of death in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 428.

658. 'Utbah b. Abī Sufyān b. Ḥarb was the brother of Mu'āwiyah.

659. This is in all probability the large tribal group in the Mecca area, Kinānah b. Khuzaymah. See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 11ff., 180; Zubayrī, Nasab Quraysh, 10ff.; Kaḥḥālah, Mu'jam, III, 996–98.

arrived back, bringing some wealth with him. ('Umar) asked him what it was. He said it was wealth he had taken with him and with which he had engaged in business. ('Umar) said, "What are you doing taking wealth with you in this way?" ('Umar) put it in the treasury. Now when 'Uthmān became caliph, he said to Abū Sufyān,[660] "If you demand what 'Umar took from 'Utbah, I shall return it to him." Abū Sufyān replied, "If you contradict your predecessor, the people will think badly of you. Beware of going against your predecessor, lest your successor go against you!"

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Rabī' b. al-Nu'mān,[661] Abū al-Mujālid Jarād b. 'Amr,[662] Abū 'Uthmān, Abū Ḥārithah,[663] and Abū 'Amr,[664] the client of Ibrāhīm b. Ṭalḥah[665]—Zayd b. Aslam—his father: Hind bt. 'Utbah[666] paid her respects to 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb and asked him for a loan from the treasury of 4,000 [dirhams] with which to engage in business, and at the same time making herself responsible for (the sum). ('Umar) lent her the money and she took it off to the territory of Kalb,[667] where she bought and sold. She heard that Abū Sufyān and 'Amr b. Abī Sufyān[668] had gone to Mu'āwiyah, so she left [2767]
Kalb territory and came to see Mu'āwiyah. [This was when Abū Sufyān had already divorced her.] "What brings you here, mother?" Mu'āwiyah asked. She replied, "To see you, my son. [You know that] 'Umar works only [to please] God. Your father, [I note], has already been to you, and I was afraid that you will give him all sorts of things, as he is worthy of this. But people 660. Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb was the father of 'Utbah.

661. Al-Rabī' b. al-Nu'mān has a brief entry in Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 165.
662. An unidentified narrator.
663. An unidentified narrator.
664. An unidentified narrator.
665. An unidentified narrator.
666. Hind bt. 'Utbah, wife of Abū Sufyān, mother of Mu'āwiyah and 'Amr (see note 668, below).
667. There are several tribes of this name, but one can perhaps assume Kalb b. Wabarah is meant here, a tribal group (baṭn) of Quḍā'ah, by origin a southern, Qaḥṭānī tribe. If this is the case, Hind would have been conducting her business in the northern Ḥijāz and the Jawf area in the north of the Peninsula. Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 455ff.; Kaḥḥālah, Mu'jam, III, 990–92; EI^{2}, s.v. "Kalb" (Fück/Dixon).
668. 'Amr b. Abī Sufyān, brother of Mu'āwiyah and son of Hind.

will not know the source of the wherewithall you had to make the gift, so they will blame you severely, and 'Umar will too and so will never absolve her of the [money] owed [to the treasury]." So [Mu'āwiyah] sent [only] a hundred dinars [from Hind's money] to his father and brother ['Amr], clothed them, and gave them mounts. But 'Amr considered this too much and Abū Sufyān said, "Do not think [it is too much], for Hind has been involved in this gift and was present at a discussion [about it]." So they all returned and Abū Sufyān said to Hind, "Did you make any profit?" "God knows best!" she replied, "I [still] have some business in Medina." When she reached Medina and sold [her goods], she complained about what had been paid out to them. 'Umar said to her, "If the money [you owe] were mine, I would leave it to you. But it is the Muslims' money and this is a discussion in which Abū Sufyān has been involved." So ['Umar] sent for [Abū Sufyān] and detained him until she paid [the money] in full. ['Umar] asked [Abū Sufyān], "How much did Mu'āwiyah give you?" He replied, "A hundred dinars."

According to 'Umar—'Alī—Maslamah b. Muḥārib[669]—Khālid al-Ḥadhdhā'[670]—'Abdallāh b. Abī Ṣa'ṣa'ah[671]—al-Aḥnaf: 'Abdallāh b. 'Umayr[672] came to 'Umar as he was assigning state stipends to the people. Now ['Abdallāh's] father was killed a martyr at the battle of Ḥunayn,[673] so he said, "O Commander of the Faithful, give me a stipend." But ['Umar] paid no attention to him. So he gave ['Umar] a prod. 'Umar cried, "Ouch!"
[2768] and then turned to him and said, "Who are you?" He told him he was 'Abdallāh b. 'Umayr, so ['Umar] said [to his servant], "Yarfa', give him 600." He gave him 500, but ['Abdallāh] did not accept it and said, "The Commander of the Faithful has given orders that I receive 600." And he went back and told ['Umar]. He said, "Give him 600 and a complete garment,

669. An unidentified narrator.
670. An unidentified narrator.
671. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Ṣa'ṣa'ah has a brief entry in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 265.
672. It is not possible to identify this man with certainty.
673. This battle took place in 8/629 and the Prophet and his Muslim forces defeated a Meccan army. Ḥunayn is a wadi only about 10 miles from Mecca itself. See Ṭabarī, I, 1654ff.; Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, II, pp. 442ff.; Guillaume, Life, 566ff. For the location of the wadi, see Bilādī, Mu'jam, III, 70–73.

Yarfa'." So the latter did. ['Abdallāh] put the garment on and threw away what he had been wearing. But 'Umar said to him, "My son, take these clothes of yours for serving your family and [keep] this one to make you look smart!"

According to 'Umar—'Alī—Abū al-Walīd al-Makkī—one of the sons of Ṭalḥah—Ibn 'Abbās: I went with 'Umar on one of his journeys. We were traveling one night, and I came near to him as he struck the front of his saddle with his whip and recited the following:[674]

You have lied, by the house of God! Will Aḥmad be killed[675] when we have not yet come to his defense with spears and arrows?
Shall we surrender him before we are slain around him and neglect our sons and spouses?

Then he said, "I ask God for forgiveness [for implying ill of the Prophet's house]!" He went on without speaking for a little while, then he recited as follows:[676]

No she-camel has borne on her saddle one more pious and more faithful when he makes a covenant than Muḥammad, One more generous to give away a red and black striped garment before it is worn out and who gives away more thoroughbred horses.

Then he said, "I ask God for forgiveness, Ibn 'Abbās! What prevented 'Alī from coming with us?" I replied, "I do not know." He continued, "Ibn 'Abbās, your father is the paternal uncle of the Messenger of God. You are his cousin. What has kept your people from [putting] you [in authority]?" I replied that I did not know. He continued, "But I do know; they do not [2769]

674. The poem was composed by Abū Ṭālib after the battle of Badr. See Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, II, 24. The meter is ṭawīl.

675. The poem was uttered by the dying 'Ubaydah b. al-Ḥārith after the battle of Badr, in fact quoting Abū Ṭālib's composition. The Sīrah version [Ibn Hishām, II, 24] reads yubzā Muḥammadun, that is, "will Muhammad be maltreated," rather than the Ṭabarī text yuqtalu Aḥmadu. The "Aḥmad" of the text means "Muḥammad." See also Wāqidī, Maghāzī, I, 70.

676. By Anas b. Zunaym al-Dīlī; see Guillaume, Life, 559. The meter is ṭawīl.

like your being put in charge of them." I said, "Why, when we are good to them?" ('Umar) replied, "O God, [grant] forgiveness. They do not like you to combine the prophethood and the caliphate among yourselves, lest it bring about self-aggrandizement and pride. You will perhaps say, 'Abū Bakr did this.' No indeed, but Abū Bakr did the most resolute thing he could. If he had made (the caliphate) yours, he would not have benefited you despite your close ties of relationship [to the Prophet]. Recite to me what the poet of poets, Zuhayr, composed:[677]

When Qays b. 'Aylān[678] hasten to a glorious goal, the one who reaches it first is made chief."

So I recited it to him as dawn broke. ('Umar) said, "Recite 'The Event'."[679] So I recited it. Then he dismounted and said his prayers, reciting "The Event" [in them].

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—a source—'Ikrimah[680]—Ibn 'Abbās: As 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb and some of his friends were reciting poetry together, one said that so and so was the best poet. Another said that, rather, so and so was the best poet. (Ibn 'Abbās) continued: I arrived and 'Umar remarked, "The most knowledgeable on the subject has just arrived." And he asked, "Who is the best poet, Ibn 'Abbās?" I replied it was Zuhayr b. Abī Sulmā. 'Umar asked me to provide some of his poetry that would prove what I had said. I said, "He eulogized a group of Banū 'Abdallāh b. Ghaṭafān as follows:[681]

---

677. The meter is ṭawīl. The poet is Zuhayr b. Abī Sulmā, one of the greatest of the pre-Islamic poets. See Tha'lab, Sharḥ, 234; Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, IX, 146ff. The poem in question is quoted on 147.

678. A large tribal confederation of 'Adnān. The name Qays is synonymous with the northern tribes, 'Adnān. See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 468ff., 480ff.; Kaḥḥālah, Mu'jam, III, 972–93; *EI*², s.v. (Watt).

679. Sūrat al-Wāqi'ah, Qur'ān, LVI, the "Event" being the day of Judgment. This is perhaps a more specific reference to "those coming first" (al-sābiqūna) in verse 10.

680. A client of Ibn 'Abbās and famous narrator; he died ca. 107/725. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 263–73.

681. A tribal group (baṭn) of Sa'd b. Qays b. 'Aylān of 'Adnān, of whom Zuhayr was a member (Shantamarī, Dīwān, 150). Cf. Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 248–49; Kaḥḥālah, Mu'jam, II, 732–33. For the poem itself, see Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, III, 31. It does not figure in Zuhayr's Dīwān. The meter is basīṭ.

If there were sitting above the sun [in a position] of nobility a people by means of their ancestry or their glory, (Banū 'Abdallāh b. Ghaṭafān) would be they.
[They are] a people whose ancestor is a spearhead; when you examine their pedigree, [2770] they have an excellent one, as do all their offspring.
[They are] men when they feel safe, jinn when they are afraid, warriors ready to sacrifice themselves when they come together, Envied for what good things they have;
may God not remove from them the thing for which they are envied."

"Bravo!" exclaimed 'Umar, "I do not know of anyone more worthy of such poetry than this branch of Banū Hāshim[682] because of the excellence of the Messenger of God and their close relationship to him." I said, "May you be granted lasting success, Commander of the Faithful." ('Umar) said, "Do you know, Ibn 'Abbās, what kept your people from [being put] over (Quraysh) after Muḥammad's death?" I did not want to answer, so I said, "If I do not know, then the Commander of the Faithful will tell me." 'Umar said, "They were unwilling for you to combine the prophethood and the caliphate, lest you magnify yourselves above your own people and be proud. Quraysh made the choice for themselves; they were right and have been granted success." I said, "Commander of the Faithful, if you will permit me and not get angry with me, I shall speak." He allowed me to do so, so I said, "As for your saying, Commander of the Faithful, that Quraysh have made their choice for themselves and that they were right and have been granted success, if Quraysh had made the same choice for themselves as God did for them, then right would be theirs, unrejected and unenvied. As for your saying that (Quraysh) were averse to the prophethood and the caliphate being ours, God has described one people as being averse and said, 'This is because they were averse to what God revealed, so He made their works fruitless.'"[683]

682. That is, Banū al-'Abbās.
683. Qur'ān, XLVII: 9. The Qur'ān is clearly referring to unbelievers.

[2771] 'Umar said, "Far from it indeed,[684] Ibn 'Abbās. I used to hear things about you of which I was reluctant to inquire, lest they bring about your removal from your position with me." I said, "What are they, Commander of the Faithful? If they are right, they should not [be such as to] remove me from my position with you; if they are false, then someone like me will remove the falsehood from himself." 'Umar said, "I have heard that you are saying they have turned [the caliphate] away from you out of envy and injustice." I replied, "When you say out of injustice, Commander of the Faithful, it has already become clear to the ignorant and the thoughtful alike; when you say out of envy, Iblīs was envious of Ādam,[685] and we are his offspring who are envied." 'Umar said, "Far from it! Your hearts, Banū Hāshim, have refused [to show anything] other than unchanging envy and increasing spite and malice." I replied, "Take it easy, Commander of the Faithful; do not describe the hearts of a people from whom God has removed uncleanness, and whom He has purified completely, as being envious and malicious. The heart of the Messenger of God is one of the hearts of Banū Hāshim." 'Umar retorted, "Leave me, Ibn 'Abbās." I said I would comply, but, when I went to get up, he became embarrassed at what he had said to me and said, "Stay where you are, Ibn 'Abbās. I shall tend to your right and approve of what gives you pleasure." I replied, "Commander of the Faithful, I have a right that is incumbent upon you and every Muslim. Anyone who preserves it will achieve good fortune; anyone who does not will lose good fortune." Then he got up and went away.

According to Aḥmad b. 'Umar[686]–Ya'qūb b. Isḥāq al-Ḥaḍramī[687]—'Ikrimah b. 'Ammār[688]—Iyās b. Salamah[689]—his father: 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb passed through the market carrying

684. That is, that Quraysh are in any way attempting to thwart the legitimate rights of the 'Alid family.

685. Iblīs, the Devil, was the angel in Islamic tradition who refused to prostrate himself before Adam. See Qur'ān, VII: 11, 19ff., XX:115ff.

686. Cairo reads Aḥmad b. 'Amr. It is not possible to identify him with certainty.

687. He died in 205/820. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 382.

688. He died in 159/775. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 261–63.

689. He died in Medina in 119/737. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 388–89.

his whip. He dealt me a blow with it and caught the edge of my garment, saying, "Get out of the way." The following year he [2772] met me and said, "Are you intending to go on the pilgrimage, Salamah?" When I told him that I was, he took me by the hand to his house and gave me 600 dirhams, saying, "Use them to make your pilgrimage, and you should know that they are by way of compensation for the lash that I gave you." I replied, "But I had not remembered it, Commander of the Faithful." "But I had not forgotten it!" he exclaimed.

According to 'Abd al-Ḥamīd b. Bayān[690]—Muḥammad b. Yazīd[691]—Ismā'īl b. Abī Khālid—Salamah b. Kuhayl:[692] 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb said, "O subjects, you have an obligation to us to give advice on what is unknown and to cooperate in doing good. There is no forbearance (ḥilm) dearer to God and more generally advantageous than that of a gentle leader. O subjects, there is no ignorance more hateful to God and more generally evil than that of a harsh leader. O subjects, he who enjoins well-being for someone in his midst, God will bring him well-being from above."

According to Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Yaḥyā b. Ma'īn[693]—Ya'qūb b. Ibrāhīm—'Īsā b. Yazīd b. Da'b—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Zayd[694]—'Imrān b. Sawādah:[695] I said the morning prayer with 'Umar, and he recited the Subḥān chapter[696] and one other. Then he left. I went off with him, and he asked if there was anything he could do. I told him there was, so he asked me to join him. I did so and, when he entered [his house], he gave me permission [to enter]. There he was on a bed with nothing on it. I told him I wanted to give him some advice. His reply was, [2773] "The person giving good advice is welcome anytime." I said, "Your community finds fault with you on four counts." ['Umar] put the top of his whip in his beard and the lower part on his 690. He died in 244/858. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 111.

691. It is not possible to identify this narrator with certainty.
692. Salamah b. Kuhayl al-Ḥaḍramī died ca. 123/741. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 155–57.
693. He died in 233/848. See Rosenthal, Historiography, 341.
694. An unidentified narrator.
695. An unidentified narrator.
696. That is, Qur'ān XVII, usually entitled "The Children of Israel."

thigh. Then he said, "Tell me more." I continued, "It has been mentioned that you declared the lesser pilgrimage[697] forbidden during the months of the [full] pilgrimage. The Messenger of God did not do this, nor Abū Bakr, though it is permitted." He answered, "It is permitted. If they were to perform the lesser pilgrimage during the months of the pilgrimage, they would regard it as being in lieu of the full pilgrimage, and [Mecca] would be a deserted place that year, and the pilgrimage would be celebrated by no one, although it is part of God's greatness. You are right." I continued, "It is also said that you have forbidden temporary marriage,[698] although it was a license (rukhṣah) given by God. We enjoy a temporary marriage for a handful [of dates],[699] and we can separate after three nights." He replied, "The Messenger of God permitted it at a time of necessity. Then people regained their life of comfort. I do not know any Muslim who has practiced this or gone back to it. Now anyone who wishes to can marry for a handful [of dates] and separate after three nights. You are right." I continued, "You emancipate a slave girl if she gives birth, without her master's [consenting to] the emancipation."[700] He replied, "I added one thing that is forbidden to another, intending only to do some good. I ask God's forgiveness." I continued, "There have been complaints of your raising your voice against your subjects and your addressing them harshly." He raised his whip, then ran his hand down it right to the end. Then he said, "I am Muḥammad's traveling companion"—he had [in fact] sat behind him at the raid on Qarqarat al-Kudr.[701] "Indeed I pasture [my flocks] well until 697. The pilgrimage that can be undertaken at any time of the year. See SEI, s.v. "'umra" (Paret).

698. Temporary marriage, mut'ah, is recognized by the Twelver Shī'īs only. See SEI, s.v. (Heffening); Schacht, Origins, 266–67; Introduction, 163; Coulson, History, 110–11, 115–16.

699. Where temporary marriage was permitted, it was carried out in return for a robe or a handful of dates. See SEI, loc. cit.

700. The umm walad would normally have to wait until her master died before gaining her freedom.

701. A plain in the area of Khaybar, about 6 miles away from the town. The raid does not appear to be dated precisely in the sīrah and maghāzī literature, but must have been only a short time before the death of the Prophet in 10/632. See Wāqidī, Maghāzī, I, 182ff. (Qarārat al-Kudr); Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, II, 618; al-Manāsik, 411; Bilādī, Mu'jam, VII, 117.

they are satisfied. I water them and quench their thirst. I push back the she-camel that grumbles when milked. I chide the she-camel that does not stick to the road. I keep them moving. I do not drive them too fast. I gather together camels pasturing alone. [2774] I bring up camels lagging behind. I chide often and beat seldom. I raise my stick. I push away with my hand. Were it not for all this, I would be much at fault!" (The source) continued: Mu'āwiyah heard this and said, "He was indeed knowledgeable about their subjects."

According to Ya'qūb b. Ibrāhīm—Ibn 'Ulayyah—Ibn 'Awn[702] —Muḥammad: 'Uthmān said, "'Umar used to deny his family and relatives things, seeking God's face, whereas I give freely to my family and relatives, [also] seeking it. No three like 'Umar will ever be met with again."[703]

According to 'Alī b. Sahl[704]—Ḍamrah b. Rabī'ah[705]—'Abdallāh b. Abī Sulaymān[706]—his father: I arrived in Medina and entered one of the houses there. There was 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb wearing [only] a striped waist wrapper and smearing the alms camels with tar.[707]

According to Ibn Bashshār—'Abd al-Raḥmān [b. Mahdī]—Sufyān [b. 'Uyaynah]—Ḥabīb[708]—Abū Wā'il [Shaqīq]: 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb said, "Had I known in the beginning what I know now, I would have taken the excess wealth of the rich and distributed it among the poor Emigrants."

According to Ibn Bashshār—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mahdī— [2775] Manṣūr b. Abī al-Aswad[709]—al-A'mash—Ibrāhīm[710]—al-Aswad

---

702. An unidentified narrator.

703. That is, only Abū Bakr and 'Umar had such piety, but I, 'Uthmān, cannot compete with them. See Ṭanṭāwī, Akhbār, 542.

704. 'Alī b. Sahl al-Ramlī does not figure in the major biographical dictionaries, but see Translation, I, 25, 174 n. 45.

705. Ḍamrah b. Rabī'ah al-Ramlī has a brief entry in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 460.

706. An unidentified narrator.

707. To treat mange, sores, and other skin problems.

708. Ḥabīb b. Abī Thābit died in 119/773. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 178–80.

709. Manṣūr b. Abī al-Aswad al-Laythī is given no date of death in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 305–6.

710. Ibrāhīm b. Yazīd al-Nakha'ī died in 96/714. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 177–79.

b. Yazīd:[711] Whenever a delegation came to 'Umar, he would ask them about their leader. They would give a good account of him, so he would ask, "Does he visit your sick?" They would answer that he did, so he would ask, "Does he visit the sick slave?" They would answer that he did, so he would ask, "How does (your leader) treat the weak? Does he sit at his door?" If they replied in the negative regarding any one of these customs, he would dismiss him.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—al-Ḥakam b. Bashīr[712]—'Amr [b. Muḥammad]: 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb used to say,

> There are four matters connected with Islam that I shall never neglect or abandon for anything: the strength in God's wealth and collecting it so that, when we do collect it, we place it where God orders us, and remain, family of 'Umar, with nothing of it in our hands at all. [Second, there are] the Emigrants who are beneath the shadow of swords—they should not be restricted, nor detained away from their families; God's immovable booty should be for them and for their families in abundance, and I shall look after their families until they return. [Third, there are] the Helpers who have already given their share to God and all of them fought the enemy—the good deeds of those who do good among them should be accepted as such, whereas the evil deeds of those who do evil deeds should be passed over without punishment and they should be consulted in the matter. [Fourth, there are] the bedouins who are the original Arabs and the mainstay of Islam—their alms should be taken from them in kind—not a single dinar should be > [2776] taken from them, nor [even] a dirham—and it should be returned to their poor and wretched.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Ibn Jurayj—Nāfi'—'Abdallāh b. 'Umar: 'Umar said, "I know that all the people [together] are not equal to these two men between whom and Gabriel the Apostle of God was the confidential messenger,

---

711. Al-Aswad b. Yazīd died ca. 75/694. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 342–43.
712. An unidentified narrator.

receiving the revelations from him and dictating them to them."[713]

The Account of the Electoral Council[714]

According to 'Umar b. Shabbah—'Alī b. Muḥammad [al-Madā'inī]—Wakī' [b. al-Jarrāḥ]—al-A'mash—Ibrāhīm, and Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh al-Anṣārī[715]—Ibn Abī 'Arūbah[716]—Qatādah—Shahr b. Ḥawshab,[717] and Abū Mikhnaf[718]—Yūsuf b. Yazīd[719]—Abū al-'Abbās Sahl[720] and Mubārak b. Faḍālah—'Ubaydallāh b. 'Umar, and Yūnus b. Abī Isḥāq[721]—'Amr b. Maymūn al-Awdī:[722] When 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb was stabbed, it was suggested to him that he should appoint a successor. "Whom shall I appoint caliph?" was his reply. "If Abū 'Ubaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ[723] were alive, I would appoint him, and if my Lord questioned me, I would say, ' I heard Your prophet say that [Abū 'Ubaydah] was the guardian of this community.' If Sālim, client

---

713. That is, 'Uthmān and 'Alī. Five future caliphs had acted as the Prophet's secretaries: Abū Bakr, 'Umar, 'Uthmān, 'Alī, and Mu'āwiyah. Abū Bakr was by this time dead; 'Umar is not talking of himself here; and Mu'āwiyah also is not in question.

714. Arabic shūrā, the council of six appointed by 'Umar to decide on the succession. See Ya'qūbī, Tārīkh, II, 160; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, III, 32ff.; Ibn 'Abd Rabbih, 'Iqd, IV, 273ff.; Bal'amī, Chronique, III, 546ff.; Ṭanṭāwī, Akhbār, 531ff. The reader's attention is also drawn to Abbott, Papyri, 80ff. Pp. 83–87 in particular include the different versions of the account of the council, with full references.

715. It is not possible to identify this narrator with certainty.

716. He died in 150/767–776. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 636.

717. Shahr b. Ḥawshab al-Ash'arī died ca. 112/730. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 369–72.

718. Abū Mikhnaf Lūṭ b. Yaḥyā died ca. 157/774. See U. Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, passim; Duri, Rise, 44ff., 143ff.; Rosenthal, Historiography, 70, 90.

719. An unidentified narrator.

720. I read tentatively from the Leiden apparatus criticus Sahl b. Sa'd al-Sā'idī who died ca. 88/707. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 252ff.

721. It is not possible to identify this narrator with certainty.

722. 'Amr b. Maymūn al-Awdī died ca. 75/694. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 109–10.

723. Abū 'Ubaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ was the famous Companion and military leader on the Syrian front against the Byzantines. He died in Syria in 18/639, shortly after the conquest of Jerusalem by the Muslims. See Shaban, History, 31, 43; EI[2], s.v. [Gibb].

[2777] of Abū Ḥudhayfah,[724] were alive, I would appoint him, and if my Lord questioned me, I would say, 'I heard your prophet say that Sālim loves God vehemently.'" Someone said to ['Umar], "I can point to someone, 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar." But ['Umar] replied, "God curse you! You were not saying this for God's sake! You wretch! How can I appoint caliph someone who has been unable to divorce his wife! We have no desire [to get involved] in your affairs. I have not found [the caliphate] so praiseworthy that I should covet it for my own family. If things turn out well, we shall have gained our reward from them; but if they turn out badly, then it is enough for the family of 'Umar that [only] one of them should be called to account and held responsible for what happened to Muḥammad's community. I have striven and have kept my own family out. If I succeed in coming out [of all this] even, and no recompense [being given to me], I shall indeed be happy. I shall look [into the matter]: if I do appoint a caliph, then someone better than I has made the appointment; but if I abandon [the idea], someone better than I has [already] done this. God will never neglect His faith."[725]

So [those with him] left and returned in the evening, suggesting to the Commander of the Faithful that he draw up a succession agreement. He replied, "I had decided after talking to you that I would look [into the matter] and appoint someone over you, the most suitable of you to bear you along the true path." And he indicated 'Alī. [He continued], "But I fell into a swoon and saw a man who had entered a garden that he had planted. He began to pick everything, both the young tender plants and the mature ones, clutching them to him and putting them beneath him. I knew that God was in control and was taking 'Umar into His mercy. I do not want to take on the burden [of the caliphate], dead as well as alive. You should [approach] that group of men who the Messenger of God said are 'among the people of paradise.' Sa'īd b. Zayd b. 'Amr b.

724. Sālim figures quite prominently in the early histories, but this is a strange assertion. See Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, I, 479, 679, 708, etc.; Wāqidī, Maghāzī, I, 9, 148, 154, etc.

725. In the first instance, if he does appoint a caliph, Abū Bakr has already done this. In the second, if he does not, Muḥammad himself did not appoint a caliph. Either way he has a precedent.

Nufayl[726] is one of them. I am not bringing him into the matter, [2778] but rather the following six: 'Alī and 'Uthmān, sons of 'Abd Manāf,[727] 'Abd al-Raḥmān [b. 'Awf] and Sa'd [b. Abī Waqqāṣ], maternal uncles of the Messenger of God, al-Zubayr b. al-'Awwām, the true friend and cousin of the Messenger of God, and Ṭalḥat al-Khayr b. 'Ubaydallāh.[728] Let them select one of themselves. When they appoint a leader, [you all] should give him good help and support. If he entrusts anyone of you with authority, he should convey to him what is committed to his care."

They left and al-'Abbās[729] said to 'Alī, "Do not get involved with them." He replied, "I do not like dissension [in our family]." [Al-'Abbās] said, "Then you will see something you do not like!" When morning came, 'Umar summoned 'Alī, 'Uthmān, Sa'd, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf, and al-Zubayr b. al-'Awwām and said, "I have looked into the matter and consider you to be the chiefs and leaders of the people. This matter will remain among you alone. When the Messenger of God died, he was well pleased with you. I have no fears for you with the people if you remain on the straight path. However, I do fear for you if there is a difference of opinion among you and the people then differ among themselves. Off you go to 'Ā'ishah's room, with her permission, and deliberate. Choose one of you." Then he added, "Do not go to 'Ā'ishah's room; rather stay near at hand." He put down his head, exhausted by the loss of blood.

So they went in and held secret discussions. But then their voices became raised and 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar exclaimed loud enough for ['Umar] to hear, "God heavens, the Commander of 726. Sa'īd b. Zayd b. 'Amr b. Nufayl, the brother-in-law of 'Umar, who with his wife, 'Umar's sister, was instrumental in the future caliph's embracing Islam. He died ca. 51/671. See Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, I, 226, 253.

727. A reference to the fact that both belonged to Quraysh—as did the other four—and represented both its lines through 'Abd Manāf, where the pedigree split: 'Alī was descended from 'Abd Manāf through Hāshim, whereas 'Uthmān was descended from 'Abd Manāf through 'Abd Shams.

728. Al-Zubayr was the son of the Prophet's paternal aunt. I detect no great significance in his calling Ṭalḥah Ṭalḥat al-Khayr, which I take to be a way of expressing endearment.

729. Al-'Abbās b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, the uncle of both the Prophet and 'Alī. See EI[2], s.v. [Watt].

the Faithful is not yet dead!" ('Umar) came to and said, "All of you, stop this! When I am dead, hold your consultations for three days. Let Ṣuhayb lead the people in prayer. Before the fourth day comes you should have your commander from among you. 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar will be there as adviser, but he shall [2779] have nothing to do with the matter [of the actual appointment]. Ṭalḥah shall share with you in the decision. If he comes within the three days, include him in your decision. If the three days go by and he does not come, make the decision nevertheless. Who will deal with Ṭalḥah for me?" "I shall," responded Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ, "and he will not give a differing view, God willing." 'Umar said, "I hope he will not give a differing view, God willing. I think one of these two, 'Alī or 'Uthmān, will become leader. If it is 'Uthmān, he is a gentle person; if it is 'Alī, he has a sense of humor. How suitable he is to carry them along the true road! If you appoint Sa'd, he is worthy of the office, but if not, the one appointed should seek his assistance. I have never dismissed him for disloyalty or weakness. How perceptive 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf is! He is disposed to what is right. [He is] rightly guided and has a protector in God. Listen to what he has to say."

('Umar) said to Abū Ṭalḥah al-Anṣārī, "For a long time had God strengthened Islam through you Helpers, Abū Ṭalḥah. Select fifty Helpers and urge them to choose one of them." To al-Miqdād b. al-Aswad[730] he said, "When you put me into my grave, assemble these people in one room to choose one of their number." To Ṣuhayb he said, "Lead the people in prayer for three days. Let into [the deliberations] 'Alī, 'Uthmān, al-Zubayr, Sa'd, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf, and Ṭalḥah, if he arrives. Have 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar present, but he shall have nothing to do with the matter [of the actual appointment]. Stay with them and if five agree to approve of one man, but one refuses, smash in his head, or strike it off with a sword. If four agree to approve of one man, but two refuse, cut off the [latters'] heads. If three approve [2780] of one of them, and three approve of another, get 'Abdallāh b.

730. Al-Miqdād b. 'Amr/al-Aswad al-Kindī died in 33/653. See Ibn Ḥajar. Tahdhīb, X, 285–87.

'Umar to make a decision. Let whichever party in favor of which he makes his judgment select one of themselves. If they do not accept 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar's judgment, be on the same side as 'Abd al-Rahman b. 'Awf. Kill the rest if they do not go along with the general consensus."

So they left. 'Alī said to some Banū Hāshim who were with him, "If your people are obeyed [only] among themselves, you will never be appointed to positions of leadership." Al-'Abbās came to him, and ['Alī] said, "[The caliphate] has slipped from us!"[731] [Al-'Abbās] asked him how he knew. He continued, "['Umar] paired me with 'Uthmān and told us [all] to fall in with the majority. If two approve of one, and two another, [he said], we should be on the same side as 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf. Sa'd will not go against his cousin, 'Abd al-Raḥmān, who is related by marriage to 'Uthmān. They will all [three] agree in their opinion. 'Abd al-Raḥmān will appoint 'Uthmān to the caliphate, or 'Uthmān will appoint 'Abd al-Raḥmān. If the other two were with me, they would be of no benefit to me, to say nothing of the fact that I have hope only of one of them." Al-'Abbās said to him, "I have never urged you to do anything without your later responding to me by holding back in a way I do not like. When the Messenger of God died, I ordered you to ask him [on his death bed] who should have the rule, but you refused. After [Muḥammad's] death I ordered you to bring the matter to a speedy conclusion, but you refused. When 'Umar nominated you a member of the electoral council, I advised you to have nothing to do with them, but you refused. Just learn one thing from me: whenever people make you a proposal, say no, unless they are appointing you [caliph]. Watch out for these people; they will continue to push us out of the matter [of the caliphate] until someone else takes our [rightful] place. I swear in God's name, no such person will get [the caliphate] without [2781] the help of some evil together with which no good will be of benefit!" 'Alī replied, "If 'Uthmān survives, I shall certainly remind him of what has happened. If he dies, they will certainly take [the caliphate] by turns among themselves. If they do, they will certainly find me in a position they do not like." Then he quoted the following verses, applying them to his own situation:[732]

731. That is, Banū Hāshim.

I swore by the lord of the mares prancing one evening—
[but] in the morning they came, nimble, hastening to al-Muḥaṣṣab.[733]
"The family of Ibn Ya'mar will certainly stand apart, facing a bloody place, difficult to drink from, they being the sons of al-Shuddākh.[734]

And he turned and saw Abū Ṭalḥah, but did not like his being there. Abū Ṭalḥah said, "Nothing to be afraid of, Abū al-Ḥasan!"[735]

When 'Umar died and his bier was brought out, both 'Alī and 'Uthmān pretended not to mind which of them would pray over him. But 'Abd al-Raḥman said, "Both of you are candidates for the caliphate. This matter has nothing to do with you. It is for Ṣuhayb whom 'Umar appointed to lead the people in prayer for three (nights) until they can agree on a leader." So Ṣuhayb prayed over ('Umar). When he had been buried, al-Miqdād assembled the members of the electoral council in the house of al-Miswar b. Makhramah—another version is that it was in the treasury and yet another that it was in 'Ā'ishah's room with her permission—five in all, accompanied by Ibn 'Umar and with Ṭalḥah [still] absent. They ordered Abū Ṭalḥah to prevent anyone from disturbing them. 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ and al-Mughīrah b.
[2782] Shu'bah arrived and sat at the door, but Sa'd threw pebbles at 732. The meter is ṭawīl. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, III, 33.

733. A place between Mecca and Minā, nearer to the latter. See al-Manāsik, 602; Bilādī, Mu'jam, VIII, 43–44.

734. Ya'mar b. 'Awf, nicknamed al-Shuddākh, was during the pre-Islamic period one of the arbitrators of Kinānah who gave a judgment between the tribes of Khuzā'ah and Quṣayy on the question of the Ka'bah. See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, III, 28; Zabīdī, Tāj, VII, 278–79. The second line is the very tentative rendering of la-yakhtaliyan rahṭu bni Ya'mara marī'an najī'an banū l-Shuddākhi wirdan muṣallabā.

'Alī here emphasises his isolation in the face of opposition.

735. Abū al-Ḥasan is 'Alī. This seems to indicate Abū Ṭalḥah's support for the Alid family.

them and made them get up, saying, "You want to say, 'We were there; we were members of the electoral council.'" The electoral council argued about the affair and a great deal of talking went on among them. Abū Ṭalḥah said, "I was more afraid that you would reject (the caliphate) than I was that you would compete for it. No, by Him who has taken away 'Umar's soul, I shall give you no more than the three days that you were ordered. Then I shall sit down in my own house and see what you are up to!"

'Abd al-Raḥmān said, "Which one of you will withdraw from the (race for the caliphate), and undertake to appoint the best of you?" No one answered. So he continued, "I withdraw." 'Uthmān said, "I am the first to accept [this]. I heard the Messenger of God say, '['Abd al-Raḥmān] is trustworthy on earth and will be in heaven.'" All the members, with the exception of 'Alī who remained silent, expressed their approval. So ['Abd al-Raḥmān] said, "What do you say, Abū al-Ḥasan?" ['Alī] replied, "Give me your word you will consider truth paramount, you will not follow your whim, you will not show any preference for a relative, and you will not let the community down." ['Abd al-Raḥmān] said [to the others], "Give me your solemn promises you will stand with me against anyone who reneges [on your final decision] and you will approve of anyone I choose for you. I impose a pact with God upon myself that I shall show no preference for a relative, because he is a relative, nor shall I let down the Muslims." He took a promise from them and similarly gave them his word. ['Abd al-Raḥmān] said to 'Alī, "You say you have most right of those present to the office because of your close relationship [to the Prophet] and your long standing in and the good deeds you have done in the cause of Islam, and you have not, [in saying so], said anything remote [from the truth]. But if you were not involved in the matter and were not here at all, whom would you think of them all has most right to (the office)?" He replied, "'Uthmān." ['Abd al-Raḥmān] took 'Uthmān on one side and said, "You say you are a shaykh of Banū 'Abd Manāf and related to the Messenger of God by marriage and his cousin, an excellent man of long standing [in Islam]—and you have not said anything remote from the truth and that (the caliphate) cannot therefore be taken from you. But if you were not here, which of the members do [2783] you think has most right to (the office)?" He replied, "'Alī." Then ('Abd al-Raḥmān) took al-Zubayr on one side and addressed him in the same way as he had 'Alī and 'Uthmān. He replied, "'Uthmān." Then ('Abd al-Raḥmān) took Sa'd on one side and spoke to him. He answered "'Uthmān." 'Alī met Sa'd and quoted, "'Fear God by whom you make demands one of another, and the wombs [which bore you]. God is ever watching you.'[736] I am asking you, in the name of the relationship (raḥim) of this son of mine[737] with the Messenger of God and that of my paternal uncle, Ḥamzah,[738] with you, not to stand with 'Abd al-Raḥmān, assisting 'Uthmān against me. I have connections 'Uthman does not." 'Abd al-Raḥmān went round at night meeting the Companions of the Messenger of God and those army commanders and nobles who arrived in Medina and consulting with them. Everyone he took to one side gave him instructions to opt for 'Uthmān. Then on the eve of the morning of the deadline, he came to the house of al-Miswar b. Makhramah well into the night and woke him up, saying, "You're asleep, when I have had very little tonight? Off you go and summon al-Zubayr and Sa'd!"

So (al-Miswar) summoned them and ('Abd al-Raḥmān) began [2784] with al-Zubayr at the back of the mosque under the covering (ṣuffah) that adjoins the house of Marwān,[739] saying, "Let the rule go to the sons of 'Abd Manāf!"[740] (Al-Zubayr) said, "I throw in my lot with 'Alī." ('Abd al-Raḥmān) said to Sa'd, "We are cousins. Throw in your lot with me so that I can choose." He replied, "If you choose yourself, that is fine! But if you choose 'Uthmān, then I prefer to support 'Alī. Have yourself accepted [as caliph], give us some respite and raise up our heads." ('Abd al-Raḥmān) said, "Abū Isḥāq, I have withdrawn from (the ca-

736. Qur'ān, IV:1.

737. The text has a singular, "son," presumably al-Ḥasan, who was born from the womb of Fāṭimah, the Prophet's daughter. The parallel text of the 'Iqd (IV, 278), however, has a dual, "these two sons of mine"; viz., al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn.

738. Ḥamzah b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, the brother of 'Alī's father, Abū Ṭālib.

739. This is perhaps the young Marwān b. al-Ḥakam, the future fourth Umayyad caliph, who died in 65/685.

740. That is, 'Alī and 'Uthmān. See note 727, above.

liphate) on condition that I make the choice. [Even] had I not done so and the choice had come back on me, I would not have wanted (the caliphate). I saw myself in a dream as if in a green meadow rich in fresh herbage.[741] A stallion camel came in—I have never seen such a noble stallion—and passed through like an arrow without paying attention to anything in the meadow right to the other side without stopping. A stallion followed him in immediately after and left the meadow. Then a fine thoroughbred stallion entered, dragging his halter, turning right and left, going where the other two went and leaving. Then a fourth, a stallion camel entered and pastured in the meadow. No indeed, I shall not be the fourth. No one can take the place of Abū Bakr and 'Umar after their death and [then] be approved of by the people." Sa'd replied, "I am afraid that weakness has overcome you. Do as you think best. You know what 'Umar's death bed instructions were."

Al-Zubayr and Sa'd left. ['Abd al-Raḥmān] sent al-Miswar b. Makhramah for 'Alī and talked with him in private for a long time, (the latter) not doubting that he was to be selected for the office [of caliph]. Then ['Alī] left, and ['Abd al-Raḥmān] sent al-Miswar for 'Uthmān, but the call to morning prayer interrupted their private conversation.

According to 'Amr b. Maymūn: 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar told me, [2785]
"'Amr, anyone who tells you that he knows what 'Abd al-Raḥmān discussed with 'Alī and 'Uthmān, does not know what he is talking about! Your Lord's decision fell on 'Uthmān."

When they had said the morning prayers, ['Abd al-Raḥmān] convened the members [of the electoral council] and sent for all the Emigrants and the Helpers of long standing [in Islam] and of excellence and the military commanders who were [in Medina]. They all assembled and there was confusion among the people in the mosque. ['Abd al-Raḥmān] said, "People, everyone wants those of the garrison towns to return to them, having learned who their supreme commander is." Sa'īd b. Zayd said, "We think you are worthy of [the caliphate]." He replied, "Give me some different advice!" 'Ammār [b. Yāsir] said, "If you want the Muslims to be in full agreement, give 'Alī the oath of allegiance." Al-Miqdād b. al-Aswad said, "'Ammār is right; if you give 'Alī the oath of allegiance, we shall say that we are in full agreement with what you are doing." Ibn Abī Sarḥ[742] said, "If you want Quraysh to be in full agreement, give 'Uthmān the oath of allegiance." 'Abdallāh b. Abī Rabī'ah said, "He is right; if you give 'Uthmān the oath of allegiance, we shall say that we are in full agreement with what you are doing." 'Ammār upbraided Ibn Abī Sarḥ, saying, "When did you ever give the Muslims any good advice?!"

741. The text reads "Innī urītu ka-rawḍatin khaḍrā'a" etc. Much neater is Ibn 'Abd Rabbih, 'Iqd, IV, 278, who has Innī ra'aytu ka-annī fī rawḍatin khaḍrā'a. I have translated the latter. In the anecdote that follows the first noble stallion camel represents the Prophet, the stallion camel Abū Bakr, and the fine thoroughbred 'Umar. The fourth represents 'Umar's successor.

Banū Hāshim and Banū Umayyah[743] held talks. 'Ammār said, "O people, God has ennobled us through His Prophet and strengthened us through His religion. How can you take this appointment away from those of the house of your Prophet?" A member of Banū Makhzūm[744] said, "You have gone too far, Ibn Sumayyah! Why should you have anything to do with Quraysh taking the leadership for themselves?"[745] Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ said, "Get it over with, 'Abd al-Raḥmān, before our people fall into civil war." 'Abd al-Raḥmān said, " I have looked into [the matter] and consulted. Do not, members of the electoral council, [2786] lay yourselves open to criticism." He summoned 'Alī and said, "God's agreement and covenant is binding on you. Will you indeed act in accordance with God's Book, the practice of His Messenger and the example of the two caliphs after him?" ['Alī] replied, "I hope to do this and act thus to the best of my knowledge and ability." ['Abd al-Raḥmān] summoned 'Uthmān and said to him the same as what he had said to 'Alī. ['Uthmān] replied, "Yes." So ['Abd al-Raḥmān] gave him the oath of

742. Ibn Abī Sarḥ was 'Iyāḍ b. 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd who died ca. 100/718. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 200–1.

743. That is, the families of 'Alī and 'Uthmān, respectively.

744. Makhzūm b. Yaqaẓah, a tribal group (baṭn) of Lu'ayy b. Ghālib and Banū Umayyah's chief rival among Quraysh. See Zubayrī, Nasab Quraysh, 299–346; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 141ff., 464; Kaḥḥālah, Mu'jam, III, 1058.

745. Sumayyah was a concubine, and this is therefore an insult. 'Ammār was not of Quraysh. See note 8, above. See also EI^{2}, s.v. "'Ammār" (Reckendorf).

allegiance. 'Alī said, "You have always been partial in his favor![746] This is not the first time you have banded together against us. But '[my course is] comely patience and God's help is to be asked against what you describe.'[747] You have appointed 'Uthmān only so that the rule will come back to you. 'Every day God exercises power.'"[748] 'Abd al-Raḥmān retorted, "Do not lay yourself open to criticism, 'Alī. I have looked into the matter and consulted the people. They regard no one as the equal of 'Uthmān." 'Alī left, saying, "[God's] decree will come in its time!" Al-Miqdād said, "You have indeed, 'Abd al-Raḥmān, passed up the one who makes decisions based 'on the truth and thereby acts justly.'"[749] ['Abd al-Raḥmān] replied, "I have indeed exerted all my efforts for the Muslims, Miqdād." [The former] said, "If you sincerely did what you did for God's sake, may He reward you as He does those who do good." [But] al-Miqdād said, "I have never seen such things as have been visited upon the people of this house after the death of their Prophet. I am amazed at Quraysh that they have abandoned someone who cannot be matched in my opinion in knowledge and the ability to act justly. What indeed if I were to find supporters against 'Uthmān!" 'Abd al-Raḥmān replied, "Fear God, Miqdād, I am afraid you will cause dissension." Someone questioned al-Miqdād, "God have mercy upon you, who are the people of this house and who is this man?" He replied, "The people of the [2787] house are Banū al-Muṭṭalib and the man is 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib." 'Alī said, "The people are looking to Quraysh, while Quraysh are [also] looking to their own house. [Quraysh] say that, if Banū Hāshim are put in authority over you, [the caliphate] will never leave them; but so long as it is in the hands of [clans] other than [Banū Hāshim] of Quraysh, you will pass it around among yourselves."

Ṭalḥah arrived on the day on which the oath of allegiance

746. This appears to be what is meant by the Arabic ḥabawta-hu ḥabwa dahrin; see Glossarium, CCXLV. Ibn 'Abd Rabbih, 'Iqd, IV, 279, has ḥabawta-hu muḥābātan.

747. Qur'ān, XII:18.

748. Qur'ān, LV:29.

749. See Qur'ān, VII:159, 181.

was given to 'Uthmān. He was asked to give his own oath to 'Uthmān, but asked, "Do all Quraysh approve of him?" and was told they did. He came to 'Uthman and the latter said, "You still have your options open; if you refuse [to give me the oath of allegiance], I shall reject [the caliphate]." Ṭalḥah said, "Will you really reject it?" 'Uthmān replied that he would. Ṭalḥah asked, "Have all the people given you the oath of allegiance?" 'Uthmān replied that they had. [Ṭalḥah] said, "Then I approve; I shall not go against the general consensus." He gave ['Uthmān] the oath of allegiance.

Al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah said to 'Abd al-Raḥmān, "You were right to give 'Uthmān the oath of allegiance, Abū Muḥammad." He also said to 'Uthmān, "If 'Abd al-Raḥmān had given the oath of allegiance to anyone other than you, we would not have agreed." But 'Abd al-Raḥmān retorted, "You one-eyed liar! If I had given anyone else the oath of allegiance, you would have done so also and would have said what you say now."

Al-Farazdaq said:[750]

Ṣuhayb led the prayer for three nights; then ['Abd al-Raḥmān] handed over [the caliphate] to Ibn 'Affān, unlimited authority,
A caliphate [which passed on] from Abū Bakr to his colleague, [Abū Bakr] rightly guided and ['Umar] under his command—they were [all] sincere friends."

[2788] Al-Miswar b. Makhramah used to say, "I have never seen a man get the better of a group of people in the matter in which they were engaged more effectively than 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf did of [the electoral council] in this case."

Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī] said: We [also] have the account of al-Miswar b. Makhramah. According to Salm b. Junādah Abū al-Sā'ib—Sulaymān b. 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Abī Thābit b. 'Abd al-

750. The meter is basīṭ. Al-Farazdaq is the famous poet, Hammām b. Ghālib b. Ṣa'ṣa'ah, always associated with al-Akhṭal and Jarīr. Al-Farazdaq died ca. 111/729. Cf. EI^{2}, s.v. [Blachère]; for a more recent assessment of al-Farazdaq and his work, see Jayyusi, "Umayyad Poetry," 401ff. The poet here is eulogizing the Umayyad caliph Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik and satirizing Yazīd b. al-Muhallab. Cf. al-Farazdaq, Dīwān, I, 265.

'Azīz b. 'Umar b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf—his father—'Abdallāh b. Ja'far—his father—al-Miswar b. Makhramah, whose mother was 'Ātikah bt. 'Awf, in the account the first part of which I have already given concerning the murder of 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb: The five, the members of the electoral council, went down into the grave of 'Umar,[751] then left for their homes. But 'Abd al-Raḥmān called them back, so they followed him, and he eventually came to the house of Fāṭimah bt. Qays al-Fihriyyah, sister of al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays al-Fihrī.[752] Some scholars say she was [not his sister but] his wife, a fine woman, one of perception. 'Abd al-Raḥmān began by saying, "I have perception; you have insight. Listen and you will learn; respond and you will have knowledge. An arrow that, though lacking power, hits the target is better than one, shot too hard, that goes beyond it. A mouthful of cold, brackish water is more beneficial than sweet that brings infection [after drinking]. You are leaders through whom guidance is brought about; [you are] scholars to whom reference [2789] is made. Do not blunt your knives by differing among yourselves, nor put your swords in their scabbards away from your enemies and so make them attain their blood revenge and diminish your deeds. Every term has a prescribed end. Every house has a leader at whose command they rise up and at whose forbidding they desist. Put one of you in charge of your affair, and you will walk slowly [forward] and reach your aim. Were it not for blind dissension and complete error, the perpetrators of which say what they think and upon whom calamity alights, your intentions would not go beyond your knowledge or your deeds beyond your intentions. Beware of the advice given at a whim and the tongue that divides. A stratagem introduced into speech is more effective than swords in a wound. Associate your affairs with someone who has ample strength against whatever befalls, is trustworthy with things unknown whatever descends, is pleased with you and all of you are pleased with him, chosen from among you and 751. See page 93.

752. Al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays al-Fihrī belonged to the Qurashī clan of Fihr. He was later in charge of Damascus, leader of Qays, the northern tribes, and fought against the Umayyad caliph, Marwān b. al-Ḥakam in 64/684 at the famous battle of Marj Rāhiṭ, where he was defeated and killed. See Ṭabarī, II, 474ff.; Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XVII, 111; EI^{2}, s.v. (Dietrich).

[about whom] all of you have the same opinion. Do not obey an evil doer who gives good advice or go against someone rightly guided who gives his assistance. I am making this speech and I ask God for forgiveness for you and for myself."

'Uthmān b. 'Affān spoke next, saying, "Praise be to God who took Muḥammad as a prophet and sent him as a messenger. He told him truthfully of His promise and granted him His help [2790] against all those distantly or closely related. God has made us his followers, guided by His command. He is our light. We act at His command when personal opinions diverge and our enemies dispute [with us]. Through His bounty God has made us leaders and through our obedience to Him commanders. Our concern does not extend beyond ourselves; no one else will approach us except those who are oblivious to the truth and shrink from the established aim. How preferable it would be if [dissension] were left alone, Ibn 'Awf! How apt that it should be,[753] if your decision is opposed and your call abandoned. I am the first to agree with you and to call to you, answerable and responsible for what I say. I ask God for forgiveness for you and for myself."

Al-Zubayr b. al-'Awwām spoke after him, saying, "To continue. He who calls upon God is not ignorant and he who answers Him is not rejected when personal opinions diverge and necks turn. Only one deviating from the truth will not comply with what you say. Only a wretch will abandon that for which you call. Were it not for God's ordinances that were made obligatory and God's regulations that were ordained and are restored to those who keep them and remain alive and do not die, death would be an escape from command and flight would be security from authority. But we must answer God's call and make the established practice prevail, lest we die a death of error and lest we suffer from the blindness of a time of ignorance. I agree with you in that to which you summon [us] and will support you in what you have commanded. There is no power and no strength except in God. I ask God for forgiveness for you and for myself."

Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ then spoke, saying, "Praise be to God who was first and will be last. I praise Him because He has saved me from going astray and opened my eyes to error. Through God's [2791] guidance those who are saved are the winners; through His mercy those who are pure are successful. Through Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh roads are lit up, paths are straight, and all truth prevails, as all falsehood is no more. Beware, members of the electoral council, of lies and the desire of those who are false. Their desires have already dispossessed a people before you. They inherited what you did and they acquired what you did, so God made them enemies and heaped curses upon them. God said, 'Those of the Israelites who did not believe are cursed by David's tongue and that of Jesus, the son of Mary; this is because they disobeyed and transgressed. They did not restrain one another from evil that they committed. How wretched was what they did!'[754] I have scattered [the arrows in] my quiver and taken my winning arrow. For Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh I have adopted [the opinion] of which I approved for myself.[755] I am answerable for him and responsible for what [opinion] I gave on his behalf. The matter is in your hands, Ibn 'Awf, for you to put your effort into it and the good advice you intended. Upon God depends the ultimate destination and to Him shall be the return. I ask for forgiveness for you and for myself and take refuge in God from your opposition."

753. Reading wa-ajdir. Cairo reads wa-aḥdhir, "how wary we should be of its occurring."

'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib then spoke, saying, "Praise be to God who sent forth Muḥammad as Prophet from among us and as a messenger to us. We are the house of the prophethood, the mine of wisdom, the security of the people of the world, and a salvation for those who ask for it. We have a right; if we are given it, we take it; if we are refused it, we ride the rumps of our camels, though the night journey be long.[756] If the Messenger of God had given us a commission, we would have carried out his agreement; if he had said [something] to us [as a designation], we would have disputed [with others] over it until we die.[757] No 754. Qur'ān, V:78–79.

755. It will be recalled that Ṭalḥah was absent until the final day of the deliberations, and Sa'd now speaks on his behalf.

756. That is, we take it by force.

757. 'Alī is here claiming the succession, but making it clear that there is no explicit delegation from the Prophet.

[2792] one will be faster than I to call for truth and [claim] close kinship. There is no power and strength except in God. Listen to and remember what I have to say. Perhaps you will see swords drawn and agreements broken in this matter after this council, until you become one united group, and some of you become leaders over those in error and over partisans (shī'ah) of the ignorant." Then he recited the following:[758]

If Jāsim has perished, I, because of what Banū 'Abd b. Ḍakhm have done,[759] Shall [nevertheless] obey anyone [even if he is] unable to find the right way in the desert heat, knowing well my destination, [guided by] every star.[760]

'Abd al-Raḥmān said, "Which one of you is willing to withdraw from this appointment and appoint someone else?" But they did not respond to his suggestion. He continued, "I withdraw myself and my cousin."[761] So the members gave him the task of settling the matter. At the minbar he got them to swear to give the oath of allgiance to whomsoever he gave it, even if he were to give with one hand the oath of allegiance to the other. He remained for three [nights] in his house, which was near the mosque and called today Raḥabat al-Qaḍā' [Courtyard where the Decision was made]—for this reason it was given this name. Ṣuhayb remained also for three [nights] leading the people in prayer.

'Abd al-Raḥmān sent for 'Alī and said to him, "If I do not give you the oath of allegiance, tell me to whom I should." ['Alī] replied, "'Uthmān." Then ['Abd al-Raḥmān] sent for 'Uthmān and asked the same thing of him. ['Uthmān] replied, "'Alī." ['Abd al-Raḥmān] then dismissed them both and summoned al-

758. The meter is wāfir. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, III, 37.

759. Jāsim is a section of the Amalekite tribe, Banū 'Abd b. Ḍakhm, from the area of al-Ṭā'if. See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, XII, 354; Fīrūzābādī, Qāmūs, IV, 143; Kaḥḥālah, Mu'jam, I, 157; II, 725. Ṭabarī, I, 230, however, places Jāsim in Oman.

760. 'Alī's message through this obscure poem is that, despite having been let down badly by his own people and despite having no one on which to depend, he can nevertheless proceed as he thinks fit, because he knows his goal is a righteous and attainable one.

761. That is, Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ.

Zubayr. He asked (al-Zubayr) the same thing and he replied "'Uthmān." Then ('Abd al-Raḥmān) summoned Sa'd and said, "Whom do you advise me [to support], as we two are not candidates for (the caliphate)?" He replied, "'Uthman." On the third night, ('Abd al-Raḥmān) called, "Miswar!" I replied, "At your service!" ('Abd al-Raḥmān) exclaimed, "You are asleep, [2793] when I have not slept for three [nights]! Go and call 'Alī and 'Uthmān for me. Miswar continued his account: I said, "Which shall I call first, uncle?" He replied, "Whichever one you wish." So I left and came to 'Alī—and he was the one I favored [for the caliphate]—and said, "Will you come to speak with my uncle?" ('Alī) said, "Did he send you to anyone else?" I replied that he had also sent me to 'Uthmān. ('Alī) said, "Which one of us did he order you to come to first?" I replied, "I asked him and he told me whichever one I wished. So I came to you first—you were the one I favored." So he came with me and we reached the place where people sit (al-maqā'id), and 'Alī took his seat there. I went in to see 'Uthmān and found him performing the witr prayer as dawn came up.[762] I asked him if he would come to speak with my uncle. ('Uthmān) in turn asked me, "Did he send you to anyone else?" I replied that he had also sent me to 'Alī. ('Uthmān) said, "Which one of us did he order you to come to first?" I replied, "I asked him and he told me whichever one I wished. 'Alī is where the people sit." So he came with me and we all went in to see my uncle who was standing in the qiblah, praying. He left [his prayers] when he saw us, then he turned to 'Alī and 'Uthmān and said, "I have asked about you and about others. I find that the people regard no one as equal to you two. Will you, 'Alī, give me your oath of office based on God's Book, the practice of His Prophet, and the deeds of Abū Bakr and 'Umar?" ('Alī) replied, "Indeed no, but [only] based on my own effort in all this and in accordance with my own ability." ('Abd al-Raḥmān) turned to 'Uthmān and said, "Will you give me your oath of office based on God's Book, the practice of His Prophet, and the deeds of Abū Bakr and 'Umar?" ('Uthmān) said, "Indeed yes." Then ('Abd al-Raḥmān) made a sign with his hand to his shoulders[763] and said, "If you will come this way!" S.. we got up and went to the mosque where someone gave out [2794] the cry, "Everyone in for prayer!"[764] 'Uthmān [later] said, "I held back, embarrassed by his haste to join 'Alī. I was at the back of the mosque." 'Abd al-Raḥmān appeared wearing the very turban that the Messenger of God had put on him and carrying his sword. He went up into the minbar where he stood for a long time. Then he said a prayer that the people did not hear.

762. The odd number of prostrations performed in prayer at night. See SEI, s.v. (Wensinck).

('Abd al-Raḥmān) then spoke, "O people, I have questioned you in secret and openly on the question of [who will be] your leader. I have found that none of you regard [anyone else] as equal to one of these two, 'Alī or 'Uthmān. Come forward to me, 'Alī." He did so and stood beneath the minbar. 'Abd al-Raḥmān took his hand and said, "Will you give me your oath of office based on God's Book, the practice of His Prophet, and the deeds of Abū Bakr and 'Umar?" He replied, "No, but based on my own effort in all this and in accordance with my own ability." ('Abd al-Raḥmān) let go of ('Alī's) hand and called out, "Come forward to me, 'Uthmān." He took him by his hand, as ('Uthmān) stood where 'Alī had stood, and said, "Will you give me your oath of office based on God's Book, the practice of His Prophet, and the deeds of Abū Bakr and 'Umar?" ('Uthmān) replied, "Indeed yes!" So ('Abd al-Raḥmān) stretched right up to the ceiling of the mosque, his hand still in 'Uthmān's hand. Then he said, "O God, hear and bear witness! O God, I have placed what was my own responsibility in all this upon 'Uthmān." The people crowded round to give 'Uthmān the oath of allegiance, until they reached him at the minbar. 'Abd al-Raḥmān sat down where the Prophet sat in the minbar, and he sat 'Uthmān down on the second step. The people began to [2795] give him the oath of allegiance, but 'Alī excused himself. 'Abd al-Raḥmān quoted, "He who breaks his word, does so to his own detriment; he who keeps the agreement he has made with God, He will bring him a great reward."[765] Then 'Alī came back, 763. Thus signifying that they should walk on either side of him.

764. Arabic, al-ṣalātu jāmi'ah. See Dozy, Supplément, I, 216–17.
765. Qur'ān, XLVIII:10.

pushing his way through the people, and gave the oath of allegiance, saying, "Deceit! What deceit!"

'Abd al-'Azīz[766] said, "The reason for 'Alī's mentioning deceit was simply that 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ had met 'Alī during the period the electoral council was meeting and said, "Abd al-Raḥmān is striving hard. The more you show (your) firm resolution, the less keen he is (that you be appointed). But [the more you say you will act according to] (your) effort and ability, the keener he is (that you be appointed). Then ('Amr b. al-'Āṣ) met 'Uthmān and said, "Abd al-Raḥmān is striving hard. He will indeed give you his oath of allegiance only because of firm resolution. So accept (the offer).' It was for this reason that 'Alī mentioned deceit."[767]

Then ('Abd al-Raḥman) went off with 'Uthmān to the house of Fāṭimah bt. Qays, where he sat down with the people. Al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah got up to make a speech, with 'Alī sitting there, "Praise be to God, Abū Muḥammad, who has granted you success! There was indeed no one other than 'Uthmān for (the caliphate)." 'Abd al-Raḥmān said, "This is none of your business, Ibn al-Dabbāgh! I could give my own oath of allegiance to no one without your saying what you have just said about him!"

Then 'Uthmān sat at the side of the mosque and called for 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Umar, who was confined in the house of Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ. He is the one from whose hand the sword had been snatched after he had killed Jufaynah,[768] al-Hurmuzān, and the daughter of Abū Lu'lu'ah, saying that he was going to kill some of those who were involved in shedding his father's blood, alluding to both the Emigrants and the Helpers. Sa'd had jumped up against him, snatched the sword from his hand and tugged at his hair until he had him on the ground. He held him prisoner in his own house until 'Uthmān brought him out. [2796]
'Uthmān said to a group of Emigrants and Helpers, "Give me your advice on [what to do with] this man who has brought 766. The father of Sulaymān, see the chain of authorities, p. 154, above.

767. 'Amr later appeared as Mu'āwiyah's arbitrator against Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī, 'Alī's arbitrator, after Ṣiffīn in 38/659. It appears from this text that he had long been against 'Alī.

768. Jufaynah was a Christian slave from al-Ḥīrah, see p. 163, below.

schism into Islam." 'Alī replied, "I think you should kill him." One of the Emigrants said, "'Umar was killed yesterday; will his son be killed today?" But 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ said, "Commander of the Faithful, God has exempted you from this having happened while you were in authority over the Muslims; rather this took place when you had none." 'Uthmān said, "I am now their master. I have decided that blood money should be paid in this case, and I shall bear the cost from my own money."

A Helper called Ziyād b. Labīd al-Bayāḍī recited the following when he saw 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Umar:[769]

Ah, you have no way of escape, 'Ubaydallāh, no place of refuge from Ibn Arwā[770] and no means of protecting yourself.
You spilled blood indeed, completely unlawfully—and killing al-Hurmuzān is a dangerous matter—
For no other reason than that someone said,
"Do you suspect al-Hurmuzān of [killing] 'Umar?"
When so many things were happening, a fool replied,
"Yes, do suspect him, since he suggested [it] and gave the command.
The slave's weapon[771] was inside the (Hurmuzān's) house, he turning it over [in his hand]. One thing [must] be reckoned in relation to another."

'Ubaydallāh. b. 'Umar complained to 'Uthmān of Ziyād b. Labīd and his poem, so 'Uthmān called in Ziyād b. Labīd and forbade him [from reciting it]. Ziyād recited the following, speaking of 'Uthmān:[772]

Abū 'Amr, 'Ubaydallāh is a hostage—have no doubt—for the killing of al-Hurmuzān.
For if you forgive him the offense, [this will be wrong],

769. The meter is ṭawīl. Ziyād b. Labīd al-Bayāḍī is unidentified. For the poem, see Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, III, 37.

770. That is, 'Uthmān b. 'Affān, whose mother was Arwā bt. Kurayz.

771. That is, the double-bladed dagger used by Abū Lu'lu'ah to kill 'Umar.

772. The meter is wāfir. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, III, 37.

when the circumstances of the crime are [at least] equally balanced.[773]

Will you forgive ['Ubaydallāh], when you have no right to do so?[774]

[As yet] you have no authority to do what you say.[775]

So 'Uthman summoned Ziyād b. Labīd, forbade him [to recite this], and sent him away. [2797]

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd[776]—Sa'īd b. al-Musayyab: On the morning when 'Umar was stabbed 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Bakr said, "Last evening I passed by Abū Lu'lu'ah, as he was meeting in secret with Jufaynah and al-Hurmuzān. When I came upon them, they sprang up and a dagger with two baldes and its handle in the middle fell out into their midst. Consider [the instrument] with which ['Umar] was killed!" [Abū Lu'lu'ah] had already slipped through the crowd attending the mosque. A Tamīmī[777] went off in search of him and returned to them, having kept after Abū Lu'lu'ah as he left 'Umar, taken him, and killed him. [The Tamīmī] brought the dagger that 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Bakr had described. 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Umar heard about this, but held back until 'Umar died. Then he wrapped his garments round his sword, came to al-Hurmuzān, and killed him. When the sword was wounding him, he called out, "There is no god but God." Then ['Ubaydallāh b. 'Umar] passed on to Jufaynah, a Christian from al-Ḥīrah, foster son of Sa'd b. Mālik[778] and whom he had brought to Medina as a result of the peace between himself and [the inhabitants] and to teach him writing. As he held the sword over him, ['Ubaydallah] [struck Jufaynah with it], making the 773. The second hemistich reads "wa-asbābu al-khaṭā farasā rihāni"; literally, "two horses racing [neck and neck]". That is, it is a question of timing: was 'Uthman in authority when the crime was perpetrated or not?

774. The first hemistich reads a-ta'fū idh 'afawta bi-ghayri ḥaqqin.

775. With some hesitation I follow the Glossarium, CXCIX. The Arabic reads fa-mā la-ka bi-lladhī taḥkī yadāni.

776. Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd b. Mikhnaf, father of Abū Mikhnaf.

777. Tamīm b. Murr, a huge confederation of northern tribal groups inhabiting the general area of Najd, al-Yamāmah and Bahrain. See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 207, 466–67; Kaḥḥālah, Mu'jam, I, 126–33.

778. That is, Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ.

sign of the cross between his eyes. Ṣuhayb heard of this and sent 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ to ('Ubaydallāh). He kept at him, saying "[Give me] the sword, by my mother and father!" until he handed it over to him. Sa'd sprang upon him, took him by the hair and they all came to Ṣuhayb.

[2798] 'Umar's Governors in the Garrison Towns

'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb's governor of Mecca in the year in which he was killed, that is, 23 [November 19, 643–November 7, 644], was Nāfi' b. 'Abd al-Ḥārith al-Khuzā'ī;[779] of al-Ṭā'if, Sufyān b. 'Abdallāh al-Thaqafī;[780] of Ṣan'ā', Ya'lā b. Munyah, confederate of Banū Nawfal b. 'Abd Manāf;[781] of al-Janad,[782] 'Abdallāh b. Abī Rabī'ah; of al-Kūfah, al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah; of al-Baṣrah, Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī; of Egypt, 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ; of Ḥimṣ, 'Umayr b. Sa'd; of Damascus, Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān; and of Bahrain and its neighboring area, 'Uthmān b. Abī al-'Āṣ al-Thaqafī.

According to al-Wāqidī, Qatādah b. al-Nu'man al-Ẓafārī[783] died in 23 and 'Umar prayed over him.

In (this year) Mu'āwiyah launched a summer offensive and reached Amorium,[784] accompanied by some of the Companions of the Messenger of God; viz., 'Ubādah b. al-Ṣāmit,[785] Abū 779. I have no further information on Nāfi' b. 'Abd al-Ḥārith al-Khuzā'ī. For the following list, see Ya'qūbī, Tārīkh, II, 161.

780. Sufyān b. 'Abdallāh al-Thaqafī has a brief entry in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 115–16, although no date of death is given.

781. Ya'lā was more commonly known as Ya'lā b. Umayyah; see note 205. Nawfal b. 'Abd Manāf was a tribal group (baṭn) of Quraysh. See Zubayrī, Nasab Quraysh, 197–205; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 115–17; Kaḥḥālah, Mu'jam, III, 1202–3.

782. Al-Janad is very close to, and at the present time a suburb of, the important town of Ta'izz in the southern highlands of the Yemen. It was of great importance in early and medieval times and the seat of one of the three governors in the Yemen, along with Ṣan'ā' and Ḥaḍramawt (not here mentioned). See Hamdānī, Ṣifah, 44, 54–55 and passim; Kay, Yaman, end map.

783. Qatādah b. al-Nu'mān al-Ẓafarī fought at Badr, a fact mentioned in the biographies; e.g., Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 357–58.

784. Byzantine Amorion, Arabic 'Ammūriyyah, in the heart of Asia Minor, only approximately 170 miles southeast of Constantinople. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 158; Runciman, Crusades, I, Map 176.

785. 'Ubādah b. al-Ṣāmit died in 34/654 or later. He had been present at the battle of Badr. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 111ff.

Ayyūb Khālid b. Zayd,[786] Abū Dharr,[787] and Shaddād b. Aws.[788]

In (this year) Mu'āwiyah conquered Ascalon[789] by making peace [with its inhabitants.]

It was reported that Shurayḥ was judge of al-Kūfah in the year in which 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb died; judge of al-Baṣrah was Ka'b b. Sūr.[790] According to Muṣ'ab b. 'Abdallāh—Mālik b. Anas[791] —Ibn Shihāb: Abū Bakr and 'Umar had no judge.

---

786. Abū Ayyūb Khālid b. Zayd died in 50/670 or 55/675. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 90–91.

787. Abū Dharr al-Ghifārī died ca. 32/653. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XII, 90ff.; *EI*², s.v. [Robson]; Cameron, Abū Dharr, passim.

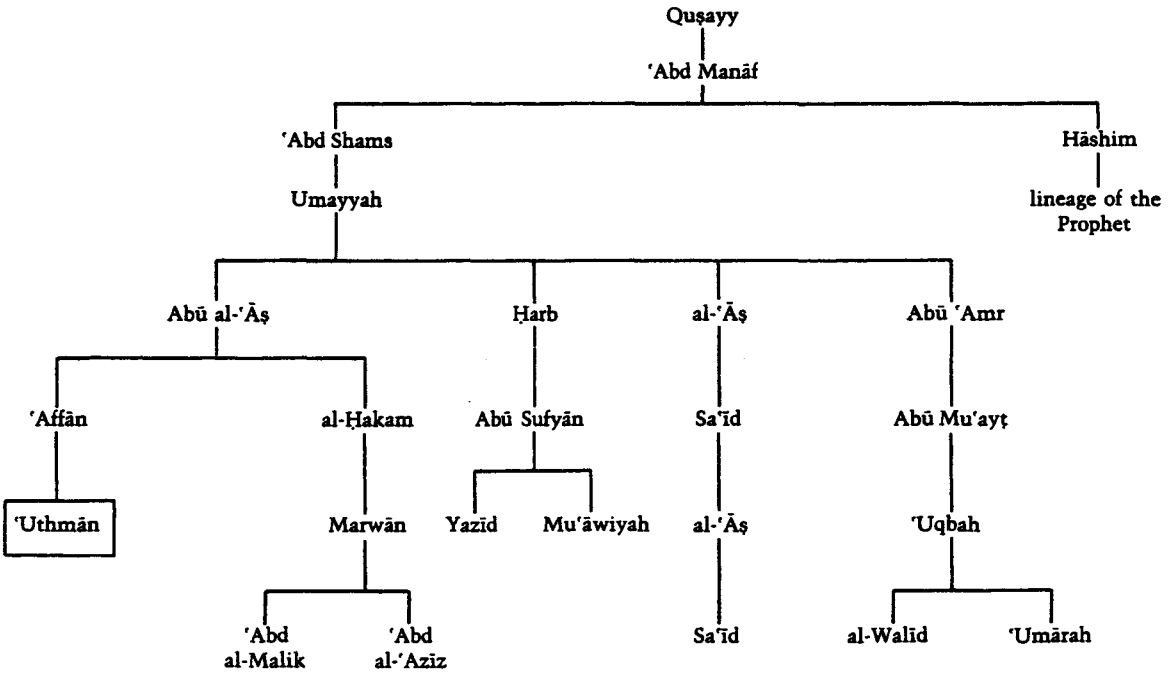
788. Shaddād b. Aws died ca. 64/683. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 315.

789. 'Asqalān on the Mediterranean coast north of Gaza. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 122; Le Strange, Palestine, 400–3 and map opposite 14.

790. For Ka'b b. Sūr al-Azdī, see Wakī', Akhbār, I, 274ff.

791. Mālik b. Anas was the author of the famous Muwaṭṭa' and died in 179/796. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 5–9; Sezgin, GAS, I, 457–64.

The History of al-Ṭabarī



VOLUME XV

The Crisis of the Early Caliphate

TRANSLATED BY R. STEPHEN HUMPHREYS

Table 1. 'Uthmān's Lineage

The Events of the Year [2799]

24

(November 7, 644–October 27, 645)

In (this year) the oath of allegiance was rendered to ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān as Caliph. There is disagreement as to when the oath was rendered to him. Some authorities (baʿḍuhum) follow the account related to me by al-Ḥārith—Ibn Saʿd—Muḥammad b. ʿUmar (al-Wāqidī)—Abū Bakr b. Ismāʿīl b. Muḥammad b. Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ—ʿUthmān b. Muḥammad al-Akhnasī. He (Ibn Saʿd) says: according to Muḥammad b. ʿUmar—Abū Bakr b. ʿAbdallah b. Abī Sabrah—Yaʿqūb b. Zayd—his father: The oath of allegiance was rendered to ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān on Monday, the next to last day of Dhū al-Ḥijjah of the year 23 (November 5, 644).[1] He accepted the Caliphate in al-Muḥarram of the year 24 (November 7–December 6, 644).

1. This implies that al-Muḥarram would begin on Tuesday at sunset. There is a discrepancy between the day of the week and the date of the month here. According to Caetani's tables (Annali, VII, 2), Muḥarram 1, 24 should have fallen on Sunday (= November 7); hence the oath of allegiance to ʿUthmān would have taken place on Friday rather than Monday. In this case, I have followed the Julian-Hijri equivalents for the day of the month, disregarding the day of the week. However confused these dates may seem, Ṭabarī appears to have transcribed his

Others follow the account related to me by Aḥmad b. Thābit al-Rāzī—someone who mentioned it[2]—Isḥāq b. ʿĪsā—Abū Maʿshar: The oath of allegiance was rendered to ʿUthmān in the Year of Nosebleeds, the year 24. It is said [by certain authorities]: This year was called the Year of Nosebleeds only because nosebleeds were a common occurrence among the people during this time.[3]

Others follow the account transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Khulayd b. Dhafarah and Mujālid: ʿUthmān was named Caliph on al-Muḥarram 3 of the year 24 (November 9, 644); then he went out and led the people in the afternoon prayer. He increased [their stipends] and permitted delegations to be sent [to him from the provinces];[4] this was established as a precedent.

---

source (al-Wāqidī) accurately, for Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 23, who also follows al-Wāqidī, gives the same ones. The dates of ʿUthmān's election and assumption of office are subjects of considerable confusion, as will become evident below; on this issue see Caetani, Annali, VII, 7–8.

2. ʿamman dhakarahu. The phrase could also be rendered, "on the authority of someone whom he has mentioned." But cf. the isnād of Aḥmad b. Thābit below, p. 25. Dhakara normally indicates a written, not an oral, source: "he mentioned in a book."

3. I have consistently rendered al-nās as "the people" in this translation. Unfortunately there are other terms (e.g., qawm, ahl) that appear to be near-synonyms and which for the sake of English idiom sometimes must be translated as "people," though I have tried to find other equivalents wherever possible. In this section of Ṭabarī, al-nās is consistently used to refer collectively to the Muslims, either as a whole or (more commonly) to those involved in a particular incident. The term has strongly positive connotations; normally it is applied to a group that is morally upright and devoted to the ideals of the Community. Qawm in contrast is usually negative in tone, implying a group acting in opposition to Islam or (if made up of Muslims) subverting the unity and integrity of the Community. Qawm is commonly used in the Qurʾān and elsewhere to mean "a people, nation," and its root meaning is "the fighting men of a tribe." In this section of Ṭabarī, however, qawm almost always refers to a small, voluntary association. I have normally translated it as "group" or "band." Ahl is a morally neutral term that refers simply to the populace of a certain locality or to the partisans of a given religio-political tendency. Hence, an expression like ahl al-Baṣrah can appropriately be translated as "the Baṣrans," though occasionally "the inhabitants/people of Baṣrah" seems better.

4. Presumably in order to swear the oath of allegiance to him on behalf of the officials and troops of the frontiers, and to receive accession donatives from the new Caliph. This and the succeeding text repeat (with identical isnāds) reports already cited in connection with the account of ʿUmar's death above: I, 2727, 2728. The latter reads "wa-waffada ahla al-amṣāri wa-ṣaniʿa fihim"—"He permitted the inhabitants of the garrison towns to send delegations, and treated them generously."

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Amr—al-Sha'bī: The men of the shūrā[5] agreed on 'Uthmān on al-Muḥarram 3 (November 9). It was now midafternoon, and the muezzin of Ṣuhayb[6] had called the prayer. They reached agreement between the call to prayer and its actual inception. Then ('Uthmān) went out and led the people in prayer. He increased (the stipends of) the people by 100 (dirhams) and permitted the inhabitants of the garrison towns (ahl al-amṣār) to send delegations; he was the first to do these things. [2800]

Others follow the account of Ibn Sa'd—al-Wāqidī—Ibn Jurayj—Ibn Abī Mulaykah: The oath of allegiance was rendered to 'Uthmān on al-Muḥarram 10, three nights after the murder of 'Umar.

The Sermon of 'Uthmān and the Slaying of al-Hurmuzān by 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Umar

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Badr b. 'Uthmān—his paternal uncle: When the men of the shūrā had rendered the oath of allegiance to 'Uthmān, he went out more distressed than any of them. He came to the pulpit of the Messenger of God and preached to the people, praising and extolling God and asking His blessing upon the Prophet. He said: "Verily you are in a transitory abode and in the flower of life, so set forth until the time appointed for your death and aim for the best which you can attain, for you may be met (by your end) morning or evening. Surely this world harbors deceit, 'so let not the present life delude you,' and 'let not the deceitful one delude you

5. The shūrā was the electoral council of six men ('Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf, Ṭalḥah, Zubayr, Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ—who was not actually present—'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib, and 'Uthmān b. 'Affān) named by 'Umar on his deathbed in order to choose his successor from among their own number. The shūrā's deliberations and choice of the aged 'Uthmān were matters of intense controversy. See Vol. 14 of the present translation (text, I, 2776–2797).

6. Ṣuhayb al-Rūmī was a freedman, presumably of Greek Christian origin, whom the stricken 'Umar had appointed to lead the prayers while the shūrā met in camera to determine his successor. The text reads "mu'adhdhin Ṣuhayb," so it is clear that Ṣuhayb himself was not the muezzin.

concerning God.'[7] Consider those who have gone before you, then be in earnest and do not be neglectful, for you will surely not be overlooked. Where are the sons and brothers of this world who tilled it, dwelt in it, and were long granted enjoyment therein? Did it not spit them out? Cast aside this world as God has cast it aside and seek the hereafter, for verily God has coined a parable [2801] for it and for that which is better. The Almighty has said: 'And strike for them the similitude of the present life: it is as water that We send down out of heaven, [and the plants of the earth mingle with it; and in the morning it is straw the winds scatter; and God is omnipotent over everything. Wealth and sons are the adornment of the present world; but the abiding things, the deeds of righteousness, are better with God in reward, and better in] hope.' "[8] Then the people came forward to render the oath of allegiance to him.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Abū Manṣūr: I heard al-Qumādhbān speaking about the murder of his father. He said: The Persians (al-'Ajam) in Medina were taking their ease with one another when Fayrūz[9] passed by my father with a two-bladed dagger. (My father) took it from him and said, "What are you doing with this around here?" Fayrūz said, "I like having it."[10] Now a man saw him, and when 'Umar was struck down, he said, "I saw this (dagger) with al-Hurmuzān; he gave it to Fayrūz." Then 'Ubaydallāh came up and killed (al-Hurmuzān). When 'Uthmān took office, he summoned me and put ('Ubaydallāh) in my hands. Then he said, "My son, this man is the murderer of your father; it is your duty rather than ours to take vengeance upon him, so go and kill him." I went out with him, and there was no one in the land who did not support me and demand that [I take action] against him. I said to them, "Is it up to me to kill ('Ubaydallāh)?" They answered, "Yes." And they reviled 'Ubaydallāh. Then I said, "Is it your place to protect him?"

---

7. Qur'ān 31:33; 35:5.

8. Qur'ān 18:42–44. The words in brackets are supplied to complete the passage, cited here (as is usual in medieval Arabic texts) in abridged form.

9. Fayrūz Abū Lu'lu'ah, the murderer of 'Umar.

10. Reading "ānasū bihi" in accordance with Ibrāhīm's text and the mss (Oxford Marsh 394, Köprülü 1043), rather than "abussu bihi," a conjectural restoration by the editor (E. Prym) of the Leiden text.

They answered, "No," and they reviled him. Then I left ['Ubaydallāh] to God's hands and theirs, and they bore me away. By God, I only reached my home carried upon the heads and hands of these men.[11]

The Governorship of Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ in Kūfah

In this year, 'Uthmān removed al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah from Kūfah and appointed Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ as governor there, according to the account transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Mujālid—al-Sha'bī. He says: 'Umar had said, [2802] "I enjoin the Caliph after me to name Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ as governor, for I did not remove him on account of any evil action, and I fear that something of that kind may be attributed to him." The first governor ('āmil) whom 'Uthmān appointed was Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ in Kūfah. He removed al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah from office, al-Mughīrah being in Medina at that time. Sa'd acted as governor in (Kūfah) for one year and part of another. ('Uthmān) retained Abū Mūsā (al-Ash'arī) in office for a number of years.[12]

According to al-Wāqidī—Usāmah b. Zayd b. Aslam—his father: 'Umar enjoined that his governors ('ummāl) should be maintained in office for a year. When 'Uthmān came to power, he kept al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah in Kūfah for a year and then removed him, naming Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ as his governor [there]. Then he removed him and appointed al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah. If al-Wāqidī is correct about that, then Sa'd's governorship in Kūfah on behalf of 'Uthmān fell in the year 25.

*The Letters of 'Uthmān to His Officials ('ummāl) and Governors (wulāt) and to the Common People (al-'āmmah)*

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah—their usual chain of authorities (bi-

11. Other versions of this story portray 'Ubaydallāh and 'Uthmān in a far more hostile light: see Vol. 14 of the present translation (I, 2795–2797); Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 188; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil (Beirut), III, 75–76.

12. As governor of Baṣrah; see below, p. 34.

isnādihimā]: When 'Uthmān took office, he dispatched 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir to Kābul—that is, the province of Sijistān. He stayed in Kābul until he had captured all of it. Now the province of Sijistān was larger than Khurāsān until Mu'āwiyah died; then the inhabitants of Kābul resisted stubbornly.

According to some authorities (qālū), the first letter which 'Uthmān wrote to his officials was [as follows]: "To proceed: God has commanded the imāms to be shepherds; He did not direct them to be tax collectors. Indeed at the inception of this Community they were made shepherds and not tax collectors. But your imāms are surely on the verge of becoming tax collectors rather [2803] than shepherds. If they turn out thus, then modesty of manners, integrity, and good faith will be at an end. Verily, the most just conduct is for you to examine the affairs and obligations of the Muslims, so that you may give them what is properly theirs and take from them what they owe. Do likewise as regards the Pact of Protection;[13] give to them what is theirs and take from them what they owe. As to the enemy whom you encounter, faithfully seek God's aid against them."

According to some authorities, the first letter that he wrote to the commanders of the armies in the frontier passes was [as follows]: "To proceed: Verily you are the guardians and protectors of the Muslims, and 'Umar laid down for you [instructions] that were not hidden from us; on the contrary, they were in accordance with our counsel. Let me hear of no change or alteration on the part of any one of you, lest God change your situation and replace you with others. So examine your conduct, for I shall examine what God has required me to examine and watch over."

According to some authorities, the first letter that he wrote to the tax officials ('ummāl al-kharāj) was [as follows]: "To proceed: Verily God created mankind in truth, and he accepts naught but the truth. Take what is right and give for it what is right. Strive for integrity! Uphold it and be not the first to violate it, so that you may share what you have acquired with those who come after you. Keep faith, keep faith! Do not wrong the orphan nor one with whom you have made a pact, for God is the opponent of him who wrongs them."

13. al-dhimmah. The treaty made with non-Muslims at the time of the Conquest, guaranteeing them security of life and property and limited freedom of worship in return for submission to Muslim rule. Some of the vast literature on this complex subject is surveyed in the translator's Islamic History: A Framework for Inquiry (Minneapolis: 1988), 233–39. A recent general reference is C. E. Bosworth, "The Concept of Dhimma in Early Islam," in B. Braude and B. Lewis, eds., Christians and Jews in the Ottoman Empire (2 vols., New York: 1982), I, 37–51.

According to some authorities, his letter to the common people was [as follows]: "To proceed: You have attained so much only by strict adherence to sound models [of conduct]. Let not this world turn you away from your proper concerns (amrikum), for this Community will become involved in innovation after three things occur together among you: complete prosperity, the attainment of adulthood by the children of captive women, and the recitation of the Qur'ān by both Arabs and non-Arabs (al-a'ājim). [2804] The Messenger of God has said, 'Unbelief stems from speaking Arabic badly; if something seems foreign to them, they will do it awkwardly and [thereby] bring about innovation.'"

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Āṣim b. Sulaymān—'Āmir al-Sha'bī: 'Uthmān was the first Caliph to increase the stipends paid to the people by a hundred [dirhams]; this became the usual practice. 'Umar used to pay to every living person among the authorized recipients of stipends (ahl al-fay')[14] one dirham per day during Ramaḍān, and stipulated for the wives of the Messenger of God two dirhams each. He was told, "You should have prepared food for them and brought them to one place to get it." He replied, "Feed the people in their homes." 'Uthmān confirmed what 'Umar had done, but increased [the amount]. He established the [grants of] food for Ramaḍān, saying, "[This is] for the devout worshiper who lingers in the mosque, for the wayfarer, and for the destitute among the people during Ramaḍān."

In this year—that is, the year 24—al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah raided

14. Ahl al-fay', literally "the people of booty." In the context of the Conquest years, it means those Muslims who were entitled to a regular stipend from the public treasury, whose revenues came from taxes and tribute levied against the "immovable booty" (fay') constituted by the conquered territories and their inhabitants. These stipends were paid to Muslims who had joined the new religion in the time of Muḥammad and to the Arab soldiers who had accepted Islam and participated in the wars of conquest. See F. Løkkegaard, "Fay'," *EI*², II, 869–70.

Ādharbayjān and Armenia, because their inhabitants had repudiated the terms to which they had agreed with the Muslims during 'Umar's reign. [That is] according to the account of Abū Mikhnaf, but other authorities relate that this took place in the year 26.

[2805]

The Campaign of [al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah in Ādharbayjān and Armenia]

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad—Abū Mikhnaf—Farwah b. Laqīṭ, of the clan of Ghāmid in the tribe of Azd:[15] The campaigns of the Kūfans took place in Rayy and Ādharbayjān; in the two frontier zones there were 10,000 Kūfan warriors, 6,000 in Ādharbayjān and 4,000 at Rayy. In Kūfah itself, there were at that time 40,000 warriors, and every year 10,000 of them would go on campaign to these two frontier zones, so that a man would be subject to one campaign every four years. During his governorship in Kūfah during the reign (sulṭān) of 'Uthmān, al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah campaigned in Ādharbayjān and Armenia. [Al-Walīd] summoned Salmān b. Rabī'ah al-Bāhilī, sending him ahead as his vanguard, while al-Walīd set out with the body of the people, with the intention of devoting every effort to [the conquest of] the land of Armenia. He proceeded with the people until he entered Ādharbayjān. He sent 'Abdallāh b. Shubayl b. 'Awf al-Aḥmasī with 4,000 [troops], and he attacked the inhabitants of Mūqān, al-Babar, and al-Ṭaylasān. He seized some of their wealth and cattle, but these people (qawm) were on guard, and he took only a few captives from among them before turning back to meet al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah.

[2806] Then al-Walīd made peace with the inhabitants of Ādharbayjān, in return for [a tribute] of 800,000 dirhams, these being the terms which Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān had negotiated in the year 22, one year after the battle of Nihāwand.[16] With the death of 'Umar, they had stopped payment. When 'Uthmān took office and

15. Text: al-Azdī thumma 'l-Ghāmidī. See Wright, Arabic Grammar, I, 293C.

16. The battle of Nihāwand (21/642) was the Arab victory in the mountain passes leading from Iraq to Hamadhān over Sasanian forces commanded by the king Yazdagird III. This victory opened the Iranian plateau to Arab attack, and brought an end to centrally controlled Iranian resistance to the Arab invaders. It was not the end of the fighting in Iran, which stretched on for more than a decade al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah became governor of Kufah, (the latter) campaigned until he had trampled them underfoot with (his) army. When they saw that, they submitted to him, beseeching him to maintain for them [the terms of the original] treaty. He did so, taking from them the sums due. He also dispatched a series of expeditions against the enemies of the Muslims roundabout (those who had just submitted). When 'Abdallāh b. Shubayl al-Aḥmasī returned unharmed and bearing plunder from his raid, (al-Walīd) dispatched, in the year 24, Salmān b. Rabī'ah al-Bāhilī against Armenia with 12,000 (troops). He went into the land of Armenia killing and taking prisoners and booty. Then, his hands laden [with plunder], he left and returned to al-Walīd. Al-Walīd now departed, having triumphantly achieved his aims.

The Gathering of Byzantine Forces against the Muslims and the Muslims' Call for Aid from the Kūfans

In this year, according to Abū Mikhnaf, the Byzantines mobilized their forces to such a level that the Muslim armies in Syria sought reinforcements from 'Uthmān.

The Account of That Event

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—Farwah b. Laqīṭ al-Azdī: When—during the year 24 according to (Abū Mikhnaf's) chronology—al-Walīd achieved his aims in Armenia in the campaign discussed above, and then entered Mosul, making camp at al- [2807] Ḥadīthah, he received a letter from 'Uthmān, [as follows]: "To proceed: Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān[17] has written to inform me that the Byzantines have mobilized vast forces against the Mus-and was often very bitter, but this was henceforth a matter of local sieges, regional campaigns, guerilla resistance, and the like.

---

17. At this time governor of Syria, having succeeded his elder brother Yazīd in 639 when the latter had perished during an outbreak of the plague. Mu'āwiyah was the son of the Prophet's most obdurate opponent and had accepted Islam only with the occupation of Mecca in 8/630. In spite of this taint, however, his great talents were recognized by Muḥammad himself and—somewhat reluctantly—by the Caliph 'Umar.

lims; therefore, I have thought it fit that their Kūfan brothers should assist them. When my letter reaches you, send to them, [directly] from the place where my emissary shall find you, a man whose courage, steadfastness, valor, and [devotion to] Islam satisfies you, along with eight or nine or ten thousand (troops). Peace!"

Then al-Walīd stood up amidst the people. He praised and extolled God, then he said: "To proceed: O People, God has in this manner conferred a great blessing upon the Muslims. He has restored to them lands of theirs that had reverted to unbelief and has opened up lands that had not been conquered [before], sending them back safe and sound and fully compensated [for their struggles]. Praise be to God, Lord of the Worlds! The Commander of the Faithful has written, commanding me to dispatch between eight and ten thousand of you to reinforce your brothers in Syria, for the Byzantines have gathered their forces against them. In that there will be a mighty recompense and manifest bounty.[18] Go forward then—may God be merciful to you—with Salmān b. Rabīʿah al-Bāhilī."

(Abū Mikhnaf) says: So the people pressed forward, and a third [2808] day had not elapsed before 8,000 men from among the Kūfans departed, marching until they entered Byzantine territory together with the Syrians. Commanding the Syrian army was Ḥabīb b. Maslamah b. Khālid al-Fihrī, while the Kūfan army was under Salmān b. Rabīʿah al-Bāhilī. They launched attacks against the Byzantine territory; the people seized as many captives as they desired, filled their hands with plunder, and captured numerous fortresses there.

Al-Wāqidī claims that Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣ was the one who sent Salmān b. Rabīʿah to the aid of Ḥabīb b. Maslamah. He says: the reason is that ʿUthmān had written to Muʿāwiyah, ordering him to send Ḥabīb b. Maslamah with the Syrians to attack Armenia, and he did so. Then Ḥabīb learned that al-Mawriyān al-Rūmī had set out to meet him with 80,000 Byzantines and Turks.[19] Ḥabīb 18. Qur'ānic allusions to the rewards (both now and hereafter) given by God to those who serve Him faithfully. Cf. Qur'ān 27:16.

19. Al-Mawriyān al-Rūmī: probably the strategos Maurianos or Mavrianos, a Byzantine general in Armenia. Other sources (Sebeos, Theophanes, and Balādhurī's Futūḥ al-Buldān) state that he was defeated (and perhaps killed) by Ḥabīb b. Maslamah at the Armenian city of Dvin in 653–655—that is, about a decade later wrote to Mu'āwiyah about this, and Mu'āwiyah [in turn] wrote to 'Uthmān. Thus, 'Uthmān wrote to Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ, ordering him to support Ḥabīb b. Maslamah. [Sa'īd] then sent Salmān b. Rabī'ah with 6,000 [troops] to aid him. Ḥabīb was a master of military ruses, and he decided on a night attack against al-Mawriyān. His wife—[known as] Umm 'Abdallāh bt. Yazīd al-Kalbiyyah—heard him mentioning this, and she said to him, "Where is your rendezvous?" He answered, "At the pavilion of al-Mawriyān or in Paradise." Then he attacked them by night, killing whoever came within his sight. He reached [al-Mawriyān's] pavilion and discovered that his wife had preceded him; she was the first woman among the Arabs to whom a pavilion was assigned [as her share of the booty]. Ḥabīb died and she survived him; al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays [2809] al-Fihrī took his place as her husband, and she was the mother of his child.

There is disagreement as to who led the pilgrimage in this year. According to some authorities, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf led the pilgrimage this year by order of 'Uthmān; Abū Ma'shar and al-Wāqidī follow this opinion. According to others, however, 'Uthmān b. 'Affān made the pilgrimage this year.

As regards disagreement concerning those conquests, which some people ascribe to the time of 'Umar and others to the reign of 'Uthmān, I have previously mentioned in this book such differences of opinion under the date of each conquest at issue.

---

than Abū Mikhnaf's dating. See Andreas N. Stratos, Byzantium in the Seventh Century [Amsterdam: 1975], III, 30, 269. I am indebted to my colleague John M. Barker for these references. Here and elsewhere, "Byzantine" translates Rūm/Rūmī—that is, "Roman," which is of course what the Byzantines called themselves—in Greek, Rhomaioi.

The Events of the Year 25

(October 28, 645–October 16, 646)

According to the account related to me by Aḥmād b. Thābit al-Rāzī—a traditionist (muḥaddith)—Isḥāq b. ʿĪsā—Abū Maʿshar: The conquest of Alexandria took place in the year 25.

According to al-Wāqidī: In this year, Alexandria repudiated its pact, and ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ launched a bloody attack on them.[20] We [that is, al-Ṭabarī] have previously cited the report (of this event), mentioning also those who disagree with Abū Maʿshar and al-Wāqidī concerning the date.

[2810] Also according to al-Wāqidī: In this year, ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿd b. Abī Sarḥ sent cavalry forces against the Maghrib. (Al-Wāqidī) says: ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ had previously sent an expedition to the Maghrib. They seized booty, and ʿAbdallāh sought and received permission from (ʿAmr) to raid Ifrīqiyah.[21]

---

20. fa-ghazāhum ʿAmru b. al-ʿĀṣ wa-qatalahum. Literally, "ʿAmr attacked and killed them."

21. Ifrīqiyah: the Roman-Byzantine province of Africa Proconsularis, essentially the northern half of modern Tunisia.

According to [al-Wāqidī]: 'Uthmān led the pilgrimage in this year, appointing a deputy for Medina [during his absence].

Also according to him: In [this year] the fortresses [in Byzantine territory] were conquered, the commander being Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān.

Also according to him: In [this year] was born Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah.[22]

Also according to him: In [this year] the first [attack on] Sābūr took place.[23]

---

22. The future Caliph (regn. 680–683), especially notorious as the tyrant responsible for the martyrdom of al-Ḥusayn at Karbalā' in 61/680. His troops were also accused of sacking Medina in 64/683 and of burning the Ka'bah during the siege of Mecca (broken off at his death) later the same year. On his reign, see Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 145–68.

23. kānat Sābūru'l-ūlā. Following the emendation in Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil (Beirut), III, 86, I have supplied the word ghazwah between kānat and Sābūr.

The Events of the Year 26

(October 17, 646–October 6, 647)

According to Abū Ma'shar and al-Wāqidī, the conquest of Sābūr took place during (this year). (This event) has previously been reported, in accordance with the account of authorities who contradict them on that (point).

Al-Wāqidī says: In (this year), 'Uthmān ordered the stones marking the limits of the sacred territory [around Mecca] to be [2811] restored.[24]

He also says: In (this year), 'Uthmān added to and enlarged the Sacred Mosque.[25] He purchased [property] from one group of people, while others refused [to sell]. He then demolished [their

24. amara 'Uthmānu bi-tajdīdi anṣābi al-ḥarami. The whole of Mecca, and not merely the Ka'bah itself, was regarded as a ḥaram, an inviolable sanctuary under the protection of Allāh. Presumably 'Uthmān took this action because the precise boundaries of the sacred area were no longer clearly marked or were in dispute. Such delimited sacred territories were very common in ancient Arabia; any area generally recognized as protected by some deity was so regarded. In modern South Arabia, similar sanctuaries still existed down to the 1960s at least, under the name of ḥawṭah. See R. B. Serjeant, "Haram and Hawtah, the Sacred Enclave in Arabia," in Mélanges Taha Husain, ed. A. R. Badawi (Cairo: 1962), 41–58.

25. al-masjid al-ḥarām. This is the Ka'bah and the enclosed courtyard around it.

houses] in spite of them and put the prices [which he would have paid them] in the public treasury. When they shouted protests at 'Uthmān, he had them jailed, saying, "Do you know what has emboldened you against me? Only my forbearance! 'Umar did the same thing to you, and you did not scream protests at him." Then 'Abdallāh b. Khālid b. Asīd spoke with him on their behalf, and they were released.

(Al-Wāqidī) also says: 'Uthmān b. 'Affān led the pilgrimage in this year.

According to al-Wāqidī: In this year, 'Uthmān removed Sa'd (b. Abī Waqqāṣ) from the governorship of Kūfah and appointed al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah.

According to Sayf: He removed him from (Kūfah) in the year 25 and made al-Walīd governor there. (Sayf) asserts that ('Uthmān) had removed al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah from Kūfah when 'Umar died, sending Sa'd there as governor ('āmil). He then governed in (Kūfah) on ('Uthmān's) behalf for a year and some months.

The Reason Why 'Uthmān Removed Sa'd from Kūfah and Named al-Walīd His Governor There

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Amr—al-Sha'bī: The first satanically inspired event among the inhabitants of Kūfah—which was the first garrison town in Islam where Satan instigated evil among (its people)—happened (in this way). Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ sought a loan from the public treasury from 'Abdallāh b. Mas'ūd,[26] and he issued it to him. But when (Ibn Mas'ūd) demanded repayment, (Sa'd) was unable to do so. Words arose between the two of them, to the point that 'Abdallāh sought 26. 'Abdallāh b. Mas'ūd was one of the earliest Companions of the Prophet and was regarded as one of the principal students and transmitters of the text of the Qur'ān. His personal origins are not entirely clear; he seems to have been a member (or perhaps only a protégé) of the Hudhayl tribe, but to have resided in Mecca as a client of one of the Quraysh clans. Though esteemed for his piety and learning, and present at such crucial battles as Badr (2/624), Uḥud (3/625), and Yarmūk (15/636), he was never assigned a major military or administrative office. He settled in Kūfah soon after its founding, and was made intendant of the public treasury there. With him are associated a number of persons who were prominent in the early pietist, pro-'Alid movement in Kūfah. See J. C. Vadet, "Ibn Mas'ūd," *EI*², III, 873–75.

help from one part (unās) of the people in getting the money repaid, while Sa'd asked the assistance of another part in gaining a [2812] deferral. Thus, (the people) split up into wrangling factions, with one group blaming Sa'd and the other 'Abdallāh.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Ismā'īl b. Abī Khālid—Qays b. Abī Ḥāzim: I was sitting in Sa'd's residence with his brother's son Hāshim b. 'Utbah, when Ibn Mas'ūd came to Sa'd and said, "Hand over the money that you owe!" Sa'd replied, "I think you are just heading for trouble. Are you anyone but the son of Mas'ūd, a slave from the [tribe of] Hudhayl?"[27] Ibn Mas'ūd said, "Indeed so. I am the son of Mas'ūd, by God, while you are the son of Ḥumaynah." Hāshim said, "Yes indeed, and you are both Companions of the Messenger of God, and closely watched [by everyone]." Then Sa'd—a man with a violent temper—threw down a rod that he was holding, raised his hands, and said, "O God, Lord of the heavens and the earth!" 'Abdallāh responded, "Woe to you! Speak with a blessing and do not curse." With that Sa'd said, "No, by God! But for the fear of God, I would call down on you a curse (da'wah) that would not miss you." 'Abdallāh hastily turned around and left.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Qāsim b. Walīd—al-Musayyab b. 'Abd Khayr[28]—'Abdallāh b. 'Ukaym:[29] When the argument broke out between Ibn Mas'ūd and Sa'd concerning the loan that 'Abdallāh had extended to him and that Sa'd was unable to repay, 'Uthmān was angry at both of them. He snatched (Kūfah) away from Sa'd and fired him. He was angry at 'Abdallāh but retained him in office. He then appointed as governor al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah, who had been 'Umar's agent ('āmil) in charge of the Rabī'ah tribe in the Jazīrah. (Al-Walīd) arrived in Kūfah and did not mount a door on his residence down to the time when he departed from the city.

27. The Hudhayl tribe resided in the hills between Mecca and al-Ṭā'if, and was closely linked genealogically to the Quraysh. They joined Quraysh in opposing Muḥammad, and were only brought over to Islam at the conquest of Mecca in 630. See G. Rentz, "Hudhayl," *EI*², III, 540–41. I take "Ibn Mas'ūd" here not as a name, but literally, "the son of Mas'ūd." There seems no indication that 'Abdallāh b. Mas'ūd himself was ever a slave, but if he was the son of a man who had been one, that would explain the allusions to his client status as regards both Hudhayl and Quraysh. A further bit of evidence for his father's status: "Mas'ūd" ("Fortunate") would have been a very uncommon name for a full member of a noble Arab tribe.

28. The printed text has Musayyab—'Abd Khayr, but de Goeje (Introductio, dcxxv) corrects this in accordance with Köprülü 1043.

29. Following the readings of de Goeje (Introductio, dcxxv) and Ibrāhīm, since the mss are uncertain on this name.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: When 'Uthmān learned of what had been going on between 'Abdallāh and Sa'd, he was angry and planned to take steps against both of them. Then he abandoned that [idea]. He recalled Sa'd and took [from him] what he owed, confirming 'Abdallāh [in his office] and forwarding [the sum due] to him. To replace Sa'd he named as governor (amīr) al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah, who had been 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb's agent in charge of the Arabs of the Jazīrah. Al-Walīd arrived in the second year of 'Uthmān's caliphate, Sa'd having been governor there for one year and part of another. Once in Kūfah, (al-Walīd) was the most beloved of men among the people and the most courteous in dealing with them. Matters continued thus for five years; there was no door on his residence. [2813]

The Events of the Year 27

(October 7, 647–September 24, 648)

According to the account related to me by Aḥmad b. Thābit al-Rāzī—a traditionist—Isḥāq b. ʿĪsā—Abū Maʿshar: Among these was the conquest of Ifrīqiyah by ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿd b. Abī Sarḥ. This is the account of al-Wāqidī as well.

The Conquest [of Ifrīqiyah] and the Reason for the Appointment of ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿd b. Abī Sarḥ as Governor of Egypt and ʿUthmān's Removal of ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ from (That Province)

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: At ʿUmar's death, ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ governed Egypt, while the judgeship there was held by Khārijah b. Ḥudhāfah al-Sahmī. When ʿUthmān took office, he retained both of them for [the first] two years of his caliphate. Then he removed [2814] ʿAmr from office and appointed ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿd b. Abī Sarḥ as governor.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Abū Ḥārithah and Abū ʿUthmān: When ʿUthmān took office, he confirmed 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ in his governorship, for he did not depose anyone save on the basis of a complaint [against him] or an [official's] desire to step down apart from any complaint. 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd belonged to the army (jund) of Egypt, and 'Uthmān put him in command of this army, reinforced him with [additional] men, and sent him off to Ifrīqiyah. With him he sent 'Abdallāh b. Nāfi' b. 'Abd al-Qays al-Fihrī and 'Abdallāh b. Nāfi' b. al-Ḥuṣayn al-Fihrī. To 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd he said: "If in the coming days God grants you victory in Ifrīqiyah, then from the spoils that God bestows on the Muslims, you will have as your personal share one-fifth out of the [Caliph's] fifth of the moveable booty."[30] He also assigned command over the [Egyptian] army to the two 'Abdallāh al-Fihrī's, reinforced them with [additional] men, and sent them against Spain. He ordered the two of them and 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd to combine forces against the Ajall.[31] Thereafter 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd would remain in his province [namely, Ifrīqiyah] while the other two would continue toward their own province [namely, Spain].

They set forth, traversing Egypt. When they penetrated into the territory of Ifrīqiyah, they were intent on getting to the Ajall, who was accompanied by troops of various origins. The Ajall was killed in battle by 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd, who conquered Ifrīqiyah, both the lowlands and mountains. Then [the inhabitants of Ifrīqiyah] agreed to accept Islam, and their submission [to the Caliphate] was sincere.

'Abdallāh divided up the booty that God had bestowed on them among the army, taking [for himself] one-fifth of the [Caliph's] fifth and sending the remaining four-fifths [of the Caliph's share]

30. The Qur'ān (8:42) had established that one-fifth of any battlefield spoils should go to the Prophet, to be used for the needs of himself and his family, as well as to assist orphans, the indigent, and travelers. (This was no innovation; the tribal chieftains of ancient Arabia followed a similar custom, though their traditional share was one-quarter). This privilege was retained of course by Muḥammad's successors.

31. The identity of this figure is obscure. Caetani, Annali, III, 196, identifies him merely as a Berber prince. His name in this text perhaps reflects some Byzantine title (al-ajall means "most noble," hence "nobilissimus"), but the military and administrative significance of this epithet is unclear. If Caetani is correct, the title might have been officially conferred on him as an ally or protégé of the Roman Empire, or it might have been self-bestowed.

back to 'Uthmān with Ibn Wathīmah al-Naṣrī. He established a [2815] camp on the site of [the future city of] Qayrawān, and dispatched a delegation [to 'Uthmān].

When [his delegates] complained about 'Abdallāh in regard to [the portion of the booty] that he had taken, ['Uthmān] said to them, "I assigned that to him as his personal share. Things used to be done in this way, and I ordered him [to proceed] thus. Now it is up to you: if you are content, he will be permitted [to retain the booty]; and if you are displeased, it will be given back." They replied, "We are indeed displeased," and ['Uthmān] said, "So, it will be given back." He wrote to 'Abdallāh to give back [the disputed booty] and to try to reconcile them. But they said, "Remove him from us, for we do not wish him to hold command over us when such a thing has happened." So 'Uthmān wrote to him [as follows]: "Appoint as your successor in Ifrīqiyah a man who satisfies both you and [the army], and divide up [among them], for God's sake, the fifth that I had granted you as your share, for they are displeased about the booty." 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd did [this] and returned to Egypt, having conquered Ifrīqiyah and killed the Ajall.

[The native allies and converts of Ifrīqiyah] remained among the most orderly and obedient of the provinces;[32] they were the most peace loving and loyal people (ummah), up to the time of Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik, when the Iraqis infiltrated among them. When the Iraqi agents[33] slipped in among them and incited them

32. A somewhat conjectural translation, since there is no clear antecedent for the subject of the verb in this sentence: fa-mā zālū min asma'i ahli 'l-buldān wa-aṭwa'ihim. . . . However, it is clear from the context that Sayf b. 'Umar or his informants have conflated two separate stories here. Up to this point, the Muslims have been Arab garrison troops stationed in Egypt. But beginning with this sentence, he portrays a conflict between Arab garrison troops stationed in Ifrīqiyah (the governor's jund) and a body of second-class Muslim militia, who are never explicitly identified but must represent native Berber allies and converts to Islam. It was among these people that Kharijism was to have a special appeal in the mid-second/eighth century.

33. du'āt ahl al-'Irāq. A dā'ī (pl. du'āt) is a "missionary" working as a propagandist and organizer on behalf of some religio-political movement dedicated to the overthrow of the existing order and the restoration of the true community of Muslims. In this case, the Iraqi agents would not represent the Abbasid cause, as one might suppose from the date, but a variety of Kharijite sects. Religio-political dissidence in eighth- and ninth-century North Africa was almost always Kharijite in inspiration.

to rebel, they broke the staff [of unity] and divided themselves into sects even to the present day. The cause of their division is this. They rejected the heretics (ahl al-ahwā'), saying, "We shall not oppose the Imams [that is, the Caliphs] because of crimes committed by the governors; we do not hold them responsible for that." The [Iraqi agents] responded, "But [the governors] are only carrying out the orders of the [Imams]." [The people of Ifrīqiyah] said, "We shall not accept that until we have informed ourselves about them."

Thus, Maysarah set out with ten men or so to go to Hishām. They sought permission [to speak with him], but that proved hard to obtain. They came to al-Abrash[34] and said, "Inform the Com- [2816] mander of the Faithful that our amīr [in Ifrīqiyah] takes both us and his regular troops (jund) on campaign. When he gains a victory, he assigns the spoils to them and excludes us, saying, 'They have a better right to it.' We would say, '[This booty] renders our jihād the more sincere, since we do not take any part of it. If [the booty] is ours, then they are free to have it. If it is not ours, we do not want it.'" [The delegates] continued: "When we besiege a city, he orders us to advance, but holds back his regular troops. Then we have responded, 'Advance, for this will strengthen the jihād; [men] like you support their brothers.' Now we have personally shielded them and supported them [in battle]. Then in addition, they set upon our livestock and began to cut them open to get the unborn lambs, seeking the white skins for the Commander of the Faithful, and killing a thousand sheep for a single skin. We said, 'How small a matter this is for the Commander of the Faithful.' We bore it patiently and permitted them [to do] that. Then in addition, they have deemed themselves so much above us that they take every pretty daughter of ours. We said, 'We do not find this in the Book of God nor in the practice of His Messenger, and we, too, are Muslims.'[35] We would like to know, then, whether the Commander of the Faithful approves of all this or not."

[Al-Abrash] replied, "We shall act [on this matter]." Now when

34. The chamberlain of Hishām.

35. Prym's text gives lam najid hādhā fī kitābin wa-lā sunnatin. I have followed the reading of Oxford Marsh 394.

they had waited a long time and their provisions were exhausted, they wrote their names on brief petitions (riqa') and presented them to the ministers of state. They said, "These are our names and lineages. If the Commander of the Faithful asks you about us, inform him." Then, having returned to Ifrīqiyah, they revolted against Hishām's governor, killed him, and seized control of the country. When Hishām heard the news, he asked about the small band [of men who had petitioned him]. Their names were presented to him, and behold, they were the same band who were reported to be in revolt.

[2817] It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: Immediately after [their campaign in Ifrīqiyah], 'Uthmān sent 'Abdallāh b. Nāfi' b. al-Ḥuṣayn and 'Abdallāh b. Nāfi' b. 'Abd al-Qays from Ifrīqiyah to Spain; they arrived there by way of the sea. 'Uthmān wrote [as follows] to those to whom he had delegated authority among the inhabitants of Spain: "To proceed: Only through Spain can Constantinople be conquered. If then you conquer [Spain], you will share the reward of those who conquer [Constantinople]. Peace." Ka'b al-Aḥbār[36] said, "Nations (aqwām) will cross the sea to Spain and they will conquer it. They will be known by their radiance on the Day of Resurrection."

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: They set out accompanied by the Berbers. They came [to Spain] by land and sea, and God bestowed it upon the Muslims and the Ifranjah.[37] They flourished under Muslim rule as did Ifrīqiyah. When 'Uthmān removed 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd b. Abī Sarḥ, he sent to his province (ilā 'amalihi) 'Abdallāh b. Nāfi' b. 'Abd al-Qays, and he ruled over it while 'Abdallāh b.

---

36. Ka'b al-Aḥbār was a Yemeni Jew who converted to Islam in the reign of 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, and became a trusted counselor of both 'Umar and 'Uthmān. He is so enmeshed in later legend that it is hard to say anything concrete about him. To him was attributed a vast knowledge of Jewish lore—he was indeed regarded as the main conduit through which this material was introduced into Islam—and he was also looked on as something of a seer. See M. Schmitz, "Ka'b al-Aḥbār," *EI*², IV, 316–17; G. Vajda, "Isrā'īliyyāt," *EI*², IV, 211–12.

37. The identity of the Ifranjah is not clear. Presumably the word (literally, "Franks") is here applied to another Germanic people, the Visigoths, who ruled Spain between the fifth century and the Muslim conquest. It may also refer to that part of the indigenous population that accepted and supported Islamic rule.

Sa'd returned to Egypt. The situation in Spain continued to be like that in Ifrīqiyah until the time of Hishām; the Berbers defended their land; those living in Spain kept their affairs in good order.

According to al-Wāqidī—Ibn Abī Sabrah—Muḥammad b. Abī Ḥarmalah—Kurayb: When 'Uthmān stripped 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ of Egypt, 'Amr was intensely angry and was filled with hatred for 'Uthmān. 'Uthmān now sent 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd with orders to proceed to Ifrīqiyah, and charged the people to undertake [the conquest] of that land. Thus 10,000 [troops] from Quraysh, the Helpers, and the Emigrants set forth.[38] [2818]

According to al-Wāqidī—Usāmah b. Zayd al-Laythī—Ibn Ka'b: When 'Uthmān sent 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd to Ifrīqiyah, the Patrician of Ifrīqiyah Gregory (Jurjīr)[39] made peace in return for [a tribute] of 2,520,000 dinars. The Byzantine Emperor dispatched a legate, ordering him to take from (the inhabitants of Ifrīqiyah) 300 qinṭārs[40] [of gold], just as 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd had done. So he gathered together the leading men (ru'asā') of Ifrīqiyah and said, "The Emperor has commanded me to take from you 300 qinṭārs of gold, the same amount that 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd has taken from you." They answered, "We have no money to give. As for what we once possessed, we have used it to ransom ourselves. As to the Emperor, he is indeed our lord, so let him take the portion of our wealth that used to be lawfully his, on the same terms as we formerly paid him every year." When (the legate) heard this, he

38. The Anṣār ("Helpers") were the Medinese who had accepted Muḥammad's religion and political leadership at the time of the hijrah. The Muhājirūn ("Emigrants") were those Meccan followers who had gone into exile in Medina with Muḥammad. In this context, Quraysh must refer to those Meccans who had come over to Muḥammad only upon his occupation of the city in 630.

39. The Patrician Gregory was exarch (military governor) of Carthage, and had proclaimed himself emperor with the support of both local Byzantine troops and Berber tribes. (Ironically, the late Emperor Heraclius had also mounted his coup d'état in 610 from Carthage.) For that reason, the Arab invasion described here was something of a godsend to the Imperial government in Constantinople. See G. Ostrogorsky, History of the Byzantine State, 118. Cf. the account of Sayf b. 'Umar above, pp. 18–19 (text, I, 2814).

40. A qinṭār was equal to 100 raṭls ("pounds"), a unit of weight that varied wildly according to region and period, but most commonly approximated 400 grams. Since this story involves a Roman province and emperor, we might suppose that the Roman librum of 327.5 grams is the unit intended here. However, the legendary character of this narrative makes any effort at exactitude quite meaningless. See E. Ashtor, "Makāyīl and Mawāzin," *EI*², VI, 117–21.

ordered them to be imprisoned. They sent [for help] to a certain group among their associates (aṣḥābihim); they came against [the legate] and broke open the prison, so that the detainees escaped.

The terms on which 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd made peace were 300 *qinṭār*s of gold, and 'Uthmān commanded it [to be turned over] to the family of al-Ḥakam.[41] I [that is, al-Wāqidī] said: "Or to Marwān?" He [that is, Usāmah b. Zayd] replied, "I don't know."

According to Ibn 'Umar [al-Wāqidī]—Usāmah b. Zayd—Yazīd b. Abī Ḥabīb: 'Uthmān stripped 'Amr b. al-'Āṣī of [control over]
[2819] the tax revenues (kharāj) of Egypt and made 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd the chief fiscal officer. The two [men] were bitterly at odds. 'Abdallāh wrote to 'Uthmān saying, "Verily 'Amr has refused to turn over the tax revenues," while 'Amr wrote, "Verily 'Abdallāh has used the stratagems of war against me." 'Uthmān wrote ordering 'Amr to depart, and gave 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd authority over both the tax revenues and the army. 'Amr arrived [in Medina] in a fury, and entered 'Uthmān's presence wearing a Yemeni cloak (jubbah) filled with cotton. 'Uthmān said to him, "What is the filling of your cloak?" He responded, "'Amr." 'Uthmān went on, "I knew that it was filled with 'Amr. I didn't mean that. I was only asking whether it was cotton or something else."

According to al-Wāqidī—Usāmah b. Zayd—Yazīd b. Abī Ḥabīb: 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd sent 'Uthmān a sum of money from Egypt that he had amassed. 'Amr entered 'Uthmān's presence, and 'Uthmān said, "'Amr, do you know that those she-camels have given milk plentifully since you left?" And 'Amr answered, "But their young have perished."

In this year, 'Uthmān b. 'Affān led the pilgrimage.

According to al-Wāqidī: In this year occurred the second conquest of Iṣṭakhr, at the hand of 'Uthmān b. Abī al-'Āṣ.

Also according to him: In [this year], Mu'āwiyah attacked Qinnasrīn.

---

41. Al-Ḥakam b. Abī al-'Āṣ was a kinsman of 'Uthmān, but had been one of Muḥammad's bitterest opponents and was sent into exile after the occupation of Mecca. His restoration to respectability under 'Uthmān and the many benefactions showered upon him and his son Marwān were the basis for some of the most serious charges of corruption and nepotism levied against the Caliph. Marwān of course ultimately seized the Caliphate (64–65/684–85), and was the lineal ancestor of all the succeeding Umayyad caliphs in Damascus as well as the amirs of Córdoba after 756.

The Events of the Year 28

(SEPTEMBER 25, 648–SEPTEMBER 13, 649)

According to al-Wāqidī: Among these (events) is the conquest of Cyprus by Mu'āwiyah, who attacked it at the command of [2820] 'Uthmān. However, Abū Ma'shar says that [the conquest of] Cyprus took place in the year 33. This was related to me by Aḥmad b. Thābit—one who related it [to him]—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—[Abū Ma'shar].[42]

Some authorities say that [the conquest of] Cyprus took place in the year 27. According to their accounts, a body (jamā'ah) of the Companions of the Messenger of God attacked it—among them Abū Dharr, 'Ubādah b. al-Ṣāmit and his wife Umm Ḥarām, al-Miqdād, Abū al-Dardā', and Shaddād b. Aws.[43]

---

42. The text says simply "'anhu." But Köprülü 1043 gives the name "Abū Ma'shar." Cf. the isnād of Aḥmad b. Thābit, above, p. 2.

43. On Abū Dharr, see below, pp. 64ff. and note 106; on Abū al-Dardā', see below, p. 65 and note 109.

Mu'āwiyah's Attack on Cyprus

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Rabī' b. al-Nu'mān al-Naṣrī and Abū al-Mujālid Jarād b. 'Amr—Rajā' b. Ḥaywah; and [Sayf—] Abū Ḥārithah and Abū 'Uthmān—Rajā' and 'Ubādah and Khālid:[44] In the time of 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, Mu'āwiyah pleaded with him about naval campaigns (ghazw al-baḥr) and the closeness of the Byzantines to Ḥimṣ. He said, "In one of the villages of Ḥimṣ, the inhabitants hear the barking of (the Byzantines') dogs and the squawking of their chickens." [He pressed 'Umar] until he was on the verge of being won over. So 'Umar wrote to 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ, [saying,] "Describe the sea and the seafarer to me, for I am uneasy about it."

According to 'Ubādah and Khālid: When ('Umar) informed him
[2821] of the benefits for the Muslims and the damage to the Polytheists to be derived from (naval warfare), 'Amr wrote back to him [as follows]: "Verily I have seen a great creature [that is, the sea] ridden by a small one [that is, man]. If (the sea) is calm it rends the heart with anxiety, and if it is agitated it leads the mind into confusion. On it certainty shrinks and doubt increases. Those who are on it are like a worm on a twig; if it bends he is drowned, and if he is saved he is astounded." When 'Umar read (this letter), he wrote to Mu'awiyah [as follows]: "No, by Him who sent Muḥammad with the Truth, I shall never send any Muslim there."

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad b. Sa'īd—'Ubādah b. Nusayy—Junādah b. Abī Umayyah al-Azdī: Mu'āwiyah had written a letter to 'Umar to provoke his interest in naval campaigns, saying, "O Commander of the Faithful, in Syria there is a village whose inhabitants hear the barking of the Byzantines' dogs and the crowing of their roosters, for (the Byzantines) are directly opposite a certain stretch of the coast of [the district of] Ḥimṣ. Now 'Umar was doubtful about 44. This way of constructing the isnād is somewhat conjectural, since Abū Ḥārithah and Abū 'Uthmān could be read in conjunction with Rajā' b. Ḥaywah. However, two points suggest that Sayf is combining two separate chains of transmission here: (1) in other isnāds Abū Ḥārithah and Abū 'Uthmān are direct informants of Sayf; (2) the name Rajā' is repeated directly following Abū Ḥārithah and Abū 'Uthmān, this time along with two other informants.

this because (Mu'āwiyah) was the one who advised it. He therefore wrote to 'Amr [as follows]: "Describe the sea for me and send me information about it." 'Amr then wrote to him [as follows]: "O Commander of the Faithful, I have seen a mighty creature ridden by a small one. It is naught but sky and water, and (those who travel upon it) are only like a worm on a twig: if it bends he drowns, and if he is saved he is amazed."

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Abū 'Uthmān and Abū Ḥārithah—'Ubādah—Junādah b. Abī Umayyah and Rabī' and Abū al-Mujālid: 'Umar wrote to Mu'āwiyah [as follows]: "We have heard that the Mediterranean Sea (baḥr al-Sha'm) surpasses the longest thing upon the earth, seeking God's permission every day and every night to overflow the earth and submerge it. How then can I bring the troops to this troublesome and infidel being? By God, one Muslim is dearer to me than all that the Byzantines possess. Take care not to oppose me. I have given you a command; you know what al-'Alā' (b. al-Ḥaḍramī)[45] encountered at my hands, and I did not give him such categorical orders." [2822]

According to certain authorities (qālū): The Byzantine Emperor abandoned warfare and entered into correspondence with 'Umar, establishing close relations with him. He asked him for a statement in which all knowledge ('ilm) would be united, and 'Umar wrote to him [as follows]: "Love for the people what you love for yourself, and hate for them what you hate for yourself. (This) will bring together all wisdom (ḥikmah) for you. And regard the people as your closest concern. (This) will combine for you all understanding (ma'rifah)."

The Byzantine Emperor wrote to him again, sending a long-necked bottle: "Fill this bottle for me with everything." So ('Umar) filled it with water and wrote, "Verily this is everything provided by this world." The Byzantine Emperor wrote to him [and asked], "What lies between truth and falsehood?" ('Umar) wrote back, "(There are) four fingers of truth in what the eyes see,

45. Al-'Alā' b. al-Ḥaḍramī was Abū Bakr's general in Baḥrayn during the Riddah wars, and later played a role in the Persian wars under 'Umar, who did not really trust him. See Donner, Early Islamic Conquests, 86, 327; and E. Shoufani, Al-Riddah and the Muslim Conquest of Arabia, 131–34. See also the volumes in this series on Abū Bakr and 'Umar.

while falsehood often lies in what has been heard about without being directly observed." Then the Emperor of the Byzantines wrote to ask him how far it is between the heavens and the earth [2823] and between the East and the West. 'Umar wrote to him, "A journey of five hundred years, if it were a level road."

According to the narrator: Umm Kulthūm, the daughter of 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib [and wife of 'Umar], sent to the Empress of the Byzantines perfume, drinking vessels, and cheap receptacles used for women's things. She inserted this into the official post (al-barīd), which conveyed it to her. [This material] having been taken from the post, the wife of Heraclius came and assembled her women, saying: "This is a gift from the wife of the King of the Arabs and the daughter [sic] of their prophet." She entered into correspondence with [Umm Kulthūm] and requited her in kind by sending her gifts, among them a superb necklace. Now when the official post brought [these gifts] to 'Umar, he ordered them to be seized and summoned [the people] together to pray. When they had assembled, he prayed two *rak'ah*s with them, and then said, "There is no good in any affair of mine that is decided without consultation. What about a gift that Umm Kulthūm sent to the wife of the Byzantine Emperor, who then sent a gift to her?" Some said, "It is [Umm Kulthūm's] along with what she [already] possesses. The Emperor's wife is neither under a pact of protection (dhimmah), so that she should try to conciliate [you] with [this gift], nor is she under your authority so that she should fear you." Others said, "We used to send garments as a gift in order to get something in return; we would send them to be sold and to obtain a [certain] price." Then 'Umar said, "But the envoy was the envoy of the Muslims, and the postal service was theirs. The Muslims are vexed [to see] [the necklace] on her breast." Thus, he ordered it to be returned to the public treasury, while he paid [Umm Kulthūm] the amount of her expenses.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Abū Ḥārithah—Khālid b. Ma'dān: The first to conduct naval warfare was Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān in the time of [2824] 'Uthmān b. 'Affān. He had sought 'Umar's permission for this but did not obtain it. When 'Uthmān took office, Mu'āwiyah persisted until at last 'Uthmān decided to grant permission. He said, "Do not conscript the people or cast lots among them. Let them decide for themselves, and whoever chooses [to go on] campaign in obedience [to your call], support and aid him." (Mu'āwiyah) did this, naming as his admiral (wa'sta'mala 'alā al-baḥr) 'Abdallāh b. Qays al-Jāsī, an ally (ḥalīf) of the Banū Fazārah.[46]

('Abdallāh) conducted fifty campaigns on the sea, in both winter and summer, and not one man was drowned or injured. He would call upon God to provide prosperity for his troops and to protect him and his soldiers against misfortune. So he went on, until the time when God decided to afflict him alone. He set out in advance [of his fleet] in a light boat (qārib). He reached the seaport in Byzantine territory; at that place beggars besought him for aid, and he gave them alms. A woman from among the beggars returned to her village and said to the men [there], "Do you want to find 'Abdallāh b. Qays?" "Where is he?" they said. "At the seaport," she answered. "O enemy of God," they said, "how do you know 'Abdallāh b. Qays?" She scolded them, saying, "You are too feeble for 'Abdallāh to hide from any one [of you]." Then they rose [2825] up and attacked him. They did battle with one another, and ('Abdallāh) alone was struck down.

The sailor [of his boat] got away to ('Abdallāh's) comrades [in the main fleet]; they returned and landed under the command of Sufyān b. 'Awf al-Azdī. He advanced and did battle with (the Byzantines). In a state of anger, he began mocking and abusing his comrades. Then 'Abdallāh's slave girl said, "Alas, for 'Abdallāh! He did not speak like that when he was fighting." Sufyān responded, "So how did he speak?" She said, "A sea of troubles, and then it will vanish from us."[47] Thus, (Sufyān) stopped what he had been saying and stuck to "A sea of troubles, and then it will vanish from us." He was struck down among the Muslims on that day, and that ended the era of 'Abdallāh b. Qays al-Jāsī.[48] Afterwards, the woman [who had reported 'Abdallāh's presence] was

46. The text reads al-Ḥārithī, but de Goeje (Introductio, dcxxv) corrects to al-Jāsī. The Banū Jās were a clan of Fazārah, a powerful Najdī tribe that had rebelled during the Riddah wars, but was soon compelled to recognize the supremacy of the Caliphate, and then played an honorable part in the Persian campaign. See Donner, Early Islamic Conquests, 65, 85, 194, 262.

47. A proverb expressing confidence: see Freytag, Arabum Proverbia, II, 173.

48. In the text, "al-Ḥārithī." I have followed de Goeje's reading, Introductio, dcxxv.

asked, "How did you recognize him?" "By his alms," she answered. "He gave in the manner of kings, and was not grasping like the merchants."

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Abū Ḥārithah and Abū 'Uthmān: The woman who had incited the Byzantines against 'Abdallāh b. Qays was asked, "How did you recognize him?" She answered, "He looked like a merchant, but when I pleaded for alms, he gave to me like a king, and so I knew that he was 'Abdallāh b. Qays."

['Uthmān] wrote to Mu'āwiyah and the [other] provincial officials: "To proceed: See to those matters concerning which you have departed from 'Umar['s directives], and do not alter them. If you are in doubt about something, refer it to us; we shall convene [2826] the Community (ummah) concerning it and then send [the proper course of action] back to you. Take care to alter nothing, for I shall accept from you only what 'Umar would accept." That region (nāḥiyah) had been falling into disorder in [the period] between the peace treaty [established under] 'Umar and the regime of 'Uthmān. He would thus send a certain man there and God would conquer it through him, and that [conquest] would be accounted as his. Regarding the conquests [in general], they were credited to the first man who was made governor over them.[49]

Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī] says: When Mu'āwiyah attacked Cyprus, he agreed upon peace terms with its inhabitants, according to 'Alī b. Sahl—al-Walīd b. Muslim—Sulaymān b. Abī Karīmah, al-Layth b. Sa'd, and other shaykhs of the coastal districts of Damascus: The peace terms for Cyprus (ṣulḥ Qubrus) consisted of a tribute (jizyah) of 7,000 dinars, to be paid to the Muslims every year. [The Cypriots] would also pay the same amount to the Byzantines, and the Muslims would not have the right to interfere in the payment of that tribute to the Byzantines.[50] In addition, [the Muslims] would neither raid [the Cypriots] nor fight against anyone seeking their protection. (The Cypriots) were obliged to inform the Muslims of any expedition against them by their enemy the Byzantines; moreover, the Imam of the Muslims should appoint the Patrician over them from among themselves.

49. Presumably this paragraph deals with Syria, since Mu'āwiyah is the only person named and tilka al-nāḥiyah ("that region") seems to refer to a specific place. The new or restored conquests would then be the northern frontier zone in Cilicia and the Taurus mountains.

50. Laysa li'l-muslimīna an yaḥūlū baynahum wa-bayna dhālika. Literally, "It is not for the Muslims to intervene between them and that."

According to al-Wāqidī: Muʿāwiyah attacked Cyprus in the year 28. The troops in Egypt attacked it also, under the command of ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿd b. Abī Sarḥ, until they met up with Muʿāwiyah, who then wielded authority over [all] the Muslims [in this campaign].[51]

According to (al-Wāqidī)—al-Thawr b. Yazīd—Khālid b. Maʿdān—Jubayr b. Nufayr: When we took (the Cypriots) captive I saw Abū al-Dardāʾ weeping, and I said, "Why are you weeping on [2827] a day when God has exalted Islam and its adherents and abased infidelity and its partisans?" He struck my shoulder with his hand and said, "May your mother be bereft of you, Jubayr. How despicable mankind becomes to God when they abandon his commandments. Here was a mighty nation (ummah), which dominated (our) people and possessed royal power (mulk). Then they abandoned God's commandments; thus they fell into the condition that you see and God subjected them to captivity. If a people (qawm) is subjected to captivity, then God has no use for them."

According to al-Wāqidī—Abu Saʿīd: Muʿāwiyah b. Abī Sufyān established peace terms with the Cypriots in the reign of ʿUthmān, having been the first to attack the Byzantines [in Cyprus]. In the pact between (Muʿāwiyah) and (the Cypriots) was [the provision] that they would only contract marriages with our enemy the Byzantines with our permission.

According to al-Wāqidī: In this year, Ḥabīb b. Maslamah attacked Sūrīyah in Byzantine territory.

In this year, ʿUthmān married Nāʾilah bint al-Farāfiṣah.[52] She was a Christian, but converted to Islam before he consummated the marriage.

According to (al-Wāqidī): In (this year), ʿUthmān built his resi-

51. That is, over the combined Muslim forces from Syria and Egypt on Cyprus.
52. A woman of the tribe of Kalb.

dence [called] al-Zawrā' [that is, "bent," "slanting"] in Medina and brought it to completion.

According to [al-Wāqidī]: In [this year], there took place the first conquest of Fārs and the definitive conquest of Iṣṭakhr, under the [2828] command of Hishām b. 'Āmir.

According to [al-Wāqidī]: In this year, 'Uthmān led the pilgrimage.

The Events of the Year 29

(SEPTEMBER 14, 649–SEPTEMBER 3, 650)

In (this year) 'Uthmān removed Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī from Baṣrah, after he had been his governor ('āmil) there for six years. As governor, he appointed 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir b. Kurayz, who was then twenty-five years of age, and he proceeded (to Baṣrah). It is also said that Abū Mūsā was 'Uthmān's governor in Baṣrah only for three years.

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī)—Muḥārib—'Awf al-A'rābī: Ghaylān b. Kharashah al-Ḍabbī went up to 'Uthmān b. 'Affān and said, "Indeed you[53] have a youngster whom you should treat as an adult and appoint as governor of Baṣrah. How long will this old man"—that is, Abū Mūsā—"govern Baṣrah?" Now he had been governor for six years since the death of 'Umar.

(Al-Madā'inī) goes on (as follows): Thus, 'Uthmān deposed him and sent out 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir b. Kurayz b. Rabī'ah b. Ḥabīb b.

53. Plural: lakum ṣaghīr. Presumably he is addressing the tribe of Quraysh, not 'Uthmān alone. See the more elaborate parallel versions below, pp. 35–37.

'Abd Shams. This man's mother was Dajjājah bt. Asmā' al-Sulamī, and he was the son of 'Uthmān b. 'Affān's maternal uncle.

According to Maslamah: He came to Baṣrah in the year 29, at the age of twenty-five.

The Reason for 'Uthmān's Removal of Abū Mūsā [al-Ash'arī] from Baṣrah

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: When 'Uthmān took office, he retained Abū Mūsā in Baṣrah for three years, deposing him in the fourth. He appointed 'Umayr b. 'Uthmān b. Sa'd as military commander of Khurāsān, and 'Abdallāh b. 'Umayr al-Laythī from [the tribe of] [2829] Kinānah[54] as military commander in Sijistān. ['Abdallāh] fought relentlessly there as far as Kābul, while 'Umayr waged war in Khurāsān until he reached Farghānah, compelling every district (kūrah) this side of it to come to terms. ['Uthmān] sent 'Ubaydallāh b. Ma'mar al-Taymī to Makrān, and he battled unceasingly until he reached the river.[55] To Kirmān he sent 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ghubays, and a small band to Fārs and al-Ahwāz. He annexed the agricultural hinterland (Sawād) of Baṣrah to [the districts under] al-Ḥusayn b. Abī al-Ḥurr. Then ['Uthmān] removed 'Abdallah b. 'Umayr [from Sijistān] and put 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir in charge, retaining him there for a year; in turn he deposed ['Abdallāh b. 'Āmir] and appointed 'Āṣim b. 'Amr. He also removed 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ghubays [from Kirmān] and sent back 'Adī b. Suhayl b. 'Adī.

During the third year [of 'Uthmān's reign], the inhabitants of Īdhaj[56] and the Kurds rebelled. Abū Mūsā called out the people, exhorting them and charging them [to repress the rebellion]. He

---

54. The text has Tha'labah; I have followed de Goeje's emendation, Introductio, dcxxv.

55. No certain identification is possible. Perhaps the Dasht is meant, which flows into the Indian Ocean near the present border between Iran and Pakistan. Conceivably the text refers to the far more prominent Helmand River, but this stream lies very far north for an army working its way along the Makrān coast.

56. Also known as Māl-Amīr. The chief town of southern Luristan, on the upper Kārūn River. It had originally been subjected to tribute in 17/638, and then had to be reconquered after the battle of Nihāwand (21/642). See C. E. Bosworth, "Īdhadj," *EI*², III, 1015–16; Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 245.

spoke of the merit in making the jihād on foot, so that a few men loaded up their animals and agreed to set forth as infantrymen. But others said, "No, by God! We will not hasten to act until we see what he does. If his actions are like his words, then we will do as our comrades have done." When the day came to set out, [Abū Mūsā] sent out his baggage from the governor's palace on forty mules. [The doubters] clung to his bridle and said, "Mount us on some of these extra [animals], and be as eager to go on foot as you asked us to be." He appeased these men until they let go of his animal; then he proceeded forward.

They came to 'Uthmān, however, and asked that he relieve them of [Abū Mūsā]. They said, "We do not wish to say everything we know, but give us [someone else] in place of him." "Whom do you wish?" responded 'Uthmān. Then Ghaylān b. Kharashah said, "Anyone would be as good as this slave who has [2830] devoured our land and revived among us the way of the Time of Ignorance. Shall we not free ourselves from an Ash'arī who regards his sovereignty (mulk) over the Ash'arī tribesmen as a great thing and belittles sovereignty in Baṣrah? If you make a child or an old man our amir, he will be as good, and anyone of the people in between those two [extremes] will be better than [Abū Mūsā]." Thus, ['Uthmān] summoned 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir and made him governor (ammarahu) of Baṣrah.

['Uthmān] dispatched 'Ubaydallāh b. Ma'mar to Fārs, appointing 'Umayr b. 'Uthmān b. Sa'd as governor over ['Ubaydallāh's former] province. In the fourth year of his reign, he named Umayr[57]b. Aḥmar al-Yashkurī as governor of Khurāsān. In the same year, he assigned the governorship of Sijistān to 'Imrān b. al-Faṣīl al-Burjumī and the governorship of Kirmān to 'Āṣim b. 'Amr, who died there.

Fārs burst into rebellion during the regime of 'Ubaydallāh b. Ma'mar, and [the rebels] assembled against him in Iṣṭakhr. They clashed at the gate of Iṣṭakhr, and 'Ubaydallāh was killed and his army routed. When 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir heard the news, he called the Baṣrans to arms, and the people marched forth with him, 'Uthmān b. Abī al-'Āṣ being in command of the vanguard. [The two armies) met at Iṣṭakhr, and he slaughtered many of (the rebels), as a result of which they remained submissive thereafter.

57. Prym and Ibrāhīm read the name as Umayn, but Köprülü 1043, Ibn al-Athīr, and Balādhurī (Futūḥ al-buldān, 395) all give it as Umayr.

[2831]

('Abdallāh) wrote to 'Uthmān about this event, and the latter wrote back to him naming [the following men] as military commanders in the administrative districts (kuwar) of Fārs: Harim b. Ḥassān al-Yashkurī; Harim b. Ḥayyān al-'Abdī, of the [tribe of] 'Abd al-Qays; al-Khirrīt b. Rāshid, of the [tribe of] Banū Sāmah; al-Minjāb b. Rāshid; and al-Tarjumān al-Hujaymī. He also divided Khurāsān among a group of six [men]: al-Aḥnaf [was put] in charge of the two Marws;[58] Ḥabīb b. Qurrah al-Yarbū'ī over Balkh, which was part of the territories conquered by the Kūfans; Khālid b. 'Abdallāh b. Zuhayr over Herat; Umayr b. Aḥmar al-Yashkurī over Ṭūs; Qays b. al-Haytham[59]al-Sulamī over Nishapur—he was the first to set out [for his district]; and 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim, who was his cousin (ibn 'ammihi). Then before his death 'Uthmān combined (all of Khurāsān) under (Qays b. al-Haytham), and when ('Uthmān) died Qays [held authority] over Khurāsān. ('Uthmān) appointed Umayr b. Aḥmar as governor in Sijistān, and then set over it 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Samurah, who belonged to the clan (āl) of Ḥabīb b. 'Abd Shams. At the time of 'Uthmān's death, ('Abd al-Raḥmān b. Samurah) held authority in (Sijistān), 'Imrān in Kirmān, 'Umayr b. 'Uthmān b. Sa'd in Fārs, and Ibn Kindīr al-Qushayrī in Makrān.[60]

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī)—'Alī b. Mujāhid—his shaykhs: Ghaylān b. Kharashah said to 'Uthmān b. 'Affān, "Is there not among all of you some wretch for you to raise up? Is there no beggar for you to enrich? O men of Quraysh, how long will that aged Ash'arī devour these lands?" The old man [that is, 'Uthmān] grasped his point and named 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir as governor [of Baṣrah].

[2832]

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī)—Abū Bakr al-

58. Marw on the Murghāb River, the administrative center of Khurāsān in Umayyad and early Abbasid times; and Marw al-Rūdh.

59. Text: Hubayrah. De Goeje, Introductio, dcxxv, gives no authority for his emendation.

60. As the parentheses suggest, this paragraph is full of masculine singular pronouns with no clear antecedents. My reconstruction agrees with that of Caetani, Annali, VII, 292–93, who—here as elsewhere—puts little stock in the evidentiary value of Sayf's account.

Hudhalī: 'Uthmān named Ibn 'Āmir as governor of Baṣrah. According to al-Ḥasan: Abū Mūsā said, "To you a youth of great shrewdness is coming. Through his grandmothers and his maternal and paternal aunts he is noble; under him the two armies will be combined."

According to [al-Madā'inī]—al-Ḥasan: When Ibn 'Āmir arrived, the army of Abū Mūsā and the army of 'Uthmān b. Abī al-'Āṣ al-Thaqafī were united under him. Now 'Uthmān b. Abī al-'Āṣ was one of those who had crossed over [to Khūzistān by ship] from 'Umān and Baḥrayn.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: In the time of 'Uthmān, Qays b. al-Haytham sent 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim as his envoy to 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir. 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim was much esteemed by 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir, and so he said to the latter, "Write a diploma ('ahd) appointing me over Khurāsān should Qays b. al-Haytham leave [that province]." [Ibn 'Āmir] did so and ['Abdallāh b. Khāzim] returned to Khurāsān. When the people heard the news of 'Uthmān's murder and the enemy grew turbulent, Qays said [to Ibn Khāzim], "What do you think, 'Abdallāh?" "In my opinion," ['Abdallāh] responded, "you should leave me [here] as your deputy and not delay your departure, so that you can look into the situation." [Qays] did this, appointing [Ibn Khāzim] as his deputy. Then 'Abdallāh [b. Khāzim] produced his diploma of appointment [from Ibn 'Āmir], and he maintained authority over Khurāsān until the rise of 'Alī. The mother of 'Abdallāh [b. Khāzim] was 'Ajlā; [2833] and Qays—in anger at how [Ibn Khāzim] had treated him—said, "I had a better right than 'Abdallāh to be the son of 'Ajlā."

According to al-Wāqidī, and according to Aḥmad b. Thābit [al-Rāzī]—one who recounted it [to him]—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar: In this year, 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir conquered Fārs. As regards the account of Sayf, we have already given it.

In this year—that is, 29 [649–50]—'Uthmān enlarged and widened the Mosque of the Messenger of God [in Medina].[61] He began construction in Rabīʿ al-Awwal (November 12–December 11). Gypsum [to be used for stucco] was brought to ʿUthmān from Baṭn Nakhl. He built it with cut stone, making its pillars out of blocks of stone [held together] with lead [clamps] and constructing its roof from teakwood. He made it 160 cubits long and 150 cubits wide. He gave it six portals, as in the time of ʿUmar.

61. On this incident, and the history of this structure in general, see the brilliant though conjectural account of Jean Sauvaget, La mosquée omeyyade de Médine [Paris: 1947]. Sauvaget gives an exhaustive and very sophisticated account of the textual sources, among which Ṭabarī has only a modest place.

In this year, ʿUthmān led the pilgrimage. At Minā[62] he pitched a tent—this was the first tent that ʿUthmān pitched at Minā—and he completed the [rites of] prayer there and at ʿArafah.[63]

[ʿUthmān's Alterations to the Pilgrimage Rites]

According to al-Wāqidī—ʿUmar b. Ṣāliḥ b. Nāfiʿ—Ṣāliḥ, the client (mawlā) of al-Taw'amah—Ibn ʿAbbās: The people first began to talk openly about ʿUthmān [in the following circumstances]. During his reign, he had prayed two rakʿahs with the people at Minā, but in his sixth year he completed (the prayer rites) [with two additional rakʿahs]; more than one of the Prophet's Companions found that blameworthy. This was discussed among those who wished to make difficulties for him, until ʿAlī came to him with [2834] certain others and said, "By God, there is no commandment new or old [concerning this]. You have observed your Prophet praying two rakʿahs, followed by Abū Bakr and ʿUmar and you yourself at the beginning of your reign. I do not know upon what this is based."[64] (ʿUthmān) replied, "It is a personal opinion that I hold."

According to al-Wāqidī—Dāwūd b. Khālid—ʿAbd al-Malik b. ʿAmr b. Abī Sufyān al-Thaqafī—his paternal uncle: ʿUthmān prayed four (rakʿahs) with the people at Minā. Then someone

62. One of the pilgrimage stations outside Mecca, the last place visited by the pilgrims. On 10 Dhū al-Ḥijjah, they throw stones at a construction called "Jamrat al-ʿAqabah," and later in the day carry out here the ritual sacrifice in commemoration of the sacrifice of Abraham. On the three days following the end of the ḥajj proper (ayyām al-tashrīq), Minā is visited again by the pilgrims for a new round of ritual stonings. See A. J. Wensinck and J. Jomier, "Ḥadjdj," *EI*², III, 36–37.

63. Another of the pilgrimage stations, more commonly called "ʿArafāt," a valley some 25 kms. east of Mecca where the pilgrims congregate on 9 Dhū al-Ḥijjah after the circumambulation of the Kaʿbah and before proceeding to Minā for the ritual stoning and sacrifice. See Wensinck and Jomier, ibid., 35–36; on the prayer rites observed during the Pilgrimage, see Wensinck, "Ṣalāt," SEI, 491–99, esp. p. 494.

64. Emending the text to read "fa-mā adrī mā yarjaʿū ilayhi."

came to 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf and said, "Do you know that your brother has prayed four rak'ahs) with the people?" 'Abd al-Raḥmān prayed two rak'ahs with his companions and then set out to see 'Uthmān. He said to him, "Did you not pray two rak'ahs in this place with the Messenger of God?" ('Uthmān) answered, "Indeed so." "And did you not pray two rak'ahs with Abū Bakr?" "Indeed so." "And did you not pray two rak'ahs with 'Umar?" "Indeed so." "And did you not pray two rak'ahs at the beginning of your caliphate?" "Indeed so," said 'Uthmān. "But listen to me, Abū Muḥammad. I was informed that some of the Yemenis and ill-educated people who made the pilgrimage last year said, 'The ritual prayer consists of two rak'ahs for the permanent resident (al-muqīm); here is your imam 'Uthmān praying two rak'ahs.' In Mecca I am connected with a clan (ahl), and I have thought it best to pray four rak'ahs out of my fear for the people. In addition, I have taken a wife there, and in al-Ṭā'if I have property, which I sometimes supervise and reside in after the day of return from the Pilgrimage."[65]

'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf said, "None of this gives you any excuse. You say that you are connected with a clan, but your wife is in Medina, going and coming as you wish, and living only where you do. You say that you have property in al-Ṭā'if, but between [2835] you and al-Ṭā'if is a three-day journey, and you are not one of the inhabitants of al-Ṭā'if. You say that the Yemenis and others who are making the pilgrimage are returning [home] and saying, 'Here is your imam 'Uthmān praying two rak'ahs, and he is a permanent resident.' But revelation would descend on the Messenger of God when Islam was rare among the people, [and yet he prayed two rak'ahs], and then Abū Bakr and 'Umar did the same. Thus, Islam became established, and 'Umar prayed two rak'ahs with them until he died." 'Uthmān replied, "It is my own personal opinion."

65. 'Uthmān's point is twofold. (1) Many ordinary Muslims were ignorant of the different number of ritual prostrations (rak'ahs) connected with the act of prayer at different times. Hence, they would assume that all prayers were to be performed with two rak'ahs, although in fact only those who were traveling or on pilgrimage were permitted to abbreviate the usual four rak'ahs in that manner. (2) 'Uthmān's property holdings and family ties made him a permanent resident in Mecca and al-Ṭā'if as well as Medina; hence, he felt obligated to observe the complete rite of four rak'ahs even during the Pilgrimage season. See note 271 below, and the discussion in Caetani, Annali, VII, 261–64.

According to al-Wāqidī: Then ʿAbd al-Raḥmān went out and met up with Ibn Masʿūd. [The latter said], "Abū Muḥammad, is it different from what we have heard?" "No," he replied. [Ibn Masʿūd] said, "So what shall I do?" [ʿAbd al-Raḥmān] said, "You should do what you know [to be right]." Then Ibn Masʿūd said, "Disagreement is an evil. I have heard that he has prayed four *rakʿah*s, and so I prayed four *rakʿah*s with my associates." ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf replied, "I have heard that he has prayed four *rakʿah*s, and with my associates I prayed two. But now I shall do as you say; we shall, following him, pray four *rakʿah*s."

The Events of the Year 30

(SEPTEMBER 4, 650–AUGUST 23, 651)

Among these was the campaign of Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ in Ṭabaristān, according to the account related to me by Aḥmad b. Thābit—one who related it to him—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar. [2836]

[The same is said by] al-Wāqidī and by 'Alī b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī, on whose authority 'Umar b. Shabbah related that to me.

As for Sayf b. 'Umar, he states that the ispahbadh[66] (of Ṭabaristān) had made peace with Suwayd b. Muqarrin based on the understanding that (Suwayd) would not attack (the region) in return for a certain tribute (māl) to be paid to him. The report concerning this has been given above, in the time of 'Umar.

It was related to me by 'Umar (b. Shabbah)—'Alī b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī: No one attacked (Ṭabaristān) until 'Uthmān b. 'Affān came to power; then Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ attacked it in the year 30 (650–51).

66. The ispahbadh was the military governnor of a major province in the late Sasanian Empire. Khusraw Anushirvan (531–579) had divided the empire into four quarters, each named after a cardinal point of the compass, and appointed an ispahbadh over each. For example, Iraq and Mesopotamia constituted the quarter

The Campaign of Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ in Ṭabaristān

It was related to me by 'Umar b. Shabbah—'Alī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī)—'Alī b. Mujāhid—Ḥanash b. Mālik: In the year 30 (650–51), Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ set out on campaign from Kūfah, aiming at Khurāsān, accompanied by Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān and a group of the Companions of the Messenger of God. With him were al-Ḥasan, al-Ḥusayn, 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās, 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar, 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ, and 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr. [At the same time] 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir set out from Baṣrah for Khurāsān. He outstripped Sa'īd and laid siege to Abrashahr.[67] Sa'īd having learned of his siege of Abrashahr, he encamped at Qūmis, which was governed by a peace treaty that Ḥudhayfah had made with (its people) after Nihāwand.

Then Sa'īd came to Jurjān and concluded a treaty with it requiring [a tribute of] 200,000 [dirhams]. Then he came to Ṭamīsah,[68] which is situated between Ṭabaristān and Jurjān; it is a city on [2837] the shore [of the Caspian] Sea, at the boundaries of Jurjān. Its inhabitants fought him until he performed the prayer of fear.[69] He had said to Ḥudhayfah, "How did the Messenger of God pray?" (Ḥudhayfah) told him, and Sa'īd performed there the prayer of fear while they were fighting.

On that day Sa'īd smote one of the polytheists on the sinews of his shoulder and his sword emerged below (the man's) elbow. He besieged them and they sought safe-conduct (amān). He granted it to them with the condition that he would not kill one man among them. Then they threw open the fortress and he put them all to death save one man.[70] He seized the contents of the fortress, and a man from [the tribe of] Banū Nahd came across a basket with a lock; he supposed it contained jewelry. Sa'īd learned of this of the West. However, Sasanian provincial administration was extensively revamped under Khusraw Parviz (592–628), so that the scope of the authority of the official named here is not certain. See Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 28, 38, 126, 148, 187.

---

67. Nishapur/Naysābūr. The name Abrashahr seems to have dropped out of use after the fourth/tenth century. See Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 383.

68. Also known as Ṭamīs; see Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 375.

69. The prayer of fear, ṣalāt al-khawf, is a shortened ritual performed in the near presence of an enemy. See Wensinck, "Ṣalāt," SEI, 496.

70. Thereby observing the letter of the peace terms.

and sent for the Nahdī tribesman. He brought the basket to him; they broke open its lock. Within it they found (another) basket. They opened it, and there was a black cloak rolled up. Spreading it out, they found a red cloak. They unfolded it, and there was a yellow cloak containing two penises, one maroon and one rose-colored. A poet said, ridiculing the Banū Nahd:

The noble-hearted have returned with captives as booty, while the Banū Nahd have won two penises in a basket,
Maroon and rose-colored, both of ample size.
They thought them spoils; forbid yourself such an error!

Then Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ conquered Nāmiyah, which is not a city but a desert.

It was related to me by 'Umar b. Shabbah—'Alī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī)—'Alī b. Mujāhid—Ḥanash b. Mālik al-Taghlibī: In the year 30 (650–51), Sa'īd campaigned in Jurjān and Ṭabaristān. With him were 'Abdallāh b. al-'Abbās, 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar, Ibn al-Zubayr, and 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ. A peasant ('ilj) who used to serve them recounted the following to me (namely, Ḥanash): "I used to bring them the serving tray, and when they had eaten, they ordered me to shake it off and hang it up. Then when evening came they gave me the leftover (food)." [2838]

According to ('Umar b. Shabbah): Muḥammad b. al-Ḥakam b. Abī 'Aqīl al-Thaqafī, the grandfather of Yūsuf b. 'Umar,[71] perished (while on campaign) with Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ. Yūsuf once said to Qaḥdham, "Qaḥdham, do you know where Muḥammad b. al-Ḥakam died?" He replied, "Yes, he found martyrdom in Ṭabaristān with Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ." (Yūsuf) said, "No, he died there while he was (on campaign) with Sa'īd; then Sa'īd returned to Kūfah." Ka'b b. Ju'ayl lauded (Sa'īd), saying:

How excellent was the youth when dust swirled beneath him and when they alighted from Dastabā—[72]

71. Yūsuf b. 'Umar al-Thaqafī was one of the most prominent Umayyad governors of Iraq, noted particularly for his unrelenting harshness toward his rivals. He was appointed by the caliph Hishām in 738, and died during the Umayyad civil war in 744. On his career see Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 333–35, 357–59, 367–68, 376; Hawting, First Dynasty of Islam, 82–83, 93, 96–97.

72. Dastabā was "a large district (kūrah) divided between al-Rayy and Hamadhān. One section of it was named Dastabā al-Rāzī, and contained almost then he was dazzling in his splendor.

Know, fortunate Sa'īd, that if my beast sits down,
I fear it is hamstrung.
[It is] as though you were a lion in a thicket on the Day of the Cleft, which left behind the lion in the wood and went forth into the desert.
[2839] You command what no one before you has ever commanded—eighty thousand men, [some] with armor and [some] without.

It was related to me by 'Umar [b. Shabbah]—'Alī [b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī]—Kulayb b. Khalaf and others: Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ made peace with the inhabitants of Jurjān; then [later on] they became obdurate and manifested unbelief. No one came to Jurjān after Sa'īd, and they closed off that road, so that no one took the road to Khurāsān by way of Qūmis save in fear and dread before the Jurjānīs. The [usual] road to Khurāsān went from Fārs through Kirmān, and the first man to open up the road through Qūmis was Qutaybah b. Muslim when he became governor of Khurāsān.[73]

It was related to me by 'Umar [b. Shabbah]—'Alī [b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī]—Kulayb b. Khalaf al-'Ammī—Ṭufayl b. Mirdās al-'Ammī and Idrīs b. Ḥanẓalah al-'Ammī: Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ made peace with the inhabitants of Jurjān. At times the Jurjānīs would collect 100,000 [dirhams] and say, "This fulfills our peace treaty." At other times [the sum collected would be] 200,000 or 300,000. Sometimes they would pay this, sometimes not. Then they became obdurate and manifested unbelief, not paying any tribute ninety villages. The other section was named Dastabā Hamadhān and was made up of numerous villages; at various times it was called 'Dastabā Qazwīn' because it was attached to the province ('amal) of Qazwīn." (Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, II, 573)

---

73. Qutaybah b. Muslim was named to this post in 705 by al-Walīd, and held it until his death in 715; he was the victim of a mutiny by his own troops when he tried to provoke a rebellion against the new Caliph Sulaymān b. 'Abd al-Malik. Qutaybah was the first Muslim general to achieve permanent conquests in Central Asia. On his career see Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 429–45 et passim; Barthold, Turkestan down to the Mongol Invasion, 185–86; Gibb, The Arab Conquests in Central Asia, 29–57; M. A. Shaban, The 'Abbāsid Revolution, 63–75 et passim.

(kharāj) until Yazīd b. al-Muhallab came against them.[74] When he arrived there no one could stand against him, and after he had made peace with Ṣūl and conquered al-Buḥayrah and Dihistān, he made peace with the inhabitants of Jurjān in accordance with the treaty of Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ.

In this year—that is, the year 30 (650–51)—'Uthmān removed [2840] al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah from Kūfah and made Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ governor there, according to Sayf b. 'Umar.

The Reason for 'Uthmān's Removal of al-Walīd and His Appointment of Sa'īd as Governor [in Kūfah]

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: When 'Uthmān learned of the conflict between 'Abdallāh (b. Mas'ūd) and Sa'd (b. Abī Waqqāṣ), he grew angry with both men and resolved [to deal with] them. Then he abandoned that [notion] and removed Sa'd [alone] from office, recovering [from him] what he owed [to the treasury in Kūfah]. He confirmed 'Abdallāh in office and issued instructions to him. To replace Sa'd as governor he appointed al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah, who had been a fiscal officer ('āmil) over the bedouin (al-'arab) of the Jazīrah for 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb. So al-Walīd arrived (in Kūfah) in the second year of 'Uthmān's rule (imārah), after Sa'd had been governor there for one year and part of another.

Having arrived in Kūfah, (al-Walīd) was the most beloved among the people and the most courteous [in his dealings] with them. So it was for five years; there was no door on his residence. Then some of the young men of Kūfah put Ibn al-Ḥaysumān al-Khuzā'ī under surveillance, intending to overpower him. He was warned about them and went out against them sword in hand.

74. Yazīd b. Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufrah, of the tribe of Azd, was an Umayyad general and governor in the early eighth century. His father had achieved prominence by his bloody suppression of the Kharijite revolts in Iraq in the 690s and was named governor of Khurāsān in 698. Yazīd succeeded his father in that office in 702. He was soon deposed, but was reinstated in 715 to succeed Qutaybah b. Muslim. In 720 Yazīd led a revolt in Baṣrah (where the tribe of Azd was strong) against the new Caliph Yazīd II; at first this revolt ballooned dangerously, but it was quickly suppressed. See Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 250–51, 257–63, 312–18, 445–48; Hawting, First Dynasty of Islam, 69, 73–76.

When he saw their numbers, however, he shouted for help. They said, "Shut up! One blow, and we relieve you from the terror of this night." Abū Shurayḥ al-Khuzā'ī observed them when (Ibn al-Ḥaysumān) shouted at them; they struck and killed him. Then the people surrounded [the place] and seized them. Among others, [the youths] included Zuhayr b. Jundub al-Azdī, Muwarri' b. Abī [2841] Muwarri' al-Asadī, and Shubayl b. Ubayy al-Azdī. Abū Shurayḥ and his son bore witness against them, [to the effect] that they had entered (Ibn al-Ḥaysumān's) house, some of them holding back others among the people, and then one of them had killed him. (Al-Walīd) wrote to 'Uthmān about (these young men), and he wrote back to put them to death. Thus, (al-Walīd) executed them at the gate of the Official Palace (al-qaṣr) in the square (al-raḥabah).

Concerning this (event) 'Amr b. 'Āṣim al-Tamīmī said:

Never feed on your neighbors immoderately,
O dissolute men, in the reign (mulk) of Ibn 'Affān.
For Ibn 'Affān, whom you have put to the test, has cut off thieves by the well-established law of [our] Salvation (al-furqān);
Without fail he acts in accordance with the Book, keeping close watch over every neck and fingertip among them.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Abdallāh b. Sa'īd—Abu Sa'īd: Abū Shurayḥ al-Khuzā'ī was one of the Companions of the Messenger of God, and he had moved from Medina to Kūfah in order to be closer to the campaigns [against the infidel]. One night, while he was on his roof, his neighbor suddenly shouted for help. He looked over, and there he was with some Kūfan youths who had plotted against him. They began saying to [this neighbor], "Don't shout! It'll only take one blow for us to finish you off!" Then they killed him. So (Abū Shurayḥ) went to 'Uthmān, returning with his family to Medina. When this story gained wide currency, the collective oath [2842] (qasāmah) was instituted for the first time, and thenceforth the statement of the murder victim's representative (walī) was accepted [as a valid accusation] against a [specified] group among the people, so that the people [as a whole] would abstain from killing.[75]

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad b. Kurayb—Nāfi' b. Jubayr: 'Uthmān said, "The collective oath is the responsibility of the accused and his close associates (awliyā'). Fifty men among them will be made to swear an oath if there is no clear proof [of the guilt of the accused]. If their collective oath falls short [of the requisite number] or if one man abstains, then their oath is to be rejected and the plaintiffs shall be made responsible for swearing [the oath], and if fifty of them do so, their claim [for retaliation] shall be recognized."[76]

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Ghuṣn b. al-Qāsim—'Awn b. 'Abdallāh: Among 'Uthmān's innovations in Kūfah, in addition to the things reported above, is the following. He learned that a public crier, acting on behalf of Abū Sammāl al-Asadī and a small band of Kūfans, would call out when the purveyors came [to the city], "Whoever is here from [the tribe of] Kalb or the Banū Such-and-Such, their tribe (qawm) has no assigned residence (manzil) in [the city]; Abū Sammāl[77] will be responsible for [giving him] a place to stay." So ['Uthmān] took over the site of the house of 'Aqīl, the visitors' house, and the house of Ibn Habbār. The residence of 'Abdallāh b. Mas'ūd was located among the Hudhayl [tribe] in the place of al-Ramādah; he had lived in the place where his house was, but then turned his house over to be the

---

75. walī al-dam—According to tribal custom [sanctioned by the Qur'ān], the victim's closest male relative was charged with avenging the blood of his kinsman by finding and putting to death his assailant, or by obtaining a suitable blood price (diyah). In Ḥanafī law [originally based on the custom of Kūfah], the qasāmah is an oath of innocence sworn fifty times by the inhabitants of a locality that they were not involved in the murder of a person whose corpse was found in their midst. Faced with such an oath, the walī al-dam could not demand blood retaliation and would have to settle for the blood price. In Mālikī law [based on the custom of ancient West Arabia], the qasāmah is a collective oath [also sworn fifty times] by the kinsmen of the slain man, through which they formally accuse and demand vengeance against an alleged murderer. See J. Pedersen and Y. Linant de Bellefonds, "Ḳasām," *EI*², IV, 689–90.

76. Hence 'Uthmān's ruling reflects—or rather [if we take this account at face value] underlies—both the Ḥanafī and Mālikī conception of the qasāmah.

77. Following Ibrāhīm's reading instead of the Leiden text.

guesthouse. Visitors resided in his house in the Hudhayl [quarter] when the area around the mosque became too restricted for them.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Mughīrah b. Muqsim—one who goes back to the time of the learned men of Kūfah: Abu Sammāl's public crier would call out in the marketplace and the Kunāsah,[78] "Whoever is here from the Banū Such-and-Such, and whoever has no assigned quarter (khiṭṭah) in [the city]—Abu Sammāl will be responsible for [giving him] a place to stay." So 'Uthmān took over certain residences [to provide] for visitors.

[2843] A similar account was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—a client (mawlā) of the clan of Ṭalḥah—Mūsā b. Ṭalḥah.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb had named al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah as fiscal officer over the bedouin of the Jazīrah, and he resided among the Banū Taghlib.[79] Now both in the Time of Ignorance and in [the era of] Islam, Abū Zubayd lived among the Banū Taghlib until he converted to Islam. The Banū Taghlib were his relatives on his mother's side [literally, his maternal uncles]; these relatives wronged him in regard to a debt owed to him, so al-Walīd seized on his behalf what was owed him. [Abū Zubayd] was grateful to him for this; he became devoted to him and came to visit him in Medina. Now when al-Walīd became governor of Kūfah, [Abū Zubayd] came greeting and extolling him, just as he was accustomed to do in the Jazīrah and Medina. The last time Abū Zubayd came to pay court to al-Walīd, he resided in the visitors' house (dār al-ḍīfān); he would go seek out 78. The Kunāsah was originally a dumping ground outside the settled compound in Kūfah, but by Umayyad times it had become a caravan station and open-air market, like the Mirbad of Baṣrah. Either this locale had already obtained its new function by the time of 'Uthmān, or the story contains a serious anachronism (not uncommon in Sayf's narratives). See H. Djait, "al-Kūfa," *EI*², V, 347.

79. The Banū Taghlib were a Christian tribe who had long since established themselves along the middle Euphrates; they were pastoralists, but kept sheep and goats rather than camels. After an initial phase of resistance, they joined the Muslim Arab forces during the Conquest period and were given a privileged tax status, but were allowed to maintain their Christian religion until well into the Umayyad period. On them see Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 218–20, 229–32, et passim; Donner, Early Islamic Conquests, 188, 251–53, et passim.

(the governor) and then return [to the visitors' house]. Before this time he was a Christian, but al-Walīd kept after him until , by the end of his governorship, he converted to Islam. His conversion was sincere and, when he became a Muslim, al-Walīd invited him to enter [his entourage], as he was a bedouin and poet at the time.

Now someone came to Abū Zaynab, Abū Muwarri', and Jundub, who were full of bitterness against (al-Walīd) because he had executed their sons; they were keeping a close eye on him. (The informer) said to them, "Do you know that al-Walīd is drinking with Abū Zubayd?" They became excited about this, and Abū Zaynab, Abu Muwarri', and Jundub said to a body of the leading men (wujūh) of Kūfah, "This man is your amir; Abū Zubayd is his chosen intimate, and they are both devotees of wine." Now al-Walīd's residence was in the central square (al-raḥabah) with [that of] 'Umārah b. 'Uqbah, and had no door. Then (the Kūfan [2844] notables) arose with (the three accusers) and stormed in upon him from the mosque, for the entryway (of his house) opened into the mosque.[80] Al-Walīd was taken completely by surprise and shoved something under the dais (al-sarīr). Without seeking permission, one of (the intruders) reached in and pulled (the object) out. There was a platter of grape seeds and stems, which al-Walīd had pushed aside only out of embarrassment, for they would see his platter with nothing but these leavings. Then (the intruders) got up and went out to the people; some of them began blaming others. When the people heard these things, they began to revile and curse them. Some groups (aqwām) were saying, "May God be angry with (the intruder)." But others said, "The Book [of God] compelled him [to do this], and it called upon them to examine [al-Walīd's doings] thoroughly." Now al-Walīd forgave them for this, concealing it from 'Uthmān and taking no steps among the people in regard to it. He disliked arousing dissension among them, so he kept silent about it and bore it patiently.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Fayḍ b. Muḥammad, who says: I saw al-Sha'bī sitting 80. In most of the early Islamic administrative centers, the governor's residence adjoined the mosque, usually on the qiblah side, thus permitting the governor to enter the mosque to lead the prayer without having to go outside. The arrangement is evidently both functional and symbolic.

with Muḥammad b. 'Amr b. al-Walīd—namely, (Walīd) b. 'Uqbah—who was the deputy (khalīfah) of Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik. Muḥammad (b. 'Amr) mentioned Maslamah's campaign,[81] and (al-Sha'bī) said, "If you could only go back to the time of al-Walīd's campaigns and governorship! If he mounted a campaign against such-and-such [a place], he neither fell short [of his goal], nor did anyone mutiny against him, that is, up to the time he was removed from office. The chamberlain in those times was 'Abd al-[2845] Raḥmān b. Rabī'ah al-Bāhilī.[82] And indeed, among the increased benefits that 'Uthmān b. 'Affān bestowed on the people through (al-Walīd) is that the surplus revenues were distributed to every slave (mamlūk) in Kūfah three [times] per month. By this means they were prospering, while their masters (mawālī) were not shortchanged of their rations (arzāq)."

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Ghuṣn b. al-Qāsim—'Awn b. 'Abdallāh:[83] Jundub and a band of men came to Ibn Mas'ūd and said, "al-Walīd is addicted to wine." They spread this around until it was generally talked about among the people.[84] Ibn Mas'ūd said, "If a man hides something from us, we do not pursue his flaws nor tear open his veil." Now (al-Walīd) sent for Ibn Mas'ūd, who came to [see] him; he rebuked him for this (statement), saying: "Would it be acceptable

---

81. Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik, a son of the famous Caliph. He had a small role in the Umayyad civil war of 743–44 and died with the other Umayyads at al-Saffāḥ's bloody banquet. See Ibn al-Athīr Kāmil (Beirut), IV, 519; V, 295, 394, 430. Maslamah, a son of 'Abd al-Malik by a slave mother, was commander of the unsuccessful siege of Constantinople in 715–17. A few years later, he suppressed the revolt of Yazīd b. al-Muhallab, and ultimately succeeded Muḥammad b. Marwān as governor of the Jazīrah and Armenia. His career is sketched in Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 317–19; Hawting, First Dynasty of Islam, 73, 76, 83. 'Āmir b. Sharāḥīl al-Sha'bī (d. ca. 721) was a famous traditionist and historian; he lived in Kūfah and is usually identified with a moderate pro-Alid tendency. On him see E. L. Petersen, 'Alī and Mu'āwiya in Early Arabic Tradition (Copenhagen: 1964), 28–51, et passim; G. H. A. Juynboll, Muslim Tradition (Cambridge: 1983), 19–20, 59. These facts suggest that this anecdote should be placed in the 710s.

82. wa-'alā 'l-bābi yawma'idhin 'Abdu 'l-Raḥmān. . . This clause appears to be parenthetical, and perhaps represents a marginal gloss incorporated by copyists into the text.

83. Text: 'Amr b. 'Abdallāh. I have followed de Goeje's emendation (Introductio, dcxxvi).

84. ḥattā ṭuriḥa 'alā alsuni 'l-nāsi: literally, "until it was thrown onto the tongues of the people."

for a man like you to respond to people who have suffered an unrequited injury as you have responded about me? What am I hiding? Such statements are only made about someone who is under suspicion." Then they heaped abuse on one another and separated in anger, but nothing else passed between them.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: A sorcerer was brought to al-Walīd, and he sent to Ibn Mas'ūd to inquire about the divinely ordained punishment[85] for him. (Ibn Mas'ūd) asked, "How do you know he is a sorcerer?" (Al-Walīd) replied, "This band of men"—that is, the band of men who had brought (the accused man)—"allege that he is a sorcerer." Then he said (to the accusers), "And how do you know that he is a sorcerer?" They replied, "He himself says so." (Al-Walīd) said, "Are you a sorcerer?" "Yes," he answered. (Al-Walīd) said, "And you know what sorcery is?" "Yes," he said, and sprang toward an ass. He began to mount it from its tail, making it appear to them that he was emerging from its mouth and buttocks. "Kill him," Ibn Mas'ūd said. Al-Walīd [2846] rushed off, and they cried out in the mosque that a man was playing with sorcery at al-Walīd's residence.

They approached, and Jundub seized (the opportunity) and stepped forward, saying, "Where is he? Where is he? Let me see him!" Then (Jundub) struck down (the sorcerer), and 'Abdallāh (b. Mas'ūd) and al-Walīd agreed to imprison (Jundub) until (al-Walīd) could write to 'Uthmān. 'Uthmān answered them as follows: "Obtain from (Jundub) an oath in God's name that he did not know your opinion (ra'y) regarding (the sorcerer), and that he is telling the truth when he states that he thought the divinely ordained penalty against him had been neglected. Reprimand him and let him go. Direct the people not to act on the basis of (their) personal suppositions nor to carry out the divinely ordained penalties without (authorization from) the government (al-sulṭān), for verily we restrain him who is in error and instruct him who does what is right." So (al-Walīd) did this with (Jundub); he was left alone because he had carried out a divinely ordained penalty.[86]

85. ḥadd; pl. ḥudūd. The punishments ordained in the Qur'ān for a limited number of offenses that "transgress God's limits." These are flogging for fornication, slander against virtuous women, and the drinking of intoxicants; severing of the hand for theft; and execution for highway robbery. See J. Schacht and B. Carra de Vaux, "Ḥadd," *EI*², III, 20–21.

Jundub's associates were angry on his account and went to Medina. Among them were Abū Khushshah al-Ghifārī and Jaththāmah b. Ṣa'b b. Jaththāmah, and Jundub [went along] with them. They sought al-Walīd's dismissal, but 'Uthmān said to them, "You are acting on the basis of personal supposition; you are in error about Islam, and you are coming here without permission, so go back." Thus he sent them home. When they returned to Kūfah, every man who nursed some grievance, without exception, came to see them. They [all] concurred on one opinion and expressed it publicly. Then they took advantage of al-Walīd's easy manner, for no curtain screened him off [from the public]. Thus, Abu Zaynab al-Azdī and Abu Muwarri' al-Asadī entered [his home] and snatched his signet ring; then they, along with a few individuals (nafar) known to be their supporters, went off to 'Uthmān and testified against him.

'Uthmān sent for [al-Walīd], and when he came, he put Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ in charge of him. [Sa'īd] said, "O Commander of the [2847] Faithful, I adjure you by God [not to act hastily], for by God these two are both aggrieved opponents [of al-Walīd]." ('Uthmān) responded, "That will bring you no harm; we are only acting in accordance with our information. If a man commits a wrong, God is responsible for taking vengeance against him; if a wrong is done to him, God is responsible for requiting him."

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Abu Ghassān Sakan b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ḥubaysh: A band of Kūfans got together and endeavored to have al-Walīd deposed. Abū Zaynab b. 'Awf and Abū Muwarri' b. Fūlān[87] al-Asadī were deputed to testify against him. So [this group] called on al-Walīd and clung to him assiduously. One day, while they were with him

86. The story is not entirely clear here, even when one identifies the antecedents of all the pronouns. 'Uthmān's intervention is required because Jundub's blow has killed the sorcerer. This intervention demonstrates both 'Uthmān's clemency and his determination to retain authority in his own hands. The version of al-Ya'qūbī (Ta'rīkh, II, 190), more concise but clearer, has the sorcerer appearing to enter the animal's buttocks and then reemerge from its mouth.

87. Literally, "the son of so-and-so"; that is, the father's name is not known to the narrator.

in [his] house, al-Walīd fell asleep. Now he had two wives in the bedchamber, separated from the group (qawm) by a curtain; one of them was the daughter of Dhū al-Khimār, the other the daughter of Abū 'Aqīl. The group dispersed, but Abū Zaynab and Abū Muwarri' stayed put. One of them took his signet ring, and then both of them left. Al-Walīd awoke [and found] his two wives sitting by his head. Not seeing his signet ring, he asked them about it; however, he found that they knew nothing. Then he said, "Which of the group stayed behind?" "Two men whom we do not know," answered the women, "for they have only recently been coming to visit you." "Describe them," he said. "One of them had a coarse mantle (khamīṣah) while the other wore an embroidered cloak (miṭraf),[88] and the one with the embroidered cloak was farther away from you," they answered. "[Was he] the tall one?" he asked. "Yes," they answered, "and the one wearing the coarse mantle was closer to you." "[Was he] the short one?" he asked. They responded, "Yes, and we saw his hand touching yours." He said, "That one is Abū Zaynab, and the other is Abū [2848] Muwarri'. They intend some dastardly deed; would that I knew what!" Then he sought for them but could not find them.

[Meantime] the two of them headed for Medina and approached 'Uthmān. With them was a small band made up of men whom 'Uthmān knew to be among those dismissed from [their] offices by al-Walīd. They all spoke to 'Uthmān, and he said, "Who testifies [against al-Walīd]?" "Abū Zaynab and Abū Muwarri'," they answered, "the others are too fearful." So 'Uthmān said, "How did you see [this]?"[89] "We were members of his entourage," they said. "We entered his presence and he was vomiting up wine." ['Uthmān] said, "Only a man who has been drinking wine vomits it up." Then he sent for [al-Walīd]. When he entered 'Uthmān's presence, he saw [his two accusers] and recited [this verse]:

---

88. These two items of clothing are described in M. M. Ahsan, Social Life under the Abbasids (London and New York: 1979), 40–41: "The miṭraf, a garment made of silk and richly embroidered, was a large piece of cloth, sometimes so large as to enfold the whole body of the wearer. . . . It was generally worn by rich people and high dignitaries." The khamīṣah in contrast "was a long coarse stuff that could be used as a blanket," or "a black square blanket having two borders."

89. Text: Kayfa ra'aytumā. It might also mean, "What did he look like to you?"

I had no fear at all regarding a matter where I was alone, so I did not fear thee prying into such things.

Then al-Walīd swore [his innocence] to ('Uthmān) and told him his story. 'Uthmān said, "We shall carry out the divinely ordained penalty [for wine drinking], and the false witness will bring hellfire upon himself. Suffer patiently, dear brother!" Then he gave the command to Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ and he flogged (al-Walīd)—an act that has left a legacy of enmity between their two sons even to the present day. Al-Walīd was wearing a coarse mantle the day his flogging was ordered, and 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib ripped it from him.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Ubayd al-Ṭanāfisī—Abū 'Ubaydah al-Iyādī: Abū Zaynab and Abū Muwarri' set out and entered al-Walīd's presence at his house. Two women were there, the daughter of Dhū al-Khimār and the daughter of Abū 'Aqīl, and he was asleep. One of the two women said: "One (of these visitors) bent over him and took his signet ring." (Al-Walīd) asked the two women about it when he woke up, and they said, "We didn't take it." "Who was the last of the group (qawm) to remain behind?" asked (al-Walīd). The women responded, "Two men—a short one wearing a coarse mantle [2849] and a tall one wearing an embroidered cloak—and we saw the one with the coarse mantle bending over you." "That was Abū Zaynab," he said; he set out to look for the two men. Just then they were heading away from a crowd of their associates, while al-Walīd did not understand what they meant to do. The two men came to 'Uthmān and told their story [namely, about al-Walīd's behavior] to him in the presence of the people. So ('Uthmān) sent for al-Walīd; he came, and lo and behold, there were (his two accusers). 'Uthmān summoned them and said, "How do you testify? Do you testify that you saw him drinking wine?" "No," they responded fearfully. 'Uthmān said, "How then [do you testify]?" "We wrung his beard," they said, "as he was vomiting up wine." So ('Uthmān) gave orders to Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ. He flogged (al-Walīd). Thus a legacy of enmity has been left between their two families.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Aṭīyyah—Abū al-'Arīf and Yazīd al-Faq'asī: In regard to al-Walīd, the people were divided into two factions, the ordinary folk ('āmmah) on his side, and the elite (khāṣṣah) against him. In regard to this (issue), they were diffident until [the battle of] Ṣiffīn.[90] Then Mu'āwiyah took power (waliya) and they began to say, "'Uthmān accused [al-Walīd] without cause." But 'Alī said to them, "In your censure of 'Uthmān, you are really like the man who thrusts a lance through himself in order to kill the rider seated behind him. What was 'Uthmān's sin in regard to a man whom he struck because of his deeds[91] and dismissed from his office? And what was 'Uthmān's sin in what he did regarding us?"[92]

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb— [2850]
Sayf—Muḥammad b. Kurayb—Nāfi' b. Jubayr: 'Uthmān said, "When someone is flogged [in accordance with] the divinely ordained penalty and then manifests his repentance, his testimony becomes legally acceptable."

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Abū Kibrān—a female client (mawlāt) of theirs whom he commended highly: Al-Walīd had brought prosperity to the people, to such a degree that he began to distribute shares (yuqsimu) to serving girls and slaves.[93] Both free men and slaves were deeply

90. One of the most controversial events in Islamic history, Ṣiffīn was a battle in the summer of 37/657 between Iraqi (mostly Kūfan) forces loyal to 'Uthmān's successor 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib and Syrian forces led by the governor of Syria, Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān, who had challenged 'Alī's right to the caliphate on the grounds that he had received his office from the rebels who had murdered 'Uthmān. The battle was inconclusive and led to an even more bitterly disputed arbitration issuing in the formal deposition of 'Alī, though he continued the struggle against Mu'āwiyah until his own death at the hands of an assassin in 40/661. On Ṣiffīn see L. Veccia Vaglieri, "'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib," *EI*², I, 383–84; E. L. Petersen, "'Alī and Mu'āwiyah: The Rise of the Umayyad Caliphate 656–61," Acta Orientalia, XXIII (1959), 181–96; M. Hinds, "The Siffin Arbitration Agreement," JSS, XVII (1972), 93–102; Hawting, First Dynasty of Islam, 28–30.

91. Reading bi-fi'lihi instead of bi-qawlihi. See de Goeje, Introductio, dcxxvi.

92. Presumably the reference is to 'Uthmān's being chosen by the shūrā (electoral council) to succeed 'Umar rather than 'Alī. The point (in opposition to Shi'ite views) is that 'Alī admits that 'Uthmān did nothing wrong to obtain the election.

93. Presumably this means that he began to pay stipends drawn from the taxes paid on the conquered lands not only to the Muslim Arab soldiers (muqātilah) but also to persons who, as chattels of these soldiers, could have had no claim to a share of revenues derived from conquest. It might also mean that he distributed actual land shares in the newly conquered territories; on this possibility see Donner, Early Islamic Conquests, 241–42. The story is probably a subtle piece of anti-Abbasid or anti-Shu'ūbī propaganda, intending to show that the Umayyads strove to do justice to all believers, whatever their personal status or ethnic origin.

distressed at (his deposition), and the serving girls, clad in mourning garments, were heard reciting:

Woe, al-Walīd has been deposed,
while Sa'īd has brought us hunger;
The measure [of rations] does not increase but shrinks, and maidservants and slaves are made to starve.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Ghuṣn b. al-Qāsim: When al-Walīd was deposed and Sa'īd named governor, the people used to say:

Let not kingship be far off, since its traits have fled, nor leadership, when scribes have become chiefs.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah, according to their [usual] chain of transmission: Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ arrived [in Kūfah] in the seventh year of 'Uthmān's caliphate. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ was the best of [the lineage of] al-'Āṣ b. Umayyah, and his family (ahl) was numerous and unbroken from generation to generation. When God conquered Syria [for the Muslims], (Sa'īd) went there and resided with Mu'āwiyah, having been an orphan who had grown up under 'Uthmān's care. Now 'Umar was mindful of [the tribe of] Quraysh, and he asked after (Sa'īd) as part of his inquiry into the affairs of the people. He was told, "O Commander of the Faithful, (Sa'īd) is [2851] in Damascus in the care of one who is looking after him attentively [namely, Mu'āwiyah], and he is mortally wounded.[94] So ('Umar) sent Mu'āwiyah [the following order]: "Dispatch Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ to me in a litter." So (Mu'āwiyah) sent him to ('Umar), though he was desperately ill, and no sooner did he reach Medina than he recovered.

('Umar) said, "Nephew, I have heard of your courage and uprightness; grow [in these qualities] and God will cause you to grow in prosperity." ('Umar) said, "Do you have a wife?" "No," replied (Sa'īd). ('Umar) said, "Abū 'Amr [namely, 'Uthmān], what has kept you from finding a spouse for this young man?" "I did offer [a bride] to him," said ('Uthmān), "but he refused." Then ('Umar) went out on a journey into the desert and at last came to a watering place. There he encountered four women. They stood up before him, and he said, "What are you doing, and who are you?" "[We are] the daughters of Sufyān b. 'Uwayf," they answered. Their mother was with them, and she said, "[I am] their mother. Our menfolk have perished, and if the men have perished, the women are lost. So find suitable marriage partners for [these girls]." Thus, ('Umar) married Sa'īd to one of them, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf to another, and al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah to the third. Then the daughters of Mas'ūd b. Nu'aym al-Nahshalī came to ('Umar) and said, "Our men have died and [only] the youths are left, so find suitable marriage partners for us." Thus, he married Sa'īd to one and Jubayr b. Muṭ'im to another, and Sa'īd participated in [marriages with] both of these [families]. His uncles were men of long experience and early precedence in Islam, and had standing with the Messenger of God. Now 'Umar did not die before Sa'īd had become one of the leading men among the people.

94. Huwa bi-Dimashqa 'ahdu 'l-'āhidi bihi wa-huwa ma'mūmun bi'l-mawt.

Sa'īd came to Kūfah as governor during the caliphate of 'Uthmān. With him, from Mecca or Medina, set out al-Ashtar, [2852]
Abū Khushshah al-Ghifārī, Jundub b. 'Abdallāh, and Abū Muṣ'ab b. Jaththāmah. These were among the men who had gone with al-Walīd to accuse him; now they were returning with [Sa'īd]. [Upon arriving in Kūfah] Sa'īd mounted the pulpit. He praised and extolled God, and then said: "By God, I have been sent to you though I did not want to come. But, having been given an order, I found no way to evade carrying it out. Truly dissension (fitnah) has raised its snout and eyes, and by God I shall strike it in the face until I suppress it or it defeats me. Truly my soul is troubled today." Then he stepped down.

He inquired about the inhabitants of Kūfah and was preoccupied with their situation. He wrote to 'Uthmān about what he had learned [as follows]: "The affairs of the Kūfans are in turmoil. The nobles among them, the men of distinguished family (buyūtāt), and the veterans of the early campaigns (ahl al-sābiqah wa'l-qudmah) have been overwhelmed, and the dominant element in these lands are recent immigrants and bedouin who have attached themselves [to the regular forces. It has gotten] to the point that one does not see a man of noble lineage or experience among the settlers or youth (of this place)."[95] 'Uthmān wrote back [as follows]: "To proceed: Among those to whom God granted the conquest of these lands, give preference to the veterans of the early campaigns. Then let those who settled here because of (those veterans) be subordinate to them, unless the latter regard [their] obligations as a burden and fail to perform them, while (the newcomers) do strive to carry out their duties. Keep everyone in his proper rank, and give them all their due measure. For through knowledge about the people is justice attained."

Then Sa'īd sent to the leading men among the veterans of the [2853] first battles in Iraq (ahl al-ayyām) and of al-Qādisiyyah, saying: "You are the 'faces' of those behind you, and the face speaks on behalf of the body. So convey to us the needs of those who are lacking and in want." Then he placed with them as many late joiners and recent immigrants as he could.[96] He secluded himself with Qur'ān reciters (qurrā') and men devoted to prayer in his

95. A crucial passage for the early history of Kūfah. A major source of social and political tension in the city was the difference in status, pay, and privileges between Arab soldiers who participated in the earliest Iraqi campaigns and those who arrived there after the conquests. In this passage, the former class are termed ahl al-sābiqah wa'l-qudmah. Sābiqah refers to priority in conversion to Islam, and under 'Umar's administrative system early converts typically enjoyed both higher status and a higher pay scale. A literal translation of the Arabic phrase would thus be "men of religious priority and precedence." The usual terms for the second class are rawādif, "those who follow behind, latecomers, recent immigrants"; and lawāḥiq, "those who join, attach themselves to others." Such latecomers began to flow into Kūfah (apparently in separate waves or blocs) in 'Umar's last years, but do not seem to have posed an explosive problem until 'Uthmān's time. This issue has been extensively albeit inconclusively discussed in the recent literature; see Caetani, Annali, VII, 358–60; Donner, Early Islamic Conquests, 231–39; Hinds, "Kūfan Political Alignments and Their Background in the Mid-Seventh Century A.D.," IJMES, II (1971), 349, 352–56; Shaban, Islamic History, I, 44–55 (to be read critically); Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 242, 256.

96. The point here is that these people would be officially recognized as muqātilah and as such would be paid stipends (albeit at a reduced rate) from the public treasury. However, they would not be registered as a separate group in their own right, but would be attached to the established tribal and section leaders (the wujūh), through whom their pay would be distributed to them. Thus, the newcomers were integrated into the existing administrative structure, but at the same time were locked into a visibly inferior status.

evening gatherings. It was as if Kūfah were dry tinder engulfed by a fire; people kept entirely to their own class, and gossip and rumor were everywhere.

Sa'īd wrote to 'Uthmān about this, and 'Uthmān's herald called out, "The [next] prayer will be performed with the congregation." [The Medinese] assembled, and ['Uthmān] informed them of what he had written to Sa'īd, and what [the latter] had written to him concerning [the Kūfans]. He also told them of the gossip and rumor that he had heard. "You have done the right thing," [his hearers] said, "Do not humor [the Kūfans] in this, and do not let them aspire after something for which they are not fit. For if someone undertakes matters in which he is incompetent, he cannot manage them and [instead] corrupts them." Then 'Uthmān said, "People of Medina, prepare yourselves and hold fast, for dissensions (fitan) have crept in among you." Then he stepped down [from the pulpit] and repaired to his dwelling. And he quoted [these verses] as a proverb about himself and the kind [of people] who had begun quarreling:

Banū 'Ubayd, have your partisans heard what you say, and the poet's verse about you?
If you have heard these things, gird yourselves;
for javelins have eyes for the unarmored man.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Hishām b. 'Urwah: 'Uthmān had the people learn to recite one line [of the poem], then two lines, and [finally] lines three to five. [2854]

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Sa'īd b. 'Abdallāh al-Jumaḥī—'Ubaydallāh b. 'Umar, who says, I heard him [sic] say to my father: 'Uthmān assembled the Medinese and said, "Men of Medina, the people are tossing and turning in dissension. By God, I will surely recover your [property] for you so that I may transfer it to you, if you think that is right. Is it your opinion that those who shared with the settlers in Iraq (ahl al-'Irāq) in the conquests should go and reside there with them in their lands?" Then ['Uthmān's listeners] rose up and said, "O Commander of the Faithful, how will you transfer to us those lands [in Iraq] that God has given us as booty?" He responded,

"We shall sell it to anyone who wishes in exchange for his [present] holdings in the Ḥijāz."[97]

They were delighted, and God thereby opened up for them an opportunity (amr) that they had not counted on. So they dispersed, and by (this means) God gave them deliverance from (dissension). All the lots (suhmān) in Khaybar, in addition to his other holdings, were combined together by Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh. Thus, in exchange for his properties in Khaybar and other places, Ṭalḥah purchased al-Nashāstaj, which was part of the assigned share (naṣīb) [of conquered land in Iraq] that belonged to those Medinese who had fought at al-Qādisiyyah and Ctesiphon, but had remained [in Medina] without emigrating to Iraq to settle. (Ṭalḥah) also purchased, in exchange for the Well of Arīs, a property (shay') of 'Uthmān's in Iraq. Marwān b. al-Ḥakam purchased the River of Marwān, which at that time was a swampy canebrake, from ('Uthmān) in exchange for a property of his that [2855] 'Uthmān had given to him. Certain men from the tribes in Iraq who were drawn from the inhabitants of Medina, Mecca, al-Ṭā'if, Yemen, and Ḥaḍramawt, purchased (land in Iraq) in exchange for properties that they had in the Arabian Peninsula.[98] Among that which al-Ash'ath purchased from ('Uthmān), in exchange for a property of his in Ḥaḍramawt, was a holding in Tīzanābādh.

'Uthmān wrote to the inhabitants of the frontier provinces (ahl al-āfāq) about this (exchange), about the number of jarībs [99]of

97. This and the following paragraphs report a property exchange devised by 'Uthmān to turn public lands in Iraq over to Medinese and Iraqi notables, while obtaining control of some of the wealthiest estates in the Ḥijāz for the caliphate. This policy ensured that the Caliph would have greater revenues under his direct control, while rewarding and presumably reinforcing the loyalty of the leading class in the Muslim community. The ordinary tribesmen in Iraq were of course disadvantaged by this—another cause of the tensions that would ultimately lead to revolt against 'Uthmān. On this exchange see Caetani, Annali, VII, 360–62; and M. Hinds, "Kûfan Political Alignments," 359–60. I have been unable to identify the place names given here. As Caetani notes, this account is "singolarmente oscura."

98. Wa'shtarā minhu rijālun min 'l-qabā'ili bi'l-'Irāqi bi-amwālin kānat lahum fī Jazīrati 'l-'Arabi min ahli 'l-Madīnati wa-Makkata wa'l-Ṭā'ifi wa'l-Yamani wa-Ḥaḍramawta.

99. The jarīb was the standard unit of land in Iraq; in the Sawād (alluvial plain) it was equivalent to sixty square cubits—roughly .16 hectares or .4 acres. See Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 100–4, 531.

conquered land (fay'), and about the conquered land that the inhabitants of the garrison towns had claimed for themselves. (The conquered land) had belonged to the kings, such as Chosroes and Caesar, and to the inhabitants of their dominions who had succeeded them. They had then been abandoned by them. Thus, something was carried out for (the people) that they knew to be good. ('Uthmān) took the [conquered lands] in proportion to the number of the Medinese who had participated in (the conquests in Iraq) and in proportion to their assigned share [of the conquered land]; he then assigned (these lands) to them. They purchased (the newly assigned lands) in exchange for nearby properties in the Ḥijāz, Mecca, the Yemen, and Ḥaḍramawt. (Conquered land in Iraq) was transferred to the inhabitants (of these districts) who were Medinese and who had participated in the conquests.[100]

A similar account was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah, except as follows: Men from every tribe who had property there [that is, in Iraq] purchased this category [of land], for they wished to take it in exchange for their nearby holdings [in Arabia]. Thus, they took possession [of the conquered lands]; this was lawful for them since it was based on mutual agreement with them and with the people [as a whole] and on a confirmation of [their] rightful claims. However, those who were not veterans of the early campaigns[101] did not obtain as much as those who enjoyed priority [in conversion to Islam], precedence in the councils, leadership, and prestige. Then (the men of lower status) censured [such] preferential treatment, regarding it as an act of harshness and contempt. They concealed [their true feelings] concerning this matter, barely letting them become known, since they had no documentary proof (ḥujjah) [to support their claims]; the people were against them. [2856]
Now if some late joiner, whether youth, bedouin, or freedman, attached himself to (these malcontents), he would approve of their speech. Thus, (the malcontents) were on the increase and the people were decreasing [in proportion]. As a result, evil prevailed.

100. A somewhat conjectural reading of this passage: wa-akhadha bi-qadri 'iddati man shahadahā min ahli 'l-Madīnati wa-bi-qadri naṣībihim wa-ḍamma dhālika ilayhim fa-bā'ūhu bi-mā yalīhim min 'l-amwāli bi'l-Ḥijāzi wa-Makkata wa'l-Yamani wa-Ḥaḍramawta yuraddu 'alā ahlihā 'lladhīna shahadū 'l-futūḥa min bayni ahli 'l-Madīnati.

101. alladhīna lā sābiqita lahum wa-la qudmata. See above, note 91.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: Ḥudhayfah was transferred from the Rayy campaign to the campaign against al-Bāb[102] in order to reinforce ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Rabīʿah, and Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣ accompanied him as far as Ādharbayjān. Thus, they lent support to the people. [Saʿīd] remained [there] until Ḥudhayfah came back, and then they both returned [to Kūfah].

In this year—that is, the year 30 (650–51)—the signet ring of the Messenger of God fell from ʿUthmān's hand into the Well of Arīs, which lay some two miles [103]from Medina. It was one of the poorest wells in [yield of] water, but its bottom has not been plumbed until this very hour.

How the Signet Ring Fell from ʿUthmān's Hand into the Well of Arīs

It was related to me by Muḥammad b. Mūsā al-Ḥarashī—Abū Khalaf ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĪsā al-Khazzāz, the associate (sharīk) of Yūnis b. ʿUbayd—Dāwūd b. Abī Hind—ʿIkrimah—Ibn ʿAbbās: The Messenger of God decided to write letters to the non-Arabs (aʿājim), summoning them to Almighty God. A certain man said to him, "O Messenger of God, they will not accept a letter unless it is sealed." So the Messenger of God ordered a signet ring to be [2857] fashioned out of iron for him, and he placed it on his finger. Then Gabriel came to him and said, "Take it from thy finger." The Messenger of God did so and ordered another signet ring to be made for him. A new signet ring was thus fashioned for him out of copper, and he placed it on his finger. Then Gabriel said to him, "Take it from thy finger." The Messenger of God did so and ordered a signet ring of silver. A signet ring of silver was fashioned for him, and he placed it on his finger. [This time] Gabriel con-

102. Bāb al-Abwāb, the Caspian seaport of Darband, which stood astride the main corridor through the Caucasus; it marked the northern limits of the early Arab conquests in this region. See D. M. Dunlop, "Bāb al-Abwāb," *EI*², I, 835–36; Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 180.

103. The Arabic mile (mīl) is equal to one-third of a farsakh—that is, about two km. See W. Hinz, Islamische Masse und Gewichte, 63. See also below, note 119.

sented to it, and commanded that "Muḥammad, the Messenger of God" be engraved upon it. Then (Muḥammad) began sealing [his correspondence] with it and writing to those non-Arabs to whom he had decided to write. The inscription on the signet was in three lines.

He wrote a letter to Kisrā b. Hurmuz[104] and sent it with 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb. 'Umar brought it to Kisrā and it was recited aloud, but he paid no heed to (the Prophet's) letter. 'Umar said, "O Messenger of God, may God make me thy ransom! You sit upon a couch woven out of palm fibers, while Kisrā b. Hurmuz sits upon a throne of gold covered with brocade." The Messenger of God replied, "Are you not content for them to have this world while we have the next?" "May God make me thy ransom," said 'Umar, "I am content." (The Prophet) wrote a second letter and sent it with Diḥyah b. Khalīfah al-Kalbī to Heraclius, Emperor of the Byzantines, summoning him to Islam. (Heraclius) recited it aloud, pressed it to himself, and placed it nearby.

Thus, the Messenger of God wore the signet ring on his finger until Almighty God took him. Then Abū Bakr became caliph and wore it until Almighty God took him. Afterwards 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb ruled, and he began wearing it until God took him. Then [2858] after him 'Uthmān b. 'Affān ruled and wore it for six years. He dug a well in Medina to supply water for the Muslims. He was sitting on the edge of the well and began fiddling with the ring and twisting it around his finger. The ring slipped off and fell into the well. They searched for it and [even] drained the well of its water, but without success. ('Uthmān) established a magnificent reward for anyone who could bring it [to him] and became deeply depressed on account of (the lost ring). When he despaired of [finding] the signet ring, he ordered another one like it in form and appearance and made of silver to be fashioned for him.[105] On it was engraved "Muḥammad, the Messenger of God." Then ('Uthmān) placed it on his finger until he perished. When he was 104. Khusraw Parviz or Chosroes II, regn. 592–628, not only a symbol of imperial grandeur but also of overweening pride, which brought down not only himself but his kingdom.

105. A somewhat conjectural reading: amara fa-ṣuni' a lahu khātamun ahkaru mithlahu ḥalaqahu/khilquhu min fiḍḍatin 'alā mithālihi wa-shibhihi.

murdered the ring disappeared from his hand, and no one knew who had taken it.

The Reports Concerning Abū Dharr [al-Ghifārī][106]

In this year—that is, the year 30 (650–51)—occurred (the events) that have been recorded about the affair of Abū Dharr and Muʿāwiyah, and about Muʿāwiyah's exiling him from Syria to Medina. Many things have been recorded as to why he sent him into exile, most of which I am loathe to mention. As for those who excuse Muʿāwiyah in this (affair), they have told a story (qiṣṣah) about it [which runs as follows]:

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī, stating that Shuʿayb had personally recited [it] to him (ḥaddathahu) on the authority of Sayf—ʿAṭiyyah—Yazīd al-Faqʿasī: When Ibn al-Sawdāʾ[107] came to Syria he met Abū Dharr and said, "Abū Dharr, are you not astonished at Muʿāwiyah for saying, 'The public mon-[2859] eys are God's property.'[108] Verily, everything belongs to God. [It is] as if he intends to seize it [for himself] to the exclusion of the Muslims and to efface the Muslims' names [from the fiscal registers]." Abū Dharr came to (Muʿāwiyah) and said, "What leads you to use the term 'God's property' for the public moneys of the Muslims?" "God be merciful to you, Abū Dharr," responded Muʿāwiyah. "Are we not God's slaves, the public moneys His

106. The matter of Abū Dharr is discussed at length in Caetani, Annali, VII, 365–79, with references to the other principal accounts, especially the pro-Shiʿite versions of Yaʿqūbī and Masʿūdī. To these add Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, pp. 52–56, whose account mainly follows the tradition of al-Wāqidī and Abū Mikhnaf. Abū Dharr has always been regarded by Shiʿites as a voice protesting the corruption of ʿUthmān's regime and calling for a restoration of the ascetic piety and social equality of the original community. It is not surprising that Abū Dharr has become a potent figure in the ideology of contemporary Islamic radicals. On his life and significance, see Cameron, Abu Dharr.

107. Literally, "son of the black woman." A name for the sinister ʿAbdallāh b. Sabāʾ, a legendary (and perhaps fictitious) figure whom a certain strand of tradition identified as the principal source of political dissension as well as extremist Shiʿite ideas in early Islam. He is supposed to have been a converted Yemeni Jew. This report marks his first appearance in Ṭabarī's chronicle; here and later, Sayf b. ʿUmar is the main authority for his activities. On him see M. G. S. Hodgson, "ʿAbd Allāh b. Sabāʾ," *EI*², I, 51.

108. al-mālu mālu ʾllāh.

property, the created world His creation, and public authority [al-amr] His authority?" [Abū Dharr] said, "Do not use this expression." He continued, "Indeed, I do not say that [the public moneys] do not belong to God, but I shall call them 'the property of the Muslims.'"

[The narrator] continues: Ibn al-Sawdā' came to Abū al-Dardā',[109] who said to him, "Who are you? By God, I think you are a Jew!" Then he came to 'Ubādah b. al-Ṣāmit and attached himself to him. ['Ubādah] brought him to Mu'āwiyah and said, "By God, this is the man who provoked Abū Dharr against you." Now Abū Dharr rose up in Syria and began saying, "O men of wealth, show charity to the poor. To 'those who treasure up gold and silver and do not expend them in the way of God,' declare [that there will be] branding irons from a fire, 'and therewith their foreheads and their sides and their backs shall be branded.'"[110] He persisted in such [statements] until the poor were set aflame and compelled the rich to do this, and until the rich complained about [the behavior] that they were encountering from the people.

Mu'āwiyah wrote [as follows] to 'Uthmān: "Abū Dharr has become a problem for me, and his case has involved such-and-such matters." 'Uthmān wrote him [in response]: "Verily dissension has protruded its snout and eyes and is poised to jump. Do not scrape the scab, but rather dispatch Abū Dharr to me. Send a guide along with him, give him adequate provisions, and treat him gently. Restrain the people and yourself as far as you can, for you will keep control [of affairs] only so long as you keep control of yourself."

So [Mu'āwiyah] sent Abū Dharr away accompanied by a guide. [2860]
When [Abū Dharr] reached Medina and saw the homes [majālis] at the foot of Sal',[111] he said, "Declare to the Medinese [that they will suffer] a devastating attack and a terrible war." Then he

---

109. Abū al-Dardā' al-Anṣārī al-Khazrajī, a Medinese Companion revered for his ascetic piety and his knowledge of the Qur'ān. We are told that he was sent to Damascus to serve as a qāḍī there: in any event, he died and was buried there in 32 [652]. See A. Jeffery, "Abū 'l-Dardā'," *EI*², I, 113–14.

110. Qur'ān 9:34–35.

111. Sal' is a hill on the outskirts of Medina, about a kilometer northwest of the Prophet's Mosque.

entered 'Uthmān's presence, and ('Uthmān) said, "Abū Dharr, why are the Syrians complaining about the wounds inflicted by you?" (Abū Dharr) informed him that it was improper to say, "God's property," nor was it proper for the rich to grasp after wealth. ('Uthmān) responded, "Abū Dharr, I must carry out my own obligations and take what is owed by the subjects (ra'iyyah). I cannot compel them to be ascetics; rather, I am required to summon them to heed God's commandments and to follow the path of moderation." (Abū Dharr) said, "Then permit me to leave, for Medina is no home for me." ('Uthmān) replied, "And will you replace it save with [someplace] worse?" (Abū Dharr) said, "The Messenger of God commanded me to leave (Medina) when the built-up area (al-binā') reached Sal'." "Well, do as he commanded you," said 'Uthmān.

(The narrator) continues: So (Abū Dharr) set out until he settled in al-Rabadhah, and there he traced out a mosque.[112] 'Uthmān allocated to him a small herd of camels and gave him two slaves (mamlūkayn). He also instructed him [as follows]: "Bind yourself to Medina by compact, lest you revert to being a bedouin." (Abū Dharr) did so.[113]

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad b. 'Awn—'Ikrimah—Ibn 'Abbās: Fearing [that he might revert to] the bedouin way of life, Abū Dharr traveled repeatedly from al-Rabadhah to Medina, though he loved isolation and seclusion. [Once] he entered 'Uthmān's presence, and there with him was Ka'b al-Aḥbār. (Abū Dharr) said to 'Uthmān, "Be not content that the people refrain from wrongdoing until they strive for the good. One who fulfills the alms tax (zakāt) should not confine himself to that until he treats neighbors and 112. wa-khaṭṭa bihā masjidan. A mosque need not be a building, but can be any patch of ground, properly oriented toward Mecca, which has been marked off and set aside for the ritual prayer. The earliest mosques in the great garrison towns of Iraq appear to have been just such open spaces. See J. Pedersen, "Masdjid," SEI, 331.

---

113. Since Abū Dharr was living outside any settled community of Muslims, it was necessary for him to demonstrate his adherence to Islam and his acceptance of the political and religious authority of the Caliph through a formal pact of submission, precisely as Muḥammad had required the bedouin tribes to do during his lifetime. See Donner, Early Islamic Conquests, 263–67, for 'Umar's attitudes toward the bedouin.

brothers generously and brings [benefit to his] kinsmen." Ka'b said, "He who fulfills the divine commandment (farīḍah) has fully met his obligations." Then Abū Dharr raised his staff and [2861] struck him, cracking open [his head]. 'Uthmān asked (Abū Dharr) for (the staff) and he turned it over to him. ('Uthmān) said, "Abū Dharr, fear God and restrain thy hand and tongue." For (the latter) had said to (Ka'b), "Son of the Jewess, what are you doing here? By God, you will learn from me, or I shall do violence to you."

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Ash'ath b. Siwār—Muḥammad b. Sīrīn: Abū Dharr went away to al-Rabadhah on his own account when he saw that 'Uthmān did not incline to him, and Mu'āwiyah expelled his household after him. They set forth to [join] him, taking with them a sack almost too heavy to carry.[114] (Mu'āwiyah) said, "Look at the possessions of this man who proclaims the renunciation of this world!" But (Abū Dharr's) wife responded, "No, by God, it contains neither gold nor silver coins, but only copper ones, so that if his official salary ('aṭā') runs out, he can take some small coins from it for our necessities."

When Abū Dharr settled in al-Rabadhah, the ritual prayer was performed under the leadership of a man who was in charge of the alms tax (al-ṣadaqah).[115] He said, "Come forward [to lead the prayer], Abū Dharr." He replied, "No, you go forward, for the Messenger of God said to me, 'Listen and obey, even if a crop-nosed slave be set over you.' You are a slave, though not crop-nosed." This man, a black named Mujāshi', was one of the slaves acquired through the alms tax (raqīq al-ṣadaqah).

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Mubashshir b. al-Fuḍayl—Jābir: Every day 'Uthmān be-114. wa-ma'ahum jirābun yuthqilu yada 'l-rajuli.

---

115. The word used in the preceding paragraph for alms tax is zakāt, while here it is ṣadaqah. Both words occur in the Qur'ān as financial obligations owed by the believers as acts of purity and sincerity. The Qur'ānic distinction, if any, between them is not clearly defined. In later times zakāt came to refer to the compulsory alms tax levied upon Muslims, while ṣadaqah had more the sense of voluntary alms, though it often continued to be an exact synonym for zakāt. See T. H. Weir, "Ṣadaḳa," SEI, 483–84; and J. Schacht, "Zakāt," SEI, 654–56. Donner, Early Islamic Conquests, 252, 265, argues that there was a systematic distinction during the Conquest period at least: ṣadaqah would refer to the tax on animals levied against Muslim nomads, while zakāt meant the tax paid by settled Muslims.

stowed the leg of a slaughtered camel on Abū Dharr and the same on Rāfiʿ b. Khadīj. Both of them had withdrawn from Medina because something they had heard was not explained to them. They tried to understand [this statement] but were bested [in discussion about it].

[2862] It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad b. Sūqah—ʿĀṣim b. Kulayb—Salamah b. Nabātah: We set out to perform the Lesser Pilgrimage[116] and came to al-Rabadhah. We looked for Abū Dharr in his house but did not find him. (The people there) said, "He has gone to the watering place." We withdrew and made camp near his house. Then he passed by with a camel's leg, which a servant boy was helping him to carry. He greeted us and then went on to his house. He stayed [there] only briefly before returning. Sitting down before us, he said, "The Messenger of God said to me, 'Listen and obey, even if a crop-nosed Abyssinian be set over you.' I settled at this oasis, and some of the slaves acquired by the Public Treasury (raqīq māl Allāh) were in authority over it, and over them was set an Abyssinian, albeit not crop-nosed. I did not know him, but I commend him highly. Every day they have a slaughter camel, and from it I get a leg that I and my household eat." I [namely, the narrator Salamah b. Nabātah] said, "What do you get from the Treasury?" "A small herd of sheep and a troop of camels," he answered. "My servant boy takes care of one, my serving girl the other, and my servant boy will be free at the New Year." (Ibn Nabātah) continues: I said, "Indeed your companions in our presence here are the wealthiest of the people." (Abū Dharr) answered, "Certainly they have no claim on the Public Treasury that I do not equally have."

As for the other (narrators of these events), they recount many things concerning them, repugnant matters that I am loath to repeat.

In this year, according to one (authority), Yazdagird b. Shahriyār fled from Fārs to Khurāsān.

---

116. On this ritual see R. Paret, "'Umra," SEI, 604–6. The ʿumrah, in contrast to the ḥajj proper, may be performed at any time of year; the rites are those of the earlier stages of the ḥajj (circumambulation of the Kaʿbah, running between al-Ṣafā and al-Marwah), but there is no visitation of the sacred places outside Mecca and no sacrifice at the conclusion of the ceremonies.

[The Flight of Yazdagird from Fārs to Khurāsān]

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad [al-Madā'inī]—Maslamah—Dāwūd: Ibn 'Āmir arrived in Baṣrah; then he set out for Fārs and [2863] conquered it. Yazdagird fled from Jūr—which is [the chief town of the district of] Ardashīr-Khurrah[117]—in the year 30 (650–51). Ibn 'Āmir sent Mujāshi' b. Mas'ūd al-Sulamī in pursuit, and he followed [Yazdagird] to Kirmān. Mujāshi' made camp with the army at al-Sīrajān,[118] while Yazdagird fled to Khurāsān. According to [al-Madā'inī], [the tribe of] 'Abd al-Qays states that Ibn 'Āmir sent Harim b. Ḥayyān al-'Abdī [in pursuit of Yazdagird], while [the tribe of] Bakr b. Wā'il says that he dispatched Ibn Ḥassān al-Yashkurī. [Al-Madā'inī] says: The soundest [identification] in our opinion is Mujāshi'.

According to 'Alī [b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī]—Salamah b. 'Uthmān, who was an accomplished man—a scholar (shaykh) among the inhabitants of Kirmān, and al-Faḍl al-Kirmānī—his father: Al-Mujāshi' set out from al-Sīrajān and followed Yazdagird. While he was at the castle in Bīmand, the one [now] called Qaṣr Mujāshi', they were struck by blizzards. Snow fell and the cold became intense; the snow reached the height of a lance. The army perished, but Mujāshi' and a man with a slave girl were saved. He slit open the stomach of a pack camel, put [the girl] in it and fled. The next day he came back, found her alive, and carried her away. That castle was named Qaṣr Mujāshi' because his army perished in it while he was five or six farsakhs[119] from al-Sīrajān.

According to 'Alī [b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī]—Abū al-Miqdām—one of his teachers: Mujāshi' left Tustar[120] in com- [2864]

---

117. Jūr, renamed Fīrūzābād in Būyid times, is located about sixty miles due south of Shīrāz. Founded by the first Sasanian king Ardashīr (226–241), it was one of the largest towns of Fārs under that dynasty, and a major link on the road from Iṣṭakhr to the port of Ṣīrāf. See Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 255–56.

118. Sīrjān was the Sasanian and early Islamic capital of the province of Kirmān down to Būyid times, when the capital was transferred to its modern site. It remained a large and prosperous town until its conquest in 796 (1394) by Timur, who left it in ruins as a punishment for its obstinate resistance to his armies. Sīrjān is located about 100 km. southwest of modern Kirmān. See Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 300–2.

119. A farsakh is the most common unit of distance in medieval Islamic texts, equal approximately to six km. See W. Hinz, "Farsakh," *EI*², II, 812–13.

120. Tustar (or Shushtar) was the second city of the province of Khūzistān, mand of the Baṣran force. Among them was al-Aḥnaf; he captured, in one sweep during a single morning, 50,000 [horses]. He got to [the one named] al-Ṣafrā' bt. al-Gharrā' bt. al-Ghabrā' first, but 'Umar took her from him when his agents divided up the booty.

'Alī [b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī] states: I said to Naḍr b. Isḥāq, "Abū al-Miqdām has recounted this story." He said, "He has told the truth; I have heard it from several of the [tribesmen of] al-Ḥayy and others." His mare was al-Ṣafrā' bt. al-Gharrā' bt. al-Ghabrā', and he is Mujāshi' b. Mas'ūd b. Tha'labah b. 'Ā'idh b. Wahb b. Rabī'ah b. Yarbū' b. Sammāl b. 'Awf b. Imru'ul-Qays b. Buhthah b. Sulaym, and his kunyah is Abū Sulaymān.

[Al-Madā'inī] says: In this year, 'Uthmān added the third call to [the Friday prayer and had it proclaimed from] al-Zawrā'; he prayed four (rak'ahs) at Minā.[121]

In this year, 'Uthmān led the Pilgrimage.

---

located some sixty miles due north of the capital Ahwāz, along the Kārūn River. See Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 233–36.

121. Al-Zawrā' was 'Uthmān's residence in Medina; see above, pp. 31–32/2827, sub anno 28; on his innovations in the prayer at the pilgrimage station in Minā, see above, pp. 38–40/2833–2836, sub anno 29.

The Events of the Year [2865]

31

(August 24, 651–August 11, 652)

Among these, according to al-Wāqidī, was the expedition of the Muslims against the Byzantines that is called the Battle of the Masts.

It was related to me by Aḥmad b. Thābit al-Rāzī—someone who mentioned it—Isḥāq b. ʿĪsā—Abū Maʿshar: The Battle of the Masts took place in the year 34 (654–55). (Abū Maʿshar) says: In the year 31 (651–52) took place [the expedition] by sea against the blacks[122] and the events that befell Kisrā [that is, the King of Iran, Yazdagird III].

Al-Wāqidī says: The Battle of the Masts and the expedition against the blacks both took place in the year 31 (651–52).

122. This is a disastrous naval expedition against Abyssinia (ghazwat al-asāwidah) led by ʿAlqamah b. Mujazziz al-Mudlifī, which other authorities date to the year 20 (641). See Caetani, Annali, VI, 366–67, VIII, 94. See also Ṭabarī, I, 2595.

The Account of the Battles [of the Masts and against the Blacks]

According to al-Wāqidī—Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ—'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. Qatādah:[123] The Syrians set out under the command of Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān, all Syria having been unified under him.

The Reason Why (Syria) was Unified under [Mu'āwiyah]

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Abd al-Malik, al-Rabī', Abū Mujālid, Abū 'Uthmān, and Abū Ḥārithah: When Abū 'Ubaydah died, he named 'Iyāḍ b. Ghanm to succeed him in his governorship ('amal). 'Iyāḍ was [both] his maternal uncle and the son of his father's brother. ('Iyāḍ) had been governor (waliya 'amalan) in the Jazīrah, but 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb [2866] had deposed him. So he attached himself to Abū 'Ubaydah in Syria and remained with him. ('Iyāḍ) was generous and famed for his liberality, stinting nothing and refusing no one. 'Umar was told about that, and the people said to him, "You deposed Khālid (b. al-Walīd)[124] and reproved him for being openhanded. Now 'Iyāḍ is the most generous and openhanded of the Arabs, refusing nothing that is asked of him." 'Umar replied, "How long has 'Iyāḍ faced such demands on his own wealth that he should make use of ours? Even so, I have not altered any decision (amr) which Abū 'Ubaydah has laid down."

'Iyāḍ b. Ghanm died after Abū 'Ubaydah, and 'Umar named Sa'īd b. Ḥidhyam al-Jumaḥi as military governor of his province (ammara 'alā 'amalihi). Afterwards Sa'īd died, and to replace him 'Umar appointed 'Umayr b. Sa'd al-Anṣārī as military governor. 'Umar died while Mu'āwiyah held authority over [the provinces

123. Reading 'Umar for 'Umayr, in accordance with de Goeje, Introductio, dcxxvi.

124. Perhaps the most famous and brilliant Arab general of the Riddah wars and the early Conquests; see P. Crone, "Khālid b. al-Walīd," *EI*², IV, 928–29 (reflects a radical critique of the sources); Donner, Early Islamic Conquests, 119–32, 135–42, 173–90, et passim.

of] Damascus and Jordan and 'Umayr b. Sa'd over [the provinces of] Ḥimṣ and Qinnasrīn. However, Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān made Qinnasrīn a garrison center for those among the inhabitants of the two Iraqs[125] who came to join him.

When Yazīd b. Abī Sufyān[126] had died, 'Umar named Mu'āwiyah to replace him and announced his death to [his father,] Abū Sufyān. [The latter] said, "Whom have you set over his province ('amal), Commander of the Faithful?" "Mu'āwiyah," replied ['Umar]. Then [Abū Sufyān] said, "You have treated kinsmen generously." Thus, Jordan and Damascus were combined under Mu'āwiyah. When 'Umar died, Mu'āwiyah held authority over Damascus and Jordan, 'Umayr b. Sa'd over Ḥimṣ and Qinnasrīn, 'Alqamah b. Mujazziz over Palestine, and 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ over Egypt.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Mubashshir—Sālim: The first governor ('āmil) appointed by 'Uthmān b. 'Affān was Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ, in accordance with the testament of 'Umar. Then 'Umayr b. Sa'd was stricken by plague. He was severely weakened by this and sought leave from 'Uthmān to step down and return to his kinsmen. He granted his [2867] request and attached Ḥimṣ and Qinnasrīn to Mu'āwiyah's [sphere of authority].

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Abū Ḥārithah and Abū 'Uthmān—Khālid b. Ma'dān: When 'Uthmān took office, he confirmed 'Umar's governors in Syria.

---

125. In later centuries, at least, "the two Iraqs" would refer to Iraq 'Arabī—that is, the lower Tigris-Euphrates Valley—and Iraq 'Ajamī [also called al-Jibāl], the Zagros highlands to the east that included the great cities of Hamadhān, Iṣfahān, Rayy, and Kermānshāh. Since the only Arab garrison town [not a very important one] in the latter region was Qum, however, Baṣrah and Kūfah are clearly meant here.

126. Yazīd was Mu'āwiyah's elder brother, and Abū 'Ubaydah's successor as governor of Syria. He commanded one of the four principal expeditionary forces sent in 13/634 to undertake the conquest of Syria, and initially was responsible for Transjordan. When Abu 'Ubaydah and several other senior Companions died in the devastating Plague of 'Amwās in 18/639, the supreme command fell to Yazīd. But Yazīd himself died later in 18/639 during the same epidemic. See Donner, Early Islamic Conquests, 151–53; and Lawrence Conrad, "The Plague in the Early Medieval Near East," Ph.D. diss., Princeton University, 1981, 201–15, 225–31.

When ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAlqamah al-Kinānī, who had authority over Palestine, died, [ʿUthmān] attached his province to Muʿāwiyah. ʿUmayr b. Saʿd fell victim to a long-drawn-out illness during ʿUthmān's caliphate and sought his permission to step down. [ʿUthmān] granted his request and attached his province to Muʿāwiyah's [sphere of authority]. Thus, [all] Syria was unified under Muʿāwiyah during [the first] two years of ʿUthmān's caliphate. ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ held authority in Egypt in the time of ʿUmar. It was unified under him, and ʿUthmān confirmed him in office at the outset of his caliphate.

Return to al-Wāqidī's Account of the Two Battles Mentioned Above

The Syrians set out under Muʿāwiyah b. Abī Sufyān, while ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿd b. Abī Sarḥ was in command of the men from the maritime districts (ahl al-baḥr).[127]

According to [al-Wāqidī]: In that same year, Constantine the son of Heraclius[128] set forth, because of what the Muslims had done to them [that is, the Byzantines] in Africa, in a fleet (jamʿ) whose like had not been assembled by the Byzantines since the coming of Islam. They set out in five hundred ships and encountered [the Muslims] under ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿd. Some of them provided protection for others, until they yoked together the spars of the Muslims' and Polytheists' ships.

According to Ibn ʿUmar [al-Wāqidī]—ʿĪsā b. ʿAlqamah—ʿAbdal-[2868] lāh b. Abī Sufyān—his father—Mālik b. Aws b. al-Ḥadathān: I was with them. We met [the enemy] at sea; we had never seen such ships. The wind was against us, so we rode at anchor for an hour; they, too, were anchored nearby. Then the wind abated and we said, "[Let there be] safe passage between you and us." "You and we must all decide on that," they replied.[129] Then we said, "If you like [we shall fight] on the shore, until whoever is the shorter-lived—whether you or us—shall die; but, if you prefer, the sea." [Al-Wāqidī] continues: They gave a snort and said, "The water." We drew up to them and bound the ships fast to one another, until we were striking at one another on both their ships and ours. We fought most bitterly; men fell upon one another, striking with swords and thrusting with daggers upon the ships, until the blood was washed up on shore by the pounding waves. The breakers threw up men's corpses in heaps.

127. ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿd b. Abī Sarḥ had replaced ʿAmr b. al-ʿAṣ as governor of Egypt in 25 (645–646), and the naval forces on this expedition were based in Egypt. The sailors were Egyptian Christians, while the warriors on shipboard were Muslim Arabs garrisoned in Egypt.

128. Heraclius' grandson Constans II Pogonatus (641–668), whose official throne name was Constantine. In spite of numerous military disasters, his reign did see much stiffer and more systematic resistance to the Muslim advance than had heretofore been the case. In ways that we do not as yet fully grasp, his efforts must have laid the foundation for the later consolidation of Byzantine control in Anatolia and the Aegean. On his troubled reign see Ostrogorsky, History of the Byzantine State, 110–23.

According to Ibn 'Umar [al-Wāqidī]—Hishām b. Sa'd—Zayd b. Aslam—his father—one who was present on that day: I saw the beach where the wind was driving the waves; upon it was what looked like a great hill of human corpses, and there was more blood than water. A great many Muslims were killed on that day; however, of the unbelievers the number was beyond counting. On that day, the Muslims endured what they had never endured anywhere; then God sent down His aid upon the people of Islam, and [2869]
Constantine turned tail and fled. He was routed due only to the killing and injuries that befell him, for on that day he suffered injuries and lay wounded for some time.

According to Ibn 'Umar [al-Wāqidī]—Sālim, the client of Umm Muḥammad—Khālid b. Abī 'Imrān—Ḥanash b. 'Abdallāh al-Ṣan'ānī: The first thing heard from Muḥammad b. Abī Ḥudhayfah[130] occurred while the people were at sea in the year 31 (651–52). When 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd b. Abī Sarḥ led the people in the afternoon prayer, Muḥammad b. Abī Ḥudhayfah proclaimed "God is most great!". He raised his voice until the imam 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd b. Abī Sarḥ had finished. Upon leaving, ['Abdallāh b. Sa'd] asked, "What is this?" He was told, "That is Muḥammad b. Abī Ḥudhayfah proclaiming God's greatness." So 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd summoned him and said, "What is this innovation and novelty?" [Muḥammad] replied, "This is no innovation or novelty, for there is no harm in proclaiming the greatness of God." ('Abdallāh) said, "You are not to do it again."

129. Qālū dhālika lakum wa-lanā minkum.

130. One of the chief conspirators against 'Uthmān; on his controversial role see below, sub annis 34 and 35.

(Al-Wāqidī) continues: Thus Muḥammad b. Abī Ḥudhayfah was silenced. But when 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd led the prayer at sunset, Muḥammad b. Abī Ḥudhayfah proclaimed God's greatness even more loudly than before. ('Abdallāh) sent to him [as follows]: "You are a foolish boy. Indeed, by God, were I not uncertain that the Commander of the Faithful would agree, I would drag you away in fetters." Muḥammad b. Abī Ḥudhayfah replied, "By God, you have no way to do that. If you were determined to do so you could not." ('Abdallāh) said, "Leave off! [It will be] better for you. By God, you are not sailing with us." (Muḥammad) responded, "Shall I sail with the Muslims [at all]?" ('Abdallāh b. Sa'd) said, [2870] "Go wherever you want."

(Al-Wāqidī) continues: So (Muḥammad b. Abī Ḥudhayfah) sailed by himself, in a ship with no one but the Copts,[131] until they reached [the site of] the Battle of the Masts. [There] they encountered the Byzantine forces, with 500 or 600 ships and with Constantine the son of Heraclius present among them. (Constantine) said, "Give me your counsel." (His officers) said, "We will observe [the situation] tonight." They passed the night striking their wooden clappers[132] while the Muslims spent the night praying and calling on God.

Then the morning came. Constantine had resolved to do battle, and (the Byzantines) drew their ships into tight formation. The Muslims likewise drew [their ships] up in tight formation and lashed them together. 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd formed the Muslims in ranks along the sides of the ships and began ordering them to recite the Qur'ān aloud and to stand fast. The Byzantines jumped into the Muslims' ships and assailed their ranks until they broke them up; they were fighting in disorder.

(Al-Wāqidī) continues: So they fought bitterly. At length God aided the Believers, and they made a great slaughter among the Byzantines, among whom only those who fled made it to safety.

(Al-Wāqidī) continues: 'Abdallāh remained at [the site of] the 131. That is, the sailors per se.

132. The Eastern churches traditionally used wooden clappers to summon people to worship, rather than bells or the human voice.

Battle of the Masts for some days after the enemy (qawm) had fled, then turned about to come back. Muḥammad b. Abī Ḥudhayfah began saying to the army, "Yes, by God, in reality we have left the jihād behind us." His listener would ask, "What jihād?" Then (Muḥammad b. Abī Ḥudhayfah) would say, "'Uthmān b. 'Affān has done this and done that." He continued until he had corrupted the people. By the time they approached their own country he had corrupted them, for they were openly saying things that they had not [previously] uttered.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar (al-Wāqidī)—Ma'mar b. Rāshid—al-Zuhrī: Muḥammad b. Abī Ḥudhayfah and Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr set out when 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd did. They publicly [2871] proclaimed the shameful deeds of 'Uthmān and how he had altered and contradicted [the policies] of Abū Bakr and 'Umar, and [they declared] that 'Uthmān's blood was lawful. They would say, "['Uthmān] named 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd as governor—a man whose blood the Messenger of God declared to be lawful, and one whose unbelief was revealed in the Qur'ān. The Messenger of God exiled a certain clan (qawm) and ['Uthmān] permitted them to return. ['Uthmān] has removed from office the Companions of the Messenger of God and appointed Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ and 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir."[133] Word of this got to 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd b. Abī Sarḥ, and he said, "You two will not sail with us." Thus, they sailed on a ship upon which there was not a single Muslim.

The Muslims had met the enemy, while these two were the feeblest[134] in battle of [all] the Muslims. People spoke to them about this, but they replied, "How shall we fight alongside a man whose authority it is not right to accept? 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd was appointed by 'Uthmān, and 'Uthmān has done thus and so." Thus, they corrupted the participants in this battle, having censured 'Uthmān in the severest terms. 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd sent to them, absolutely forbidding them [to act in this manner]. He said, "By God, were I not uncertain that the Commander of the Faithful would agree, I would punish and imprison you both."

According to al-Wāqidī: In this year, Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb passed away, at the age of eighty-eight.

---

133. The governors of Kūfah and Baṣrah respectively.
134. Reading akall rather than ankal. See de Goeje, Introductio, dcxxvi.

According to al-Wāqidī: In this year—that is, the year 31 (651–52)—Armenia was conquered by Ḥabīb b. Maslamah al-Fihrī.

[2872] In this year, Yazdagird, the king of Persia (Fārs), was killed.

The Cause of [Yazdagird's] Murder

There is a difference of opinion regarding the cause of his murder and how it came about.

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad (al-Madāʾinī)—Ghiyāth b. Ibrāhīm—Ibn Isḥāq: Yazdagird fled with a tiny escort from Kirmān to Marw. He sought money from its marzubān,[135] but (the latter) refused him. Then (the people of Marw) were afraid for themselves and sent to the Turks, seeking their support against (Yazdagird). (The Turks) came and sprang a nighttime attack against him; they killed his companions, and Yazdagird fled until he came to the home of a millstone cutter on the banks of the Murghāb.[136] (Yazdagird) took shelter with him overnight, and as he slept (the millstone cutter) killed him.

According to ʿAlī (b. Muḥammad al-Madāʾinī)—al-Hudhalī: Yazdagird came to Marw in flight from Kirmān, and sought money from its marzubān and populace. But they refused him, and in fear of him they sprang a nighttime attack against him. [In spite of what certain authorities allege,] they did not ask the Turks to mobilize an army against him. They killed his companions, while he fled on foot, carrying his belt, his sword, and his crown, until at last he came to the home of a stonecutter on the banks of the Murghāb. When Yazdagird became careless, the stonecutter killed him, took his belongings, and flung his corpse into the Murghāb. In the morning, the people of Marw followed (Yazdagird's) footsteps until they lost track of them at the stonecutter's dwelling. They seized (the stonecutter); he confirmed that he had murdered (the king) and brought out his belongings. Then they killed the stonecutter along with the members of his household, and seized his belongings along with those of Yazdagird. Taking (the king's body) out of the Murghāb, they placed it in a wooden coffin.

135. The marzubān or marzbān was the military governor of a frontier district under the Sasanian Empire. After the provincial reform of Khusraw Anushirvan, he was theoretically under the authority of the ispahbadh in whose quarter his district lay. By the date of this story, obviously, a marzubān was usually quite autonomous. See Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 28, 131, et passim.

136. The Murghāb is the river flowing by Marw; shortly east of the city it flows into a shallow desert basin where it is swallowed up. The river was dammed shortly upstream from Marw, and the resultant lake fed the city's complex of canals. See Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 397–400.

According to (al-Madā'inī): One of (my authorities) alleges that they bore (Yazdagird's body) to Iṣṭakhr[137] and that he was buried there at the beginning of the year 31 (651–52). Marw was named "The Lord's Enemy" (Khudhāh Dushman). Yazdagird had had [2873] intercourse with a woman there, and she bore him a boy deformed on one side. This (birth) took place after Yazdagird had been murdered, (the boy) being named al-Mukhdaj (that is, "the Deformed.") [A number of] children were born to the latter in Khurāsān, and when Qutaybah (b. Muslim) conquered al-Ṣughd[138]or some other place he found two servant girls. He was told that they were among the children of al-Mukhdaj, so he sent them, or one of them, to al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf. He [in turn] sent her to al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik, and to al-Walīd she bore Yazīd b. al-Walīd al-Nāqiṣ [that is, "the Lacking"].[139]

According to 'Alī (b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī)—Rawḥ b. 'Abdallāh—Khurdādhbih al-Rāzī: Yazdagird came to Khurāsān with Khurrazādh-Mihr, the brother of Rustam. (Khurrazādh-Mihr) said to Māhawayh, the marzubān of Marw, "I have entrusted the king to you." He then left for Iraq. Yazdagird remained in Marw and resolved to depose Māhawayh. Thus, Māhawayh wrote to the Turks, informing them of Yazdagird's flight and his coming to him. He made a compact with (the Turks) to support (the people of Marw) against (Yazdagird), giving them free entry [into Khurāsān].

According to (al-Madā'inī): The Turks reached Marw, and

137. That is, to the Sasanian dynasty's city of origin in southwestern Iran.

138. Al-Ṣughd, ancient Sogdiana, can be broadly defined as the region between the middle Oxus and Jaxartes Rivers dominated by Bukhārā and Samarqand. More narrowly, it seems to refer to the district of Samarqand. See Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 460.

139. The future Yazīd III, a would-be reformer whose caliphate lasted a bare six months in 744. If one wishes to accept this story, Yazīd would have been the great-grandson of Yazdagird, albeit through a lineage of minimal prestige. His nickname comes from his having reduced the pay of his soldiers. See Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 362–69.

Yazdagird went out to meet them with the companions who were with him. He fought them, supported by Māhawayh with the heavy cavalry (al-asāwirah) of Marw.[140] Yazdagird made a great slaughter among the Turks, and Māhawayh feared they would flee. Thus, he went over to them with the heavy cavalry of Marw. Yazdagird's troops fled and were killed, while his horse was [2874] wounded in the course of the evening. He fled on foot until at last he reached a house with a mill on the banks of the Murghāb, staying there two nights while Māhawayh searched in vain for him. Then on the morning of the second day, the millowner entered his house. Seeing the form of Yazdagird, he said, "What are you, human or demon?" (Yazdagird) responded, "Human. Do you have any food?" "Yes," he said, and brought it to him.

Then (Yazdagird) said, "I am a Magian, so bring me what I need to perform my rites!"[141] So the miller went to one of the cavalrymen and sought from him what he needed to perform Magian rites. (The soldier) asked, "What are you going to do with it?" "I have in my house a man whose like I have never seen, and he has sought this from me." (The cavalryman) brought (the miller) before Māhawayh, who said, "This is Yazdagird. Go and bring me his head." The Magian priest (mawbādh) said to him, "That is not yours to do. You know that religion and kingship are twins; one of them cannot stand without the other. If you do [this deed], you will defile all that is most sacred."

The people spoke up, looking upon this as a grave enormity. But Māhawayh cursed them and said to the heavy cavalry, "Whoever speaks up, kill him." Then he commanded a number [of men] to go with the miller and kill Yazdagird. They rushed off, but when they saw him they found killing him hateful and refused to do it. They said to the miller, "You go in and kill him." So he entered (Yazdagird's) presence while he slept; he crushed his head with a stone. Then he severed his head, handed it over to

---

140. The asāwirah (Middle Persian usvārān) were the heavy mailed cavalry who constituted the core of the Sasanian army and were its most distinctive element. They carried lances and swords but were most noted as archers, able to launch clouds of arrows against an opponent. Given the cost of their equipment and training, they were inevitably drawn from at least the petty aristocracy. See Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 198, 207–8, 528.

141. Innī muzamzimun fa'tinī bimā azamzimu bihi.

them, and threw his corpse into the Murghāb. A party (qawm) of Marwazīs went out, slew the miller, and razed his mill. The bishop of Marw went and removed the body of Yazdagird from the Murghāb and placed it in a coffin. He bore it to Iṣṭakhr and laid it [2875] in a tomb (nāwūs).[142]

According to other authorities—Hishām b. Muḥammad (b. Sā'ib al-Kalbī)—his sources: Yazdagird fled after the battle of Nihāvand, this being the last of (the Arabs') battles (against him), until he happened upon the territory of Iṣfahān. In this place there was a man named Maṭyār; he was one of the dihqāns,[143] who was the one charged with fighting the Arabs when the Persians retreated from (that city). He called (the people of Iṣfahān) before him and said, "If I take charge of your affairs and lead you out against (the Arabs), what will you do for me?" They answered, "We shall acknowledge to you your merit." So he led them out and gained some slight victory over the Arabs, by which he won the esteem of (the Iṣfahānīs) and obtained the highest rank among them. When Yazdagird saw the situation in Iṣfahān and halted there, Maṭyār came to visit him that very day. (Yazdagird's) gatekeeper placed (the king) in seclusion and said to (Maṭyār), "Stay here until I gain permission for you to enter his presence."

---

142. Nāwūs is derived from Greek naos, meaning the inner chamber of a temple where the god's image is placed. Some lexicographers believe that nāwūs refers to a Christian burial place; others use it for a sarcophagus. Presumably here it refers to some kind of permanent tomb chamber, either a mausoleum or one cut into the rock.

143. Dihqān/pl. dahāqīn: literally, "village lord." In Sasanian and early Islamic times, this term referred to the landowners who resided in the villages of Iraq and Iran, and who were the monarch's local fiscal administrators. In Iraq and western Iran, where the monarchy was relatively strong, the dihqans represented the lower levels of the aristocracy. In Khurāsān, however, the situation was more complex. While some dihqans were simply small freeholders and village notables, others were powerful and wealthy figures who governed entire districts. A long text below refers to the dihqān Marw—not a petty rural aristocrat in this case, obviously, but the powerful (and presumably autonomous) lord of a major city and oasis. (See above, p. 78 and note 135, where the same figure carries the more precise and prestigious title of marzubān). In view of this range of meanings, the best translation might be the comprehensive term "landed aristocracy." In Iraq and western Iran their status began to fall rapidly from the ninth century on, as fiscal rights on the land were increasingly assigned directly to state officials. In modern Persian, dihqān simply means "peasant." See Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 187–89, 199–208; A. K. S. Lambton, "Dihḳān," *EI*², II, 253–54.

But (Maṭyār) jumped on him, smashing open his head in pride and fury, because he had blocked access to (Yazdagird).

The gatekeeper, all bloody, entered Yazdagird's presence. When Yazdagird looked at him, he was terrified. Within the hour he rode out of Iṣfahān. Since the Arabs were distracted from him by their own concerns, he was advised to go to the uttermost part of his kingdom and remain there for a time. So he betook himself to the district (nāḥiyah) of Rayy, and when he approached it the overlord (ṣāḥib) of Ṭabaristān went forth to meet him. He described his lands to (Yazdagird) and informed him of their impregnability, saying to him, "If you do not respond favorably to me this very day and then come to me, I shall not receive you or give you refuge." Yazdagird refused, but wrote for him [an appointment to] the office of iṣpahbadh, for he had previously held a humbler rank than this.

According to one of (the authorities): Immediately thereupon [2876] Yazdagird proceeded to Sijistān, and then went from there to Marw accompanied by a thousand men from the heavy cavalry.

According to one of (the authorities): Yazdagird entered the territory of Fārs and dwelt there four years; then he came to the territory of Kirmān and remained there two or three years. Now the dihqān of Kirmān pleaded with him to remain with him. However, (Yazdagird) did not do [that], and asked the dihqān to leave a hostage with him [so as to ensure his personal safety]. The dihqān of Kirmān would give him nothing, and so (the king) would not accede to his request. Then (the dihqān of Kirmān) seized him by the leg, dragged him out, and expelled him from his lands. (Yazdagird) moved on from (Kirmān) to Sijistān, remaining there for some five years. Then he decided to settle in Khurāsān, so that he might reassemble his forces and lead them against those who had robbed him of his kingdom. He went with his escort to Marw, accompanied by hostages taken from among the sons of the dihqāns. With him, among the leading members (of this group), was Farrukhzād. When (Yazdagird) reached Marw, he appealed[144] to the kings for aid and reinforcements. [He wrote in the same vein] to the Lord (ṣāḥib) of China, the King of Farghānah, the King of Kābul, and the King of the Khazars.

144. Reading fīhā with Köprülü 1043, rather than minhum as given in Prym's text.

At that time the dihqān in Marw was Māhawayh b. Māfanāh b. Fayd, the father of Barāz. Māhawayh put his son Barāz in charge of the city proper (madīnah) of Marw, and it was under the latter's authority. Yazdagird decided to enter the city in order to inspect it and its citadel (quhandiz), but Māhawayh, fearing his deceitful cunning and treachery, had directed his son not to open [the city] to him if he desired entrance. Yazdagird rode out on the day on [2877 which he intended to enter the city, and made a circuit of the walls. When at last he reached a certain gate and attempted to enter there, Barāz's father shouted to Barāz, "Open!" [But he said this] while he was tightening his belt and signaling [to his son] not to do so. One of Yazdagird's companions spotted this and informed him of it; he sought his permission to behead Māhawayh, saying, "If you do this, affairs in this district will clear up completely for you." But [Yazdagird] refused.

According to one of [the authorities]: [It did not happen that way.] Rather, Yazdagird had named Farrukhzād as governor of Marw and ordered Barāz to turn the citadel and the city over to him. However, the city's inhabitants refused [to do] that, because Barāz's father Māhawayh had directed them not to. [Māhawayh] had said to them, "This man [that is, Yazdagird] is no king for you, for he has come to you beaten and wounded, and Marw should not suffer what other districts (kuwar) are suffering. Now when I come before you tomorrow [with Yazdagird], do not open the gate." So when he came before them, they did as he had said.

Farrukhzād went and knelt down before Yazdagird, saying, "Marw has proved an intractable problem for you, and these Arabs have caught up with you." [Yazdagird] said, "What is [your] opinion?" [Farrukhzād] replied, "[My] advice is that we get to the country of the Turks and remain there until the situation of the Arabs has become clear to us, for [the Arabs] do not leave a town until they have entered it [as conquerors]." [Yazdagird] said, "I will not do [this], but instead will go back and begin again." Thus, he opposed [Farrukhzād] and did not accept his advice. Yazdagird set out and came to Barāz, the dihqān of Marw, having decided to transfer the dihqānate to Sanjān, the son of his brother.

[2878] Māhawayh, the father of Barāz, learned of that and undertook to destroy Yazdagird. He wrote to Nīzak Ṭarkhān, informing him that Yazdagird had come to him a defeated man. He invited (Nīzak) to come to him in order that they might join hands to seize (Yazdagird), and to make a compact either to kill (Yazdagird) or to enter into a treaty with the Arabs against him. If (Nīzak) would relieve him of (Yazdagird), (Māhawayh) offered to pay him a thousand dirhams per day. He asked (Nīzak) to use a letter to deceive Yazdagird in order to separate him from the main body of his soldiers, thereby leaving him with a weak and powerless segment of his army and personal retinue (khawāṣṣ).145 said, "In your letter you should inform him of the sincere counsel and aid against his Arab enemies that you have resolved upon, so that he may overcome them. And you should petition him, in a letter sealed with gold, to confer upon you one of the titles belonging to the men of rank. You should also inform him that you will not come to meet him until Farrukhzād parts from him."

Nīzak wrote to Yazdagird in this manner, and, when his letter reached him, he sent to the magnates of Marw and sought their advice. Sanjān said to him, "I do not think it wise to dismiss your army and Farrukhzād for any reason." Abū Barāz [that is, Māhawayh] responded, "On the contrary, I believe that you should [2879] join Nīzak and accede to his request." (Yazdagird) accepted his advice, dispersed his troops, and ordered Farrukhzād to go to the reedbeds of Sarakhs.[146] Farrukhzād cried out and rent the neckhole [of his garment]. He took a post in his hands, intending to smite Abū Barāz with it. "You murderers of kings," he said, "you have killed two kings [already], and I believe you will be the murderers of this one!" Farrukhzād did not set out until Yazdagird had written a letter to him in his own hand, [as follows]: "This is a letter to Farrukhzād. Verily you have turned Yazdagird, his household, his children, his retinue, and his pos-

145. wa-yaḥṣula fī ṭā'ifatin min 'askarihi wa-khawāṣṣihi fa-yakūnu aḍ'afa li-ruknihi wa-ahwana li-shawkatihi: literally, "so that he would be among a section of his army and his personal retinue, but it would be too weak to be his pillar and too pliant to be his sharp thorn."

146. The marshlands north of the city of Sarakhs; they are formed by the Tajand River as it empties into a shallow basin in the desert. See Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 395–96.

sessions over safe and secure to Māhawayh, the dihqān of Marw. And hereby I bear witness to this."

Nīzak approached a locality between the two Marws called Ḥulsidān,[147] and, when Yazdagird decided to go out to meet him, Abū Barāz advised him not to meet (Nīzak) bearing arms, lest he suspect his intentions and flee. On the contrary, (Yazdagird) should encounter him with reed pipes and musical instruments. He did so, going out with the escort which Māhawayh had suggested and (even) designated for him. Abū Barāz held back from (Yazdagird), while Nīzak formed his companions into squadrons. When the two men drew near to each other, Nīzak went on foot to receive Yazdagird, while the latter remained on horseback. He commanded that one of his spare horses (be provided) for Nīzak, who mounted it. When (Yazdagird) was in the midst of (Nīzak's) army, the two men halted, and Nīzak said to him, among other things, "Give me one of your daughters in marriage, that I may give you loyal counsel and fight alongside you against your enemy." Yazdagird answered, "You are being insolent with me, you dog!" Then Nīzak was on him with his whip. Yazdagird shouted, "The traitor has betrayed (us)." He fled headlong, while Nīzak's companions laid about with their swords among (Yazdagird's escort), killing many of them.

Yazdagird's flight ended up at a place in the territory of Marw. Dismounting from his horse, he entered the house of a miller and [2880] remained there for three days. Then the miller said to him, "Unhappy man, come out and eat something, for you have fasted for three days now." (Yazdagird) said, "I will only do that in accordance with Magian rites."[148] A man who was one of the Magians (zamāzimah) of Marw had brought some wheat for the miller to grind, and the latter spoke to him about performing the Magian rites in his house so that (his guest) might eat. (The man) did so;

147. "The two Marws"—Marw and Marw al-Rūdh (or Marw-i Kūchik, "Little Marw"). The latter is a city some 260 km. to the southeast of Marw, also on the Murghāb River and about halfway on the road to Herat. See Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 397, 404–5. The reading "Ḥulsidān" is supplied by Ibrāhīm, but the mss are unclear. Balādhurī, Futūḥ al-Buldān, 316, gives "Junābadh," but this place is located far to the southwest, about 200 km. south of Nishapur—much too far away to fit the context here.

148. Lastu aṣilu ilā dhālika illā bi-zamzamatin.

then, when he had gone back, he heard Abū Barāz mentioning Yazdagird. He asked (Abū Barāz's entourage) about (Yazdagird's) jewelry. They described it for him, and he informed them that he had seen (Yazdagird) in a miller's house—a curly-haired man with joined eyebrows[149] and fine teeth, adorned with earrings and bracelets.

Thereupon (Māhawayh) sent one of the heavy cavalry to take (Yazdagird). If he got hold of him, he had orders to strangle him with a bowstring and then to throw him into the river of Marw. They encountered the miller and beat him so that he would point out (Yazdagird), but he would not do so. He denied to them that he knew where (Yazdagird) had gone. But when they decided to leave him, one man among them said to (his companions), "I detect the odor of musk." He discerned the edge of a silk brocade garment in the water, pulled it toward him, and there was Yazdagird.[150] (Yazdagird) implored (the soldier) not to kill him and not to identify him; [in return] he would give him his signet ring, his bracelets, and his belt. The other said, "Give me four dirhams and I will let you go." Yazdagird responded, "Alas, my signet ring is yours, and its price is beyond counting." But he refused, and Yazdagird said, "I had been told that I would be in need of four dirhams and would be reduced to eating cat food, and I have seen this turn out to be the truth."[151] Then (Yazdagird) took one of his earrings and gave it to the miller as his reward for having concealed him.

[2881] (The miller) drew close to (the soldier) as if to speak to him about something, then described (Yazdagird's) hiding place to him.[152] The man notified his companions and they came to (Yazdagird). Then Yazdagird pleaded with them not to kill him, saying, "Woe to you. Verily we find in our books that he who dares to kill kings will be chastised by God with fire in the nether

149. rajulun ja'dun maqrūnun: possibly meaning "a compact and well-made man."

150. There is clearly a minor gap in the narrative at this point; as things stand, Yazdagird's sudden appearance here is quite unexplained.

151. fa-qad 'āyantu wa-jā'anī bi-ḥaqīqatihi. The last sentence is not really clear and seems to be missing a word or phrase; see de Goeje, Introductio, dcxxvi.

152. Again the narrative is confused. This paragraph seems to repeat some of the action, though not the words, of the one preceding. See Prym's note in the apparatus.

world [al-dunyā] for his audacity. So do not kill me; take me to the dihqān [of Marw] or send me off to the Arabs, for they will spare the life of a king like me."

But they took the jewelry he was wearing, put him in a sack and sealed it, and then strangled him with a bowstring and threw him in the river of Marw. The water carried him away until he reached the opening of the Razīq [canal],[153] where he was caught and held by a branch. The bishop of Marw came to him and bore him away. He wrapped him in a musk-scented cloak [ṭaylasān], placed him in a coffin, and brought him to Bā'y Bābān below Mājān.[154] Having laid [Yazdagird] in a vaulted chamber ['aqd], which had previously served as the bishop's audience hall, he walled it up. Abū Barāz asked about one of the two earrings when he noticed it missing; he seized the person who was pointed out to him and beat him to death. He sent what had been obtained [of Yazdagird's jewelry] to the reigning caliph, and the caliph required the dihqān to reimburse the value of the lost earring.

According to others: [It did not happen that way.] Rather, Yazdagird left Kirmān before the Arabs got there, taking the road through al-Ṭabasayn and Quhistān[155]until he approached Marw with some 4000 men. [His intention] was to recruit troops from the Khurāsānīs and to turn back on the Arabs and fight them. He

153. South of Marw [that is, upstream] the Murghāb is dammed up and the water is channeled into four canals, which form the district's great oasis. The Razīq is one of these canals, and flows through the walled city. There is a possibility of confusion, since the name Razīq was sometimes given to the river itself. See Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 398–401.

154. Bā'y [or Bāb] Bābān: presumably a village near Marw, unidentified. Mājān: the principal western suburb of Marw. See Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 399, 403.

155. Quhistān is a mountainous province in eastern Iran, lying between the Dasht-i Kavīr [Great Desert] on the west and Khurāsān to the north and east. Al-Ṭabasayn is a dual form referring to the two towns in this province named Ṭabas. [1] Ṭabas Gīlakī or Ṭabas al-Tamr [Tabas of the Dates] lies on the western edge of the province, just on the edge of the desert. As its name implies, it was a date-palm oasis. [2] Ṭabas Masīnān or Ṭabas al-'Unnāb [Tabas of the Jujube Tree] lies some eighty km. due east of Birjand in the southeastern part of the province. It was a substantial town but far less important than Ṭabas al-Tamr. Al-Ṭabasayn sometimes refers to a single one of the two towns; in this case Ṭabas al-Tamr must be meant, since it lay on one of the principal roads from Kirmān and was called by Balādhurī the Gate of Khurāsān. See Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 359–61, 362–63.

was met by two military chiefs (qā'idān) in Marw, each filled with hatred and envy towards the other, one named Barāz and the other Sanjān. Both having pledged obedience to him, he took up residence in Marw.

[2882] He made Barāz his special favorite, and Sanjān envied him on that account. Barāz began seeking the ruin of Sanjān and arousing Yazdagird's fury against him. He so defamed and discredited Sanjān that (Yazdagird) resolved to kill him. He divulged his purpose to a woman of his with whom Barāz was in collusion, and she sent to Barāz a woman who declared that Yazdagird had decided to kill Sanjān. What Yazdagird had resolved to do became general knowledge. Sanjān having been warned, he took precautions and gathered around himself a force like Barāz's companions and the soldiers who accompanied Yazdagird. Then (Sanjān) went to the palace where Yazdagird was residing. Barāz learned of this and stayed clear of Sanjān due to the number of his troops. Sanjān's force so dismayed and frightened Yazdagird that he left his palace in disguise and fled on foot in order to save himself.

He walked some two *farsakh*s (twelve km.) until he came to a certain mill. He entered the millhouse and sat down in fatigue and exhaustion. The millowner saw him with his fine bearing, knotted scarf (ṭurrah),[156] and noble attire. He spread [a carpet] for him and he sat down; then he brought him food and he ate. (Yazdagird) stayed with him a day and a night. The millowner having requested some compensation from him,[157] he offered him a jewel-studded belt that he was wearing. This the millowner refused to accept and said, "Instead of this belt, I would really be content with four dirhams with which I might eat and drink." But (Yazdagird) informed him that he had no silver currency (waraq) with him. So the millowner flattered him until, when he dozed off, he went up to him with an ax, struck his head with it, and killed him. Then he cut off his head, took the garments and belt that he was wearing, and threw his corpse into the river whose water turned his mill. He slit open his belly and in it inserted some tamarisk roots that were growing in that river in order to [2883] keep (Yazdagird's) body where he had thrown it, lest it should be recognized as it floated downstream. For the murderer feared he would be sought along with the spoils that he had taken. Then he fled in haste.

156. Ṭurrah usually means "fringe," that is, a fringe of hair or the fringe on a piece of cloth. Here it seems to refer to the long scarf knotted onto the headpiece or crown of Sasanian kings. This scarf was one of the insignia of royalty, and symbolized the divine farr or effulgence that marked a king as enjoying the favor of Ahura-Mazda.

157. Fa-sa'alahu ṣāḥibu 'l-raḥā an ya'mura lahu bi-shay'in. Literally: "The millowner asked him to command something for him."

A man from Ahwāz named Iliyā', who was the archbishop (muṭrān) of Marw, learned of the murder. He assembled the Christians who were under his authority and said to them, "The King of the Persians has been murdered, the son of Shahriyār son of Kisrā. Now Shahriyār is the child of Shīrīn the Believer[158], whose just conduct and beneficence toward her coreligionists you must know. This king [that is, Yazdagird] had a Christian lineage.[159] [We should note as well] the honor that the Christians obtained during the reign of his grandfather Kisrā, and the good previously received by them during the regime of certain kings among his ancestors. He even built some churches for them and settled [the debts] of some of their coreligionists. It is therefore fitting for us to bewail the murder of this king because of his generosity, [which was] commensurate with the beneficence of his ancestors and his grandmother Shīrīn toward the Christians. Now I think it right that I build a tomb (nāwūs) for him and bear his body in honor in order to inter it there."

The Christians answered, "O archbishop, we submit to your command and concur with you in this opinion of yours." Thus, the archbishop ordered a tomb to be built within the Garden of the Archbishops in Marw. He himself, accompanied by the Christians of Marw, went out and took the corpse of Yazdagird from the river, wrapped it, and placed it in a coffin. Then the Christians who were with him bore it on their shoulders until they brought it to the tomb that he had commanded to be built, interred it [2884] therein, and walled up the doorway.

158. Shīrīn, a princess of Armenian birth, became the queen of Khusraw Parviz (592–628). Her love and fidelity for him became one of the great romantic subjects of New Persian literature, first stated in the final chapters of the Shāh-nāmeh, but most fully and movingly elaborated in Niẓāmī's Khusraw va-Shīrīn, one of the poems in his Khamseh.

159. Wa-li-hādhā 'l-maliki 'unṣurun fī 'l-Naṣrāniyyah.

The reign of Yazdagird lasted twenty years, among them four years in peace and quiet and sixteen in fatigue due to the ruthless warfare of the Arabs against him. He was the last king of the lineage of Ardashīr son of Bābak to reign, and after him kingship passed to the Arabs.

In this year—that is, the year 31 (651–52)—ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĀmir set out for Khurāsān. He conquered Abrashahr, Ṭūs, Abīward, and Nasā, reaching as far as Sarakhs. In (the same year) he made a peace treaty with the inhabitants of Marw.

[ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĀmir's Campaign in Khurāsān]

It is recounted that when Ibn ʿĀmir had conquered Fārs, Aws al-Tamīmī went before him and said, "May God uphold the amir! Verily this land lies within your grasp, and you have conquered but little of it. Go forward, then, for God is your helper." (Ibn ʿĀmir) replied, "Have we not ordered [the expedition] to set forth?" He disliked showing that he had taken (Aws's) advice.

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad (al-Madāʾinī)—Maslamah b. Muḥārib—al-Sakan b. Qatādah al-ʿUraynī: Having conquered Fārs, Ibn ʿĀmir returned to Baṣrah. As his deputy in Iṣṭakhr he 2885] appointed Sharīk b. al-Aʿwar al-Ḥārithī, who built the mosque of Iṣṭakhr. A man of the Banū Tamīm entered Ibn ʿĀmir's presence. According to (al-ʿUraynī): We used to say that (this man) was al-Aḥnaf. It is also said [that he was] Aws b. Jābir al-Jushamī—that is, [the clan of] Jusham in [the tribe of] Tamīm.

(The man) said to (Ibn ʿĀmir), "Verily your enemy flees in terror before you and the lands are vast. Set forth, for God is your helper and will glorify His religion." Ibn ʿĀmir mobilized [his forces], ordering the people to outfit themselves for the campaign. He left Ziyād in Baṣrah as his deputy. Proceeding to Kirmān, he led [his troops] to Khurāsān. However, there is a body of authorities (qawm) who say that he took the road to Iṣfahān and then went on to Khurāsān.

According to ʿAlī (b. Muḥammad al-Madāʾinī)—al-Mufaḍḍal al-Kirmānī—his father: The scholars (ashyākh) of Kirmān used to recount that Ibn ʿĀmir made camp with the army at al-Sīrajān, then proceeded to Khurāsān. As his deputy in Kirmān, he appointed Mujāshiʿ b. Masʿūd al-Sulamī. Ibn ʿĀmir traveled by way of the Desert of Rāvar, which is [a distance of] eighty farsakhs.[160] Then he went to al-Ṭabasayn, aiming at Abrashahr, which is the [present] city of Nīshāpūr. Al-Aḥnaf b. Qays was in command of his vanguard. [Al-Aḥnaf] led [his forces] to Quhistān and set out for Abrashahr. The Hephthalites, who were the inhabitants of Herāt, came out against him, but al-Aḥnaf routed them in battle.[161] Then Ibn ʿĀmir came to Nīshāpūr.

According to ʿAlī [b. Muḥammad al-Madāʾinī]—Abū Mikhnaf—Numayr b. Waʿlah—al-Shaʿbī: Ibn ʿĀmir went by way of the Desert of Khabīṣ, then through Khwāst. It is also said that he went by way of Yazd, then through Quhistān.[162] He placed al-Aḥnaf in the vanguard. [The latter] was met by the Hephthalites, but he routed them in battle and came to Abrashahr, and Ibn ʿĀmir laid siege to it. Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣ came to Jurjān with the Kūfan army, intending [to proceed to] Khurāsān. But when he learned that Ibn ʿĀmir was besieging Abrashahr he returned to Kūfah. [2886]

According to ʿAlī [b. Muḥammad al-Madāʾinī]—ʿAlī b. Mujāhid: Ibn ʿĀmir laid siege to Abrashahr, conquering one-half of it by assault. The other half was held by Kanārā, together with half of Nasā and Ṭūs. Ibn ʿĀmir, having failed to get through to Marw, negotiated a peace with Kanārā. [The latter] turned over to him his son Abū al-Ṣalt b. Kanārā and his brother's son Salīm as hostages. [Ibn ʿĀmir] sent ʿAbdallāh b. Khāzim to Herāt and Ḥātim b.

---

160. Rāvar [in the Arabic text, Rābar] is a town on the western edge of the Dasht-i Kavīr, some 80 miles north of Kirmān. It is not really clear whether "eighty farsakhs" refers to the distance from Kirmān or the distance across the desert to al-Ṭabasayn. See Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 305. The place names and persons mentioned here recapitulate those given above, p. 87 [text, I, 2881], at the beginning of the account of the death of Yazdagird, but here the fugitive Sasanian king is completely absent.

161. al-Hayāṭilah. The Hephthalites or "White Huns" were a nomadic people from central Asia, presumably related to the European Huns of Attila. Their ethnic-linguistic background is unclear, but they seem to have been Turkic. In any case, the Hephthalites appeared on the northeastern frontiers of the Sasanian Empire in A.D. the fifth century and proved an extraordinarily dangerous and persistent foe. In the seventh century, Hephthalite elements were permanent settlers in the region of Herāt. See A. D. H. Bivar, "Hayāṭila," EI[2], III, 303–4.

162. This passage indicates as clearly as anything can the uncertainties surrounding Ibn ʿĀmir's route. Khabīṣ, like Rāvar, lies on the western edge of the desert but is 160 km southeast of Rāvar, while Khwāst is roughly the same distance from Ṭabas Gīlakī [al-Ṭabasayn] on the desert's eastern margin. Yazd is 320 km. northwest of Kirmān, 240 km. from Rāvar.

al-Nu'mān to Marw. Ibn 'Amir seized the two sons [sic] of Kanārā; they came into the possession of al-Nu'mān b. al-Afqam al-Naṣrī, [2887] and he manumitted them.

According to 'Alī (b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī)—Abū Ḥafṣ al-Azdī—Idrīs b. Ḥanẓalah al-'Ammī: Ibn 'Āmir captured the inner city (madīnah) of Abrashahr by assault and conquered the places around it—Ṭūs, Abīward, Nasā, and Ḥumrān. This took place in the year 31 (651–52).

According to 'Alī (b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī)—Abū al-Sarī al-Marwazī—his father: I heard Mūsā b. 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim say: My father negotiated a peace with the inhabitants of Sarakhs. 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir had dispatched him against them from Abrashahr, while he himself established a peace treaty with the inhabitants of Abrashahr. (The latter) gave (Ibn 'Āmir) two serving girls of the lineage of Kisrā—Bābūnaj and Tahmīj, or Tamhīj—and he brought them along with him. He dispatched Umayr b. Aḥmar al-Yashkurī, and he conquered the places around Abrashahr—Ṭūs, Abīward, Nasā, and Ḥumrān—until he ended up at Sarakhs.

According to 'Alī (b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī)—al-Ṣalt b. Dīnār—Ibn Sīrīn: Ibn 'Āmir sent 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim to Sarakhs, and he conquered it. Ibn 'Āmir acquired two serving girls of the lineage of Kisrā; he gave one of them to al-Nūshajān,[163] while Bābūnaj died.

According to 'Alī (b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī)—Abū al-Dhayyāl Zuhayr b. Hunayd al-'Adawī—certain Khurāsānī scholars (ashyākh): Ibn 'Āmir dispatched al-Aswad b. Kulthūm al-'Adawī—[that is, from the tribe of] 'Adī belonging to the confederation of Ḍabbah[164]—to Bayhaq, which was part of Abra-[2888] shahr, being separated from the city proper by sixteen farsakhs. Al-Aswad b. Kulthūm conquered it but was killed.

According to (al-Madā'inī): He was a man of distinction in his religion. He was one of the companions of 'Āmir b. 'Abdallāh al-'Anbarī, and 'Āmir used to say, after he had been expelled from Baṣrah, "I grieve for nothing in Iraq except thirsting in the noon-

163. A figure unknown to me, who appears nowhere else in Ṭabarī.

164. 'Adī al-ribāb. According to Lane's authorities, al-ribāb was a name for five confederate tribes who shared a common ancestor in one Ḍabbah. The tribes are variously identified in different sources, but all agree on 'Adī and Taym. E. W. Lane, Arabic-English Lexicon, III, 1005, col. 1.

day heat,[165] the sonorous harmony of the muezzins, and brethren like al-Aswad b. Kulthūm."

According to ʿAlī (b. Muḥammad al-Madāʾinī)—Zuhayr b. Hunayd—one of his paternal uncles: Ibn ʿĀmir conquered Nīshāpūr and proceeded toward Sarakhs. The inhabitants of Marw sued for peace, and Ibn ʿĀmir sent them Ḥātim b. al-Nuʿmān al-Bāhilī. He made peace with Abraz [sic], the marzubān of Marw, in return for [a tribute of] 2,200,000 [dirhams].

According to ('Alī b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī)—Muṣʿab b. Ḥayyān—his brother Muqātil b. Ḥayyān: He made peace with them in return for [a tribute of] 6,200,000 [dirhams].

In this year, ʿUthmān led the people on the Pilgrimage.

---

165. Zimāʾ al-hawājir. Presumably he is referring to the pious discipline imposed by the midday prayer.

The Events of the Year 32

(AUGUST 12, 652–AUGUST 1, 653)

Among these was the expedition of Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān to [2889] the Bosphorus—that is, the straits of Constantinople. He was accompanied by his wife 'Ātikah bt. Qurṭah b. 'Abd 'Amr b. Nawfal b. 'Abd Manāf. [Her name] is also said to be Fākhitah. This was related to me by Aḥmad b. Thābit [al-Rāzī]—someone who mentioned it—Isḥāq [b. 'Īsā]—Abū Ma'shar. It is [also] the account of al-Wāqidī.

According to Sayf, in this year Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ named Salmān b. Rabī'ah as his deputy on the frontier (farj) at Balanjar,[166] and sent the Syrians to reinforce the army encamped there with Ḥudhayfah. [The Syrians] were commanded by Ḥabīb b. Maslamah al-Fihrī. During [this year] dissension over the command arose between Salmān and Ḥabīb, and the Syrians and Kūfans quarreled with one another about this.

166. Balanjar was in this period the chief political center of the Khazar confederation. Its precise location is uncertain, but it probably lay some 175 km. to the northwest of Bāb al-Abwāb [Darband]. After the disastrous campaign recounted below, it was ultimately captured by Umayyad forces ca. 750. See D. M.

[The Disaster at Balanjar]

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: ʿUthmān wrote to Saʿīd ordering Salmān to attack al-Bāb. [ʿUthmān] wrote also to ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Rabīʿah, who was in command at al-Bāb: "Verily greed and arrogance have made many of the subjects (raʿiyyah) reckless. Curtail [your campaign] and do not plunge ahead with the Muslims so boldly, for I fear they may face severe trials." But this [letter] did not restrain ʿAbd al-Raḥmān from his goal and he would not stop short of Balanjar. In the ninth year of ʿUthmān's caliphate, he mounted an expedition, and when he reached Balanjar, [his forces] besieged it, setting up mangonels (majānīq) and ballistas (ʿarrādāt) against it. However, no one could begin to approach [the city] [2890] without being captured or killed. [The defenders] dashed out against the people, and during those days Miʿḍad was killed.

Then the Turks [167] agreed [with the inhabitants of Balanjar] on a day [for a combined attack]. The men of Balanjar sallied forth, the Turks came to their support, and they joined battle. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Rabīʿah—known as Dhū al-Nūr[168]—was struck down, and the Muslims scattered in flight. Those who took the road to Salmān b. Rabīʿah were given sanctuary by him until they left al-Bāb. Those who followed the road to the Khazars and their lands went by way of Jīlān and Jurjān; among these were Salmān

---

Dunlop, "Balandjar," *EI*², I, 985. The following account continues the account of the Armenian-Caucasian wars given above, pp. 8–9 [text, I, 2805–2806, sub anno 24] on the authority of Abū Mikhnaf through Hishām b. Muḥammad b. Sāʾib al-Kalbī. However, Ṭabarī has here dropped Abū Mikhnaf's narrative in favor of the one constructed by Sayf b. ʿUmar, perhaps because of the overt pietism of Sayf's version of events.

167. Presumably he is referring to the Turkish elite among the Khazars. These were a confederation of steppe peoples that emerged in the northern Caucasus and lower Volga basin in the mid-sixth century, under the leadership of a Turkish khagan and aristocracy. After the Arab invasion in the mid-eighth century, their political center was transferred to Atil, near the mouth of the Volga. Allies of the Byzantines during the bitter war against the Sasanians of the early seventh century, they were among the most formidable opponents faced by the Caliphate in the first three Islamic centuries. See C. E. Bosworth, "Ḵabḵ," *EI*², IV, 343–45; W. Barthold and P. B. Golden, "Khazar," *EI*², IV, 1172–75.

168. Both manuscripts as well as Ibn al-Athīr and Ibn Kathīr read "Dhū al-Nūn."

al-Fārisī and Abū Hurayrah.[169] This people (qawm, i.e., the Khazars) took the body of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān and placed it in a casket. It has remained among them, and to this day they ask for rain through him and seek his aid [in battle].

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Dāwūd b. Yazīd—al-Shaʿbī: By God, Salmān b. Rabīʿah knew more about the vulnerable spots on the body than does a butcher about the joints of a slaughter camel.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Ghuṣn b. al-Qāsim—a man of the Banū Kināna: When the expeditions against the Khazars were taking place one after another, they complained and reproached themselves [in the following words]: "We used to be a nation (ummah) that no one would approach until this little nation (ummah) came along, and we have not been able to stand up to them." They said to one another, "These [men] do not die, for if they were subject to death they would not hurtle themselves against us." Now no one [among the Muslims] was injured in the expeditions against [the [2891] Khazars] until the very end of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān's campaign. [The Khazars] said [to their soldiers], "Will you not try [to oppose them]?" Thus, they hid themselves in the thickets, and men from the [Muslim] army who were passing by ran into the ambush. They shot at them from [the thickets], killed them, and cut off their heads. Then they summoned one another to war against [the Muslims] and agreed on a day [to attack]. They joined battle, and ʿAbd al-Raḥmān was killed. This [news] spread quickly among the people and they split into two groups. One group [went] toward al-Bāb, where Salmān [b. Rabīʿah] gave them sanctuary before sending them on, while another group proceeded toward the Khazars, coming to Jīlān and Jurjān. Among them were Salmān al-Fārisī and Abū Hurayrah.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Mustanīr b. Yazīd—his brother Qays—his father: Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah, ʿAlqamah b. Qays, Miʿḍad al-Shaybānī, and Abū 169. Two of the most famous Companions and transmitters of the Prophet's sayings. The geography in this and the following anecdote seems rather confused, since Jīlān and Jurjān lie on the southern shores of the Caspian—a very indirect route at best to the lands of the Khazars.

Mufazzir al-Tamīmī were in one tent, while ʿAmr b. ʿUtbah, Khālid b. Rabīʿah, al-Ḥalḥāl b. Dhurrī, and al-Qarthaʿ were in another. They were all neighbors of one another in the camp at Balanjar. Al-Qarthaʿ used to say, "How beautiful the sheen of blood on one's garments!" And ʿAmr b. ʿUtbah used to say, addressing a white coat (qabāʾ)[170] that he was wearing, "How beautiful the redness of blood upon your whiteness!" The Kufans attacked Balanjar for years during ʿUthmān's caliphate, and during this time no woman [of theirs] was widowed nor was any youth orphaned through violence[171] until the ninth year [of his reign]. [2892]

But in that year, two days before the battle, Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah saw a gazelle brought to his tent, and he never saw one more beautiful until he was shrouded [for burial] in his blanket. Then he was brought to a grave, at which four persons [were standing], and never did he see a finer and more perfectly level grave until he was interred within it. Now when the people assembled early in the morning [for battle] against the Turks, Yazīd was struck by a stone that smashed his head, and it was as though his clothing was adorned rather than soiled by the blood. Thus, he himself was that gazelle which he had seen, and by that blood upon his coat he became [a figure] of beauty.

One day before the battle, [the Muslims] assembled [for battle] early in the morning, and Miʿḍad said to ʿAlqamah, "Lend me your mantle (burd) and I'll tie it around my head." He did this and came to the tower (burj) where Yazīd had been struck down. He shot at them, killing [a number] of them. Then (Miʿḍad) was struck by a ballista stone that crushed his skull. His companions dragged him away, burying him beside Yazīd. ʿAmr b. ʿUtbah was wounded; he saw his coat as he had longed [to see it], and was killed.

On the day of the battle, al-Qarthaʿ fought until he had been perforated by lance thrusts, and it was as if his coat were a garment with a white ground and red ornamentation. The people had remained steadfast until he was wounded, but upon his death they fled.

170. Ahsan defines the qabāʾ as "a kind of sleeved, close-fitting coat resembling the qafṭān, generally reaching the middle of the calf, divided down the front and made to overlap the chest." It seems to have been part of the official attire of viziers in the Abbasid period. Ahsan, Social Life under the Abbasids, 41–42.

171. Reading min qatlin rather than min qablu, as given in Prym's text. See de Goeje, Introductio, dcxxvi.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Dāwūd b. Yazīd: On the Day of Balanjar, Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah al-Nakhaʿī, ʿAmr b. ʿUtbah, and Miʿḍad were struck [2893] down. As for Miʿḍad, he was wearing a mantle of ʿAlqamah's. He was hit by a sliver from a mangonel stone that pierced his head. Thinking it a minor matter, he placed his hand upon it and died. ʿAlqamah washed (Miʿḍad's) blood but it would not rinse out, and he would wear (the bloody mantle) to the Friday prayer. He said, "Miʿḍad's blood upon it makes it all the more precious to me." As to ʿAmr, he wore a white coat and said, "How beautiful blood would be on this!" Then a stone hit and killed him, soaking (the coat) in blood. As for Yazīd, something was dropped on him and killed him. They had dug out and prepared a grave. Upon examining it, Yazīd said, "How fine it is!" It was revealed in a dream[172] that a gazelle, the most beautiful ever seen, was brought to be buried in (the grave), and he was that gazelle. Yazīd was a gentle and handsome man. When ʿUthmān learned of all this, he said, "Verily, we are God's and to Him we return. The people of Kūfah have been betrayed. O God, forgive them and accept them."

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: Saʿīd (b. al-ʿĀs) named Salmān b. Rabīʿah as his deputy on that frontier and put Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān in command of the campaign with the men of Kūfah. Before this, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Rabīʿah was in charge on that frontier. In the tenth year [of his caliphate], ʿUthmān reinforced (the Kūfans) with Syrian forces under the command of Ḥabīb b. Maslamah al-Qurashī. Salmān claimed to be his superior officer, but Ḥabīb rejected this. The Syrians even said, "We are determined to strike down Salmān." At that point the people (al-nās) said, "Then by God we shall smite Ḥabīb and put him in prison. And if you refuse [to recognize Salmān] there will be many slain among both you and ourselves.

Concerning this Aws b. Maghrāʾ said:

---

172. Wa-uriya fīmā yarā 'l-nā'imu anna ghazālan . . . jī'a bihi. See above, p. 97 (text, I, 2892).

If you smite Salmān we shall smite your beloved one (ḥabībakum),
If you make a journey to Ibn 'Affān so shall we.
If you act rightly, the frontier is our amir's; [2894]
This (man) is an amir advancing with the squadrons.
We were charged to be the frontier's guardians, Shooting (arrows) and repelling (assaults) during the nighttime on every frontier.

Ḥabīb decided to assert his authority over the ruler (ṣāḥib) of al-Bāb, as the commander of the army used to do when he came from Kūfah.

When Ḥudhayfah perceived (this situation), he agreed (to accept the command), and (the other Muslims) acknowledged (his status). Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān launched three expeditions against (the Khazars),[173] and during the third campaign 'Uthmān was killed. When they learned of his death, (Ḥudhayfah) said, "O God, curse the murderers of 'Uthmān and those who attacked and reviled him. O God, indeed we used to reprove him, and he would reprove us, whenever those who were with him reproved us and we them. But they have taken that as a ladder to rebellion. O God, do not let them die save by the sword!"

In this year 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf died. According to al-Wāqidī—'Abdallāh b. Ja'far—Ya'qūb b. 'Utbah: At his death he was seventy-five years old.

According to (al-Wāqidī): In (this year) al-'Abbās b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib died at the age of eighty-eight. He was three years older than the Messenger of God.

According to (al-Wāqidī): In (this year) died 'Abdallāh b. Zayd b. 'Abd Rabbih, to whom (the use of the voice for) the call to prayer was revealed (in a dream).

According to (al-Wāqidī): In (this year) 'Abdallāh b. Mas'ūd passed away in Medina. He was buried in al-Buqay'. One (authority) says that 'Ammār (b. Yāsir) led the funeral prayer for him, while another states that the prayer was led by 'Uthmān.

173. A very elliptical and difficult passage. The original reads: fa-lammā aḥassa Ḥudhayfatu aqarra wa-aqarrū fa-ghazāhā Ḥudhayfatu 'bnu 'l-Yamān thalātha ghazawātin. In the last clause, the pronominal suffix of ghazāhā might also refer to Balanjar. Ibn al-Athīr, obviously uncertain of the precise sense of the passage, contents himself with a loose paraphrase: Kāmil (Beirut), III, 133.

[2895] According to (al-Wāqidī): In (this year) Abū Ṭalḥah died.

According to Sayf: In (this year) Abū Dharr died.

The Account of the Death of [Abū Dharr al-Ghifārī]

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Aṭiyyah—Yazīd al-Faq'asī: When the time for Abū Dharr's death arrived, in Dhū al-Ḥijjah of the eighth year of 'Uthmān's caliphate, (the Angel of Death)[174] came down to Abū Dharr. When (Abū Dharr) perceived him he said to his daughter, "Be watchful, my daughter. Look, do you see anyone?" "No," she replied. "My hour is not yet come," he said. Then he ordered her to slaughter and roast a sheep. Then he said, "When those who are to bury me come to you, say to them: 'Abū Dharr adjures you not to ride off until you have eaten.'" Now when her pot had cooked thoroughly, he said to her, "Look, do you see anyone?" "Yes," she answered, "there are riders approaching." He said, "Put me facing the Ka'bah." She did so. He went on, "In the name of God, and by God, and [blessings] on the community (millah) of the Messenger of God—may God bless him and give him peace."

Then his daughter went out to meet them, saying, "God have mercy on you. Behold Abū Dharr." "Where is he?" they said. She pointed him out to them—he had already died—saying, "Bury him." They said, "We shall indeed. What a true blessing. By this God has honored us." Now these riders were Kūfans, among them Ibn Mas'ūd. They turned to him, and Ibn Mas'ūd was saying as he wept, "The Messenger of God spoke truly: 'He will die alone and be resurrected alone.'" Then they washed (Abū Dharr's body), wrapped him for burial, performed the prayer for him, and buried him. When they washed to leave, (his daugher) said to them, "Verily Abū Dharr greets you in peace, and he has adjured you not to ride off before you have eaten." So they did this, and carried [his family with them] until they brought them to Mecca. They announced his death to 'Uthmān, and he attached (Abū Dharr's) daughter to his own household, saying, "God will be merciful to Abū Dharr, and forgive Rāfi' b. Khadīj for his remaining at [2896] home."[175]

174. The text reads nazala only, without an explicit subject; I have followed the editor's suggestion (angelus mortis). Cf. the account in Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 52–56.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Qa'qā' b. al-Ṣalt—a certain man—Kulayb b. al-Ḥalḥāl—al-Ḥalḥāl b. Dhurrī: We set out with Ibn Mas'ūd in the year 31 (651–52), numbering fourteen riders, and ultimately came to al-Rabadhah. There was a woman who met us and said, "Behold Abū Dharr." Now we were completely uninformed about his situation, so we said, "Where is Abū Dharr?" She pointed to a tent, and we said, "What's going on with him?" She said, "He left Medina due to a certain matter that he heard about there, so he went away." Ibd Mas'ud said, "What induced him to [live among] the bedouin?" She said, "Indeed the Commander of the Faithful disliked that, but (Abū Dharr) used to say, '(Medina) is corrupt and abased.'"[176] Then Ibn Mas'ūd turned toward him in tears.

We washed (his body) and wrapped him. Now his tent was permeated with musk, and we said to the woman, "What is this?" "It was a bit of musk," she replied. "When he was brought [here], he said: 'Witnesses will come to the dead man and find the stench [of death] and will not eat. So dissolve that musk in water and sprinkle the tent with it. Receive them hospitably with its scent and cook this meat, for a group of pious men will see me and take charge of my burial, so receive them hospitably.'"

When we had buried him, she summoned us to eat. After eating, we decided to take her with us. Ibn Mas'ūd said, "The Commander of the Faithful is nearby; we will seek his instructions." We came to Mecca and informed him of the news. He said, "God will be merciful to Abū Dharr and forgive him for settling in al-Rabadhah." When he left [Mecca after the end of the Pilgrimage], he took the road to al-Rabadhah and attached (Abū Dharr's) family to his own household. Then he headed for Medina while we went on to Iraq. Our number included Ibn Mas'ūd, Abū Mufazzir al-Tamīmī, Bakr b. 'Abdallāh al-Tamīmī, al-Aswad b. Yazīd al-

175. Rāfi' b. Khadīj: I have been unable to identify this figure.

176. The sentence is a pun: hiya ba'adun wa-hiya madīnatun. Ba'ad is literally "distant, remote." Madīnah is a feminine adjective, madīn, "burdened by debt."

[2897] Nakha'ī, 'Alqamah b. Qays al-Nakha'ī, al-Ḥalḥāl b. Dhurrī al-Ḍabbī, al-Ḥārith b. Suwayd al-Taymī, 'Amr b. 'Utbah b. Farqad al-Sulamī, Ibn Rabī'ah al-Sulamī, Abū Rāfi' al-Muzanī, Suwayd b. Math'abah al-Tamīmī, Ziyād b. Mu'āwiyah, the brother of al-Qartha' al-Ḍabbī, and the brother of Mi'ḍad al-Shaybānī.

In the year 32 (652–53), Ibn 'Āmir conquered Marwarūdh, al-Ṭāliqān, al-Fāryāb, al-Jūzajān, and Ṭukhāristān.

['Abdallāh b. 'Āmir's Conquests in Northeastern Iran]

According to 'Alī (b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī)—Salamah b. 'Uthmān and others—Ismā'il b. Muslim—Ibn Sīrīn: Ibn 'Āmir dispatched al-Aḥnaf b. Qays to Marwarūdh, and he besieged its inhabitants. They came out and fought, but the Muslims routed them and forced them back into their fortresses. Then (the inhabitants of Marwarūdh) looked out upon them and said, "You Arabs are not what we expected. Had we known what you were like, matters between you and us would be different than they are. Grant us a respite and we will consider now (what we should do). Go back to your camp ('askar)." Thus, al-Aḥnaf returned, going out to them the next morning (to learn of their decision). They had made ready for war, and one of the Persians emerged from the city with a letter (kitāb) and announced, "I am an ambassador; give me safe-conduct." (Al-Aḥnaf) did so. Now he was an envoy from the marzubān of Marwarūdh,[177] (and was also) his nephew and interpreter, and the letter from the marzubān was (addressed)
[2898] to al-Aḥnaf. He read out the letter, which said: "To the commander of the army: We praise God, in whose hand are the turns of fortune, who transfers kingship as He pleases, who lifts up whomever He wishes after abasement and brings down whomever He wishes after exaltation. Verily He has called upon me to arrange peace terms with you on the (same) lines as my grandfather's submission and with the marks of honor and rank that your master (ṣāḥibkum) thinks appropriate. So welcome to you, and rejoice. I summon you to peace between you and us, based on (the following conditions): (1) that I render you a tribute

177. The text has marzubān Marw, but presumably Marwarūdh is intended.

(kharāj) of 60,000 dirhams; (2) that you confirm me in the possession of what Kisrā, King of Kings, conceded (aqṭa'a) to my great-grandfather, when he killed the serpent that was feeding on the people and cutting the roads that connected the lands and villages along with their inhabitants; (3) that you take no tribute whatever from any member of my house; (4) that the office of marzubān not be taken from my house and given to any other. If you do all this for me, I will come forth to you. I have sent you my nephew Māhak to seek a pact with you concerning my requests."

According to (al-Madā'inī): Al-Aḥnaf wrote back to him (as follows): "In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. From Ṣakhr b. Qays, commander of the army, to Bādhān, marzubān of Marwarūdh, and the heavy cavalry (asāwirah) and the Persians who are with him. Peace be upon him who follows the Divine guidance, believes truly, and fears God. To proceed: Your nephew Māhak has come before me, striving sincerely on your behalf and informing [me] about you. I have presented (your proposals) to the Muslims who are with me. I and they agree as to what is incumbent upon you. We consent to what you have [2899] sought and laid before me. To wit: you will pay 60,000 dirhams from your plowmen, peasants, and cropland to me and to any commander of the Muslims who is governor (wālī) after me. Excepted are those lands that you have mentioned, where Kisrā—the man who wronged himself—conceded them to your great-grandfather, because he had killed the serpent that had done evil in the earth and cut the roads, 'for the earth belongs to God and His Messenger, and he bequeaths [it] to whomever He pleases among His servants.'[178] You, together with the heavy cavalry who are with you, are likewise obliged to aid the Muslims and fight their enemies, if the Muslims so wish and decide. In return you are owed the aid of the Muslims against anyone who fights against those members of your community (millah) who follow you. Concerning all this there will be a letter from me, which you will possess after me. And no tribute whatever [will be levied] against you [personally] nor against any relatives from your household. If you become a Muslim and follow the Messenger, you and your brother will have from the Muslims [the same]

178. Qur'ān 7:125.

salary, status, and rations [which the Muslims receive].[179] For this you have my covenant [dhimmah], the covenant of my father, and the covenants of the Muslims and their ancestors. The contents of this document have been duly witnessed by Jaz' b. Mu'āwiyah—or, Mu'āwiyah b. Jaz'—al-Sa'dī; Ḥamzah b. al-Hir-[2900] mās and Ḥumayd b. Khiyār, both men of [the tribe of] al-Māzin; and 'Iyāḍ b. Warqa' al-Usaydī. It was written by Kaysān, protegé (mawlā) of the Banū Tha'labah, on Sunday in the Month of God, al-Muḥarram." It was sealed by the commander of the army, al-Aḥnaf b. Qays, and the inscription on al-Aḥnaf's seal reads, "We serve God."

According to 'Alī [b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī]—Muṣ'ab b. Ḥayyān—his brother Muqātil b. Ḥayyān: Ibn 'Āmir made peace with the inhabitants of Marw, and sent al-Aḥnaf with 4,000 [troops] to Ṭukhāristān. He advanced until he made camp at the [present-day] location of the Castle of al-Aḥnaf [in the district of] Marwarūdh.[180] Against him assembled the inhabitants of Ṭukhāristān, al-Jūzajān, al-Ṭāliqān, and al-Fāryāb, constituting three armies of 30,000 [men]. News about them and the forces that they had gathered having reached al-Aḥnaf, he sought counsel from the people. They differed among themselves: one person said, "We should return to Marw"; another said, "We should go back to Abrashahr"; another said, "We should remain here and call for reinforcements"; another said, "We should confront them in battle."

According to [al-Madā'inī]: That evening, al-Aḥnaf went out for a walk in the camp and listened to the people's conversation. He was passing by the people in one tent, where a man was kindling a fire under a stew or kneading dough. They were all talking about the enemy. One of them said, "The right choice for the commander [namely, al-Aḥnaf] is to set out in the morning and to meet this nation (qawm) in battle, wherever that may happen, for [this] will be more alarming to them." The man with the stew or dough responded, "If he does that, he and all of you will commit a [2901] blunder. Will you order him to confront the elite forces of the

179. The bracketed words are from Ibn Ḥubaysh, Kitāb al-Ghazawāt.

180. On Qaṣr al-Aḥnaf, on the Murghāb a day's march from Marwarūdh, see Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 405.

enemy by advancing into their territory? [In that case] he would face a great number with but a few men. If they have room to maneuver, they will annihilate us. Instead, the right thing is for him to establish his camp between the Murghāb and the mountain, putting the Murghāb on his right and the mountain on his left. Then the enemy, though they may be many, will only confront him with a number equal to that of his own comrades." Then al-Aḥnaf returned [to his own tent] convinced by what the latter had said. He fixed his camp where he was. Now the people of Marw sent to him, proposing to fight alongside him, but he responded, "I dislike having to seek the aid of Polytheists. Adhere to the terms that we agreed upon with you. For if we are victorious, we shall stand on what we promised you. And if they are victorious over us and fight you, then fight on your own behalf."

According to [al-Madā'inī]: Now the Muslims were performing the afternoon prayer when the Polytheists suddenly fell upon them. But the Muslims fought back staunchly, and the two sides held their ground until the evening as al-Aḥnaf recited the verse of Ibn Ju'ayyah al-A'rajī:

He who most rightly hates not fatal destiny is a strong youth who has no children.

According to 'Alī [b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī]—Abū al-Ashhab al-Sa'dī—his father: At night al-Aḥnaf and the Muslims encountered the inhabitants of Marwarūdh, al-Ṭāliqān, al-Fāryāb, and al-Jūzajān, fighting with them the whole night through. Then God routed [the enemy], and the Muslims slew them until at last they [2902] came to Raskan,[181] which is some twelve farsakhs from the Castle of al-Aḥnaf. The marzubān of Marwarūdh had delayed bringing the [tribute] in return for which [the Muslims] had made peace with him in order to see how things would turn out for them.

According to [al-Madā'inī]: When al-Aḥnaf gained the victory, he sent two men to the marzubān with orders not to speak to him until they had arrested him. They did [that], and knowing that they would not treat him thus unless they had been victorious, he fulfilled his obligations.

According to 'Alī [b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī]—al-Mufaḍḍal al-

181. Not identified.

Ḍabbī—his father: Al-Aqraʿ b. Ḥābis went to al-Jūzajān, al-Aḥnaf having sent him with a detachment (jarīdah) of cavalry to pursue remnants of the [enemy] forces routed by al-Aḥnaf. (Al-Aqraʿ) fought them and the Muslims ranged far and wide. Some of the [Muslim] cavalrymen were killed, but then God bestowed victory over them upon the Muslims and they routed and killed them. Ibn Kuthayyir al-Nahshalī said, in a long poem:

The rain clouds poured when the struggles of valiant youths began at al-Jūzajān,
As far as the two castles in the district (rustāq) of Khūṭ;
the two bald men (al-aqraʿān) commanded them there.

In this year occurred the peace between al-Aḥnaf and the inhabitants of Balkh.

[2903] [The Peace between al-Aḥnaf and the People of Balkh]

According to ʿAlī (b. Muḥammad al-Madāʾinī)—Zuhayr b. Hunayd—Iyās b. al-Muhallab: Al-Aḥnaf advanced from Marwarūdh to Balkh and besieged its inhabitants. They made peace with him in return for [a tribute of] 400,000 [dirhams]. He was satisfied with that, appointing his nephew, Asīd b. al-Mutashammis, as his deputy to collect from them the amount agreed to in the peace treaty. Then he marched on to Khwārazm and remained there until winter assailed him. He asked the opinion of his comrades, and Ḥuṣayn [b. al-Mundhir][182] said to him: ʿAmr b. Maʿdīkarib has said to you:

If you cannot do a thing, put it aside;
pass it by to get to what you can do.

According to (al-Madāʾinī): So al-Aḥnaf ordered [his forces] to move on, then departed for Balkh. His nephew took charge of the (tribute) agreed to in the peace treaty, and while he was levying [it] from them the festival of Mihrgān[183] came around. They gave 182. The bracketed words are from Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil (Beirut), III, 127, sub anno 31.

183. Mihrgān is the autumn festival (16 Mihr/26 October), one of the two chief him gifts—gold and silver vessels, dīnārs and dirhams, furniture, and garments. Al-Aḥnaf's nephew said, "This is the (tribute) in return for which we made peace with you." "No," they responded, "this is rather something that we do on this day for our ruler in order to conciliate him." (Al-Aḥnaf's nephew) said. "What is this day?" They answered, "Mihrgān." "I do not know what that is," he said. "I hate to refuse (such gifts), for perhaps they are rightfully mine. But I will take them and set them aside until I can look into (the matter)." Thus, he took possession of [2904] them. When al-Aḥnaf arrived, he informed him (about the matter), and (al-Aḥnaf) asked (the Balkhīs) about it. They told him what they had told his nephew. (Al-Aḥnaf) said, "I will bring (these gifts) to the commander." Thus, he took them to Ibn ʿĀmir and informed him about them. (Ibn ʿĀmir) said, "Keep them, Abū Baḥr, they are yours." "I have no need of them," replied (al-Aḥnaf). Then Ibn ʿĀmir said, "Take them for yourself, Mismār."

According to (al-Madāʾinī)—al-Ḥasan: So al-Qurashī seized them greedily.

According to ʿAlī (b. Muḥammad al-Madāʾinī)—ʿAmr b. Muḥammad al-Murrī—certain shaykhs of the Banū Murrah: As his deputy in Balkh al-Aḥnaf appointed Bishr b. Mutashammis.

According to ʿAli (b. Muḥammad al-Madāʾinī)—Ṣadaqah b. Ḥumayd—his father: When Ibn ʿĀmir made peace with the inhabitants of Marw and al-Aḥnaf did the same with the inhabitants of Balkh, Ibn ʿĀmir dispatched Khulayd b. ʿAbdallāh al-Ḥanafī to Herat and Bādghīs,[184] which he conquered. Then later they rebelled (kafarū) and sided with Qārin.

According to ʿAlī (b. Muḥammad al-Madāʾinī)—Maslamah—Dāwūd: When al-Aḥnaf returned to Ibn ʿĀmir, the people said to the latter, "No one has been granted such conquests as you—Fārs, Kirmān, Sijistān, and all Khurāsān." Ibn ʿĀmir responded, "I festivals of ancient Iran, Nawrūz (New Year in the spring) being the other. See Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 73, 201–2.

---

184. Bādghīs is the fertile district in northwestern Afghanistan lying between the Herāt river (Harī Rūd) and the Murghāb river. It is crossed by several tributaries of the Murghāb, but the main source of water appears to be wells and the rainfall inspired by the Paropamisus mountains on the east. Through it pass the roads connecting Herāt to Marwarūdh. See Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 412–15; Barthold, Historical Geography, 47–49.

shall most assuredly manifest my gratitude to God for that by setting forth in a state of consecration from this place in order to perform the Lesser Pilgrimage ('umrah). Thus, he performed the rites of consecration in Nishapur for a Lesser Pilgrimage. When he came to 'Uthmān, the latter rebuked him for having consecrated himself in Khurāsān, saying, "You should observe this (rite) strictly at the time when the people consecrate themselves."[185]

[2905] According to 'Alī (b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī)—Maslamah—al-Sakan b. Qatādah al-'Uraynī: As his deputy in Khurāsān, Ibn 'Āmir appointed Qays b. al-Haytham, and Ibn 'Āmir departed from (that province) in the year 32 (652–53).

According to (al-Madā'inī): Qārin assembled a great host from the district (nāḥiyah) of al-Ṭabasayn and from the inhabitants of Bādghīs, Herāt, and Quhistān, and advanced with 40,000 [men]. [Qays b. al-Haytham][186] said to 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim, "What is your opinion?" (Ibn Khāzim) said, "I think you should leave the country, for I am its governor (amīr). I possess a diploma of appointment ('ahd) from Ibn 'Āmir: if war breaks out in Khurāsān, I will be its governor." And he produced a document that he had deliberately fabricated.[187] Qays, disgusted by his seditious conduct, left him and the country and came to Ibn 'Āmir. Ibn 'Āmir rebuked him, saying, "You have come to me having abandoned [those] lands in wartime." (Qays) answered, "'Abdallāh (b. Khāzim) came to me with a diploma of appointment from you." Then (Ibn 'Āmir's) mother said to him, "I forbade you to leave 185. On the 'umrah see above, note 116. On the rites of consecration for pilgrimage to Mecca, see A. J. Wensinck and J. Jomier, "Iḥrām," EI[2], III, 1052–53. The rites includes a formal statement of intention, a major ablution, shaving and cutting the hair, and the donning of a distinctive white garment, as well as abstinence from shaving, intercourse, etc. while performing the pilgrimage. The point of 'Uthmān's rebuke is that pilgrims are supposed to assume a state of iḥrām only at certain specified places, variously 50 to 200 km. from Mecca. Ibn 'Āmir's piety here is an excessive act that deviates from the established practice of the Muslims.

186. Supplied from a marginal note in Ibn Ḥubaysh, Kitāb al-Ghazawāt. See editor's note.

187. Cf. the account of this event given above, p. 37 (text, I, 2832, sub anno 29) on the authority of Sayf b. 'Umar. Note that Sayf connects Ibn Khāzim's usurpation not with the revolt of Qārin but with the turbulence following the murder of 'Uthmān.

both of them in one place, precisely because (Ibn Khāzim) would make trouble for (Qays)."

According to (al-Madā'inī): Ibn Khāzim went out against Qārin with 4000 [troops], commanding the people to take grease [with them]. When he drew near (Qārin's) camp, he gave orders to the people, saying, "Let every man of you tie any rag or cotton or wool he has with him around the head of his spear, then soak it with grease—ghee, oil, pitch, or melted fat." Then he moved on until, when evening had come, he sent ahead his vanguard of 600 [men]. He then followed behind them; upon his orders the people set their spear heads ablaze, with some of them taking the flame from others.

According to (al-Madā'inī): His vanguard reached Qārin's camp, coming upon them in the middle of the night. They had sentinels, and (the Muslim vanguard) skirmished with them, sowing utter confusion among them by the night attack while they themselves were secure. Ibn Khāzim approached (the enemy), who saw fires right and left, moving forward and backward, sinking and rising, [2906] but without being able to perceive anyone. They were terrified by this, even as Ibn Khāzim's vanguard was fighting them. Then Ibn Khāzim led the Muslims down upon them. Qārin was slain and the enemy fled, while the Muslims followed them, killing them at will and capturing many prisoners. A shaykh of the Banū Tamīm claims that the mother of al-Ṣalt b. Ḥurayth was one of the captives taken from Qārin['s followers], as were the mothers of Ziyād b. al-Rabī' and 'Awn Abū 'Abdallāh b. 'Awn the jurist.

According to 'Alī (b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī)—Maslamah: Ibn Khāzim seized Qārin's camp and its contents, and wrote to Ibn 'Āmir of the victory. The latter was pleased and confirmed (Ibn Khāzim) in authority over Khurāsān. He continued in power there until after the Battle of the Camel, when he came to Baṣrah. He was present at the uprising (waq'ah) of Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī, with whom he was staying in the house of Sunbīl.[188]

188. Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī was one of Mu'āwiyah's agents during the first civil war. In 38 (658) he was dispatched to Baṣrah to incite the Tamīm to revolt against 'Alī. The revolt was quashed by 'Alid loyalists from the tribe of Azd, however, and Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī was killed in the fray. Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 100, citing Ṭabarī, I, 3414ff., on the authority of al-Madā'inī.

According to 'Alī [b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī]—al-Ḥasan b. Rashīd—Sulaymān b. Kathīr al-Khuzā'ī:[189] Qārin assembled a great host against the Muslims, and the Muslims became anxious about their situation. Al-Qays b. al-Haytham said to 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim, "What is your opinion?" He responded, "My opinion is that you cannot handle the great number of those who confront us. Betake yourself to Ibn 'Āmir and inform him about the vast forces who have assembled against us. As for us, we shall remain in these strongholds and hold them off until you reach us with your reinforcements."

According to [al-Madā'inī]: So Qays b. al-Haytham departed, for as he pondered [this advice], Ibn Khāzim showed [him] a diploma of appointment, saying, "Ibn 'Āmir has made me governor of Khurāsān." Then [Ibn Khāzim] advanced against Qārin, gaining the victory over him. He wrote of the victory to Ibn 'Āmir, and the latter confirmed him in authority over Khurāsān. The Baṣrans continued to attack those Khurasānīs who had not negotiated peace terms [with them]; and when they came back [to Baṣrah], they left behind 4000 men to complete the task.[190] [These latter] kept on with this until the civil war (fitnah) broke out.

---

189. Not the famous Abbasid naqīb in Khurāsān. See de Goeje, Introductio, dcxxvii.

190. Fa-idhā raja'ū khallafū arba'ata ālāfin li'l-'aqabati.

The Events of the Year [2907]

33

(August 2, 653–July 21, 654)

In (this year), according to al-Wāqidī, took place Mu'āwiyah's attack on the Castle of the Woman (Ḥiṣn al-Mar'ah) in the Malaṭyah district of the land of the Byzantines.

In (this year) took place 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd b. Abī Sarḥ's second campaign in Ifrīqiyah when its inhabitants repudiated (their) pact ('ahd).

In (this year), according to al-Wāqidī, 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir sent al-Aḥnaf b. Qays to Khurāsān, for its inhabitants had rebelled. (Al-Aḥnaf) conquered both (of the cities named) Marw—Marw Shāhjān[191] by a negotiated peace (ṣulḥan), and Marw al-Rūd after a bitter struggle. 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir followed him out; he laid siege to Abrashahr and occupied it through a negotiated peace.

According to the account related to me by Aḥmad b. Thābit al-Rāzī—someone who related it (to him)—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar: (The conquest of) Cyprus took place in the year 33 (653–

191. On this epithet see Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 398.

54). But in the report on Cyprus we have already given the statement of those who contradict (Abū Ma'shar) concerning this.[192]

In (this year) 'Uthmān b. 'Affān sent certain Iraqis into exile in Syria.

The Exile of the Kūfans Whom ['Uthmān] Sent [to Syria][193]

The authorities (ahl al-siyar) disagree on this matter.

Sayf's account was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—(Sayf)—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ used to receive visits only from those long settled in Kūfah, the leading men among the veterans of the earliest battles in Iraq (wujūh ahl al-ayyām) and of al-Qādisiyyah, the Qur'ān reciters (qurrā')[194]
[2908] among the Baṣrans, and the pious-minded. These were his confidants when he retired [to his private quarters]. Now when he held audience for the people, then everyone might enter his presence. One day he held such an audience and the people came in. While they were seated conversing with one another, Ḥubaysh al-Asadī—whose father's name is unknown[195]—said, "How gener-

192. See above, pp. 25–31 (text, I, 2819–2827, sub anno 28). Ṭabarī follows the date given by Wāqidī, while the principal authority for his narrative is Sayf b. 'Umar.

193. Another version of the story, based largely on the tradition of Wāqidī and more sympathetic to the dissidents, is given in Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 39–47. Ṭabarī also gives a version derived from Wāqidī, pp. 120–25 (text, I, 2915–2921).

194. Qurrā' is a mysterious word. It was long interpreted in both Islamic and Orientalist tradition as "Qur'ān-reciters"—that is, men of piety and religious learning who had memorized the Qur'ān. At first such men provided the ideological cadres for the Muslim forces, but later on they became the nucleus of the irreconcilable Kharijite opposition to "worldly power." But this concept was challenged by M. A. Shaban, Islamic History, I, pp. 50–55, where he argues that they are the early settlers in Iraq, ahl al-qurā, literally, "men of the towns." Shaban's suggestion remains controversial, but has been further explored by Martin Hinds and G. Juynboll. Hinds ("Kūfan Political Alighnments," pp. 357–61) identifies them as those early comers to Iraq who had the fewest followers, and hence possessed the lowest status and received the most meager rewards; however, he still connects them with the term qārī', "Qur'ān-reciter." The literature is accurately but inconclusively reviewed in T. Nagel, "Ḳurrā'," *EI*², V, 499—500. In the present context the traditional interpretation seems to fit reasonably well, as also above, p. 58 (text, I, 2853). Cf. the "respectable classes" here with those mentioned above, pp. 57–58 (text, I, 2852–2853, sub anno 30).

195. Ḥubaysh b. Fulān al-Asadī. Prym has restored the name as "Khunays," ous is Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh!" Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ replied, "If a man possesses a place like al-Nashāstaj,[196] it is only right that he be generous. By God, if I possessed anything like it, God would provide you all with a life of ease."

Then 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ḥubaysh, who was a young man, said, "By God, I wish that this al-Milṭāṭ[197] were yours"—that is, the Sasanian crown lands alongside the Euphrates adjacent to Kūfah. [The others present] said, "May God seal your mouth! By God, we have something in mind for you!" Then Ḥubaysh said, "[He's only] a boy, don't argue with him."[198] "He desires part of our Sawād for himself," they said. [Ḥubaysh] answered, "And for you he desires many times as much." "He should desire nothing either for us or for himself," they said. "What's wrong with you," said [Ḥubaysh]. "By God, you ordered him to do this," they responded. Then [a group of them] rose up in fury against ['Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ḥubaysh] and seized him—al-Ashtar, Ibn Dhī al-Ḥabakah, Jundub, Ṣa'ṣa'ah, Ibn al-Kawwā', Kumayl, and 'Umayr b. Ḍābi'.[199] His father [that is, Ḥubaysh al-Asadī] went to his debut "Ḥubaysh" seems much better attested. See 2908, note b, and de Goeje, Introductio, dcxxvii. In favor of Prym's reading, however, see Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 40: 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Khunays al-Asadī, ṣāḥib shuraṭihi.

---

196. On Ṭalḥah's acquisition of al-Nashāstaj, see above, p. 60 [text I, 2854, sub anno 30].

197. Al-Milṭāṭ is the land bordering the Euphrates in the vicinity of Kūfah; al-Muthannā camped there with his army on the eve of the battle of Buwayb. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, IV, 633; other references in Ṭabarī: I, 2185, 2255, 2485.

198. Reading lā tujāruhu instead of lā tujāzuhu. See de Goeje, Introductio, dcxxvii. The subject of the sentence is somewhat ambiguous; it reads, "Qāla Ḥubayshun ghulāmun fa-lā tujāruhu." Caetani [Annali, VIII, 32] takes Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ as the implicit subject and translates as follows: "Disse Sa'īd: 'Khunays é un ragazzo. . . .'" This alters the dialogue's dramatic development, obviously, since Sa'īd becomes the boy's chief defender, but it does not change the general import of the passage—namely, that Ḥubaysh and his son were attacked with little provocation by inveterate malcontents. In any case, I believe that Caetani is in error here: [1] Ḥubaysh [that is, Khunays] is clearly a mature man in the text, not "un ragazzo"; [2] Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil [Beirut], III, 138, paraphrases the sentence to read, Qāla abūhu ghulāmun fa-lā tujāzuhu, and "abūhu" can only be the subject of "qāla."

199. Maqrīzī, al-Muqaffā, gives fuller versions of two of these names: Ka'b b. Dhī al-Ḥabakah al-Nahdī, and Kumayl b. Ziyād. See de Goeje, Introductio, dcxxvii. Note also that, according to Sayf's account, several of the dissidents here were involved in the conspiracy against Sa'īd's predecessor as governor of Kūfah, al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah. Ṭabarī's list should be compared with the one given in Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 40–41.

fense, but they beat both of them unconscious. Sa'īd (b. al-'Āṣ) began pleading with them [to stop], but they refused scornfully until they had worked their will upon [their two victims].

The Banū Asad [that is, the tribe of Ḥubaysh and his son] having heard of this, came—Ṭulayḥah among them—and surrounded the [governor's] palace. The tribes (al-qabā'il) mounted [their horses] and took refuge [from the Banū Asad] with Sa'īd, saying, "Get us to safety." So Sa'īd went out to the people and said, "O people, a band of men (qawm) have quarreled and fought with one another, but now God has bestowed forgiveness [on [2909] them]." Then [the Banū Asad] backed off and returned [home], continuing their discussions. Sa'īd censured [the assailants of Ḥubaysh and 'Abd al-Raḥmān][200] and sent them away. When the two men recovered consciousness, he said, "Are you alive?" "Your associates (ghāshiyah) have killed us," they replied. "They will not come to call on me again, by God," he said, "now hold your tongues and do not embolden the people against me."[201] And they did [as he said].

When the hopes of those individuals were frustrated, they sat in their homes and busied themselves with spreading rumors until the Kūfans blamed [Sa'īd] for their situation. He [al-Ashtar?] said, "This [man] is your governor (amīr), and he has prevented me from stirring anything up. Whoever among you intends to get things moving, let him act." Then the notables and upright men of Kūfah (ashrāf ahl al-Kūfah wa-ṣulaḥā'hum) wrote to 'Uthmān to have [the dissidents] expelled. He wrote, "If your council of notables (mala') is agreed on that, then put them in Mu'āwiyah's charge." So they expelled them, and they were led away in humiliation until they reached him, some ten in number.

[The Kūfan notables] having written about this to 'Uthmān, he wrote to Mu'āwiyah [as follows]: "The Kūfans have expelled and sent to you certain innately rebellious individuals. Therefore hasten them along[202] and keep close watch on them. If you observe right conduct in them, then receive them hospitably. But if they are burdensome to you, then send them back to (the Kūfans)." When (the exiles) came to Mu'āwiyah, he welcomed them, housing them in a church named after Mary. In accordance with 'Uthmān's orders, he had them treated as they had been in Iraq, and he began taking the noon and evening meals with them constantly.

200. Reading fa-sā'ahum instead of fa-sa'alahum. See 2909, note a, and de Goeje, Introductio, dcxxvii.

201. Reading wa-lā tujarri'a 'alayya 'l-nāsa. See de Goeje, Introductio, dcxxvii.

202. Reading fa-za'hum instead of fa-ru'hum. See de Goeje, Introductio, cclxxxi, dcxxvii.

One day he said to them, "You are a group of Arabs who possess maturity and eloquence.[203] Through Islam you have attained nobility, conquered the nations (umam), and taken possession of their official ranks and their estates. I have learned that you are [2910 embittered against Quraysh. But were it not for Quraysh you would again be abject and despised, just as you used to be. Down to the present day your imāms have been your armor, so do not be without[204] your armor. Today your imāms are patient for your sake in the face of wrongdoing, and they bear the burden of providing for you. By God, you must end [your dissidence] or God will most assuredly put you to the test with (rulers) who impose heavy demands on you and then do not praise you for enduring [them]. Then you will be their accomplices in (the evils) that you have brought upon the subjects (ra'iyyah) both during your lifetime and after your death."

Then a man belonging to the band [of exiles][205] said, "As for what you said about Quraysh—in the Time of Ignorance, they were certainly not the most numerous or formidable of the Arabs so that they can frighten us [now]. As for what you said about armor—when the armor is pierced matters will be in our hands."[206]

Mu'āwiyah responded, "Now I recognize you [pl.]. I know that it is simplemindedness which has seduced you into this. You [that is, Ṣa'ṣa'ah] are the spokesman for this band, and I see no intelligence in you. To you I extol the cause (amr) of Islam and remind you of it, while to me you recall the Time of Ignorance. I

---

203. Innakum qawmun min 'l-'arabi la-kum asnānun wa-alsinatun.

204. Reading tashidhdhū rather than tasdū. See de Goeje, Introductio, dcxxvii.

205. Identified as Ṣa'ṣa'ah in Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil (Beirut), III, 139.

206. Fa-inna 'l-junnata idhā ukhturiqat khulīṣa ilaynā. A conjectural translation; I have followed Caetani's version, which seems to reflect the situation accurately (Annali, VIII, 33]: "Quanto poi allo scudo, quando sará lacerato, tutto tornerá in mano nostra."

have given you godly admonishment, while you claim that what shields you will be pierced. But what can be pierced has no connection with armor. May God put to shame any band of men (aqwām) that glorifies your [pl.] conduct and lauds [it] before your caliph. You must understand—as I doubt you do—that Quraysh was given power and prestige, both in the Time of Ignorance and under Islam, only by Almighty God. (Quraysh) were neither the most numerous nor the most warlike of the Arabs, but among them they were the noblest in public esteem, the purest in lineage, the mightiest in face of danger, the most perfect in manly [2911] qualities. In the Time of Ignorance, while the people were devouring one another, they abstained [therefrom] only through God. Those whom He has exalted are not scorned, and those whom He has raised up are not thrown down, for He has reserved for them "a sanctuary secure, while all around them the people are snatched away."[207] Do you know of Arabs or non-Arabs, Black or Red, whom fate (dahr) has not struck down in their own country and sanctuary by some turn of fortune (dawlah), save only Quraysh. For whenever anyone laid a plot against (Quraysh) God abased him,[208] until God willed that whoever honors and follows His religion should be saved from disgrace in this world and an evil return in the next. Therefore He approved the best of His creatures [that is, Muḥammad], and for him He approved companions, the best of whom were [from] Quraysh. Then upon (Quraysh) He erected this royal power (mulk), and among them He fixed this caliphal authority (khilāfah), and all this is appropriate for no one save them. For God guarded (Quraysh) in the Time of Ignorance while they were yet unbelievers. Do you imagine that He will not protect them now when they have accepted His religion, and when He sheltered them in the Time of Ignorance from the [foreign] kings who used to subjugate you?

I would feel disgust for you [sing.] and your associates even if someone besides you had spoken, but you began. As for you, Ṣaʿṣaʿah, your town (qaryah) is surely the worst of Arab towns—the one whose vegetation is most malodorous, whose riverbed is deepest, whose evildoing is most notorious, and whose protégés (jīrān) are vilest.[209] No one of noble or humble birth has ever dwelt there without being insulted on that account and without (that fact) being a defect in him. Moreover, they had the ugliest nicknames among the Arabs, the basest marriage ties, and were [2912] the outcasts of the nations. You [yourselves] were protégés in al-Khaṭṭ[210] and lackeys of Persia until the Prophet's call befell you. His summons touched you [sing.] while you were an outcast isolated in 'Umān rather than a resident of Baḥrayn, so that you might share with them in the Prophet's call. You are the worst of your people, to such a degree that when Islam has brought you out [of isolation], mingled you with the people, and lifted you up over the nations that heretofore had dominated you, you begin desiring crookedness in God's religion and inclining towards wickedness and baseness. But that does not derogate from Quraysh; it will neither harm them nor prevent them from fulfilling their obligations. Verily Satan is not heedless of you [pl.]. He has recognized you by the evildoing within your community (ummah). Thus, he has aroused the people against you while he casts you down. He knows that he cannot oppose through you any judgment that God has decreed nor any command that God has willed. [He knows also] that you can never cause evil in any affair unless God has disgraced [you] by imbuing you with evil from him."

207. Qurʾān 29:67.

208. illā jaʿala Allāhu khaḍḍahu 'l-asfala. Lit., "except that God put his cheek lowest."

Then (Mu'āwiyah) got up and left him. They quarreled among themselves and felt humiliated. Some time later, (Mu'āwiyah) came to them and said, "I give you leave [to depart], so go where you will. No, by God, God will certainly neither benefit nor harm anyone through you. You are not men [capable] of benefit or injury, but rather men [full] of blame and hostility. If you desire

209. Jār, pl. jīrān—a person who has left his own tribe to seek residence with and the protection of another. Such a "protected neighbor" remains a free man, but obviously enjoys a distinctly lower status than the full members of his adoptive tribe. Jīrān here presumably refers to those persons, non-Arabs for the most part, who had come to Kūfah to seek affiliation with one or another of the tribes settled there.

210. Al-Khaṭṭ is the strip of coast along the Persian Gulf running between Baḥrayn and 'Umān. E. Grohman, "al-Khaṭṭ," *EI*², IV, 1130–31. The text alludes to the fact that the Arab tribes of this region were inevitably tributaries if not full subjects of the Sasanian kings.

salvation, adhere to your community [jamā'ah]. Let what has sufficed the masses be sufficient for you; let not the bestowing of benefits [upon you] make you arrogant, for the good are not afflicted by arrogance. Go where you will, for I am writing to the Commander of the Faithful about you."

When they had gone, [Mu'āwiyah] called them back and said, "I [2913] reiterate to you that the Messenger of God was protected [from sin], and he bestowed authority upon me and brought me into his affairs. Then Abū Bakr was named his successor, and he bestowed authority upon me. 'Umar and 'Uthmān did the same upon their succession. I have not acted on behalf of any of them, nor did any of them put me in authority, without his being satisfied with me. The Messenger of God sought for office only men fully capable of acting on behalf of the Muslims. For [these posts] he did not want men strained beyond their powers, ignorant in [such matters], and too weak for them.[211] Verily God attacks and exacts retribution, deceiving those who have deceived Him. Do not embark upon a matter when you know that your true character is different from your public behavior, for God will not leave you without examining you and revealing your secrets to the people. Almighty God has said, 'Alif, Lām, Mīm. Do the people reckon that they will be left to say, "We believe," and will not be tried?' "[212]

Mu'āwiyah wrote to 'Uthmān [as follows]: "Bands of men [aqwām], who possess neither reason nor religion, have come before me. Islam is burdensome to them and justice vexes them. In nothing are they mindful of God, nor do they speak on a basis of proof [ḥujjah]. Their only aim is dissidence [fitnah] and the wealth of the non-Muslim subjects. God will be the one to test and examine them, then expose and humilate them. They are not [men] who can injure anyone unless they are allied with others. Therefore keep Sa'īd [b. al-'Āṣ] and his followers [man qibalahu] away from them, for they are no more than troublemakers and slanderous gossipers."[213]

---

211. Wa-innamā ṭalaba rasūlu'allāhi ṣl'm li'l-a'māli ahla 'l-jazā'i 'an 'l-muslimīna wa'l-ghanā'i wa-lam yaṭlub lahā ahla 'l-ijtihādi wa'l-jahli bihā wa'l-ḍu'fi 'anhā. The meaning of ijtihād adopted here is not attested in Lane, but fits the context as well as many senses of the root JHD.

212. Qur'ān 29:1.

213. Reading takthīr rather than nakīr, though either word will do. See 2912, note o, and de Goeje, Introductio, dcxxvii.

Then the band [of dissidents] left Damascus. [Some among them] said, "Do not go back to Kūfah, for they will gloat over your problems. Have done with Iraq and Syria, and follow our preference for the Jazīrah." Thus, they sought refuge in the Jazīrah. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Khālid b. al-Walīd heard of them. Mu'āwiyah had made him governor of Ḥimṣ, while the governor [2914] of the Jazīrah had authority over Ḥarrān and al-Raqqah. ['Abd al-Raḥmān] summoned them and said, "O instruments of Satan, you are not welcome here. Satan has come back exhausted, while you are still full of energy. I do not know whether you people are Arabs or non-Arabs. But may God ruin 'Abd al-Raḥmān if he does not chastise you until he wears you out, lest you speak to me as I heard you have spoken to Mu'āwiyah. I am the son of Khālid b. al-Walīd—the son of a man tested by long experience, and of the man who gouged out the eye of the Secession (al-riddah).[214] By God, O Ṣa'ṣa'ah, son of shame, if I learn that anyone among my followers has smashed your nose and then called you a filthy sucker, I will send you off on a very long flight."[215]

He forced them to remain for some months. Whenever ['Abd al-Raḥmān] went out to ride, he had them go on foot. When he passed by [Ṣa'ṣa'ah], he said, "O son of a base-born man, do you know that one who is not reformed by good will be reformed by evil? Why are you not speaking as I have heard that you would speak to Sa'īd and Mu'āwiyah?" [Ṣa'ṣa'ah] and [his associates] would say, "We turn to God in repentence. You abrogate our [offense] and God will abrogate yours." They did not cease doing this until ['Abd al-Raḥmān] said, "God has turned to you in forgiveness," and granted al-Ashtar leave [to go] to 'Uthmān. ['Abd al-Raḥmān] said to them, "As you wish. You are free to go or to remain." Al-Ashtar left and came to 'Uthmān in repentance and regret, renouncing [the previous conduct of] himself and his associates. ['Uthmān] said, "May God preserve you." Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ having come [to Medina], 'Uthmān said to al-Ashtar, "Take up residence where you wish." [Al-Ashtar] replied, "With 'Abd al-

214. On Khālid's role in the Riddah wars, see the present translation, vol. X; P. Crone, "Khālid b. al-Walīd," *EI*², IV, 928–29; Elias Shoufani, Al-Riddah and the Muslim Conquest of Arabia.

215. The point is presumably that Ṣa'ṣa'ah would have instigated a quarrel. The translation "filthy sucker" is slightly euphemistic.

Raḥmān b. Khālid." He mentioned ('Abd al-Raḥmān's) beneficence. "That is up to you," said ('Uthmān). Thus, al-Ashtar returned to 'Abd al-Raḥmān.

[2915] According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar (al-Wāqidī)—Abū Bakr b. Ismā'īl—his father—'Āmir b. Sa'd: 'Uthmān sent Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ to Kūfah to serve as governor (amīr) there when witnesses formally charged al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah with wine drinking, and he ordered (Sa'īd) to dispatch al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah to him.

According to (al-Wāqidī): Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ arrived in Kūfah and sent to al-Walīd [as follows]: "The Commander of the Faithful orders you to come before him."

According to (al-Wāqidī): (Sa'īd) procrastinated for some days, and then said to (al-Walīd), "Hasten to your brother, for he has ordered me to send you to him."

According to (al-Wāqidī): Sa'īd did not mount the pulpit in Kūfah until he had commanded it to be cleansed [of al-Walīd's vomit]. Certain men of Quraysh, members of the Banū Umayyah, who had gone out to Kūfah with him, pleaded with him and said, "This is disgraceful. By God, if someone besides you had intended to do this, it would be right for you to prevent [him] from it; the shame of this [act] would cling to him forever."

According to (al-Wāqidī): However, (Sa'īd) insisted on doing it and washed the pulpit. He sent to al-Walīd to vacate the governor's palace (dār al-imārah). (Al-Walīd) did so, taking up residence in the house of 'Umārah b. 'Uqbah. Then al-Walīd came before 'Uthmān. Having assembled (al-Walīd) and his opponents, ('Uthmān) decided to flog him and inflicted the penalty fixed by God (al-ḥadd).

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar (al-Wāqidī)—Shaybān—Mujālid—al-Sha'bī: When Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ arrived in Kūfah, he began to choose the leading men (wujūh al-nās) to enter his presence and pass evenings in discussion. One night, the leading men [2916] of Kūfah were holding conversation in his residence. Among them were Mālik b. Ka'b al-Arḥabī, al-Aswad b. Yazīd and 'Alqamah b. Qays—both of the clan of al-Nakha'—and al-Mālik al-Ashtar with [a number of] men. Sa'īd said, "This Sawād is but a garden for Quraysh." Al-Ashtar replied, "Do you claim that the Sawād, which God made booty for us by our swords, is a garden for you and your tribe (qawm)? God gives no additional share in it even to the most deserving of you; on the contrary, he should be like one of us." And the whole group (qawm) spoke in his support.[216]

According to (al-Wāqidī): 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Asadī, who was in command of Sa'īd's guard (shurṭah), said, "Do you dispute the governor's statement?" He berated them harshly. Then al-Ashtar said, "Everyone here, this man must not get away from you." They jumped on him and trampled him severely until he passed out. Then he was dragged by the leg, tossed out, and showered with water. When he came to, Sa'īd said to him, "Are you alive? He answered, "Those whom you have chosen for their Islam—so you claim—have killed me." Then (Sa'īd) said, "By God, not one of them will ever attend evening sessions with me again."

(The dissidents) began sitting in their meeting places (majālis) and houses, vilifying 'Uthmān and Sa'īd. The people assembled together around them until those who were frequenting them had become numerous. Sa'īd wrote to 'Uthmān informing him about all this, as follows: "There is a gang among the Kūfans"—[here] he gave him ten names—"who are inciting them and banding [2917] together to disgrace you and me and to impugn [the sincerity of] our religion. If their movement gets firmly established, I fear they will become numerous." Thus, 'Uthmān wrote to Sa'īd, [directing him] to send them in exile to Mu'āwiyah, who at that time held authority over Syria, and (Sa'īd) did so. They numbered nine persons, among them Mālik al-Ashtar, Thābit b. Qays b. Munqa', Kumayl b. Ziyād al-Nakha'ī, and Ṣa'ṣa'ah b. Ṣūḥān.

From this point (al-Wāqidī's) account approximates the narrative of al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf (b. 'Umar), except as follows: Ṣa'ṣa'ah said, "If the armor is pierced, will not matters be in our hands?" Mu'āwiyah replied, "The armor will not be pierced, so think about Quraysh in the most favorable manner."[217]

---

216. As always, qawm is troublesome; it might simply refer to the group of Kūfans assembled here and opposing Sa'īd, or—since those named (including al-Ashtar) mostly belonged to the lineage of al-Nakha'—it might mean "tribe" or "clan." This incident is discussed in Donner, Early Islamic Conquests, 241–42, with references to other versions of the story. See also Caetani, Annali, VIII, 38–41.

217. A very close parallel to Sayf's version of this exchange, except for Mu'āwiyah's riposte; see above, pp. 115–16 (text, I, 2910). The Arabic text of the Concerning this, [al-Wāqidī] adds that when Muʿāwiyah returned to them the following year [that is, 34/654–55] and reminded them [of their situation], he spoke as follows: "By God, I do not order you to do anything unless I myself, my household, and my personal retinue (khāṣṣatī) have started [doing] it. The Quraysh recognized that Abū Sufyān was the noblest among them and the son of the noblest, save for what God did for His prophet, the prophet of mercy. For indeed God elected him and showed him honor. God did not create upright qualities in anyone 2918] without singling out [the prophet] for the noblest and finest of them. Nor did He create evil qualities in anyone without ennobling him beyond [such things] and keeping him utterly free of them. Now in fact I believe that if the people were sons of Abū Sufyān, they would all be prudent and resolute men."[218]

Ṣaʿṣaʿah replied, "You lie! They are sons to a better man than Abū Sufyān—one whom God created by His own hand, 'into whom He breathed His spirit,'[219] before whom He commanded the angels to bow down. Among [the people] are the pious and the sinner, the stupid and the clever."

That night [Muʿāwiyah] departed from them. Then he came to them the following night and spoke at length among them. He said, "O band of men (qawm), answer me properly or be still. Reflect and consider what will bring benefit to you, your households, your tribes, and the whole community (jamāʿah) of Muslims. If you seek this, you will prosper and we shall prosper with you." Ṣaʿṣaʿah replied, "You are not worthy of that, nor is your noble rank such that you should be obeyed in defiance of God." [Muʿāwiyah] said, "Did I not begin by commanding you to fear God and obey Him and His prophet, to 'hold fast to His bond, together, and do not scatter.'"[220] "On the contrary," they an-last clause is as follows: fa-ḍaʿ amra Qurayshin ʿalā aḥsani mā yaḥḍuruka. Lit., "so place the matter of Quraysh on the best of what is present in your mind."

---

218. Wa-innī la-aẓunnu anna Abā Sufyāna law walada ʾl-nāsa lam yalid illā ḥāziman. See de Goeje, Introductio, dlxvi, "walada."

219. Qurʾān 32:8.

220. Qurʾān 3:98. The context of this line is highly significant; 3:98, 100–1 reads as follows: "And hold you fast to God's bond, together, and do not scatter; remember God's blessing upon you when you were enemies, and He brought your hearts together, so that by His blessing you became brothers. . . . Let there be one nation of you, calling to good, and bidding to honor, and forbidding dishonor;

swered, "you have commanded schism and opposition to what the Prophet has brought."

[Mu'āwiyah] said, "Well, then, I command you now. If I have done [what you say], I turn to God and His prophet, and I command you to fear Him and obey Him and His prophet, to adhere to the community and to abhor schism, to revere your imams and to direct them so far as you are able to every good thing, and to admonish them gently and graciously concerning anything that comes from them." [2919]

Ṣa'ṣa'ah replied, "And we then command you to resign your office ('amal), for among the Muslims there is one who has a better right to it than you." [Mu'āwiyah] asked, "Who is that?" [Ṣa'ṣa'ah] answered, "Someone whose father had a higher standing in Islam than did yours, and who himself has a higher standing than you."[221] [Mu'āwiyah] said, "By God, I have some standing in Islam. There were others whose standing surpassed mine, but in my time there is no one better able to do my job than I. 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb was of this opinion, and had there been a man more capable than I, 'Umar would not have been indulgent in regard to me or anyone else. Nor have I instituted any innovation that would require me to resign my office. Had the Commander of the Faithful and of the Community of Muslims thought so, he would have written to me by his own hand and I would have stepped down from office. Should God decree that he do this, I hope that he would not decide on someone for this [position] unless [that person] were better. Go easy, or Satan will find what he hopes for and commands in this [situation] and others like it. By my life, if affairs were decided according to your opinion and wishes, things those are the prosperers. Be not as those who scattered and fell into variance after the clear signs came to them; those there awaits a mighty chastisement."

---

221. Qāla: man kāna abūhu aḥsana qadaman min abīka wa-huwa bi-nafsihi aḥsanu qadaman minka fī 'l-islāmi. Caetani [Annali, VIII, 40] translates qadam by "precedenza," but this rendering seems a bit too restrictive. Other words derived from QDM [e.g., qidam] do refer to seniority or length of time. Qadam [lit., "foot"] can have the general meaning of "merit"—cf. Biberstein Kazimirski, II, 690. Obviously early conversion or seniority in the faith was an important element in one's religious merit, but it was not the only thing that conferred standing on a person. In the present case, Mu'āwiyah's opponents, who seem generally to belong to the tribes of Yemen [especially the Nakha' clan of Madhḥij], hardly converted to Islam earlier than he.

would not go well for the people of Islam either day or night. But (affairs) are determined and directed by God, and 'He attains His purpose.'[222] So come back to what is good and speak of that."

They responded, "You are not fit for that." He said, "By God, in truth it belongs to God to attack and take vengeance. Indeed I fear for you, lest you become so entangled in submission to Satan that submission to Satan and rebellion against the Merciful One will cause you to reside in the abode of humiliation from God's vengeance in the present and (in the abode of) everlasting abasement [2920] in the future."

Then they jumped on him and seized his head and beard. He said, "Hey, this is not the province of Kūfah! By God, if the Syrians saw what you have done to me, their imām, I could not restrain them from killing you. By my life, you always act the same way." Then he arose from among them and said, "By God, I shall never enter your presence again as long as I live." Then he wrote to 'Uthmān [as follows]: "In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. To the servant of God, 'Uthmān, Commander of the Faithful, from Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān. To proceed: O Commander of the Faithful, you sent to me certain bands of men speaking with the tongue of devils, saying things which (these latter) were dictating to them. They come to the people, so they allege, for the sake of the Qur'ān, but they render (it) obscure and ambiguous. Not all of the people understand what they mean to do, for they only desire schism and they bring discord (fitnah) nearer. Islam has been a burden to them and has vexed them. The spells of Satan have become fixed in their hearts, and they corrupted many of the people among the Kūfans who were around them. If they remain in the midst of the Syrians, I worry that they may delude them with their sorcery and depravity. Send them back to their garrison town [that is, Kūfah] and let them reside there, where their dissembling first appeared. Peace."

'Uthmān wrote and commanded him to send them back to Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ in Kūfah, and (Mu'āwiyah) did so. But when they re-[2921] turned they were even more inflammatory (than before). Sa'īd wrote to 'Uthmān complaining intensely about them, and

222. Qur'ān 65:3.

ʿUthmān wrote back to him to send them away to ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Khālid b. al-Walīd, who was governor (amīr) in Ḥimṣ. (ʿUthmān) wrote to al-Ashtar and his associates [as follows]: "To proceed: I am exiling you to Ḥimṣ. When this letter of mine reaches you, go there, for you do not desist from evil against Islam and its adherents. Peace."

When al-Ashtar read the letter, he said, "O God, (ʿUthmān) is the worst of us in his concern for the subjects (raʿiyyah) and the one who does most to arouse rebellion among them, so hasten [your] vengeance against him!" Saʿīd wrote to ʿUthmān about that, and al-Ashtar and his associates traveled to Ḥimṣ. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Khālid b. al-Walīd settled them in the coastal districts (al-Sāḥil) and had rations provided for them.

According to Muḥammad b. ʿUmar (al-Wāqidī)—ʿĪsā b. ʿAbd al-Raḥman—Abū Isḥāq al-Hamdānī: A few individuals from among the nobles of Iraq (ashrāf ahl al-ʿIrāq) gathered in Kūfah to defame ʿUthmān: Mālik b. al-Ḥārith al-Ashtar, Thābit b. Qays al-Nakhaʿī, Kumayl b. Ziyād al-Nakhaʿī, Zayd b. Ṣūḥān al-ʿAbdī, [his brother Ṣaʿṣaʿah b. Ṣūḥān],[223] Jundub b. Zuhayr al-Ghāmidī, Jundub b. Kaʿb al-Azdī, ʿUrwah b. al-Jaʿd, ʿAmr b. al-Ḥamiq al-Khuzāʿī, [and Ibn al-Kawwāʾ].[224] Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣ wrote to ʿUthmān to inform him about their activities. (ʿUthmān) wrote back, ordering him to exile them to Syria and to make them stay in the mountain passes [in Cilicia].[225]

ʿUthmān's Exile of Certain Baṣrans to Syria [2922]

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—ʿAṭiyyah—Yazīd al-Faqʿasī: When Ibn ʿĀmir had been governor for three years, he learned that there was a man in [the residential quarter of the tribe of] ʿAbd al-Qays who was staying with

223. The name in brackets is supplied by Maqrīzī, al-Muqaffā; see de Goeje, Introductio, dcxxvii. With the names supplied here and in note 219, the list totals ten—that is, the number of troublemakers mentioned in Saʿīd's first letter to ʿUthmān above, p. 121 (text, I, 2916).

224. Ibid. Kawwā' means "one who cauterizes, brands," but by extension "slanderer." Perhaps Ibn al-Kawwā' should be taken as a pejorative nickname here.

225. Wa-alzimhum 'l-durūba. For the translation, see Caetani, Annali, VIII, 41. The point of course was to put the dissidents in a place remote from the main political centers.

Ḥukaym b. Jabalah. Now Ḥukaym b. Jabalah was a robber. When the armies would return [from campaign], he would slip away from them and hurry off to Fārs to raid the protected non-Muslims (ahl al-dhimmah), treat them wrongfully, sow corruption in the land, and do whatever he desired; then he would come back. The protected non-Muslims and the Muslims both complained about him to ʿUthmān, and he wrote to ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĀmir: "Arrest (Ḥukaym) and anyone like him; he is not to leave Baṣrah until you see him acting uprightly." (Ibn ʿĀmir) arrested him and he was unable to leave (the city).

Now when Ibn al-Sawdāʾ came, he resided with (Ḥukaym). A few individuals gathered around him, and Ibn al-Sawdāʾ presented [legal and theological problems] to them without explaining them fully. However, they accepted [what he said] and believed him to be a man of importance. Ibn ʿĀmir sent to him and asked, "What are you?" (Ibn al-Sawdāʾ) informed him that he was a man from among the People of the Book who desired [to convert to] Islam and to live under (Ibn ʿĀmir's) protection. But (Ibn ʿĀmir) said, "That is not what I hear. Get away from me." So he left and came to Kūfah. Then he was expelled from there and established himself in Egypt. He and (his sympathizers in Iraq) began to cor-[2923] respond with one another, and men were traveling back and forth in great numbers.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: Ḥumrān b. Abān had married a woman during her period of waiting, and ʿUthmān punished him severely and compelled them to separate.[226] He exiled (Ḥumrān) to Baṣrah, where he joined the entourage of Ibn ʿĀmir. One day they all discussed going out to ride and calling on ʿĀmir b. ʿAbd Qays, who lived in seclusion from the people. Ḥumrān said, "I'll go ahead of you all and inform him [that you are coming]." He set off and entered ʿĀmir's presence while he was reading from the Qur'ān (muṣḥaf). (Ḥumrān) said, "The governor (amīr) has decided to call on you, and I wished to inform you [of this]." But ʿĀmir 226. On the 'iddah, the period (usually three months) that must elapse between a woman's divorce or widowhood and her remarriage, see Y. Linant de Bellefonds, "'Idda," EI,[2] III, 1010–13. A marriage contracted during the 'iddah is null and void and the couple must be separated.

would not break off his reading and pay any attention to him, so (Ḥumrān) rose to go. When he had gotten to the door, he encountered Ibn ʿĀmir and said, "I come to you from a man who does not regard even the lineage of Abraham as superior to himself."

Ibn ʿĀmir then asked to come in; he entered (ʿĀmir's) presence and sat down before him. Then ʿĀmir closed the Qur'ān and spoke with him for an hour. "Surely you will come to visit us," said Ibn ʿĀmir. (ʿĀmir) replied, "Saʿīd b. Abī al-ʿArjā' would enjoy the honor [of such invitations]." Then (Ibn ʿĀmir) said, "Indeed we shall appoint you to office." "Ḥuṣayn b. Abī al-Ḥurr would like government office (ʿamal)," said (ʿĀmir). "Then we shall arrange a marriage for you," said (Ibn ʿĀmir). He said, "Women are pleasing to Rabīʿah b. ʿIsl." (Ibn ʿĀmir) said, "This man [that is, Ḥumrān] claims that you do not regard the lineage of Abraham as superior to yourself." Then (ʿĀmir) leafed through the Qur'ān and the first passage he came upon was [this one]: "God chose Adam and [2924]
Noah and the House of Abraham and the House of ʿImrān above all beings."[227] When Ḥumrān was sent back [to Medina], he strove assiduously to discredit (ʿĀmir) in this matter, and [a number of] groups (aqwām) testified in support of (Ḥumrān). (ʿUthmān) thus sent (ʿĀmir) into exile in Syria. When (the Syrians) found out the truth about him, they gave him permission [to return to Baṣrah], but he refused and remained in Syria.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: ʿUthmān exiled Ḥumrān b. Abān for having married a woman during her period of waiting; he compelled them to separate, flogged him, and sent him off to Baṣrah. When (Ḥumrān) had served some time in exile and (ʿUthmān) received a satisfactory report about him,[228] he gave him permission [to return]. (Ḥumrān) came before (the caliph) in Medina, accompanied by a band of men (qawm) who calumnied ʿĀmir b. ʿAbd Qays, [saying] that he did not approve of marriage, nor did he eat meat or attend the Friday prayer. Now ʿĀmir was a man who lived in seclusion, and everything he did was done in secret. ('Uthmān) wrote to 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir about this matter, and he placed ('Āmir) under Mu'āwiyah's authority.

227. Qur'ān 3:30.

228. Fa-lammā atā ʿalayhi ma shāʾa ʾllāhu wa-atāhu ʿanhu ʾlladhī yuḥibbu. . . . Sayf's taste for difficult constructions and pronouns without clear antecedents is evident here again.

When Mu'āwiyah came to him he found him agreeable. ('Āmir) had a portion of bread prepared with broth and meat, and ate unfamiliar food. Then (Mu'āwiyah) knew that lies had been told about this man and said, "Do you know why you were expelled [from Baṣrah]?" "No," replied ('Āmir). (Mu'āwiyah) said, "The caliph was informed that you would not eat meat, but I have seen you do so and know that people have lied about you. [He was also told] that you do not approve of marriage or attend the Friday prayer." ('Āmir) said, "As to the Friday prayer, I attend it in the rear of the mosque; then I am among the first of the people to go back home. As for marriage, I have gone out [to find a bride] and I am [now] betrothed. As for meat, you have seen for yourself, but I [2925] was a man who would not eat animals killed by butchers ever since I saw a butcher dragging a sheep to be slaughtered. Then he placed a knife on its throat and repeated over and over, 'For sale, for sale,' until it dropped dead." (Mu'āwiyah) said, "Go back [to Baṣrah]." "I shall not go back to a place whose people have felt it permissible to behave toward me as they have," ('Āmir) said. "I shall instead remain in this place that God has chosen for me." He used to reside in the coastal districts and would encounter Mu'āwiyah [there]. Mu'āwiyah would frequently ask, "[What] do you need?" And ('Āmir) would reply, "I need nothing." When (Mu'āwiyah) pressed him, he said, "If you gave me back some of Baṣrah's heat, perhaps fasting would be something difficult for me, for in your country it is easy."

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Abū Ḥārithah and Abū 'Uthmān: When the exiles from Kūfah came to Mu'āwiyah, he settled them in a house and then went to see them alone. He and they each spoke, and when they had finished he said, "You were brought here only because of [your own] folly. By God, I perceive neither any relevant speech, clear excuse nor wise forbearance nor forcefulness—and you, Ṣa'ṣa'ah, are the most stupid among them. Do and say what you will so long as you do not neglect anything that God has commanded. Indeed everything can be tolerated from you save rebellion against Him. As for what passes between you and us, you are in command of yourselves."

Then (Mu'āwiyah) saw them later when they were attending the prayer and standing alongside the congregation's preacher (qāṣṣ al-jamā'ah).[229] One day he entered their presence as some of them were teaching others how to recite [the Qur'ān], and he said, "In this there is indeed a change from the yearning for the Time of Ignorance that you had when you came to me. Go where you [2926] wish, and know that if you adhere to your community (jamā'ah) you will thereby be happier than they, while if you do not adhere to it, you will thereby be more wretched than they. Do no injury to anyone." Then they blessed him [for these words] and extolled him.

Then (Mu'āwiyah) said, "Ibn al-Kawwā', what kind of man am I?" He answered, "[A man of] vast wealth and numerous flocks, possessing sound intuition and profound judgment. A man dominated by forbearance, one of the pillars of Islam. By you a dreaded breach has been closed up." (Mu'āwiyah) said, "Then inform me about the partisans of innovation (ahl al-iḥdāth) among the inhabitants of the camp cities [of Iraq], for you are the most intelligent of your associates." (Ibn al-Kawwā') responded, "I have corresponded with them and they with me; they pretend not to know me, but I am acquainted with them. As for the innovators among the Medinese, they are the members of the community (al-ummah) most intent on evil and least capable of doing it. As for the innovators among the Kūfans, they are those among the people most likely to discern small shortcomings and most given to the commission of great sins. As to the innovators among the Baṣrans, they arrive united and leave in discord. As for the innovators among the Egyptians, they are the ones among the people who actually do the greatest evil and who most quickly repent. As for the innovators among the Syrians, they are the most obedient of the people to one who guides them aright, and the most rebellious against one who leads them astray."

---

229. Qāṣṣ is a difficult word. In archaic usage, it can simply refer to the man who recites the bidding prayer (khuṭbah) on Friday, and it might mean that here, though this service is identified simply as ṣalāt, not specifically as jum'ah. More generally, it refers to one who tells edifying sermons and stories or who expounds scripture. After he became caliph, Mu'āwiyah is supposed to have established an official qāṣṣ to explicate the Qur'ān, and this might be simply an anachronistic reference to that institution. See Ch. Pellat, "Ḳāṣṣ," *EI*², IV, 733–35.

In this year, 'Uthmān led the people on the Pilgrimage.

Abū Ma'shar claims that the conquest of Cyprus took place in this year, but I have already mentioned those who contradict him in this regard.[230]

---

230. See above, pp. 25 (text I, 2820) and 111–12 (I, 2907).

The Events of the Year [2927]

34

(July 22, 654—July 10, 655)

In (this year) took place the Battle of the Masts, according to the account related to me by Aḥmad (b. Thābit al-Rāzī)—one who related [it] to him—Isḥāq (b. ʿĪsā)— Abū Maʿshar. We have already given the account of this battle and mentioned those who contradict Abū Maʿshar's chronology.[231]

In (this year), the Kūfans drove Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣ out of the city.

In (this year), those who were alienated from ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān wrote to one another, planning to gather together in order to confront him with (those matters) concerning which they were angry at him.

The Character of the Meeting [to Confront ʿUthmān] and [the Day of] al-Jaraʿah[232]

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Mustanīr b. Yazīd—Qays b. Yazīd al-Nakhaʿī: When Muʿāwi-

231. See above, p. 71 (text, I, 2865).
232. Bracketed words from Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil (Beirut), III, 147.

yah sent the exiles away, they said, "Iraq and Syria are no home for us; you [sic] must choose the Jazīrah." They came there freely, and 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Khālid went out to meet them. He dealt severely with them, and they humbled themselves before him and submitted to his authority. ('Abd al-Raḥmān) sent al-Ashtar to 'Uthmān, who received him, saying, "Go wherever you wish." (Al-Ashtar) answered, "I shall return to 'Abd al-Raḥmān," and he did that.

In the eleventh year of 'Uthmān's caliphate, Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ came to confer with 'Uthmān. A year and more before Sa'īd's departure from Kūfah, he had sent out [a number of deputies to the provinces under his authority, as follows]: al-Ash'ath b. Qays over Ādharbayjān; Sa'īd b. Qays over al-Rayy—Sa'īd had held authority [2928] in Hamadhān but was removed and replaced by al-Nusayr al-'Ijlī; al-Sā'ib b. al-Aqra' over Iṣfahān; Mālik b. Ḥabīb al-Yarbū'ī over Māh;[233] Ḥukaym b. Salāmah al-Ḥizāmī over Mosul; Jarīr b. 'Abdallāh over Qarqīsiyā';[234] Salmān b. Rabī'ah over al-Bāb; al-Qa'qā' b. 'Amr as military commandant [in Kūfah];[235] and 'Utaybah b. al-Nahhās over Ḥulwān.[236]

Thus, Kūfah was emptied of leaders (ru'asā'), save for those who had been stripped of office or afflicted with the spirit of dissension.[237] Then Yazīd b. Qays set out with the intention of deposing 'Uthmān. He entered the mosque and sat down. Those

---

233. Māh is an abbreviation for Māh al-Kūfah, a district in the western Jibāl (ancient Media, modern Iranian Kurdistan) subject to the governor of Kūfah. Its boundaries and administrative status fluctuated considerably in the first decades of Islamic rule. See Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 141–42.

234. Qarqīsiyā' (ancient Circesium) is a modest but strategically situated town, at the confluence of the Khābūr and Euphrates Rivers. It is located about 525 km. northwest of Kūfah. See Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 105; M. Streck, "Ḳarḳīsiyā," EI[2], 654–55.

235. Wa-'alā 'l-ḥarbi 'l-Qa'qā'a 'bna 'Amrin. One would expect a place name here, but no "Ḥarb" is noted in any geographical reference. Al-Qa'qā' had been one of Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ' most effective generals in the conquest of Iraq. On him see the numerous references in Donner, Early Islamic Conquests, esp. 390–91.

236. Ḥulwān is a strategic city on the frontier between Iraq and the Iranian highlands, located on the main road between lower Iraq and Hamadhān. See Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 191; Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 141 et passim.

237. Maftūn: lit., "tried by fire." It can also mean "stricken by insanity." In the present context, however, "affected by fitnah" seems best suited to the context. See Lane, Lexicon, VI, 2334–36.

with whom Ibn al-Sawdā' had been corresponding there gathered around [Yazīd]. Al-Qa'qā' fell upon Yazīd b. Qays and seized him, but he said, "We are only seeking Sa'īd's resignation." [Al-Qa'qā'] replied, "That is something that you will not get. Do not sit [here] to discuss this, and [these malcontents] must not come and meet with you. Seek what you really need, and by my life it will be given to you." Then [Yazīd] returned to his house and hired a man, giving him a sum of dirhams and some mules, on condition that he should go to the exiles [in the Jazīrah]. [Yazīd] wrote to them [as follows]: "Do not let my letter out of your hands until you come, for the inhabitants of the garrison town [namely, Kūfah] have joined our cause."

The man [hired by Yazīd] slipped away and came to [the exiles], [to whom] al-Ashtar had already returned. He presented [Yazīd's] letter to them, and they asked, "What is your name?" "Bughthur," he replied. "What is your tribe?" they asked. "Kalb," he said. "A vile predator that disgusts (yubaghthir) the soul. We have no need of you," they said.[238] But al-Ashtar disagreed with them, and returned in rebellion [to Kūfah]. When he had gone, his associates said, "God has exiled both us and him. We shall find no escape from what he has done. If 'Abd al-Raḥmān learns about us, he will not believe us and he will not take this lightly." So they followed after [al-Ashtar] but did not join up with him. 'Abd al-Raḥmān learned that they had departed and searched for them in [2929] the Sawād. Al-Ashtar made the journey in seven [days], the other exiles (al-qawm) in ten.

Now one Friday the people unexpectedly found al-Ashtar at the mosque portal, saying, "O people, I have come to you from the Commander of the Faithful 'Uthmān. When I left Sa'īd he was trying to get [the caliph] to cut [the state pension of] your women to a hundred dirhams, and to reduce [the salary] of the long-term veterans (ahl al-balā') among you to 2000.[239] [Sa'īd] was saying,

238. Kalb was a tribe belonging to the Quḍā'ah confederation in southern Syria. There is a pun here, of course, since kalb means "dog," not a highly esteemed animal in the Islamic world. On the tribe, see Donner, Early Islamic Conquests, 106–7 et passim; J. W. Fück and A. A. Dixon, "Kalb b. Wabara," EI², IV, 492–94. On the animal, F. Viré, "Kalb," EI², IV, 489–92.

239. The stipend for the veterans of the first Iraqi campaigns [that is, those that took place before the battle of al-Qādisiyyah] had originally been set at 3000

'How important are the noble women (ashrāf al-nisā')? This is just an extra burden on top of the others.'[240] He claims that your conquered lands (fay') are the private garden of Quraysh. I traveled with him a day's march, and he was constantly reciting doggerel about (these matters) up to the time I separated from him:

Woe to the noble women from me—as strong and violent as though I were a demon (jinn).

He has disparaged the people. Men of intelligence have begun to denounce him, and among them he is not needed."

There was a sudden commotion, and Yazīd went out and ordered a public herald to call out, "Whoever wishes to join Yazīd b. Qays in driving out Sa'īd and seeking a new governor, let him act!" The far-sighted, the nobles, and the leading men among the people remained in the mosque, but the others went out. At that time, 'Amr b. Ḥurayth was (Sa'īd's) vicegerent (khalīfah), and he mounted the pulpit. Having praised and extolled God, he said, "'Remember God's blessing upon you when you were enemies, and He brought your hearts together so that by His blessing you became brothers. You were upon the brink of a pit of Fire, and He delivered you from it.'[241] Do not revert to an evil from which Almighty God has delivered you. After Islam and its guidance and its practice (sunnah), will you not recognize truth and aim straight for its gate?"

Then al-Qa'qā' b. 'Amr said, "Will you turn the flood aside from [2930] its course? Then divert the Euphrates from its channel. How foolish! No, by God, only Mashrafī swords[242] will silence the mob, and they are on the point of being drawn. Then (these people) will bawl like goats and long for their present situation. God dirhams per year. See Donner, Early Islamic Conquests, 231; Hinds, "Kûfan Political Alignments," 349.

---

240. Wa-yaqūlu: mā bālu ashrāfi 'l-nisā'i wa-hādhihi 'l-'ilāwatu bayna hādhayni 'l-idlayni. The 'ilāwah is an extra load placed between the two evenly balanced loads ('idl) carried on each side of a camel.

241. Qur'ān 3:98–99.

242. al-mashrafiyyah. The origin of this term is somewhat obscure, but it seems to refer to the locale—either in the Yemen or close to Syria—in which these swords were made. Lane, Lexicon, IV, 1539.

will never restore (Sa'īd's) authority over them, so endure patiently." "I will endure patiently," ('Amr) said, and went to his house.

Yazīd b. Qays, accompanied by al-Ashtar, went out and established camp at al-Jara'ah.[243] Sa'īd had halted on the road, and then came upon them as they were encamped waiting for him. They said, "We want nothing to do with you." He replied, "What are you quarreling about now? It would have sufficed for you to send one man to the Commander of the Faithful and to put another man in my place. Do a thousand rational men set out against one man?" Then he left them, and they noticed a freedman (mawlā) of his on a camel that was worn out [from the journey]. (The freedman) said, "By God, it does not behoove Sa'īd to go back [to Medina]." And al-Ashtar struck off his head.

Sa'īd proceeded until he reached 'Uthmān, whom he informed of the news. ('Uthmān) said, "What do they want? Have they withdrawn their hand from obedience?" (Sa'īd) responded, "They proclaim that they want a change [of governors]." "Whom do they want?" asked ('Uthmān). "Abū Mūsā (al-Ash'arī)," replied (Sa'īd). ('Uthmān) said, "Then we have set Abū Mūsā over them. By God, we shall create no excuse for anyone, nor will we leave them any proof [against us]. We shall endure patiently, as we have been commanded to do, until we attain what they desire."

Those who held sub-governorships ('amal) near Kūfah returned [2931]
[to Medina], as did Jarīr from Qarqīsiyā' and 'Utaybah from Ḥulwān. In Kūfah, Abū Mūsā arose to speak, saying, "O people, do not hasten into such an affair, and do not do such a thing again. Adhere to your community (jamā'ah) and cling to obedience. Beware of acting precipitously. Endure patiently, just as if you had a governor (amīr)." They responded, "Lead us in prayer." He said, "I will not, unless you heed and obey 'Uthmān b. 'Affān." They replied, "We will heed and obey 'Uthmān."

It was related to me by Ja'far b. 'Abdallāh al-Muḥammadī—'Amr b. Ḥammād b. Ṭalḥah and 'Alī b. Ḥusayn b. 'Īsā—Ḥusayn b. 'Īsā—his father—Hārūn b. Sa'd—al-'Alā' b. 'Abdallāh b. Zayd al-'Anbarī: A body of Muslims gathered together to review the deeds and conduct of 'Uthmān. They concurred in a decision to dispatch a man to speak to him and inform him of his blameworthy innovations (aḥdāth). To him they sent ʿĀmir b. ʿAbdallāh al-Tamīmī al-ʿAnbarī, who is the one known as ʿĀmir b. ʿAbd Qays. (ʿĀmir) came and entered (ʿUthmān's) presence, saying, "A body of Muslims have met together and examined your actions, and they find that you have committed grave misdeeds. So fear Almighty God; turn to Him in repentance and refrain from (such acts)."

243. A place near al-Qādisiyyah; see below, p. 139 (text, I, 2934).

ʿUthmān said to him, "Look at this man! The people assert that he is a man learned in the Qur'ān (qāri'), and then he comes to speak to me about utterly trivial things. By God, he does not know where God is." ʿĀmir responded, "So I do not know where God is?" "Yes, by God," said (ʿUthmān), "you do not know where God is." ʿĀmir said, "Yes, indeed, by God! I know that God is [2932] lying in watch for you."[244]

Then ʿUthmān sent to Muʿāwiyah b. Abī Sufyān, to ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿd b. Abī Sarḥ, to Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣ, to ʿAmr b. al-ʿAṣ b. Wāʾil al-Sahmī, and to ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĀmir. He brought them together in order to consult with them about his situation, about what had been demanded of him, and about what he had learned from them. When they had assembled at his residence, he said to them, "Every man has ministers (wuzarā') and counselors. Now you are my ministers, my counselors, and my trusted men. The people have acted as you see, demanding that I depose my governors (ʿummāl), and that I turn away from that which they hate toward that which they love. So decide what you think is right and advise me."

ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĀmir said to him, "My advice to you, Commander of the Faithful, is that you command them to undertake a jihād that will divert their attention from you, and that you keep them on campaign until they act humbly before you. In this way every one of them will be concerned only about himself, about the saddle sores of his pack animal, and about the lice on his scalp."

---

244. Probably an allusion to Qur'ān 89:5–13. "Hast thou not seen how thy Lord did with ʿAd, Iram of the pillars, the like of which was never created in the land, and Thamud, who hollowed the rocks in the valley, and Pharaoh, he of the tent pegs, who all were insolent in the land and worked much corruption therein? Thy Lord unloosed on them a scourge of chastisement; surely thy Lord is ever on the watch."

Then 'Uthmān came to Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ and asked him for his opinion. He said, "O Commander of the Faithful, if you desire our opinion, cure yourself of the disease and amputate from yourself what you fear. Follow my advice, and you will attain your goal." "What is it?" said ['Uthmān]. [Sa'id] answered, "Every group has leaders. When these are eliminated, they will disperse and will be unable to agree on anything." 'Uthmān said, "This would indeed be the right opinion, were it not for what it involves!"

He approached Mu'āwiyah and said, "What is your view?" He answered, "O Commander of the Faithful, I think it best for you to send your governors back, on condition that they administer their provinces with care, and I will be the guarantor for you of my province."[245]

Then ['Uthmān] came to 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd and said, "What do you think?" He answered, "O Commander of the Faithful, in my opinion the people are greedy. Bestow upon them some of this wealth and their hearts will incline to you."

Then ['Uthmān] approached 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ and sought his opinion. He said, "I think that you have perpetrated things against the [2933] people that they detest, so resolve to do justice. If you reject [this course], then make up your mind to abdicate. If you reject [that], then be firm in your resolve and continue straight ahead." 'Uthmān replied, "What is wrong with you? May your scalp crawl with lice! Are you serious about this?" 'Amr refused to answer him for some time, until [the rest of] the assembly (qawm) had dispersed. Then 'Amr said, "No, O Commander of the Faithful, you are dearer to me than that, but I knew that the people would hear about the statements of every man among us. I wanted them to learn what I said so that they would trust me, and thereby I would bring you good and ward off evil."

It was related to me by Ja'far—'Amr b. Ḥammād and 'Alī b. Ḥusayn—Ḥusayn—his father—'Amr b. Abī al-Miqdām—'Abd al-Malik b. 'Umayr al-Zuhrī: 'Uthmān assembled the commanders of the armies (umarā' al-ajnād)—Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān, Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ, 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir, 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd b. Abī Sarḥ, and 245. an tarudda 'ummālaka 'alā 'l-kifāyati limā qibalahum wa-anā ḍāminun laka [mā] qibalī. See de Goeje, Introductio, cdlv, sub verbo kafā.

'Amr b. al-'Āṣ. He said, "Give me your advice, for the people have become as threatening to me as leopards."

Mu'āwiyah said to him, "I advise you to order the commanders of your armies that every one of them should administer his province carefully on your behalf, and I will administer the people of Syria carefully on your behalf." 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir said, "In my opinion you should keep them tied up in these campaigns until every one of them is concerned about the saddle sores of his pack animal. Thus, you will keep them too preoccupied to spread calumnies about you." 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd said, "I advise you to look into what has angered them and give them satisfaction; then you should distribute to them this wealth and divide [it] among them."

Then 'Amr b. al-'Aṣ rose up and said: "O 'Uthmān, you have afflicted the people with men like the Banū Umayyah.[246] You and they have both spoken [in anger], and you and they have both gone astray. So do justice or abdicate. But if you reject [this counsel], be firm in your resolve and continue straight ahead." Then [2934] 'Uthmān replied, "What is wrong with you? May your scalp crawl with lice! Are you serious about this?" 'Amr remained silent until (the others) had dispersed; then he said, "No, Commander of the Faithful, you are dearer to me than that, but I knew that at the portal there was a band of men (qawm). These knew that you had assembled us to obtain our advice, and I wanted them to hear about my statement, so that I might bring you good or ward off evil from you."

Then 'Uthmān sent his governors ('ummāl) back to their provinces, commanding them to maintain stringent control of those under their authority and to keep the people tied up on campaigns. He decided also to deny them their stipends, so that they would submit to him and be in need of him. He sent Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ back as governor (amīr) of Kūfah, but the Kūfans came forth in arms against him, confronted him, and made him return [to

246. The Umayyad clan of Quraysh, under the leadership of Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb, had of course been the heart and soul of Meccan opposition to Muḥammad. One of the most persistent and damaging charges against 'Uthmān (at least as represented in our texts) was his favoritism toward these old enemies of the Prophet, who were also his own kinsmen.

Medina]. They said, "No, by God, he will not rule over us while we still bear our swords."

It was related to me by Ja'far—'Amr and 'Alī b. Ḥusayn[247]—his father—Hārūn b. Sa'd—Abū Yaḥyā 'Umayr b. Sa'd al-Nakha'ī: In my mind I can still see al-Ashtar Mālik b. al-Ḥārith al-Nakha'ī. His face was covered with dust, and he was girt with a sword and saying, "By God, he—that is, Sa'īd—will not enter [our city] against us while we still bear our swords." That was the Day of al-Jara'ah. Al-Jara'ah is a high place near al-Qādisiyyah, and there the Kūfans met [Sa'īd].

It was related to me by Ja'far—'Amr and 'Alī—Ḥusayn—his father—Hārūn b. Sa'd—'Amr b. Murrah al-Jamalī—Abū al-Bakhtarī al-Ṭā'ī—Abū Thawr al-Ḥadā'i, Ḥadā' being a section of [the tribe of] Murād: I came to Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān and Abū Mas'ūd 'Uqbah b. 'Amr al-Anṣārī while they were in the mosque of Kūfah on the Day of al-Jara'ah, where the people dealt with [2935]
Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ as they did. Abū Mas'ūd was treating this as a serious matter and saying, "I do not think [the affair] will be brought to an end without blood being spilled."[248] Ḥudhayfah replied, "By God, it will surely come to an end without producing even a cupping glass of blood. I do not know anything about it today that I did not know when Muḥammad was alive. Verily a man is a follower of Islām in the morning; then in the evening he has nothing to do with it. Then on the morrow he fights the Muslims (ahl al-qiblah) and God kills him, so that his heart recoils and he doubles up in fear."[249]

Then I [that is, Abū al-Bakhtarī al-Ṭā'ī] said to Abū Thawr, "Perhaps it was [that way]." He replied, "No, by God, it was not."

[According to al-Ṭabarī:] When Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ returned to 'Uthmān, having been expelled [from Kūfah], he sent Abū Mūsā to

247. Prym proposes two possible emendations in the isnād, both of which seem reasonable in view of the other isnāds attached to Ja'far b. 'Abdallāh al-Muḥammadī: either (a) 'Amr and 'Alī—Ḥusayn—his father; or (b) 'Amr and 'Alī b. Ḥusayn—Ḥusayn b. 'Īsā—his father.

248. Mā arā an turadda 'alā 'aqibayhā ḥattā yakūna fīhā dimā'un.

249. fa-ta'luwahu istuhu. Literally: "so that his buttocks rise above him." This entire passage seems quite obscure.

be governor (amīr) in Kūfah, and (the Kūfans) confirmed him in authority over it.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Yaḥyā b. Muslim—Wāqid b. ʿAbdallāh—ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmayr al-Ashjaʿī: (Abū Mūsā) rose up in the mosque during the troubles (fitnah) and said, "O people, be still. For I heard the Messenger of God say, 'He who departs [from the Community] when there is an imām over the people'—and by God, he did not say a just imām—'in order to shatter their staff and to break up their community, kill him whoever he may be.'"

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: When Yazīd b. Qays caused the people to howl at Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣ, word of this came to ʿUthmān.
[2936] Then al-Qaʿqāʿ b. ʿAmr approached (Yazīd) and seized him. (Yazīd) said, "What do you want? Do you have any reason to prevent us from seeking (Saʿīd's) resignation?" (Al-Qaʿqāʿ) replied, "No. [Are you trying to do anything] beside that?" "No," said (Yazīd). "Then seek his resignation," said (al-Qaʿqāʿ). Yazīd summoned his associates from where they were staying, and they drove Saʿīd back [to Medina] and demanded Abū Mūsā [as his successor].

Then ʿUthmān wrote to them [as follows]: "In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. To proceed: I have named as your governor the one whom you have chosen, and I have relieved you of Saʿīd. By God, I will surely expose my honor to your abuse, and wear out my patience, and use every effort to seek reconciliation with you. So do not fail to ask for whatever you desire, so long as it does not involve rebellion against God. Nor should you fail to demand relief from whatever you hate, so long as it does not involve rebellion against God. Thus, I will comply with whatever you desire until you have no argument (ḥujjah) against me."

(ʿUthmān) wrote in this vein to the [other] garrison towns. Thus came about the governorship of Abū Mūsā and the expedition of Ḥudhayfah. Abū Mūsā became governor, the governors (ʿummāl) returned to their provinces, and Ḥudhayfah proceeded to al-Bāb.

According to al-Wāqidī—ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad—his father: In the year 34 (654–55) certain of the Companions of the Messenger of God wrote to others [as follows]: "Come, for if you desire the jihād, then the jihād is here with us." The people maligned[250] 'Uthmān and censured him in the harshest language ever used against anyone, while the Companions of the Messenger of God were giving their opinions and listening, and among them no one forbade or prevented this save a few individuals: Zayd b. Thābit, Abū Usayd al-Sā'idī, Ka'b b. Mālik, and Ḥassān b. Thābit.

The people assembled and spoke to 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib, and he entered 'Uthmān's presence and said, "The people stand behind me, and they have spoken to me about you. By God, I do not know what to say to you. I know nothing of which you are ignorant, nor can I point out to you any affair with which you are not well acquainted. Indeed you know what we know. We have not perceived something before you have, so that we must inform you of it. Nor have we gained sole knowledge of anything so that we must bring it to your attention. In no affair have we been assigned greater distinction than you. You have seen and heard the Mes- [2937] senger of God; you were one of his Companions and became a son-in-law to him. (Abū Bakr) b. Abī Quḥāfah was not better suited than you to act rightly, nor did ('Umar) b. al-Khaṭṭāb enjoy greater merit in any way, and indeed you had a closer blood-relationship to the Messenger of God [than either of them]. You obtained a marriage tie to the Messenger of God such as they never did, nor did they have any precedence over you.[251] Remember God! You are not being given your sight after you were blind, by God, nor are you being instructed after you were in ignorance. Verily the path is manifest and clear, and the signposts of true religion are standing upright.

---

250. Reading kaththara instead of kathura. See de Goeje, Introductio, dcxxvii; and WKAS, sub verbo kaththara, p. 61, col. 2.

251. 'Uthmān, like Muḥammad, belonged to the Qurashi lineage of 'Abd Shams—that is, the two men had a common great-great-grandfather in the paternal line. 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb and Abū Bakr were both members of the tribe of Quraysh, but their clans (Makhzūm and Taym respectively) were only remotely connected with Muḥammad. In addition, 'Uthmān's mother, Arwā bt. Kurayz, was the granddaughter of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib on her mother's side; that is, she and Muḥammad were first cousins. As to marriage ties between the first three caliphs and the Prophet: Abū Bakr's daughter 'Ā'ishah became Muḥammad's favorite wife; 'Uthmān married the Prophet's daughter Ruqayyah, who predeceased her husband; 'Umar had no such links, since Muḥammad thought him too harsh for any of his daughers.

"Know, 'Uthmān, that the best of God's servants in His eyes is a just imām, one who has been guided aright and who himself gives right guidance, for he upholds accepted prescriptions (sunnah ma'lūmah) and destroys rejected innovations (bid'ah matrūkah). By God, everything is clear. Sound prescriptions stand clearly marked, as do blameworthy innovations. The worst of men in God's sight is a tyrannical imām, one who has gone astray himself and by whom others are led astray, for he destroys an [2938] accepted prescription and revives a rejected innovation. Verily, I heard the Messenger of God say, 'The Day of Resurrection will be brought by the tyrannical imām; he will have no helper and no advocate, so that he will be cast into Hell, turning about in Hell as the mill turns, and then he will plunge into the fiery flood of Hell.' I tell you to beware of God and His sudden assault and His vengeance, for His punishment is harsh and painful indeed. I tell you to beware lest you be the murdered imām of this Community. Indeed it is said that an imām will be killed in this Community, and that bloody strife will be loosed upon it until the Day of Resurrection, and its affairs will become hopelessly entangled. (God) will leave them as sects (shiya'), and they will not see the truth due to the great height of falsehood. They will toss therein like waves and wander in confusion."

Then 'Uthmān replied, "By God, I knew that (people) would be saying what you have said. But by God, if you were in my place I would not have berated you nor left you in the lurch nor shamed you nor behaved foully. If I have favored kinsmen, filled a need, sheltered an impoverished wretch, and appointed as governors men like those whom 'Umar used to appoint, [then what have I done wrong?] I adjure you by God, O 'Alī, do you know that al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah is not there?" "Yes," he answered. ('Uthmān) said, "Do you know that 'Umar made him a governor?"[252] "Yes," he answered. Then ('Uthmān) said, "So why do you blame me for having appointed Ibn 'Āmir, simply because of his close kinship [with me]?"

'Alī said, "I will tell you that everyone appointed by 'Umar b. al-

252. Of Baṣrah, after the resignation of 'Utbah b. Ghazwān, probably in 14/635–636. See Donner, Early Islamic Conquests, 217, 264. I admit to finding this reference to al-Mughīrah somewhat puzzling.

Khaṭṭāb was kept under close scrutiny by him.[253] If ('Umar) heard [2939]
a single word concerning him he would flog him, then punish him with the utmost severity. But you do not do [that]. You have been weak and easygoing with your relatives." "They are your relatives as well," answered 'Uthmān. 'Alī said, "By my life, they are closely related to me indeed, but merit is found in others." 'Uthmān said, "Do you know that 'Umar kept Mu'āwiyah in office throughout his entire caliphate, and I have only done the same." 'Alī answered, "I adjure you by God, do you know that Mu'āwiyah was more afraid of 'Umar than was 'Umar's own slave Yarfa'?" "Yes," said ['Uthmān]. 'Alī went on, "In fact Mu'āwiyah makes decisions on issues without [consulting] you, and you know it. Thus, he says to the people. 'This is 'Uthmān's command.' You hear of this, but do not censure him."[254] Then 'Alī left him, and 'Uthmān went out on his heels.

Then ['Uthmān] took his seat upon the pulpit and said, "To proceed: For everything there is some bane and in every situation there is some defect. The bane of this Community (ummah) and the defect in this [divinely bestowed] beneficence are the maligners and slanderers who let you see what is pleasing to you and conceal what is hateful to you. They talk and talk to you. Men who resemble ostriches follow the first one to make a noise. Their favorite watering place is the one far away; they fail to quench their thirst and they get only the sediment. No leader arises, affairs have worn them out, and they possess no means of gain."

"By God, you have surely blamed me for things like those which you accepted from Ibn al-Khaṭṭāb. But he trampled you underfoot, smote you with his hand, and subdued you by his tongue, and so you submitted to him whether you liked it or not. I [2940] have been lenient with you. I let you tread on my shoulders while I restrained my hand and tongue, and therefore you have been insolent toward me. By God, I am stronger [than he] in kinsmen, I have allies closer at hand, I possess more supporters. It is more fitting for me [than for him] to say 'Come!' and have [men] come to me. I have appointed over you your peers.[255] I have cheerfully lavished benefits upon you. But you have attributed to me a nature that I do not possess and statements that I have not uttered. Restrain your tongues and your slandering and maligning of your rulers (wulāt), for I have kept from you a man who would satisfy you with less than these words of mine were he the one [now] speaking to you. Nay, but which of your rights are you deprived of? By God, I have achieved no less than did my predecessors or those about whose [standing in the Community] you have not disagreed. There is a surplus of wealth, so why should I not do as I wish with the surplus? Why otherwise did I become imām?"

253. fa-innamā yaṭa'u 'alā ṣimākhihi: literally, "indeed he would trample on his ear." See de Goeje, Introductio, dlix.

254. Reading tu'ayyiru instead of tughayyiru, in accordance with de Goeje's suggestion. See de Goeje, Introductio, cccIxxxiii, sub verbo 'ayyara, dcxxvii.

Then Marwān b. al-Ḥakam stood up and said [to the assembly], "If you wish, by God, we will cause the sword to judge between us and you—ourselves and you, by God! As the poet has said,

We have exposed our honor to your abuse;
unfit for you are the overnight encampments which you erect in the dung lying on the ground.

[2941] 'Uthmān said, "Be still now. Leave to me and my associates anything you have to say concerning this matter. Did I not command you not to speak?" Marwān fell silent and 'Uthmān descended [from the pulpit].

In this year, Abū 'Abs b. Jābir, a veteran of Badr, died in Medina. Two other veterans of Badr also died: Misṭaḥ b. Uthāthah, and 'Āqil b. Abī al-Bukayr, of [the clan of] Banū Sa'd b. Layth, an ally (ḥalīf) of the Banu 'Adī.

In this year, the Pilgrimage was led by 'Uthmān b. 'Affān.

---

255. Wa-laqad a'dadtu lakum aqrānakum. See de Goeje, Introductio, cdxxii, who offers the following interpretation: "Pares vobis apposui, non quod mihi licuit, numero et auctoritate praepollentes."

The Events of the Year 35

(July 11, 655–June 29, 656)

Among these was the encampment of the Egyptians at Dhū Khushub.

Concerning that event, it was related to me by Aḥmad b. Thābit—someone who related it [to him]—Isḥāq b. ʿĪsā—Abū Maʿshar: Dhū Khushub took place in the year 35 (655–56). Al-Wāqidī concurs in this.

An Account of the Egyptians Who Went to Dhū Khushub, and the Reason Why Certain Iraqis Went to Dhū al-Marwah

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—ʿAṭiyyah—Yazīd al-Faqʿasī: ʿAbdallāh b. Sabāʾ was a Jew from Ṣanʿāʾ, and his mother was a black woman. He converted to Islam in the time of ʿUthmān, then roamed about the lands of the Muslims attempting to lead them into error. He began in the Ḥijāz, and then [worked] successively in Baṣrah, Kūfah, and Syria. He was unable to work his will upon a single one of the Syrians; they drove him out and he came to Egypt. He settled among the Egyp- [2942] tians, saying to them, among other things, "How strange it is that some people claim that Jesus will return [to the earth], while denying that Muḥammad will return. Now Almighty God has said, 'He who has ordained the Qur'ān for thee shall surely restore thee to a place of return.'[256] Now Muḥammad is more worthy than Jesus to return."

[Yazīd al-Faq'asī] says: This gained the approval [of his listeners], and so he fabricated for them [the notion of] the Return (raj'ah), and they discussed it among themselves.[257] Later on, [Ibn Sabā'] said to them, "Verily there have been a thousand prophets (nabī); every prophet has an executor (waṣī) and 'Alī was the executor of Muḥammad."[258] He continued, "Muḥammad is the seal of the prophets, and 'Alī is the seal of the executors." Then after that he said, "Who commits a greater wrong than a man who has not carried out the testament of the Messenger of God, who has attacked the executor of the Messenger of God, and who has usurped power over the Community?" Then he told them, "Verily 'Uthmān has taken it without right, while this one [that is, 'Alī] is the executor of the Messenger of God. Therefore champion this cause and set it going. Begin by censuring your governors (umarā'). Proclaim publicly the commanding of good and the forbidding of evil,[259] and you will win over the people. Summon them to this cause."

Then he dispersed his agents (du'āt) and wrote to those whom he had corrupted in the garrison towns. They returned his corre-

256. Qur'ān 28:85. I have slightly altered Arberry's rendering to fit the meaning proposed by Ibn Sabā'.

257. The doctrine of the Return or Second Coming—here applied to Muḥammad, but more characteristically to 'Alī or the seventh or twelfth imam—is one of the characteristic doctrines of the ghulāt [Shi'ite extremists] in the late seventh and eighth centuries. In spite of the dubious origins of this idea, it was ultimately applied by mainstream Shi'ism to the Twelfth Imam, who remains in a state of occultation until his coming again to usher in the last age. See A. A. Sachedina, Messianism in Twelver Shiism [Albany, N.Y.: 1981]; Wadad al-Qadi, "The Development of the Term 'Ghulāt' in Muslim Literature with Special Reference to the Kaysāniyya," Akten VII Kongr. f. Arabistik u. Islamwissenschaft [Göttingen: 1976], pp. 295–319.

258. Another characteristic Shi'i doctrine. See W. Madelung, "Imāma," EI[2], III, 1166–67.

259. The fundamental public duty of every adult Muslim; one may not be in position to compel the rulers to obey God's commandments, but one always has the obligation to warn and rebuke wherever sin is observed.

spondence and secretly preached their notions [to others]. In public they proclaimed the commanding of good and the forbidding of [2943 evil. They began sending letters to the garrison towns, filling them with censure of their rulers, while their brethren would write back to them in similar terms. Among [these dissidents] the inhabitants of each garrison town would write about their activities to another garrison town. Those involved would read this aloud in their various garrison towns, until finally they extended this [agitation] to Medina and spread his message throughout the earth. Their real aim was different from the one that they proclaimed in public, and what they kept secret was different from that which they presented openly. Thus, the inhabitants of every garrison town were saying, "We are secure from the trials facing everyone except the Medinese." As the latter became aware of [the agitation] in all the garrison towns, they said, "We are secure from the situation facing the people."

At this point [the narrator] is joined by Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: [The Medinese] came to 'Uthmān and said, "O Commander of the Faithful, have you heard what we hear concerning the people?" He answered, "No, by God. I have only heard about order and security." They continued, "[Certain things] have come to our attention," and they told him what had been communicated to them. Then ['Uthmān] said, "You are my associates (shurakā') and the men of probity (shuhūd)[260] among the Believers, so advise me." They responded, "We advise you to send men whom you trust to the garrison towns so that they may bring back their reports to you."

Then he summoned Muḥammad b. Maslamah and dispatched him to Kūfah; he also sent Usāmah b. Zayd to Baṣrah, 'Ammār b. Yāsir to Egypt, and 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar to Syria. In addition to these, he sent men to various other places. They all returned before 'Ammār and said, "O people, we did not disapprove of anything [which we found during our tours of inspection], nor did the notables (a'lām) or commoners ('awāmm) among the Muslims." They said also, "The affairs of the Muslims are in good order if only their governors (umarā') act equitably among them and keep watch over them."[261] The people waited so long for 'Ammār that they imagined he had been murdered. Then unexpectedly they got a letter from 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd b. Abī Sarḥ, in-[2944] forming them that a band of men (qawm) in Egypt had focused all their efforts on 'Ammār and won him to their cause. Among these were 'Abdallāh b. al-Sawdā' [that is, Ibn Sabā'], Khālid b. Muljam, Sūdān b. Ḥumrān, and Kinānah b. Bishr.

260. In Islamic law, shuhūd are witnesses whose testimony is admissible in court. They must be persons of recognized religious and moral probity, and that seems to be what is at issue here.

It was transmitted to me in writing from al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah and 'Aṭiyyah: 'Uthmān wrote to the inhabitants of the garrison towns [as follows]: "To proceed: I require the governors ('ummāl) to appear before me during the Pilgrimage season every year, and I have enjoined the Community (ummah) to command the good and forbid the evil ever since I took office. Nothing has been demanded from me or from any of my governors that I have not granted. Neither I nor my household claims any priority in rights over the subjects (ra'iyyah) save (the rights) bequeathed to them.[262] Now the Medinese have represented to me that some groups are being vilified and others beaten. If then anyone alleges that he has suffered clandestine beatings or verbal abuse, let him come [before me] during the Pilgrimage season and obtain his due, whether it be from me or from my governors. Beyond that, 'be charitable, for God recompenses the charitable.' "[263]

When (this letter) was read out in the garrison towns, it caused the people to weep, and they invoked blessings upon 'Uthmān, saying, "Verily the Community is groaning in labor with evil." 'Uthmān sent to the governors ('ummāl) of the garrison towns and

---

261. A somewhat conjectural reading: al-amru amru 'l-muslimīna illā anna umarā'ahum yuqsiṭūna baynahum wa-yaqūmūna 'alayhim. Caetani's paraphrase (Annali, VIII, 111) seems to distort the meaning: "essi riferirono di non aver trovato nulla di anormale o di riprovevole, se non che i governatori erano trattati e giudicati ingiustamente dai loro dipendenti." A parallel to the first clause can be found below (text, I, 2947, l. 16): kāna 'l-amru amrahum wa'l-nasū taba'un lahum.

262. Wa-laysa lī wa-li-'iyālī ḥaqqun qabla 'l-ra'iyyati illā matrūkun lahum. The problem phrase here is matrūk lahum. Presumably it refers to the property and income rights that the Caliph held as head of the Community; these were rooted in the one-fifth share of booty and conquests claimed by the Prophet and his successors. See Qur'ān 9:42; Donner, Early Islamic Conquests, 241–43.

263. Qur'ān 12:88.

they came to him: 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir, Mu'āwiyah, and 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd. He also sought the counsel of Sa'īd (b. al-'Āṣ) and 'Amr (b. al-'Āṣ). Then he said, "Woe to you! What is this complaining and protest? By God, I fear that you are rightly accused and that I alone will be reproached for (your misdeeds)." They answered him, "Did you not send [to us], and did we not inform you about the faction [of malcontents]?[264] (Your envoys) returned, did they [2945] not, without having heard anything untoward from anyone? No, by God, (these complainers) have not told the truth or been sincere, and we know of no valid basis for this situation. You are not a man who should allow someone to get you upset about things.[265] All this is mere allegation that should not be taken seriously or inquired into."

('Uthmān) said, "Give me your advice, then." Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ said, "This is a contrived affair, fabricated in secret so that it can be conveyed to some unknowing person. Then he will pass it on, and in this way it will be discussed in their assemblies (majālis)." ('Uthmān) said, "What is the remedy for that?" (Sa'īd) replied, "First, seek out these dissidents (hā'ulā' al-qawm); then kill those among whom this movement emerges."

'Abdallāh b. Sa'd said, "Take from the people what they owe if you have given them what is theirs, for that is better than neglecting them."[266]

Mu'āwiyah said, "You have made me a governor, and I rule a group of men (qawm) about whom you hear nothing but good. Now these two men [that is, Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ of Kūfah and 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd of Egypt] know best about their own districts." ('Uthmān) said, "What do you advocate?" (Mu'āwiyah) replied, "Excellent discipline."

('Uthmān) asked, "What do you think, 'Amr?" ('Amr) replied, "In my opinion you are too lenient; you have been lax in dealing

---

264. Alam narja' ilayka 'l-khabara 'an 'l-qawmi. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil (Beirut), III, 155, gives a slightly different wording: alam yarja' ilayka l-khabaru 'an 'l-'awāmmi. 'Awāmm ("the masses, the common people, the populace") seems to fit better here than qawm, which in this portion of Ṭabarī most often refers to a band of men united by a common objective—namely, hostility to 'Uthmān—though in principle it could mean "the Muslim people."

265. Wa-mā kunta li-ta'khudha aḥadan fa-yuqīmaka 'alā shay'in.

266. The final clause is a conjectural translation: fa-innahu khayrun min an tada'ahum.

with them. You have increased [their stipends] beyond the levels set by 'Umar. I believe that you must follow the path of your two predecessors, showing severity or leniency according to the situation. Severity is the right policy for the man who constantly does evil to the people, while leniency is appropriate for one who deals with the people in good faith. However, you have shown leniency to both without distinction."

Then 'Uthmān arose. Praising and extolling God, he said, "I have heard everything that you have advised me to do. Every affair has an exit door. The present affair has emerged, and on account of it one fears for this Community. The door [out of this affair] is bolted shut, and thus leniency, generous treatment, and the gratification [of desires] will be shown only in conformity [2946] with the commandments (ḥudūd) of Almighty God; for in none of these may one manifest any shortcoming. If something blocks [this door] kindness and generosity [will open it]. By God, [the door out of this affair] will surely be opened. Against me no man has any valid proof, and God knows that I have not neglected any good for the people or for myself. By God, the mill of revolt (fitnah) is turning; blessed will 'Uthmān be if he dies without having set it in motion. Restrain the people, bestow their rights upon them, and forgive them. But where God's rights are concerned, do not be lax in regard to those."[267]

When 'Uthmān terminated [the council], he dispatched Mu'āwiyah and 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd to Medina, while Ibn 'Āmir returned [to Iraq] along with Sa'īd. When 'Uthmān was left alone, the caravan leader sang [these verses]:

The lean camels knew,
    and the she-camels bent like a bow,
That the amir after him would be 'Alī;
    in al-Zubayr there is a worthy successor,
And the fiery Ṭalḥah is an heir thereto.[268]

---

267. This speech is very difficult to construe. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil [Beirut], III, 156, offers only an abridged paraphrase, thus implying that he did not really understand it either.

268. In accordance with the editor of Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil [Beirut], III, 156, and Ibrāhīm, I read lahā instead of lamā in the following verse: wa-ṭalḥatu 'l-ḥāmī lahā waliyyu.

Ka'b (al-Aḥbār) said as he traveled behind 'Uthmān, "By God, the amir after him will be the master of the she-mule," and he pointed to Mu'āwiyah.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Badr b. al-Khalīl b. 'Uthmān b. Quṭbah al-Asadī—a man from the Banū Asad: Mu'āwiyah did not cease to hope for (the caliphate) after he came to 'Uthmān, at the time when (the latter) called his governors together to meet with him during the Pilgrimage season. Then (Mu'āwiyah) departed and the poet chanted:

Verily the amir after him will be 'Alī, [2947] and in al-Zubayr there is a worthy successor.

Ka'b (al-Aḥbār) said, "You lie; after him will come the master of the gray (she-mule)"—that is, Mu'āwiyah. Mu'āwiyah was informed (of this) and asked (Ka'b) about what he had heard. (Ka'b) said, "Yes, you are to be the amir after him, but you will not obtain (this office) until you deny this statement of mine." This made a profound impression on Mu'āwiyah.

At this point (the authorities previously mentioned) are joined by Abū Ḥārithah and Abū 'Uthmān—Rajā' b. Ḥaywah and others: When 'Uthmān arrived in Medina (after the conclusion of the Pilgrimage), he had the governors return to their provinces. All of them proceeded on, but Sa'īd stayed behind. When Mu'āwiyah bade farewell to 'Uthmān, he left (the latter's) residence attired for the journey, wearing his sword and with his bow on his shoulder. Then (Mu'āwiyah) happened to meet a few of the Emigrants, among them Ṭalḥah, al-Zubayr, and 'Alī.

He rose and greeted them; then he leaned on his bow and said, "You know that this situation has come about because the people are struggling among themselves to achieve supremacy for certain men. There is not one among you but that some member of his clan used to claim leadership over him, dominate him, and decide matters without him, seeking neither testimony nor advice from him. Then at last Almighty God sent His Prophet, through him ennobling those who heeded him. When (the Muslims) turned the leadership over to his successors, they did so through consultation among themselves, assigning superiority on the basis of priority (of conversion), precedence (in religion), and legal judgment (ijtihād). If (the Community's leaders) act on that basis, then they will keep control of matters and the people will submit to them. But if they pay heed to the things of this world and seek them in a struggle for supremacy with one another, they will be deprived of (power) and God will give it back to those who used to lead them. Otherwise, let them beware of the vicissitudes of fortune, for God has the power to alter [His decree], and He can dispose as He wishes of the kingship and authority that are His. I have left among you an old man, so display good will toward him [2948] and protect him. Thereby you will be more fortunate than he."

Then (Muʿāwiyah) bade them farewell and went on his way. ʿAlī said, "I see no good in this (man)." Al-Zubayr said, "No, by God, there was never anything more distressing to you or us than he was this morning."

It was related to me by ʿAbdallāh b. Aḥmad b. Shabbawayh—his father—ʿAbdallāh—Isḥāq b. Yaḥyā—Mūsā b. Ṭalḥah: ʿUthmān sent for Ṭalḥah, and I accompanied him. When he entered ʿUthmān's presence, there were ʿAlī, Saʿd (b. Abī Waqqāṣ), al-Zubayr, ʿUthmān, and Muʿāwiyah. Muʿāwiyah praised God and extolled Him as He merits, and then he said, "You are the Companions of the Messenger of God, the best [of His followers] on earth, and those charged with the affairs of this Community. No one other than you can hope for that. You have chosen your companion [as caliph] without compulsion or personal ambition. He has grown old and his life has passed by. If you had waited for decrepitude [to afflict] him, that would be near at hand. However, I hope that he has revered God so that He will allow him to reach that stage of life. Talk has spread, and I fear it for your sakes, for you have not denounced it in any way. You have my aid (in this matter). Do not inspire the people to long for your government, for by God, if they desire that, you will never see them do anything but turn tail and flee."

ʿAlī replied, "What is that to you, and what do you know about it? You have no mother!" (Muʿāwiyah) said, "Leave my mother her place [in the Community]. She is not the worst of your mothers. She accepted Islam and swore fidelity to the Prophet.[269] Now answer me in regard to what I am saying to you."

269. Muʿāwiyah's mother Hind bt. ʿUtbah had accompanied Meccan forces to the battle of Uḥud in 3/625, as the women of a tribe often did in ancient Arabia.

Then 'Uthmān said, "The son of my brother has spoken the truth. I will tell you in regard to myself and my conduct in office that my two predecessors wronged both themselves and those who followed in their path. Indeed the Messenger of God used to [2949] bestow [public funds] upon his relatives, while my near kinsmen were impoverished and possessed few of life's necessities. Thus, I laid my hands on some of that wealth because of my concern for them. It was my opinion that [this wealth] was mine. Now if you regard that as an error, return [the money]; my authority will be subject to yours."

They replied, "You are right and have done well." They continued, "You gave [public funds] to 'Abdallāh b. Khālid b. Asīd and to Marwān," alleging that he had given Marwān 15,000 [dirhams] and Ibn Asīd 50,000, and they took [these sums] back from those two. They were satisfied with this and departed content.

Here the narrative reverts to the account of Sayf and his authorities: On the morning that Mu'āwiyah bade farewell to 'Uthmān and departed, he said to him, "O Commander of the Faithful, come with me to Syria before you are attacked by men against whom you cannot defend yourself, for the Syrians are steadfastly loyal." ['Uthmān] answered, "I will not exchange my proximity to the Messenger of God for anything, even if my throat is slashed because of that." [Mu'āwiyah] said, "I will send you an army from [Syria], which will remain among the Medinese to confront any ill fortune that may befall Medina or you." ['Uthmān] replied, "With an army quartered among them, I will stint the rations allocated to the neighbors of the Messenger of God, and I will create scarcity for the inhabitants of the Abode of Refuge and Support (Dār al-Hijrah wa'l-Naṣrah)." [Mu'āwiyah] said, "By God, O Commander of the Faithful, you will surely be assassinated or attacked." ['Uthmān] responded, "God suffices for me, and what an excellent guardian is He!"[270] Then Mu'āwiyah said, "Little slaughter camels! Where are the slaughter camels?"

When the prophet's uncle Ḥamzah was killed in the fighting she cut open his breast and bit off a piece of his liver—again a traditional gesture of revenge. See Ibn Isḥāq, Sīrah, 581; Guillaume transl., 385.

270. Qur'ān 3:264.

He set out until he came upon the band [of Companions mentioned above], and then he proceeded on.

Now the Egyptians had corresponded with their fellow partisans in Kūfah and Baṣrah, and with all those who had agreed [2950] with them to rebel against their governors. They fixed a day when their governors would be away, but save for the Kūfans, none of them carried [the scheme] out properly and rose in revolt. In [Kūfah] Yazīd b. Qays al-Arḥabī rebelled and his comrades gathered around him. The military commandant was al-Qaʿqāʿ b. ʿAmr. He came to [Yazīd], and the people surrounded [Yazīd's followers] and implored them [to break off their revolt].

Then Yazīd said to al-Qaʿqāʿ, "What recourse do you have against me and these men? By God, I submit to authority, and I adhere to my Community (jamāʿah) and to them. However, I and those whom you observe are calling for the termination of Saʿīd's governorship. [Al-Qaʿqāʿ] answered, "The elite (khāṣṣah) seeks to end a state of affairs with which the masses (ʿāmmah) are content." He continued, "That is a matter for the Commander of the Faithful." Then he left them and [their] call for [Saʿīd's] resignation, while they could proclaim nothing else. They encountered Saʿīd and drove him back from al-Jaraʿah. The people concurred in Abū Mūsā [as their next governor] and ʿUthmān confirmed him in office.

When the governors returned [from their meeting in Mecca], the sect of Ibn Sabā' (al-Sabāʾiyyah) had no way to get to the garrison towns. They wrote their adherents in the garrison towns that they should assemble in Medina in order to decide what they meant to do. They pretended that they were simply "commanding the good" and interrogating ʿUthmān about certain issues. Their aim was for these to circulate among the people and become verified against him.

Thus, they assembled in Medina, and as his envoys ʿUthmān sent two men, one from the clan of Makhzūm and the other from the clan of Zuhr. He said, "Find out what they mean to do and learn all about them." These two men were among those who had won ʿUthmān's respect by their refined behavior (adab); they patiently sought the truth and harbored no malevolence. When [the dissidents] saw them, they revealed their secrets to them and informed them of their aims. [ʿUthmān's two envoys] said, "Who among the Medinese supports you against this man [namely, 'Uthmān]?" "Three persons," they answered. The two men said, "Is there anyone else?" "No," they said. The two [envoys] went on, "So what do you intend to do?" They replied, "We want to mention to ['Uthmān] certain misdeeds that we have planted in the hearts of the people. Afterwards we shall go back to them and claim that we compelled him to confess these things, but that he did not abandon them or repent. Then we will set out in the guise of pilgrims until we reach [Medina]. We will surround him and depose him, and if he refuses we will kill him." And so it happened. [2951]

The two [envoys] returned to 'Uthmān with the news, and he laughed, saying, "O God, preserve these [enemies of mine], for if You do not preserve them, they will be wretched indeed. As for 'Ammār [b. Yāsir], he violently assaulted 'Abbās b. 'Utbah b. Abī Lahab. As for Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr, he was highly regarded until he supposed that he was not bound by rights and obligations (ḥuqūq). As for Ibn Sahlah, he faces trial and tribulation."

Then ['Uthmān] sent to the Kūfans and Baṣrans, and summoned them to pray in congregation. They assembled before him at the base of the pulpit, and the Companions of the Messenger of God came and surrounded them. Then ['Uthmān] praised and extolled God, and told them the news of this band [of dissidents]. Then the two [former envoys] arose, and all [those present] said, "Kill [the dissidents]! Verily the Messenger of God has said, 'God's curse is on any man who has summoned [others] to join him or anyone else while there is an imām over the people, so put him to death.' And 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb said, 'I permit you only to kill [such a man], and I am your partner [in that deed].'"

Then 'Uthmān responded, "Nay, but we do our utmost to pardon and accept and enlighten them, and we oppose no one until he violates a divine commandment (ḥadd) or manifests unbelief. Now these [dissidents] have mentioned various matters, concerning which you and they are equally well informed. However, they allege that they are bringing [these matters] to my attention in order to compel me [to respond] to them in the presence of those who remain uninformed."

"They say, 'He has performed the complete prayer rite while traveling [by performing four rak'ahs instead of two], when for- [2952] merly this was not done."[271] But in fact I came to a town [namely, Mecca] where my household was residing, [while I had property in al-Ṭā'if], and on account of these two things I carried out the full rite.[272] Is this the case?" [The assembled people] said, "O God, it is so."

"They say, 'You prohibited public use of a grazing reserve.'[273] But by God, [the pasture land] whose use I restricted had already been reserved before me. By God, they [namely, 'Uthmān's predecessors] did not forbid grazing rights to anyone. They only reserved [grazing land] that the inhabitants of Medina had usurped, and they prevented no one from pasturing [his animals]. They used it only for the alms taxes[274] due from the Muslims, guarding them lest there be a dispute between anyone and the official in charge of [the alms tax]. But they neither barred nor ejected anyone from it, save those who offered a dirham.[275] I possess no camels save two riding animals; I have no other livestock at all. When I became caliph, I had more camels and sheep than any of the Arabs, and today I have neither sheep nor camels, except for two camels to use for the Pilgrimage. Is this the case?" [The people] said, "O God, it is so."

"[The dissidents] say, 'The Qur'ān used to be [preserved in a number of different] written versions (kutub), and you have abandoned all but one.' But verily the Qur'ān is one, and came through one [man]. In this matter I have only followed these.[276] Is this the case?" "Yes," they replied. They sought to have him kill [the dissidents].

"[The dissidents] say that I brought al-Ḥakam back after the 271. A reference to 'Uthmān's additions to the rites of prayer at Minā during the Pilgrimage; see above, pp. 38–40 (text, I, 2833–2835, sub anno 29), and note 65.

272. The phrase in brackets is supplied in accordance with Prym's suggestion; see note a.

273. There is a somewhat fuller parallel account of this dispute in Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 38.

274. That is, these taxes (ṣadaqāt) had been paid in animals—presumably camels—rather than cash.

275. That is, rich men who tried to gain privileged access to the grazing reserve by bribery. See de Goeje, Introductio, cccii.

276. The reference of course is to 'Uthmān's decision to establish a single definitive recension of the Qur'ān, and to destroy the existing versions with their many discrepancies. "These" presumably refers to the board of editors [headed by Zayd b. Thābit] whom he appointed to carry out the task.

Messenger of God had exiled him. Now al-Ḥakam was a Meccan; the Messenger of God exiled him from Mecca to al-Ṭā'if, and then he brought him back. Thus, the Messenger of God both sent him into exile and had him return. Is that the case?" They said, "O God, it is so."

"[The dissidents] say, 'You have appointed youths as governors.' But I only appointed a man who was capable and commanded broad support [namely, 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir in Baṣrah]. These [dissidents] are inhabitants of his province, so pay them no heed regarding him.[277] My predecessors appointed younger men than these to office, and people spoke more harshly to the Messenger of God than they have to me in connection with his appointment of Usāmah.[278] Is that the case?" They responded, "O God, it is so. [These dissidents] denounce to the people things that they leave unexplained."

"[The dissidents] say that I gave to Ibn Abī Sarḥ the booty that God bestowed upon him [during the campaign in Ifrīqiyah].[279] But in fact out of the booty that God gave, I only turned over to him one-fifth out of the one-fifth [legally allocated to the caliph]. The amount was 100,000 [dirhams], and Abū Bakr and 'Umar did the same thing. The army claimed to find this reprehensible, and so I have restored to them [the 100,000 dirhams], though it was not really theirs. Is that the case?" They said, "Yes."

"[The dissidents] say that I love my kinsmen and that I make [2953] gifts to them [from the public treasury]. As to my love, it has not been turned into wrongdoing for their benefit; on the contrary, it is the weightiest of [my] obligations to them. As to [my] gifts to them, what I give them is drawn from my own property; I do not regard the wealth of the Muslims as lawful for myself or for anyone else among the people. I used to give large and much-coveted gifts from my personal property in the time of the Messenger of God, Abū Bakr, and 'Umar, and at that time I was ava-

277. I have emended the text in accordance with Prym's suggestion, note 1.

278. In 11/632, shortly before his death, Muḥammad put the young Usāmah b. Zayd b. Ḥārithah in command of a raid into the Balqā' [the district around Karak east of the Dead Sea] and al-Dārūm [a fortress just south of Gaza]. See Ibn Isḥāq, Sīrah, 776, 970, 999; Guillaume transl., 523, 652, 678. Al-Dārūm: Le Strange, Palestine under the Moslems, 412, 437.

279. On this incident see above, pp. 19–20 [text, I, 2814–2815, sub anno 27].

ricious and greedy. Now when I have attained the usual life-span of my family, when my life has reached its end and I have distributed my property among my relatives, do the heretics (mulḥid) say such things? Indeed, by God, no one can rightfully say that I have had any garrison town surrender [its] surplus revenues, for I have returned (the surpluses) to them.[280] I have received only the twenty percent [legally allocated to the caliph], and from this I have allowed nothing for myself. The Muslims have taken charge of registering (these revenues) for the proper recipients with no involvement from me, and not a penny of God's wealth has been diverted. Now what is beyond that and what I use to sustain myself I consume only from my own property."

"(The dissidents) say, 'You have given the land to certain men.' As regards these lands, when they were conquered, the Emigrants and Helpers shared in them with (these men). If a man remained any place within these conquered territories, his family followed his lead. If a man has returned to his family [from the conquered lands], that does not negate [his claim to lands] that God has acquired for him. I determined what should be distributed to them out of (the conquests) that God had bestowed upon them. Then, at their request, I purchased (property of equivalent value) for them from [other] men who owned land in Arabia. Then I transferred their share [of the conquered territories] to (these latter), and it is now in their hands."[281]

[2954] 'Uthmān had divided his wealth and lands among the Banū Umayyah, treating his own children as he did the other recipients. He began with the Banū Abī al-'Āṣ, giving the men in the lineage of al-Ḥakam (b. Abī al-'Āṣ) 10,000 [dirhams] each; they

---

280. Wa-innī wa-'llāhi mā ḥamaltu 'alā miṣrin min 'l-amṣāri faḍlan fa-yajūza dhālika liman qālahu wa-laqad radadtuhu 'alayhim. See de Goeje, Introductio, cdiv, sub verbo faḍl.

281. This passage refers to 'Uthmān's grants of estates and villages within the conquered territories (Iraq in particular) to powerful individuals. 'Umar had done the same thing, but 'Uthmān was thought to be overly generous in this regard. See Donner, Early Islamic Conquests, 241–45. There have been numerous allusions above to this and to the resentment inspired by it. For example, see pp. 58, 59–61, 112–13, 120–21 (text, I, 2852, 2854–2855, 2908, 2916). The last sentence is difficult: Fa-bi'tuhu lahum bi-amrihim min rijālin ahli 'aqārin bi-bilādi 'l-'Arabi fa-naqaltu ilayhim naṣībahum fa-huwa fī aydihim dūnī. See Caetani, Annali, VIII, 203.

took 100,000 dirhams [altogether]. To his own sons he gave a like amount. [The remainder] was divided among the Banū al-ʿĀṣ, the Banū al-ʿĪṣ, and the Banū Ḥarb.[282]

ʿUthmān's retinue (ḥāshiyah) had dealt leniently with those bands [of dissidents]. The Muslims demanded nothing short of putting them to death, while [ʿUthmān] insisted on letting them go. Thus, [the dissidents] departed and returned to their own provinces, having agreed to attack him[283] [when they came back] in the guise of pilgrims in the company of [genuine] pilgrims. They corresponded with one another, saying, "Rendezvous in Shawwāl at the outskirts of Medina." Thus, in Shawwal of the year 12 [of ʿUthmān's reign; April 656] they erected tents in the manner of pilgrims and made camp near Medina.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah and Abū Ḥārithah and Abū ʿUthmān: In Shawwāl of the year 35 (April 656), the Egyptians set out in four companies under the leadership of four commanders. The lowest number cited is six hundred, while the highest is one thousand. Leading the companies were ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿUdays al-Balawī, Kinānah b. Bishr al-Tujībī,[284] Sūdān b. Ḥumrān al-Sakūnī, and Qutayrah b. Fulān al-Sakūnī. In command of the whole body of men (qawm) was al-Ghāfiqī b. Ḥarb al-ʿAkkī. They dared not inform the people that they were setting off to war and went instead in the guise of pilgrims. Accompanying them was Ibn al-Sawdāʾ [that is, ʿAbdallāh b. Sabāʾ].

The Kūfans [likewise] set out in four companies, led by Zayd b. Ṣūḥān al-ʿAbdī, al-Ashtar al-Nakhaʿī, Ziyād b. al-Naḍr al-Ḥārithī, and ʿAbdallāh b. al-Aṣamm, a member of the tribe of ʿĀmir b. Ṣaʿṣaʿah. Their numbers were the same as those of the Egyptians, and ʿAmr b. al-Aṣamm was in overall command. [2955]

The Baṣrans set out in four companies, led by Ḥukaym b. Ja-

282. The lineage of the Umayyad clan—or more strictly, the descendants of ʿAbd Shams b. ʿAbd Manāf—is given in Appendix I, adapted from the tables in Gernot Rotter, Die Umayyaden und der zweite Bürgerkrieg (680–692) (Wiesbaden 1982), 253–57.

283. Reading yaghzuwahu rather than yaghzuwahum. See de Goeje, Introductio, dcxxviii.

284. Reading "al-Tujībī" instead of "al-Laythī." See de Goeje, Introductio, dcxxviii.

balah al-ʿAbdī, Dhurayḥ b. ʿAbbād al-ʿAbdī, Bishr b. Shurayḥ al-Ḥuṭam b. Ḍubayʿah al-Qaysī, and Ibn al-Muḥarrish b. ʿAbd ʿAmr al-Ḥanafī. Their number was the same as that of the Egyptians, and Ḥurqūṣ b. Zubayr al-Saʿdī was in command over them all, save for those among the people who followed after them.

As for the Egyptians, they yearned for ʿAlī [as caliph], while the Baṣrans desired Ṭalḥah and the Kūfans al-Zubayr. They all set out simultaneously. The people had disparate [aims], and every faction (firqah) was certain that it would obtain complete success to the exclusion of the other two. Thus, they proceeded until, three days from Medina, a group of men from among the Baṣrans went forward and made camp at Dhū Khushub. A section of the Kūfans made camp at al-Aʿwaṣ, and a group of Egyptians came to join them, having left the main body of [their compatriots] behind at Dhū al-Marwah.[285]

[2956] Ziyād b. al-Naḍr and ʿAbdallāh b. al-Aṣamm traveled back and forth between the Egyptians and Baṣrans saying, "Do not be overhasty or force us to rush, so that we can enter Medina and explore the situation for you. We have in fact heard that [the Medinese] have mobilized their troops against us. By God, if the Medinese fear us and deem it lawful to fight us when they have no solid knowledge about us, they will be even more hostile when they do obtain this, and our movement will fail. On the other hand, if they do not deem it lawful to fight us and we find that what we have heard is false, then we will bring that news back to you." [The Baṣrans and Egyptians] said, "Go ahead."

Thus, the two men entered Medina and met with the wives of the Prophet and with ʿAlī, Ṭalḥah, and al-Zubayr. They said, "We have only come here[286] to seek from this ruler [that is, ʿUthmān] the removal of certain of our governors. We have come only for that." The two men sought their permission for the people to enter Medina, but every one of them utterly refused, saying, "Surely an egg will hatch!"[287] Then (Ziyād and 'Abdallāh) returned to (their camp).

285. Dhū Khushub: "A valley lying a night's journey from Medina, often mentioned in hadith and accounts of the Prophet's campaigns" (Yāqūt, Muʿjam al-Buldān, II, 444—45. Al-Aʿwaṣ: "A locale in the vicinity of Medina, mentioned in accounts of the Prophet's campaigns . . . lying a very few miles from Medina" (Ibid., I, 317). Dhū al-Marwah: "A town in the Wādī al-Qurā; it is also said to lie between Khushub and the Wādī al-Qurā" (Ibid., IV, 513). Yāqūt's data are laconic, but they do place all three locales immediately to the north of Medina; al-Aʿwaṣ appears to be closest to the city, Dhū al-Marwah the most distant.

286. Qāla: innamā naʿtammu hādhā 'l-bayta wa-nastaʿfī hādhā 'l-wāliya min baʿḍi ʿummālinā.

Then some Egyptians banded together and came to 'Alī, while a party of Baṣrans came to Ṭalḥah and a few Kūfans to al-Zubayr. Each of these groups said, "If (the loyalists in Medina) render the oath of allegiance to our companion, [well and good].[288] Otherwise, we shall plot against them, shatter their unity and cohesion (jamā'ah), and then turn round and take them by surprise."

The Egyptians reached 'Alī while he was with an army at Aḥjār al-Zayt. He was wearing a white-striped cloak and a turban wound from a strip of red Yemeni cloth; he was girt with a sword [2957] but did not have on a shirt. He had dispatched al-Ḥasan to 'Uthmān along with those who had joined him (in his camp). Thus, al-Ḥasan was staying with 'Uthmān while 'Alī was at Aḥjār al-Zayt. The Egyptians greeted him and presented (their aims) to him. He shouted at them and drove them away, saying, "The upright know that the armies at Dhū al-Marwah and Dhū Khushub have been cursed by the tongue of Muḥammad. Go back, and may God be no friend to you!" They said, "So be it," and thereupon departed from him.

The Baṣrans came to Ṭalḥah while he was with another group of men (encamped) adjacent to 'Alī. He had sent his two sons to (support) 'Uthmān. The Baṣrans greeted him and presented (their aims) to him. He shouted at them and drove them away, saying, "The Believers know that the armies at Dhū al-Marwah and Dhū Khushub and al-A'waṣ have been cursed by the tongue of Muḥammad."

The Kūfans came to al-Zubayr while he was with yet another body of men. He had sent his son 'Abdallāh to (support) 'Uthmān. They greeted him and presented (their aims) to him, and he shouted at them and drove them away, saying, "The Muslims

287. Baydun mā yufrikhanna. That is, some evil will occur. See de Goeje, Introductio, cccxcix.

288. The Arabic text is elliptical, but the point is clear. Each of the three factions attacking 'Uthmān hopes to gain support for its own candidate for the caliphate: 'Alī, Ṭalḥah, or al-Zubayr respectively.

know that the armies at Dhū al-Marwah, Dhū Khushub, and al-A'waṣ have been cursed by the tongue of Muḥammad."

Then the dissidents (al-qawm) departed and made a show of going back [to their homes]. They withdrew from Dhū Khushub and al-A'waṣ until they reached their encampments, situated three days away; they intended for the Medinese to disperse, and then they would turn around and come back. At their departure the Medinese did in fact disperse. When the dissidents reached their encampments, they wheeled around to attack (the Medinese). They took the Medinese by surprise, and all at once the cry "God is most great!" was heard throughout the city. (The dissidents) occupied the sites of the encampments [previously established by 'Alī, Ṭalḥah, and al-Zubayr] and surrounded 'Uthmān. "Whoever restrains his hand [and does not resist us]," they announced, "will be secure."

[2958] 'Uthmān led the people in prayer for some days, but the people stayed in their houses. (The dissidents) prevented no one from discussing [the situation], and so the people, 'Alī among them, came and talked with them. ('Alī) said, "What brought you back after you had changed your minds and gone?" They responded, "We seized a letter [ordering] us to be killed from an official courier."[289] Then Ṭalḥah came and the Baṣrans said the same thing, as did the Kūfans with al-Zubayr. The Kūfans and Baṣrans said, "We are united in supporting and aiding our brothers, as they were promised." Then 'Alī said to them, "How, O men of Kūfah and Baṣrah, did you know what had befallen the Egyptians, for you traveled a certain number of days and then turned back toward us? By God, this is a conspiracy (amr) woven [while you were] in Medina." "Explain it however you wish," they said. "We reject this man [namely, 'Uthmān]. Let him be removed from us! He still leads (the people) in prayer, and they perform the prayer behind him. Anyone who wishes comes to visit [him]. In his eyes (the people) are less than dirt." (The dissidents) had not been preventing anyone from discussing [the situation], but they were forming bands in Medina that barred the people from assembling.

289. Barīd, the official postal and information service, inherited from Roman and Sasanian usage. The system reached its fullest elaboration under the early Abbasids. The term "barīd" normally refers to the institution, but here it clearly indicates an individual courier. See D. Sourdel, "Barīd," *EI*², I, 1045–46.

'Uthmān wrote to the inhabitants of the garrison towns to seek their aid: "In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. To proceed: Verily Almighty God sent Muḥammad 'with the truth, both good news and warning,'[290] and he conveyed from God what He had commanded him [to say]. Then he departed, having fulfilled the duties laid upon him, and left among us His book, wherein is found what He permits and forbids and a clear statement of the matters that He has foreordained. Thus, he accomplished [these things], both those that God's servants desired and those that they hated.

"Abū Bakr and 'Umar succeeded him, and then I was included in the consultation [on the succession to 'Umar],[291] without any [2959] knowledge [on my part of what would happen] or any dispute as regards the Community's considered opinion. Then the electoral council agreed on me,[292] in accordance with the judgment of its members and the people, without my having sought or desired anything. I have acted toward them in a manner that they fully approve, neither have I submitted to any self-appointed leader, adhered to any innovator, or followed the example of any hypocrite. When affairs came to their conclusion and evil had been betrayed by its own partisans, then malevolence and selfish desires appeared, though no crime or wrongful violence had been committed [by me], but only the carrying out of the Book of God.[293] Lacking any valid proof or excuse, [the malcontents] have in reality sought one goal while publicly proclaiming another. They have blamed me for things that were previously acceptable to them, and for clearly upright conduct (ashyā') consonant with the considered opinion of the Medinese. For years I have forced

290. Qur'ān 2:113; 35:22.

291. On the electoral process (shūrā, "consultation") through which 'Uthmān was named caliph, see Ṭabari, I, 2776–2797.

292. See de Goeje, Introductio, dcxxviii.

293. Fa-lammā intahat 'l-umūru wa'ntakatha 'l-sharru bi-ahlihi badat ḍaghā'inu wa-ahwā'u 'alā ghayri ijrāmin wa-lā tiratin fīmā maḍā illā imḍā'a 'l-kitābi.

myself to be patient with them, and have restrained myself while seeing and hearing [all this].

"Now their insolence toward Almighty God has so increased that they have attacked us in the very precincts of the Messenger of God, in His sanctuary,[294] and in the territory of the Hijrah. Now the Bedouin have returned to them, and (these dissidents) are like the hostile confederates during their battles [against us],[295] or like those who attacked us at Uḥud, save in regard to their public statements. He who can join our cause, let him do so."

The letter reached the inhabitants of the garrison towns, and they set out on camels both stubborn and docile. Muʿāwiyah dispatched Ḥabīb b. Maslamah al-Fihrī. ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿd sent Muʿāwiyah b. Ḥudayj al-Sakūnī. From among the Kūfans, al-Qaʿqāʿ b. ʿAmr set forth. In Kūfah those who urged support for the [2960] Medinese included ʿUqbah b. ʿAmr, ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Awfā, and Ḥanẓalah b. al-Rabīʿ al-Tamīmī, along with others like them from among the Prophet's Companions. The Successors[296] in Kūfah who urged [support for ʿUthmān] included the disciples (aṣḥāb) of ʿAbdallāh (b. Masʿūd)—namely, Masrūq b. al-Ajdaʿ, al-Aswad b. Yazīd, Shurayḥ b. al-Ḥārith, and ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUkaym, along with others like them. They would go about (the city) and make the circuit of tribal councils (majālis), saying, "O people, today is the time to talk, not tomorrow. Today it is good to examine [the crisis], while tomorrow it will be hateful. Today fighting is law-

294. Yathrib had been declared a sanctuary (ḥarām)—that is, a sacred place where blood feuds were forbidden and whose guardians were inviolate—in a clause of the Constitution of Medina, perhaps around 6/628. See R. B. Serjeant, "The Sunnah Jāmiʿah, Pacts with the Yathrib Jews, and the Taḥrīm of Yathrib," BSOAS, XLI (1978), 34–35, 38–40.

295. Fa-hum ka'l-aḥzābi ayyāma 'l-aḥzābi. These were the Meccans and their bedouin allies who besieged Medina in the Battle of the Trench in 5/627. ʿUthmān compares his opponents to these implacable enemies of God and His prophet. See Qurʾān 33:20–27.

296. The Successors (tābiʿun) are the second generation of Muslims—those who never knew Muḥammad directly and were converted by his Companions, or the children of the Companions. The Successors represent a sort of apostolic succession; as immediate heirs to the faith and doctrine of the Companions, they came to be almost as highly revered as these latter as teachers and exemplars for later generations of Muslims. This passage seems to represent one of the earliest mentions of this group. See V. Carra de Vaux, "Tābiʿ," SEI, 557.

ful, while tomorrow it will be forbidden. Rise up, defend your caliph and your affairs."

In Baṣrah, 'Imrān b. Ḥuṣayn, Anas b. Mālik, and Hishām b. 'Āmir arose along with other Companions of the Prophet like them and made similar statements. Among the Successors [in Baṣrah], Ka'b b. Sūr, Harim b. Ḥayyān al-'Abdī, and others like them were also saying such things.

In Syria, 'Ubādah b. al-Ṣāmit, Abū al-Dardā', and Abū Umāmah rose up with other like-minded Companions of the Prophet to make statements of this kind. Among the Successors Sharīk b. Khubāshah al-Numayrī, Abū Muslim al-Khawlānī, and 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ghanm spoke in the same vein. In Egypt Khārijah and others like him arose [to make their voices heard].

Now some of those urging [aid for 'Uthmān] had witnessed the coming (of the dissidents). When they perceived the state of affairs among these latter, they departed for their own garrison towns with that [information] and rose up there [to speak about it].

When it was the hour of the Friday prayer in the mosque of the Messenger of God, which fell immediately after the Egyptians had set up camp, 'Uthmān came forth to lead the people in prayer. Then he stood up on the pulpit and said, "O you enemies! Fear God, fear God! By God, the Medinese know that you have been [2961] cursed by the tongue of Muḥammad, so wipe out your errors by doing what is right. For verily Almighty God only eradicates evil through what is good."

Muḥammad b. Maslamah arose and said, "I bear witness to that." Then Ḥukaym b. Jabalah seized him and forced him to sit down. Zayd b. Thābit stood up and said, "Get the letter [from 'Uthmān to the governor of Egypt] for me." From another side Muḥammad b. Abī Qutayrah stood up beside him and with harsh words made him sit down. Then the dissidents (al-qawm) all rose up together and threw stones at the people until they had driven them from the mosque. They threw stones at 'Uthmān until he fell unconscious from the pulpit. He was carried off and brought into his house. Now the Egyptians expected support from only three men among the Medinese, for these had been in correspondence with them: Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr, Muḥammad b. Abī Ḥudhayfah, and 'Ammār b. Yāsir. A certain group among the people prepared themselves to face death; among these were Sa'd b. Mālik, Abū Hurayrah, Zayd b. Thābit, and al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī. 'Uthmān firmly instructed them to leave [his house], and they did so. 'Alī came back and entered 'Uthmān's presence after he had fallen [from the pulpit], as did Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr, and [all three] expressed their sorrow. Then they returned to their own homes.

[2962] It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Abū 'Amr—al-Ḥasan: I [namely, Abū 'Amr] said to him, "Did you witness the siege of 'Uthmān?" [Al-Ḥasan] responded, "Yes. At that time I was a youth [and was] in the mosque with associates of mine. When the clamor grew intense, I rose to my knees or stood up. Then the dissidents came and ensconced themselves in the mosque and its environs. A certain group among the Medinese gathered around them, saying that what they had done was distressing, while the dissidents approached the Medinese with threats. As they were thus clamoring around the gate, 'Uthmān arose, and it was as if a fire had been extinguished. He went over to the pulpit and mounted it. He praised God and extolled Him. One man got to his feet and another made him sit down, then yet another arose and someone else forced him to sit down. Then the dissidents rose up and threw stones at 'Uthmān until he fell unconscious. He was carried away and brought to [his house]. For twenty days he led them in prayer, and then they barred him from attending the prayer.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah and Abū Ḥārithah and Abū 'Uthmān: 'Uthmān led the people in prayer for thirty days after [the dissidents] had ensconced themselves in the mosque. Then they barred him from the prayer, and their chief al-Ghāfiqī led the people in prayer. The Egyptians, Kūfans, and Baṣrans submitted to him, while the Medinese dispersed to their walled compounds and stayed in their houses. None of them would venture out or attend any council unless he was wearing a sword whereby he could defend himself from the tyranny of the dissidents. The siege lasted forty days, and during this period the [caliph's] murder took place. [The dissidents] used arms against anyone who resisted them, though heretofore they had refrained [from violence] for thirty days.

As to (authorities) other than Sayf, some of them say that the dissidents' dispute with 'Uthmān and the reasons why they besieged him are correctly described in the account related to me by Ya'qūb b. Ibrāhīm—Mu'tamir b. Sulaymān al-Taymī—his father—Abū Naḍrah—Abū Sa'īd, the client of Abū Usayd al-Anṣārī:[297] 'Uthmān learned of the approach of the Egyptian delegation, and he received them while he was in a village of his outside Medina. He states: When (the Egyptians) heard about him, they approached him at the place where he then was. He says: 'Uthmān did not want them to come to him in Medina—or words to that effect. [2963]

So they came to him and said, "Send for the Qur'ān (muṣḥaf)," and he did so. Then they said, "Open to the ninth (chapter)." Now they used to call the Chapter of Jonah the ninth.[298] Then ('Uthmān) recited it until he came to this verse: "Say: Have you considered the provision God has sent down for you, and you have made some of it unlawful, and some lawful? Say: Has God given you leave, or do you forge against God?"[299] They told 'Uthmān to stop and then said to him, "Have you considered the pasture rights that you set aside? Has God given you leave, or do you forge against God?" He replied, "Enough! (This verse) was revealed in connection with such-and-such a matter." He continued, "And as to the reserved pasture, before my time 'Umar set aside pasture for the camels that had been paid as alms tax. When I became caliph, the alms-tax camels had increased in number, and so I increased the reserved pasture in accordance with that fact. Enough." Then they began berating him with the verse, and he would say, "Enough! It was revealed in connection with such-and-such a matter."

The man responsible for transmitting 'Uthmān's words was the same age at that time as you are now—Abū Naḍrah says, "Abū

297. The following narrative is persistently interrupted by the word qāla—that is, "(the narrator) states." I have for the most part omitted these editorial interjections, unless they seem to mark a significant shift in the narrative. However, the new paragraphs in this passage normally begin with such an editorial qāla.

298. The text reads al-sābi'ah, "the seventh." Cf. de Goeje, Introductio, dcxxviii. In the modern numeration the Surah of Jonah is number ten; presumably the Fātiḥah (number one) was not counted in the earliest times.

299. Qur'ān 10:60.

[2964] Sa'īd would say that to me." Abū Naḍrah said [to Abū Sa'īd], "I am the same age [now] as you were then." [Abū Naḍrah] continued, "At that time my beard had not yet started to grow." I don't know, and perhaps he said on another occasion, "At that time I was thirty years old."[300]

Then they took ['Uthmān] to task for things from which he could find no escape. Recognizing these, he said, "I seek God's forgiveness and turn to Him in repentance." Then he said to them, "What do you want?" They made a compact (mīthāq) with him, and he said, "I regard this as valid." They wrote out conditions to be imposed on him. Then ['Uthmān] obligated them to break no rod [namely, of loyalty and obedience] nor to withdraw from unity (jamā'ah) so long as he fulfilled their conditions or acted in accordance with what they required of him.

['Uthmān] said to them, "What do you want?" They replied, "We want the Medinese to take no stipend [from the Public Treasury], for this money belongs to those who fight and to those venerable men (shuyūkh) who are Companions of the Messenger of God." They were content with this and accompanied him to Medina satisfied [as to their demands]. ['Uthmān] rose and gave the Friday sermon, saying, "By God, I have seen no delegation on earth that is better for my misdeeds than this delegation that has come to me." Another time he said, "I am afraid of this delegation from Egypt. Verily let him who possesses a field go out to his field, and let him who possesses milk animals milk them. You shall have no Treasury payments from us.[301] This money belongs only to those who fight and to those venerable men who are Companions of the Messenger of God." Then the people were angry and said, "This is a trick by the Banū Umayyah."

Then the Egyptian delegation went back satisfied, and while they were on the road [back to Egypt], suddenly they noticed a rider coming up beside them and then leaving them behind. Then he came back toward them and again left them behind, scrutiniz-

300. This paragraph represents one of Ṭabarī's rare explicit editorial interventions. The point of this somewhat muddled interchange is to demonstrate that the ultimate authority for this story, Abū Sa'īd, was mature enough (between his late teens and thirty) to have given a reliable account of 'Uthmān's statements.

301. A-lā innahu lā māla lakum 'indanā.

ing them carefully.[302] They said to him, "What are you doing? Certainly you are engaged on some matter. What is your business?" [2965] [The rider] responded, "I am the envoy of the Commander of the Faithful to his governor in Egypt." So they searched him, and there was a letter framed in 'Uthmān's words, with his seal upon it, to his governor in Egypt. [It stated] that he should crucify them or slaughter them or have their hands and feet alternately cut off.[303] Then [the Egyptians] set out and came to Medina.

They came to 'Alī and said, "Did you not see that the enemy of God [namely, 'Uthmān] wrote such-and-such concerning us? Verily God has made his blood lawful! Rise up against him with us." ['Alī] said, "By God, I shall not rise up with you," until they said, "So why did you write us?" Then he said, "By God, I never wrote anything to you at all." Then they looked at one another, some saying to others, "Is it for this man that you are fighting, or on his account that you are angered?" So 'Alī departed and left Medina for a certain village.

They departed and entered 'Uthmān's presence, saying, "You wrote such-and-such concerning us." ['Uthmān] answered, "There are but two [alternatives]. Either you must produce two men from among the Muslims to bear witness against me, or [you must accept] my oath in the name of God, other than Whom there is no god, that I neither wrote nor dictated nor knew [of this letter]." He continued, "Perhaps you know that the letter is [falsely] ascribed to this man [that is, 'Uthmān himself], and it may be that the seal [on the letter] was forged."[304] They responded, "By God, God has made your blood lawful, and you have violated the pact and covenant [which you made with us]." And so they laid siege to him.

---

302. Cf. de Goeje, Introductio, cccxviii, dcxxviii.

303. An allusion to the Qur'ān 5:37: "This is the recompense of those who fight against God and His Messenger, and hasten about the earth to do corruption there: they shall be slaughtered, or crucified, or their hands and feet shall alternately be struck off, or they shall be banished from the land. That is a degradation for them in this world; and in the world to come awaits them a mighty chastisement."

304. The text of this somewhat puzzling statement reads as follows: wa-qad ta'lamūna anna 'l-kitāba yuktabu 'alā lisāni 'l-rajuli wa-qad yunqashu 'l-khātamu 'alā 'l-khātami. Caetani [Annali, VIII, 144] settles for a loose paraphrase.

As for al-Wāqidī, he has recounted many things concerning the reasons why the Egyptians went to 'Uthmān and made camp at Dhū Khushub. Among these are things that I have already mentioned, and there are others that I have refused to mention because I find them offensive. Among his various accounts, [al-[2966] Wāqidī] mentions that it was related to him by 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far—Abū 'Awn, the client of al-Miswar:[305] 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ had been 'Uthmān's governor ('āmil) in Egypt. Then he stripped him of authority over the tax revenues (kharāj) and put him in charge of the public prayers.[306] ('Uthmān) assigned authority over the tax revenues to 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd, and then combined both offices under 'Abdallāh. When 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ arrived in Medina, he launched vitriolic attacks upon 'Uthmān.

One day 'Uthmān sent for him and met with him alone. He said, "Ibn al-Nābighah, how quickly the neckhole of your gown has become louse-ridden! You faithfully carried out your duties as governor for a year previous [to this]. Do you attack me, bearing one countenance in my presence and another in my absence? By God, were it not for a morsel of food [proffered you by my enemies], you would not do that."[307] 'Amr replied, "Indeed much of what the people say and communicate to their rulers is falsehood. So fear God, O Commander of the Faithful, in regard to your subjects." 'Uthmān said, "By God, I appointed you as governor in spite of your faults and all the talk about you." 'Amr responded, "I was governor on behalf of 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, and at the time of his passing he was well satisfied with me."

'Uthmān said, "If I had controlled you as stringently as 'Umar did, by God, you would act rightly. But I have been lenient with you and so you have been insolent with me. By God, I possess greater glory than you through my next of kin in the Time of Ignorance and before I acquired my present authority." 'Amr replied, "Stop this! Praise be to God, who honored and guided us by 305. As in the preceding account, this one contains numerous editorial qālas, omitted in this translation.

---

306. That is, he left 'Amr as titular head of the Muslim community in Egypt; presumably he also continued to be commander-in-chief of the garrison stationed there.

307. Lawlā akālatun mā fa'alta dhālika. For the sense of this idiom see Lane, I, sub verbo akl.

Muḥammad. I saw [my father] al-'Āṣī b. Wā'il and I saw your father 'Affān, and by God al-'Āṣ was nobler than your father!" 'Uthmān was caught short and said, "Why should we be referring to the Time of Ignorance?"

'Amr departed, and Marwān entered and said, "O Commander of the Faithful, you have come to a state of things where 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ can talk about your father!" 'Uthmān replied, "Leave off! If [2967] a man mentions [other] men's fathers, they will mention his father."

Thus, 'Amr departed from 'Uthmān filled with hatred for him. At one point he came to 'Alī to incite him against 'Uthmān. Then he approached al-Zubayr and Ṭalḥah in succession to incite them. He confronted the Pilgrimage caravan to inform them of 'Uthmān's wrongful innovations. When 'Uthmān was besieged for the first time, ['Amr] went from Medina until he reached a property that he owned in Palestine called al-Sab', and took up residence in a castle of his named al-'Ajlān.[308] He would say, "It is wonderful what we hear about Ibn 'Affān."

While he was seated in that castle of his, with Salāmah b. Rawḥ al-Judhāmī and his two sons Muḥammad and 'Abdallāh, a rider passed by them. 'Amr called out to him. "Where have you come from?" "From Medina," he answered. ['Amr] said, "What has that man done?"—that is, 'Uthmān. [The rider] said, "I left him tightly besieged." 'Amr said, "I am Abū 'Abdallāh. Perhaps the jackass is breaking wind and the flatiron is in the fire."[309]

['Amr] had not left his seat before a second rider passed by. 'Amr called out to him, "What has that man done?"—that is, 'Uthmān. "He has been killed," he replied. ['Amr] said, "I am Abū 'Abdallāh. When I rub a scab, I scrape it off.[310] I have been inciting [people] against him, even the shepherd on the mountaintop with

308. According to Yāqūt (Mu'jam al-Buldān, II, 19), al-'Ajlān was an estate belonging to 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ and located in Bayt Jibrīn, a town situated about two-thirds of the way between Jerusalem and Gaza (i.e., 25 km. from the latter). Yāqūt says that this estate was named after a client of 'Amr's, but the name is probably an Arabization of Biblical Eglon, whose location fits his data very neatly.

309. A rather crude way of saying that the crisis is imminent and that 'Uthmān is too weak and frightened to oppose it effectively. See Lane, V, 1786, sub verbo ḍaraṭa, and Freytag, Arabum Proverbia, II, 248.

310. Freytag, Arabum Proverbia, I, 43, and Lane, II, 614, sub verbo ḥakka. The meaning is "When I desire an object I attain it."

his flock." Then Salāmah b. Rawḥ said to him, "O leaders of Quraysh, verily there was a strong gate between you and the Arabs and you have broken it down. Whatever led you to do [2968] that?" ('Amr) said, "We wanted to draw the truth out of the pit of falsehood and to have the people be on an equal footing as regards the truth."

'Uthmān's half-sister on his mother's side, Umm Kulthūm bt. 'Uqbah b. Abī Mu'ayṭ, used to dwell with 'Amr; then he separated from her when ('Uthmān) deposed him.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar (al-Wāqidī)—'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad—his father: Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr and Muḥammad b. Abī Ḥudhayfah were in Egypt inciting [people] against 'Uthmān. Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr came [to Medina], while Muḥammad b. Abī Ḥudhayfah remained in Egypt. When the Egyptians set out [for Medina], 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Udays al-Balawī took 500 (men) with him. Claiming that they intended to perform the Lesser Pilgrimage, they set out in Rajab (January 656). 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd [the governor of Egypt] dispatched a messenger who journeyed eleven nights to inform 'Uthmān that Ibn 'Udays and his comrades were heading toward him, and that Muḥammad b. Abī Ḥudhayfah had accompanied them as far as 'Ajrūd[311] and then turned back.

In public Muḥammad stated, "This band of men (qawm) has set out to perform the Lesser Pilgrimage." But in secret he said, "This band of men has set out to confront their imām. If he abdicates, [well and good], but otherwise they will kill him."

The dissidents (al-qawm) proceeded along the way stations [on the road to Medina], bypassing none of them until they established camp at Dhū Khushub. 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd's messenger having reached him before they arrived, 'Uthmān said, "This is a band of Egyptians who claim to be performing the Lesser Pilgrimage. By God, I do not believe that is their intention. On the contrary, the people have been taken in by them, and they hasten toward rebellion (fitnah). They feel that my life has lasted too long. But by God, if I depart from them, they will wish that every [2969] day of my life had lasted a year, on account of the bloodshed, the

311. 'Ajrūd: a locale that I have been unable to find.

ancient hatreds, the blatant selfishness, and the overturned commandments that they will witness."

When the dissidents established their camp at Dhū Khushub, the news spread that they intended to kill 'Uthmān if he did not abdicate. At night their envoy came to 'Alī, Ṭalḥah, and 'Ammār b. Yāsir successively. Muḥammad b. Abī Ḥudhayfah had joined them in writing a letter to 'Alī; they brought this to 'Alī, but he did not examine its contents. When 'Uthmān perceived all this, he came to 'Alī. He entered his house and said, "O cousin, nothing owed to me can be neglected; my kinship [with you] is close, and I have a strong claim upon your support. You see the trouble caused by this band of dissidents when they came to me today.[312] I know that you enjoy prestige among the people and that they will listen to you. I want you to ride out to them and send them away from me. I do not wish them to come before me, for that would be an insolent act toward me on their part. Let others hear of this as well."

'Alī said, "On what grounds shall I send them away?" ('Uthmān) replied, "On the grounds that I shall carry out what you have counseled me to do and thought right, and that I will not deviate from your direction." Then 'Alī said, "In fact I have spoken to you time after time, and you and I have discussed such matters at length.[313] All this is the doing of Marwān b. al-Ḥakam, Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ, Ibn 'Āmir, and Mu'āwiyah. You have heeded them and defied me." 'Uthmān said, "Then I shall defy them and heed you."

('Alī) thus issued orders to the people, and both Emigrants and Helpers rode forth with him [to meet with the dissidents].

'Uthmān sent to 'Ammār b. Yāsir, telling him to set forth with 'Alī, but he refused. Then 'Uthmān sent to Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ and told him that he should go to 'Ammār and direct him to ride out with 'Alī. Sa'd set out and entered 'Ammār's presence. He said, "O [2970] Abū al-Yaqẓān, will you not go forth with the others, all the more as ʿAlī is going? Set out with him, then, and drive these dissidents away from your imām, for I reckon that you will take no ride more beneficial to you than this one."

312. Wa-qad jā'a mā tarā min hā'ulā'i 'l-qawmi wa-hum muṣabbiḥiyya.

313. A paraphrase, since the original seems to defeat an exact rendering: Fa-qāla 'Aliyyun innī qad kuntu kallamtuka marratan ba'da marratin fa-kulla dhālika nakhruju fa-tukallamu wa-naqūlu wa-taqūlu.

ʿUthmān sent to Kathīr b. al-Ṣalt al-Kindī, who was one of his loyal supporters (aʿwān), and said, "Follow close behind Saʿd and listen to what he and ʿAmmār say to each other; then come right back to me." Kathīr set out and found Saʿd meeting privately with ʿAmmār in the latter's home. He put his eye up to the keyhole in the door. Without knowing who was there, ʿAmmār came over to him with a staff in his hand and inserted it into the keyhole where Kathīr had placed his eye. Kathīr jerked his eye away from the hole, turned tail, and fled, covering his face. Then ʿAmmār came out, recognized his footprints, and shouted, "You runt, son of a runt's mother, were you spying on me and listening to my conversation? By God, had I known it was you, I would have poked out your eye with this staff, for the Messenger of God permitted that." Then ʿAmmār returned to Saʿd, and Saʿd spoke with him and began trying by every means to turn him away [from his previous opinions]. But the end result of this was that ʿAmmār said, "By God, I shall never drive (the dissidents) away from ('Uthmān)." Then Saʿd returned to ʿUthmān and informed him of what ʿAmmār had said. ʿUthmān suspected that Saʿd was not giving him sincere advice; Saʿd therefore swore an oath to him in God's name that ('Ammār) had tried to incite [him against the caliph], and ʿUthmān accepted [this] from him.

ʿAlī rode out to the Egyptians and sent them away from ('Uthmān); and they departed and headed back [toward Egypt].

[2971] According to Muḥammad b. ʿUmar (al-Wāqidī)—Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ—ʿĀṣim b. ʿUmar—Maḥmūd b. Labīd: When (the Egyptians) established their camp at Dhū Khushub, ʿUthmān told ʿAlī and the Companions of the Messenger of God to send them away from him. So ʿAlī rode out with a few of the Emigrants, among them Saʿīd b. Zayd, Abū Jahm al-ʿAdawī, Jubayr b. Muṭʿim, Ḥakīm b. Ḥizām, Marwān b. al-Ḥakam (sic!), Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣ, and ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAttāb b. Asīd. The Helpers who set out included Abū Usayd al-Sāʿidī, Abū Ḥumayd al-Sāʿidī, Zayd b. Thābit, Ḥassān b. Thābit, and Kaʿb b. Mālik; they were accompanied by Niyār b. Mikraz from among the Bedouin. Beside these there were thirty other men. ʿAlī and Muḥammad b. Maslamah, in their position as leaders [of the Medinan delegation], spoke to [the dissidents], and these listened to their statement and turned back.

According to Maḥmūd [b. Labīd]—Muḥammad b. Maslamah:[314] We did not leave Dhū Khushub until they had set out on their journey back to Egypt. They began to say their farewells to me, and I [namely, Muḥammad b. Maslamah] shall not forget the statement of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿUdays: "O Abū ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, do you enjoin anything upon us?" I responded, "You should fear God alone, Who has no partner,[315] and you should send those around you away from their imām, for he has promised us that he will return [to what is good] and desist [from what is evil]." Ibn ʿUdays said, "I shall, God willing." Thus, the delegation (qawm) returned to Medina.

According to Muḥammad b. ʿUmar [al-Wāqidī]—ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad—his father: When ʿAlī returned to ʿUthmān, he informed him that they had gone and said to him some things which were on his mind. He said to him, "Know that I am saying more about you than I have said previously." Then he went home. [2972] ʿUthmān remained at home that day, until Marwān came to him the next day and said, "Speak and inform the people that the Egyptians have gone back, and that what they had heard about their imām was false. Your sermon (khuṭbah) will spread throughout the lands before the people can gather against you from their garrison towns [in such numbers] that you are unable to fend them off." ʿUthmān refused to go out, but Marwān kept after him until he went forth and took his seat upon the pulpit.

[ʿUthmān] praised and extolled God, and then said: "To proceed: As to this band of Egyptians, a certain matter concerning their imām had come to their attention. But when they were certain that what they had heard about was false they returned to their own land." Then from one side of the mosque ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ called out to him: "Fear God, O ʿUthmān, for you have borne great dangers, as we have done along with you. Turn to God, and we shall turn to Him!" ʿUthmān shouted back, "So you are over there, Ibn al-Nābighah. By God, your robe has become louse-

314. In the following report numerous editorial *qāla*s have been omitted.
315. Qur'ān 6:163.

ridden since I removed you from office." From another direction someone else shouted, "Turn to God and show repentance. Then the people will restrain themselves from you." 'Uthmān stretched out his hands and turned to face the qiblah, saying, "O God, verily I am the first to repent." Then he went back to his house, while 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ proceeded to his residence in Palestine. ('Amr) used to say, "By God, if I were to run across a shepherd I would incite him against ('Uthmān)."

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar (al-Wāqidī)—'Alī b. 'Umar—his father: 'Alī came to 'Uthmān after the Egyptians had gone and said to him: "Make a statement which the people will testify that [2973] they have heard from you, and God will be witness as to whether or not you desire to repent in your heart.[316] The provinces are in turmoil against you, and I fear another company of riders may come from Kūfah. You will say, 'Alī, ride out to meet them,' but I cannot go out and get [them] to listen to any excuse. Still other riders will come from Baṣrah, and you will say, 'O 'Alī, ride out to meet them.' If I do not do that, you will think I have betrayed our bonds of kinship and belittled your claims [on me]."

Thus, 'Uthmān went out and preached the sermon in which he laid before the people his heartfelt desire to repent. He arose, praising and extolling God as He merits, and then said: "To proceed: By God, O people, if any one of you has censured [me], he has not done so for anything that is unknown to me. I have done nothing unknowingly. But my soul has raised vain hopes within me and lied to me, and my rectitude has slipped away from me. I heard the Messenger of God say, 'Let him who slips repent, and let him who errs turn back and not persist in his own ruin. Verily he who persists in tyranny is very far from the true path.' Now I am the first to take warning. I ask God's forgiveness for what I have done and I turn to Him. A man like me yearns to repent. When I step down [from the pulpit], let your notables (ashrāf) come to me and inform me of their opinion. By God, if the truth turns me into a slave, then I shall tread the slave's path, I shall humble myself like a slave, and I shall be like the bondsman. If he is held in servitude, he shows patience; if he is set free, he is grateful. There is no escape from God save by returning to Him.

316. *Wa-yashhadu Allāhu 'alā mā fī qalbika min 'l-nuzū'i wa'l-ināba*ti.

The best men among you will not fail to draw near me. If my right hand refuses, then my left hand will surely obey me."[317] [2974]

Then the people had pity on him, and some among them wept. Sa'īd b. Zayd stood up before him and said, "O Commander of the Faithful, no one comes to you who does not support you. Fear God, in your soul fear God, and fulfill what you have said!"

When 'Uthmān descended [from the pulpit], he found Marwān (b. al-Ḥakam), Sa'īd (b. al-'Āṣ), and a few of the Banū Umayyah at his home. They had not been present at the sermon, and when ('Uthmān) took his seat, Marwān said, "O Commander of the Faithful, shall I speak or remain silent?" Then Nā'ilah bt. al-Farāfiṣah, 'Uthmān's wife from the Kalb tribe, said, "Nay, be silent, for they will kill him and accuse him of sin; he has made a public statement from which he cannot rightfully withdraw." Then Marwān came up to her and said, "What does this have to do with you? By God, your father died without knowing how to perform the ablutions correctly." "Go easy, Marwān," she responded, "in mentioning our fathers. You speak lies about my absent father. Indeed your father cannot defend himself [against similar charges]. By God, were (your father) not ('Uthmān's) uncle and would (the caliph) not be distressed, I would tell no lies in informing you about (your father)."

Then Marwān turned away from her and said, "O Commander of the Faithful, shall I speak or be silent?" ('Uthmān) answered, "No, speak." Marwān said, "You are as dear to me as my father and my mother! By God, I wish that you had made this statement [before the people] while you were still strong and invincible, and that I had been the first to be satisfied by it and to aid [you] in fulfilling it. However, you have said these things when the girth has reached the two teats and the torrent has overflowed the hilltops and when a humiliated man has submitted to humiliation.[318] By God, to persist in an error for which you must seek God's forgiveness is better than to repent because you are afraid. [2975]

317. The meaning is that he will force himself to submit to their judgment, however bitter he may find it to do so.

318. The first two clauses are proverbial, meaning that the affair had become distressing and surpassed normal limits. See Freytag, Arabum Proverbia, I, 151, 293; Lane, Lexicon, III, 1215; V, 1830. The last clause is explained in de Goeje, Introductio, cccIxvii.

If you so will, you may seek repentance without acknowledging error. The people have piled up at the gate against you like a mountain." 'Uthmān said, "Go out and speak to them, for I am ashamed to do so."

So Marwān went to the gate, where the people were clambering on top of one another. He said, "Why have you gathered here like looters? Your faces are deformed, and every man is holding the ear of his confederate! Whom are you after? You have come to snatch our power (mulk)[319] from us. Go! By God, if you mean us [any harm], you will encounter something distasteful from us,[320] and you will not praise the result of your opinions. Return to your homes, for by God we are not men to be robbed of our possessions."

[2976] The people retreated, and one of them went to see 'Alī and informed him of the news. Then 'Alī came in a rage to 'Uthmān and said, "Surely you have satisfied Marwān, but he is satisfied with you only if you deviate from your religion and reason, like a camel carrying a litter that is led around at will. By God, Marwān is devoid of sense in regard to his religion and his soul. I swear by God, I think he will bring you in and then not send you out again. After this visit I will not come again to chide you. You have destroyed your own honor and you have been robbed of your authority (amr)."

When 'Alī departed, ('Uthmān's) wife Nā'ilah bt. al-Farāfiṣah entered and said, "Shall I speak or remain silent?" "Speak," he replied. She said, "I have heard what 'Alī said to you, that he will not return to you, and that you have obeyed Marwān, who leads you wherever he wishes." ('Uthmān) said, "What shall I do?" She responded, "You should fear God alone, Who has no partner, and you should adhere to the practice of your two predecessors [namely, Abū Bakr and 'Umar]. For if you obey Marwān he will kill you. Marwān enjoys no prestige among the people and inspires neither awe nor love. The people have only abandoned you due to Marwān's place [in your councils]. Send to 'Alī, then, and

319. Or, "our possessions." But "kingship, rulership" seems to fit the context a bit better.

320. Amā wa'llāhi la-in rumtumūnā la-yamurranna 'alaykum minnā amrun lā yasurrukum.

trust in his honesty and uprightness. He is related to you, and he is not a man whom people disobey." So 'Uthmān sent to 'Alī, but he refused to come, saying, "I told him I would not return."

Having learned of Nā'ilah's comments about him, Marwān came to 'Uthmān and took a seat before him. He said, "Shall I speak or remain silent?" "Speak," replied ['Uthmān]. [Marwān] began, "The daughter of al-Farāfiṣah. . . ." 'Uthmān said, "You [2977] are not to say a thing about her! How evil is your countenance! By God, she is a better adviser to me than you are." With this Marwān desisted.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar [al-Wāqidī]—Shuraḥbīl b. Abī 'Awn—his father: I heard 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Aswad b. 'Abd Yaghūth mention Marwān b. al-Ḥakam. He said: May God disfigure Marwān! 'Uthmān went out to the people and gave them satisfaction. He wept as he stood on the pulpit, and the people wept also, until I saw his beard soaked with tears. He was saying, "O God, I turn to Thee in repentance. O God, I repent, I repent! By God, if it is right for me to become a mere slave, I will be content with that. When I enter my house, all of you come before me, and by God I will not seclude myself from you. On the contrary, I will give you satisfaction in full measure and more, and I will send Marwān and his kin away."

When ['Uthmān] entered [his house], he commanded that the gate be thrown open. When he went into his house, Marwān came to him and worked ceaselessly to delude him, until at last he beguiled him from his better judgment and eradicated his original intentions. For three days 'Uthmān stayed inside and would not go out, for he was ashamed to face the people. Then Marwān went out to the people and said, "May your faces be deformed! Whom are you after? Go back to your homes. If the Commander of the Faithful needs any of you, he will send for him. Otherwise, he will remain in his house."

'Abd al-Raḥmān continues: So I came to 'Alī, and found him [in the mosque] between the [Prophet's] grave and the pulpit.[321] With 321. The principal mosque of Medina was originally the courtyard of the Prophet's own dwelling. When he died he was buried in one corner of the structure. The pulpit stands more or less in the middle on the same side of the mosque. See J. Sauvaget, La mosquée omeyyade de Médine (Paris, 1947).

[2978] him were 'Ammār b. Yāsir and Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr, and they were saying, "Marwān has acted badly toward the people." 'Alī came over to me and asked, "Were you present at 'Uthmān's sermon?" "Yes," I said. 'Alī went on, "And were you present when Marwān spoke to the people?" "Yes," I answered. 'Alī said, "God forbid, O Muslims, that if I remain in my house, he should accuse me of abandoning him in spite of his kinship [with me] and his rights. And God forbid that if I speak [to him] and things turn out as he desires, Marwān would trick him[322] and he would become like a captured beast driven by him at will—[all this] despite his advanced age and his having been a Companion of the Messenger of God."

'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Aswad continues: ['Alī] kept on until 'Uthmān's envoy arrived and said, "Come with me." 'Alī responded in a loud, angry voice, "Tell him that I will not come before him again."The messenger departed. I tried without success to meet with 'Uthmān two nights later. I asked his servant where the Commander of the Faithful had been, and he said, "He was with 'Alī."

'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Aswad continues: So I took my leave and paid a visit to 'Alī. He said to me, "'Uthmān came to me yesterday and began to accuse me of refusing to see him again and of working [against him]. So I said to him, 'After what you said on the pulpit of the Messenger of God, and after [the promises] you gave [2979] of your own free will, you entered your house, and Marwān went out before the people, reviling and insulting them at your gate.'"

"['Uthmān] responded, saying, 'You have severed the bonds of kinship with me. You have abandoned me and emboldened the people against me.' I [that is, 'Alī] replied, 'By God, I am your strongest defender against the people. But whenever I have brought to you any matter that I think you will find agreeable, [Marwān] brings another. You have heard Marwān speak against me and have invited him to enter your presence.'" Then he left and went home.

'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Aswad continues: I constantly saw 'Alī avoiding ['Uthmān] and not acting as he formerly had. However, I know that he spoke with Ṭalḥah when ('Uthmān) was under siege, to the effect that waterskins should be taken to him. ('Alī) was extremely upset about that, until at last waterskins were brought in to 'Uthmān.

322. The reading of this passage is uncertain: In takallamtu fa-jā'a mā yurīdu yal'ab bihi Marwānu.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar (al-Wāqidī)—'Abdallāh b. Ja'far—Ismā'īl b. Muḥammad: 'Uthmān stood upon the pulpit on Friday, and praised and extolled God. Then a man stood up and said, "Carry out the Book of God." 'Uthmān said, "Sit down." He did so. Three times he stood up, 'Uthmān ordered him to sit down, and he did so. Then they began throwing pebbles until the sky could not be seen. ('Uthmān) fell from the pulpit and was carried off unconscious to his house. One of 'Uthmān's chamberlains (ḥujjāb) went out carrying a copy of the Qur'ān and crying out, "Those who have made divisions in their religion and become sects, I am not of them in anything; their affair is unto God."[323] Then 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib entered 'Uthmān's presence while he was still unconscious and the Banū Umayyah were around him. ('Alī) said, "Why, O Commander of the Faithful, have the Banū Umayyah drawn round you like a belt?" They responded, "O 'Alī, you have destroyed us and have brought ill to the Commander of the Faithful. Yea, by God, if you achieve your aims, [2980 then this world will surely become a bitter place for you." Then 'Alī rose up full of anger.

In this year, 'Uthmān b. 'Affān was killed.

The Account of the Murder [of 'Uthmān]

According to Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī): In this year, 'Uthmān b. 'Affān was killed. We have mentioned many of the reasons that his murderers cited as an excuse for killing him, and we have avoided mentioning many others that should not be included here. We will now describe how he was killed, how and through whom it began, and who was the first to treat him audaciously before he was murdered.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umār al-Wāqidī—'Abdallāh b. Ja'far—Umm Bakr bt. al-Miswar b. Makhramah—her father:

323. A variant version of Qur'ān 6:160. The text is usually read "thou [that is, Muḥammad] art not of them in anything."

Some camels were brought to 'Uthmān as legal alms (ṣadaqah), and he made a gift of them to one of the Banū al-Ḥakam.[324] Having learned of this, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf sent to al-Miswar b. Makhramah and 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Aswad b. 'Abd Yaghūth. They took the camels, and 'Abd al-Raḥmān (b. 'Awf) then distributed them among the people while 'Uthmān stayed at home.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar (al-Wāqidī)—Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ—'Ubaydallāh b. Rāfi' b. Naqākhah[325]—'Uthmān b. al-[2981] Sharīd: 'Uthmān passed Jabalah b. 'Amr al-Sā'idī as he sat in his courtyard holding a rope. Jabalah said, "You hyena. By God, I shall kill you. I shall carry you off on a scab-covered camel and send you to blazing fire." Another time, when 'Uthmān was standing on the pulpit, Jabalah forced him to get off.

It was related to me by Muḥammad (al-Wāqidī)[326]—Abū Bakr b. Ismā'īl—his father—'Āmir b. Sa'd: The first man who dared to insult 'Uthmān was Jabalah b. 'Amr al-Sā'idī. Once while he was sitting among his kinsmen holding a rope in his hand, 'Uthmān passed by him. 'Uthmān greeted them as he was passing by, and they greeted him in return. Then Jabalah said, "Why do you answer a man who did such-and-such a thing?" Jabalah then approached 'Uthmān and said, "By God, I will throw this rope around your neck unless you abandon your personal entourage (biṭānah)." "What entourage," asked 'Uthmān? "By God, I do not choose favorites among the people." (Jabalah) answered, "Marwān, and Mu'āwiyah, and 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir b. Kurayz, and 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd—all of these you have favored. Among them are men who are condemned in the Qur'ān, men whose blood the Messenger of God has declared lawful." 'Uthmān departed, and the people have continued to talk spitefully about him to this day.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar (al-Wāqidī)—Ibn Abī al-

---

324. The Banū al-Ḥakam (the clan from which Marwān stemmed) were of course among the most obdurate opponents of the Prophet. Their association with any act is usually enough to taint it in the eyes of the pious.

325. Perhaps "Nafākhah" or "Nuffākhah." See text, 2980, note f.

326. Ḥaddathanī Muḥammadun. Presumably he means al-Wāqidī, but there is a difficulty. The term ḥaddathanī normally indicates direct oral transmission. However, al-Wāqidī died in 207/823 and so could not have passed this anecdote on to Ṭabarī in that manner.

Zinād—Mūsā b. 'Uqbah—Abū Ḥabībah: One day 'Uthmān was [2982] preaching to the people when 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ said, "O Commander of the Faithful, you have incurred grave dangers, and we have incurred them with you. Repent, and we shall repent." 'Uthmān turned in the direction of Mecca and raised his arms in supplication. Abū Ḥabībah states: I have never seen more men and women weeping than on that day. Afterwards, as 'Uthmān preached to the people, Jahjāh al-Ghifārī came up to him and cried, "'Uthmān, we have brought this old she-camel, and on it there are a robe and a rope. Get down! We will dress you in the robe, throw the rope around your neck, carry you off on the camel, and then throw you into the mountain of smoke." 'Uthmān replied, "May God disfigure you and reveal the ugliness of your deeds." Abū Ḥabībah states: All this happened in front of the people.[327] Then 'Uthmān's favorites and partisans among the Banū Umayyah came up to him and took him home. Abū Ḥabībah states: It was the last I saw of him.

According to Muḥammad (al-Wāqidī)—Usāmah b. Zayd al-Laythī—Yaḥyā b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ḥāṭib—his father: I was watching 'Uthmān as he preached leaning on the Prophet's staff—the staff on which (the Prophet), Abū Bakr, and 'Umar used to lean while they preached. Jahjāh said to him, "You hyena, get down off this pulpit!" Seizing the staff, Jahjāh broke it over his right knee. A wood splinter pierced (the knee), and the wound remained open for so long that it became infected with gangrene, [2983] and I saw it swarming with maggots. 'Uthmān descended from the pulpit and was taken away. He ordered the staff to be repaired, and it was bound together with a strip of iron. From that day until he was besieged and killed, 'Uthmān went out only one or two times.

It was related to me by Aḥmad b. Ibrāhīm—'Abdallāh b. Idrīs—'Ubaydallāh b. 'Umar—Nāfi': Jahjāh al-Ghifārī seized a staff that 'Uthmān was holding and broke it over his knee, and (Jahjāh) was stricken with gangrene in that place.

It was related to me by Ja'far b. 'Abdallāh al-Muḥammadī—'Amr—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq b. Yasār al-Madanī[328]—his paternal 327. Wa-lam yakun dhālika minhu illā 'an mala'in min 'l-nāsi.

328. Ibn Isḥāq is of course most famous for his Sīrat Rasūl Allāh, but he also uncle ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Yasār: When the people saw what ʿUthmān was doing, the Companions of the Prophet in Medina wrote to the Companions who were scattered throughout the frontier provinces: "You have gone forth but to struggle in the path of Almighty God, for the sake of Muḥammad's religion. In your absence the religion of Muḥammad has been corrupted and forsaken. Come then and reestablish Muḥammad's religion." Thus, they came from every direction until they killed (ʿUthmān). When the people turned around to go back after ʿUthmān claimed he had repented, he wrote a letter to ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿd b. Abī Sarḥ, his governor (ʿāmil) in Egypt, concerning those who had come from Egypt, for they were the most hostile to him of all the provincial garrisons: "To proceed: Look for so-and-so and so-and-so, and behead them if they come to you. Look also for certain [2984] other men, and punish them in such-and-such a way." These persons included a few of the Companions of the Messenger of God as well as a body of the Successors. His envoy on this occasion was Abū al-Aʿwar b. Sufyān al-Sulamī. ʿUthmān mounted him on one of his camels and ordered him to get to Egypt before the dissidents (al-qawm) arrived. Abū al-Aʿwar overtook the Egyptians along the road, and they asked him where he was going. "To Egypt," he replied, and he was accompanied by a Syrian from Khawlān. When they saw him on ʿUthmān's camel, they said, "Are you carrying a letter?" "No," he said. "Why were you sent," they asked. "I don't know," he responded. "You are not carrying a letter," they said, "and you do not know why you were sent. Your situation is suspicious." Then they searched him and found a letter in an empty waterskin. Upon examining the letter, they discovered that some of them were to be executed and others were to be punished in their persons and property. When they saw this they returned to Medina. The people learned about their return and what had happened to them. They came back from all the provinces, and the Medinese rose up in rebellion.

It was related to me by Jaʿfar—ʿAmr and ʿAlī—Ḥusayn—his composed a Taʾrīkh al-Khulafāʾ. Ṭabarī cites it only rarely, but a papyrus fragment—dealing with the murder of ʿUmar and the appointment of the electoral council—does survive. This fragment has been studied by Nabia Abbott, Studies in Arabic Literary Papyri, I: Historical Texts (Chicago: 1957), pp. 80–99. See also J. M. B. Jones, "Ibn Isḥāḳ," *EI*², III, 810–11.

---

father—Muḥammad b. Sā'ib al-Kalbī: The Egyptians returned to 'Uthmān after having departed from him because a slave (ghulām) of his, riding one of his camels, overtook them carrying a letter to the governor (amīr) of Egypt [with orders] to kill some of them and crucify others. When they came back to 'Uthmān they said, "This is your slave." He said, "My slave went without my knowledge." They said, "[It is] your camel." He responded, "He took it from the house without my orders." They said, "[This is] your seal." "It was forged," he said.

When the Egyptians arrived, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Udays al-Tujībī said:

They [fem.][329] came from Bilbays and Upper Egypt, long-necked, their eyes squinting like bows,
Their flanks covered in chain mail. [2985]
They [fem.] demand God's due from al-Walīd, from
'Uthmān and from Sa'īd.
O Lord, send us back with what we seek!

When 'Uthmān saw what had happened to him and how many of the people had been sent against him, he wrote Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān in Syria: "In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. To proceed: The Medinese have become unbelievers; they have abandoned obedience and renounced their oath of allegiance. Therefore send to me the Syrian soldiers who are at your disposal, on every camel you have, whether docile or stubborn." When Mu'āwiyah got the letter, he delayed action on it, for he did not wish to differ openly with the Companions of the Messenger of God, since he knew that they concurred [on this matter]. When 'Uthmān became aware of the delay, he wrote to seek aid from Yazīd b. Asad b. Kurz and the Syrians; he stressed his rightful claims upon them, and mentioned Almighty God's commandment to obey the caliphs, to give them sincere counsel, and to promise them the support of an army or personal entourage (biṭānah) against the people [as a whole]. He reminded them of what he had endured with them and his good treatment of them. [He said:] "If you can aid me, then hurry, hurry. For the dissidents (qawm) are making haste against me." When his letter was read 329. Camels are meant.

out to them, Yazīd b. Asad b. Kurz, of the clan of Qasr in the tribe of Bajīlah, stood up. He praised and extolled God, and then spoke about 'Uthmān, stressing his rightful claims [upon them] and urging them to go to his aid. He commanded them to set out, and a great number heeded him and went with him until, having learned at Wādī al-Qurā[330] of 'Uthmān's murder, they returned.

'Uthmān also wrote 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir a copy of his letter to the Syrians, commanding him to send the Baṣrans to him. 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir assembled the people and read 'Uthmān's letter to them. Speakers from among the Baṣrans stood up, urging him to go to [2986] 'Uthmān's aid. The first among them who spoke was Mujāshi' b. Mas'ūd al-Sulamī, at that time the chief (sayyid) of the Qays tribe in Baṣrah. Qays b. al-Haytham al-Sulamī also arose and exhorted the people to support 'Uthmān. The people hastened to do that, and 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir put Mujāshi' b. Mas'ūd in command of them. Mujāshi' led them out, but when the people made camp at al-Rabadhah—the vanguard having located in a district of Medina named Ṣirār—they learned of 'Uthmān's murder.

It was related to me by Ja'far—'Amr and 'Alī—Ḥusayn—his father—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq b. Yasār al-Madanī—Yaḥyā b. 'Abbād b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr[331]—his father: The Egyptians in al-Suqyā or Dhū Khushub wrote a letter to 'Uthmān. One of them brought it to 'Uthmān, who did not reply in any way, but ordered him to be ejected from the house. Then six hundred Egyptians marched on 'Uthmān. They were divided into four brigades, and the commander of each carried a banner. The overall command was in the hands of 'Amr b. Budayl b. Warqā' al-Khuzā'ī, one of the Companions of the Prophet, and 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Udays al-Tujībī. Their letter to ['Uthmān] contained [the following statements]:

"In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. To proceed: Know that 'God changes not what is in a people, until 330. Wādī al-Qurā ("The Valley of Towns") is a long depression stretching northwest from Medina, roughly parallel to the Red Sea coast. As the name implies, several major oasis settlements of the Ḥijāz are located there, and the principal trade route to Syria likewise traversed it.

331. The text reads Yaḥyā b. 'Abbād 'an 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr. I have followed de Goeje's emendation: Introductio, dcxxix.

they change what is in themselves.'[332] So fear God, fear God! You are in a transitory world, and you must seek its fulfillment in a world to come. Do not forget your share in the world to come, and be not tempted by this present life. Know, by God, that we have [2987] been angered for God's sake, and that we find satisfaction in God. Know that we will not remove our swords from our shoulders until you come to us either with frank and unambiguous repentance or with outright falsehood. This is our statement to you, and this is our case against you. God will excuse us for our actions against you. Peace."

The Medinese wrote to 'Uthmān, calling on him to repent, and swearing by God that they would not desist until they killed him or he fulfilled his God-ordained obligations to them.

When ['Uthmān] feared he would be killed, he consulted his advisers and the members of his family (ahl baytihi) and said, "You see what the dissidents (qawm) have done. What is the way out?" They counseled him to send for 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib and to ask him to turn the people away by granting their requests in order to stall them until reinforcements could get to him. 'Uthmān replied, "The dissidents will not be put off. My promises were empty and I did nothing the first time they came.[333] If I give them my promise again they will demand that I fulfill it." Marwān b. al-Ḥakam said, "O Commander of the Faithful, dealing discreetly with them until you gain strength is preferable to struggling with them at close range. Give them what they ask and put them off so long as they delay in regard to you. They rebelled against you, so they possess no binding commitment [from you]."

'Uthmān sent for 'Alī, and when 'Alī arrived he said to him, "Abū Ḥasan, you see what the people have done and you know what I have done. I fear they may kill me. Send them away from me, and I swear to God that I shall requite them for everything they detest, and I will grant them justice against me or anyone else, even if my own blood be shed thereby." 'Alī said, "The people desire your justice more than your death. I see a band of 332. Qur'an 13:12.

333. Wahā maḥmilī 'ahdan wa-qad kāna minnī fī qadmatihim 'l-ūlā mā kāna. See de Goeje, Introductio, ccii, sub verbo ḥamala; and dcxxix.

men (qawm) who will be content only with full satisfaction.
[2988] When they first came to you, you gave them your promise in God's name that you would turn back from everything that they denounced, and thus you [were able to] send them away. Then you failed to carry out any of that. Do not tempt me with anything this time, for I will give them justice against you." "Yes," said 'Uthmān. "Give them justice, and by God I will carry it out in full."

So 'Alī went out to the people and said, "O people, you have demanded justice and [now] it is granted to you. 'Uthmān claims that he will do you justice, whether it be against himself or anyone else, and that he will abandon everything that you detest. Accept this from him and affirm it." The people answered, "We accept it. Make a compact with him for us, for by God, we will not be content with words instead of deeds." 'Alī said to them, "You will have it." Then he entered 'Uthmān's presence and told him the news.

'Uthmān said, "Arrange a delay between them and me so that I will have time to act, for I cannot do away with the things they detest in one day." 'Alī responded, "There can be no delay concerning matters here in Medina. As to matters elsewhere, you may delay as long as it takes your orders to get there." 'Uthmān said, "All right, but give me a delay of three days for affairs in Medina." 'Alī agreed. Then he went to the people and informed them of this. He wrote out a document between (the people) and 'Uthmān that gave him a three-day grace period to do away with every injustice and remove every governor whom they disliked. Then he bound him in this document as tightly as God had ever bound one of His creatures by compact or covenant. ('Alī) had (the document) witnessed by a body of the leading Emigrants and Helpers.

Thus, the people turned back from ('Uthmān) and withdrew until he should fulfill the promises that he had freely given them. But ('Uthmān) began preparing for war and gathering arms. He had already formed a strong army from among the slaves acquired as part of the caliph's one-fifth share.[334] When the three days had passed and he had done nothing to alter anything which was hateful to the people or to remove any governor, they revolted against him.

334. Wa-qad ittakhadha jundan 'aẓīman min raqīqi 'l-khums. On the one-fifth share of booty paid to the caliph, see above, note 30.

'Amr b. Ḥazm al-Anṣārī went out to the Egyptians in Dhū Khushub and informed them of the situation. He proceeded with them to Medina, where they sent to 'Uthmān and said, "Did we not leave you when you claimed that you had repented of your unlawful innovations (aḥdāth) and turned away from things hateful to us? Have you not given us a compact and covenant before God?" He answered, "I have indeed, and I hold to that." Then ('Amr b. Ḥazm) said, "So what is this letter that we found in the possession of your messenger, written by you to your governor?" ('Uthmān) responded, "I did not write it, and I don't know what you are talking about." They said, "It was your messenger on your camel, a letter [written] by your secretary and bearing your seal."[335] ('Uthmān) replied, "As for the camel, it was stolen. [One man's] handwriting may resemble [another's]. As to the seal, it was forged." [2989]

They said, "We will not act precipitously even though we suspect you. Remove from us your sinful governors and appoint others over us who are not accused [of taking] our lives and property. Respond to our grievances." 'Uthmān said, "How do I look if I name officials whom you desire and remove those hateful to you? Authority (al-amr) would then belong to you." They said, "By God, you must either do [what you promised], abdicate, or be killed. See to things yourself or leave [them to us]." But he refused, saying, "I am not one to remove a robe that God has placed upon me." So they besieged him for forty nights, and in the meantime Ṭalḥah led the people in worship.

It was related to me by Ya'qūb b. Ibrāhīm—Ismā'īl b. Ibrāhīm—Ibn 'Awn—al-Ḥasan—Waththāb. According to (al-Ḥasan): (Waththāb) was one of those manumitted by the Commander of the Faithful 'Umar, and I saw on his throat the scars of two stab wounds, like a pair of leather thongs, which he had suffered on the Day of the House. According to (Waththāb): 'Uthmān sent me to summon al-Ashtar and he came.[336]

335. In other reports, 'Uthmān's secretary is identified as Marwān b. al-Ḥakam. For barīd as "messenger," see above, note 289.

336. Mālik b. al-Ḥārith al-Nakha'ī, nicknamed al-Ashtar. See L. Veccia Vaglieri, Ibn ʿAwn thinks that Waththāb went on as follows: I laid down a cushion for the Commander of the Faithful and another for [al-Ashtar]. Then ([ʿUthmān] said, "Ashtar, what do the people want from me?" "You cannot avoid doing one of three things," he said. "What are they?" asked ([ʿUthmān]. [Al-Ashtar] said, "They ask [2990] you to choose between [the following]. You may turn their affairs over to them and say, 'This is your affair; choose whomever you will for it.' Second, you may have yourself punished. If you reject these two choices, then this band of men (qawm) will kill you." ([ʿUthmān] replied, "As for my turning their affairs over to them, I am not one to remove a robe that Almighty God has placed upon me."

According to [Ibn ʿAwn], other authorities beside [Waththāb] report [the following statement]: "By God, I would rather be brought out and beheaded than remove a shirt that God has placed upon me. I would be abandoning Muḥammad's Community to civil war." According to Ibn ʿAwn, this more closely resembles what he said. [Continuing ʿUthmān's statement:] "As for having myself punished, by God, you know that two of my associates were punished before me, and my body cannot endure punishment.[337] As for your killing me, by God, if you kill me you will never again have love for one another, nor will you ever pray together again, nor will you ever be united in fighting an enemy."

Al-Ashtar rose and hurried away, while we remained there for some days. Then a little man came like a wolf, peered in through the door, and then left. Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr came with thirteen men and went up to ʿUthmān. He seized his beard and shook it[338] until I heard his teeth chattering. [Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr] said, "Muʿāwiyah was no help to you, nor was Ibn ʿĀmir nor your letters." ([ʿUthmān] said, "Let go of my beard, son of my brother! Let go of my beard!" Then I saw [Ibn Abī Bakr] signaling with his

---

"Al-Ashtar," *EI*², I, 704. He was a tribal leader in Kūfah, and one of the bitterest opponents of the governor Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣ. See above: pp. 112–21, 125, 132–35 [text, I, 2907–2917, 2921, 2927–2931]. He was one of ʿAlī's most ardent supporters until his death in 37/658.

337. Presumably he refers to al-Walīd b. ʿUqbah and someone else. See above, pp. 53–55 [text, I, 2848–2849]. Cf. the longer account in Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 29–35, based largely on the testimony of Abū Mikhnaf and [to a lesser degree] al-Wāqidī.

338. Fa-qāla bihā. See de Goeje, Introductio, cdxxxviii, sub verbo qāla.

eye to one of the rebels (qawm). He came over to him with a broad iron-headed arrow and stabbed him in the head with it. I [that is, [2991] Ibn 'Awn] asked, "Then what happened?" [Waththāb] replied, "They gathered round him and killed him."

According to al-Wāqidī—Yaḥyā b. 'Abd al-'Azīz—Ja'far b. Maḥmūd—Muḥammad b. Maslamah: I set out with a band of my fellow tribesmen (qawmī) to meet the Egyptians. They were led by four chiefs: 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Udays al-Balawī, Sūdān b. Ḥumrān al-Murādī, 'Amr b. al-Ḥamiq al-Khuzā'ī—whose name became so dominant that (the force) was called "the army of Ibn al-Ḥamiq"[339]—and Ibn al-Nibā'. I entered their presence as the four of them were in a tent, and I saw that the people (al-nās) were following them. I stressed 'Uthmān's rights and the oath of allegiance that lay upon their necks. I filled them with a dread of civil war (fitnah), and informed them that ('Uthmān's) murder was a grave matter, concerning which there was much dissension. "Do not be the first to open the gate of discord.[340] He will turn away from those practices for which you have criticized him, and I will be the guarantor of that." The dissidents said, "And what if he does not desist?" I answered, "Then the matter is up to you." They went away satisfied, and I returned to 'Uthmān and said, "Grant me a private audience." He did so. I said, "Fear God, 'Uthmān, fear God for your life! Verily these people have only come seeking your blood, and you see how your associates have abandoned you. Worse, they are going over to your enemy." He expressed his consent and asked God to requite me.

Then I departed from him, but remained [in Medina] so long as God willed. 'Uthmān had spoken [to me] about the Egyptians' return [to Dhū Khushub]; he mentioned that they had come for one thing but had obtained something else and then departed. I [2992] wanted to come and rebuke him, but I kept silent. Suddenly someone said, "The Egyptians have arrived and are in al-Suwaydā'." I said, "Is it true, what you say?" "Yes," he replied. 'Uthmān sent to me, for the news had reached him, and the dissidents (qawm) had made camp in Dhū Khushub at that very moment. ('Uthmān) said, "Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān, these dissidents have returned. What should be done about them?" I responded, "By God, I do not know, but I do not think they have come back for any good purpose." ('Uthmān) said, "Go out to them and send them away." "No, by God, I will not," I said. "Why?" he asked. I said, "Because I assured them that you would desist from certain matters, and you have not desisted from a single letter of them." He said, "God is the one whose aid we seek." I went out, while the dissidents came and established themselves in al-Aswāf and laid siege to 'Uthmān.

339. Here I follow Caetani, Annali, VIII, 175. As emended the sentence would read: wa-qad kāna hādhā 'l-ismu ghalaba ḥattā kāna yuqālu jayshu 'bni 'l-Ḥamiqi.

340. Cf. p. 2921, note g.

'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Udays came to me, accompanied by Sūdān b. Ḥumrān and his two comrades. They said, "Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān, do you not know that you spoke to us and sent us away? And you claimed that our companion [that is, 'Uthmān] would cease his reprehensible acts?" "Yes indeed," I said. Then they showed a short letter to me; there was a lead tube, and they were saying, "We found one of the alms-tax camels being ridden by 'Uthmān's slave. We seized his belongings and searched him, and we found this letter on him. It contains the following: 'In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. To proceed: If 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Udays comes to you, give him a hundred lashes. Shave his head and beard, and keep him in confinement until my orders reach you. Do the same with 'Amr b. al-Ḥamiq, Sūdān b. Ḥumrān, and 'Urwah b. al-Nibā' al-Laythī.'" I said, "How do you know that 'Uthmān wrote this?" They responded, "Suppose Marwān has done this without 'Uthmān's knowledge. That would be worse, [2993] and he must remove himself from office." They added, "Hurry to him with us. We have spoken to 'Alī, and he has promised us that he will speak with him at the noon prayer."

We came to Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ, but he said, "I will not intervene in your affair." We came to Sa'īd b. Zayd b. 'Amr b. Nufayl, and he said the same thing. Muḥammad (b. Maslamah) asked, "Where did 'Alī promise you [he would act]?" "He promised us that he would go and see ('Uthmān) at the noon prayer," they answered.

According to Muḥammad (b. Maslamah): I performed the prayer with 'Alī; then he and I entered ('Uthmān's) presence and said, "These Egyptians are at the door, so give them leave [to come in]." Now Marwān was sitting with him, and he said, "May I be thy ransom. Permit me to speak to them." 'Uthmān responded, "May God leave you openmouthed! Get away from me. You have nothing to say about this matter." So Marwān went out, and 'Alī came in to see him. The Egyptians had told him what they had told me, and 'Alī began to inform ['Uthmān] what they had discovered in the letter. ['Uthmān] started to swear by God that he had not written or known about or sought advice concerning [this letter]. Muḥammad b. Maslamah [that is, the narrator of this incident] said, "By God he is telling the truth. This is Marwān's doing." 'Alī said, "Then have them come in and hear your excuse." 'Uthmān went up to 'Alī and said, "We are kinsmen through the female lineage.[341] By God, if you were in this situation I would extricate you from it. Go out and speak to them, for they will listen to you." But 'Alī replied, "I will not do it. Rather, have them enter so that you may present your excuses to them." ['Uthmān] said, "Have them come in."

According to Muḥammad b. Maslamah: So at that point they entered, but they did not give him the greeting appropriate to a caliph. Then I knew that this was evil itself. We exchanged the usual greetings, and then Ibn 'Udays stepped forward as spokesman for the dissidents. He mentioned what Ibn Sa'd had done in Egypt, recalling his unjust treatment of the Muslims and the protected peoples, and noting his appropriation of the Muslims' booty for himself alone. And when he was told about that, [2994] he said, "These are the written orders of the Commander of the Faithful." Then they mentioned innovations which ['Uthmān] had instituted in Medina—things opposed by his two predecessors.

[Ibn 'Udays] said, "We journeyed from Egypt seeking nothing but your blood or an end [to these abuses], but 'Alī and Muḥammad b. Maslamah sent us back, and Muḥammad assured us that everything we had complained about would be ended." Then they turned toward Muḥammad b. Maslamah and asked, "Did you tell us that?" According to Muḥammad, "I said that I had." [Ibn 'Udays continued:] "Then we returned to our country, calling upon Almighty God for help against you, because we had overwhelming proof [for our claims]. Then when we were in al-Buwayb[342] we apprehended your slave and seized the letter under your seal to 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd, in which you order him to flog us, to disfigure us by cutting off our hair, and to imprison us for long terms. Here is your letter."

341. Inna lī qarābatan wa-raḥiman.

'Uthmān praised and extolled God. Then he said, "By God I did not write it, I did not order it [to be written], I did not take counsel about it, I did not know about it." According to Muḥammad [b. Maslamah]: 'Alī and I both said, "He is telling the truth." 'Uthmān was relieved at this.

The Egyptians asked, "So who wrote it?" ['Uthmān] responded, "I don't know." [Ibn 'Udays] continued, "Can anyone treat you so audaciously that your slave is sent on a camel paid by the Muslims as alms tax, your seal is forged, and your governor is written to concerning these grave matters, while you know nothing?" "Yes," he replied. They said, "A man like you should not govern. Remove yourself from this office [amr], as God has removed you from it." ['Uthmān] replied, "I shall not remove a shirt that Almighty God has placed upon me." The shouting and noise grew louder, and I [that is, the narrator, Muḥammad b. Maslamah] thought that they would not leave without attacking him. Then [2995] 'Alī arose and went out, and when he stood up I did the same. He told the Egyptians to go and they did so. 'Alī and I each returned to our own homes, but they broke off their siege of ['Uthmān] only when they had killed him.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar [al-Wāqidī]—'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥārith b. al-Fuḍayl—his father—Sufyān b. Abī al-'Awjā': When the Egyptians came the first time, 'Uthmān spoke to Muḥammad b. Maslamah, and he set out with fifty horsemen from among the Helpers. Having reached them at Dhū Khushub, [Muḥammad] sent them away. The dissidents [qawm] went as far as al-Buwayb, where they came upon a slave of 'Uthmān carrying a letter to 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd. They turned round and went back to Medina, where al-Ashtar and Ḥukaym b. Jabalah had stayed behind. They presented the letter, but 'Uthmān denied that he had written it. "This is a forgery," he said. "The letter is written by your scribe," they replied. "Indeed," said ('Uthmān), "but he did not write it on my orders." They said, "The messenger on whom we discovered the letter is your slave." "That is so," he said, "but he set out without my permission." "The camel is your camel," they said. "Yes," he replied, "but it was taken without my knowledge."

342. "Buwayb is the diminutive of bāb, meaning a cleft between two mountains. According to Ya'qūb, al-Buwayb is the place where the Ḥijāzīs enter Egypt." [Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-Buldān, I, 764].

They said, "You are either truthful or a liar. If you are lying, you deserve to be deposed because you have unjustly ordered our blood to be shed. If you are telling the truth you deserve to be deposed because of your weakness and neglect, as well as the wickedness of your entourage. It is not right that we allow someone whose commands are ignored due to his weakness and neglect to have authority over us."[343] They continued, "You have beaten some of the Prophet's Companions and others when, in denouncing various acts of yours, they have admonished you and commanded you to return to righteousness. Have yourself chastised, then, in recompense for those whom you have wrongfully beaten." He answered, "The imām both errs and acts rightly. I shall not have myself chastised, because if I accepted retaliation for everyone against whom I have acted in error, I would be [2996] destroyed."

They said, "You have introduced grave innovations, and for them you deserve to be deposed. When people spoke to you about them, you declared your repentance, but then you did the same things again. Then we came to you and you claimed that you would repent and return to righteousness. Muḥammad b. Maslamah remonstrated with us on your behalf and gave us guarantees as to what would happen. But you betrayed him, and he declared that he would have nothing more to do with you. We returned [to Egypt] the first time in order to deprive you of any pretext and to give you every possible excuse, even as we sought the aid of Almighty God against you. Then we intercepted a letter from you to your governor over us, in which you ordered him to kill and mutilate and crucify us. You allege that [this letter] was written without your knowledge. But it was carried by your slave on your camel, it was written in the hand of your scribe, and it bore your seal. All this has aroused ugly suspicions against you, together with what we already knew about your tyrannical rule, your selfishness in sharing out [booty], your freehanded punishments against the people, and your feigned repentance followed by reversion to error. We went away, but we should not have gone before deposing you and replacing you with a Companion of the Messenger of God—a man who had not introduced the innovations that we have endured from you, and who is not subject to the suspicion that falls upon you. Give back our caliphate and abdicate, for that is our surest recourse against you and your surest recourse against us."

343. Lā yanbaghī lanā an natrūka 'alā riqābinā man yuqtaṭa'u mithlu 'l-amri dūnahu li-ḍu'fihi wa-ghaflatihi.

'Uthmān said, "Have you said everything you wanted to say?" "Yes," they answered. He said, "Praise be to God! I praise Him and seek His aid. I believe in Him, I place my trust in Him, and I bear witness that there is no deity save God alone, Who has no partner, and that Muḥammad is His servant and messenger. 'He sent him with guidance and the religion of truth, that he may uplift it above every religion, though the unbelievers be averse.'[344] To proceed: You have struck the balance neither in speech nor in [2997] judgment. As for your telling me to abdicate, I shall not remove a shirt that Almighty God has placed upon me, and by which He has honored me and set me apart from others. However, I will repent and desist [from sin], and I will never again do anything that the Muslims find blameworthy. By God, I am a man who needs God and fears Him."

They said, "Were this the first innovation that you had introduced, and had you then repented and not repeated it, we would have to accept [your repentance] and depart from you. But you know of previous innovations on your part. When we departed from you the first time, neither we nor the man through whom you had excused your conduct [namely, Muḥammad b. Maslamah] suspected that you would write the things that we found in the letter carried by your slave. How can we accept your repentance when we know by experience that as soon as you display repentance for a sin, you do it again? We shall not depart from you [now] until we have deposed you and replaced you. If your supporters—fellow tribesmen (min qawmika), kinsmen, or men devoted to you—choose battle, then we shall fight them until we reach you and kill you, or until you dispatch our souls to God."

344. Qur'ān 9:33.

'Uthmān responded, "As for surrendering my office (imārah), I would rather be crucified than give up the mandate (amr) of Almighty God and His caliphate (khilāfatuhu). As for your statement that you will fight whoever defends me, I shall not order anyone to fight you. Whoever fights for me will not do so on my orders. By my life, if I wished to fight you, I would have written to the commanders of the garrisons,[345] and they would have brought troops and dispatched men [to my aid]. I might also have linked up with my supporters[346] in Egypt or Iraq. Fear God, fear God and save yourselves. If you do not spare my life, if you kill me, you will bring about bloodshed by this affair." Then they departed [2998] from him, warning him that war would come. He sent to Muḥammad b. Maslamah and told him to send them away. [Muḥammad] replied, "By God, I do not lie to God twice in one year."

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar [al-Wāqidī]—Muḥammad b. Muslim—Mūsā b. 'Uqbah—Abū Ḥabībah: On the day 'Uthmān was killed, I saw Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ go in to him. Then he came out, saying "To God we belong and to Him we shall return," on account of what he saw at ('Uthmān's) door. Marwān said to him, "Now you are sorry, but you have slain him." I [that is, the narrator Abū Ḥabībah] heard Sa'd say, "I beg God's forgiveness. I did not imagine that the people would dare to demand his blood. I came before him just now, and he made a statement that neither you nor your comrades heard. He renounced all his reprehensible actions and manifested repentance. He said, 'I will not keep on toward ruin, for he who persists in tyranny is very far from the [true] path. I shall repent and desist from evil.'" Marwān said, "If you mean to defend ('Uthmān), you must get Ibn Abī Ṭālib, but he has secluded himself and will not be spoken to."

Sa'd left and went to 'Alī, who was [in the mosque] between the [Prophet's] tomb and the pulpit. He said, "Get up, Abū Ḥasan.

345. Following the proposed emendation, 2997, note f.
346. Aṭrāfī: see de Goeje, Introductio, cccxxxix.

May my father and mother be your ransom. By God, I bring you the best news anyone has ever received. Take care of your cousin, deal kindly with him, spare his blood, and the situation will again be as we desire. Your caliph has given [us] satisfaction of his own free will." 'Alī responded, "May God hear him, Abū Isḥāq. By God, I have persisted in defending him until I am filled with shame. But Marwān, Mu'āwiyah, 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir, and Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ have dealt with him as you see. When I gave him sincere [2999] counsel and directed him to send them away, he became suspicious of me, until what you now see has happened." While (Sa'd and 'Alī) were thus engaged, Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr came and whispered to 'Alī. Then 'Alī took my hand and arose, saying, "What good is his repentance now?" And by God, I [that is, the narrator Abū Ḥabībah] no sooner reached my house than I heard the cry that 'Uthmān had been killed. And by God, we have remained in an evil state down to this day."

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar (al-Wāqidī)—Shuraḥbīl b. Abī 'Awn[347]—Yazīd b. Abī Ḥabīb—Abū al-Khayr:[348] When the Egyptians set out against 'Uthmān, 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd sent a messenger posthaste to inform him of their departure and to tell him that they were pretending to undertake the Lesser Pilgrimage. The messenger having reached 'Uthmān b. 'Affān with this news, 'Uthmān in turn sent to the Meccans to warn them against these Egyptians and to inform them that (the Egyptians) had slandered their imam. Then 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd set out toward 'Uthmān on the heels of the Egyptians, having sought and received his permission to come to him. Upon reaching Aylah,[349] Ibn Sa'd learned that the Egyptians had returned against 'Uthmān and put him under siege.

Now Muḥammad b. Abī Ḥudhayfah was in Egypt; when he heard that 'Uthmān was under siege and that 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd had left (the country), he seized power in Egypt, and (the Egyptians)

---

347. Emended in accordance with de Goeje. Introductio, dcxxix.

348. Marthad b. 'Abdallāh al-Yazanī. See de Goeje, Introductio, dcxxix.

349. Aylah: Biblical Elath, modern al-'Aqabah. A small port located at the head of the Gulf of 'Aqabah. In ancient and early Islamic times, it was a prosperous center for the Red Sea trade with Syria, as well as the crossroads of the Pilgrimage caravans from Egypt and Damascus. See H. W. Glidden, "al-'Aḳaba," "Ayla," EI[2], I, 314–15, 783–84. There are now important excavations at this site by the Oriental Institute, University of Chicago.

submitted to his authority. 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd turned back toward Egypt, but Ibn Abī Ḥudhayfah fended him off. Thus, he made his way to Palestine and resided there until 'Uthmān was murdered.

The Egyptians advanced and made camp at al-Aswāf, and laid siege to 'Uthmān. Ḥukaym b. Jabalah came from Baṣrah with a troop of horsemen, and al-Ashtar arrived with the Kūfans. (All three parties) met in Medina, then al-Ashtar and Ḥukaym b. Jabalah withdrew, so that Ibn 'Udays and his comrades, numbering 500 men, were the ones besieging 'Uthmān. They sustained the [3000] siege for forty-nine days, until at last he was killed on Friday, eighteen nights having passed in Dhū al-Ḥijjah, in the year 35 (17 June 656).

According to Muḥammad (b. 'Umar al-Wāqidī)—Ibrāhīm b. Sālim—his father—Busr b. Sa'īd—'Abdallāh b. 'Ayyāsh b. Abī Rabī'ah:[350] I entered 'Uthmān's presence and talked with him for an hour. He said, "Come, Ibn 'Ayyāsh," and he took me by the hand and had me listen to what the people at his door were saying. We heard some say, "What are you waiting for," while others were saying, "Wait, perhaps he will repent." While the two of us were standing there, Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh passed by; he stopped and said, "Where is Ibn 'Udays?" He was told, "He is over there." Ibn 'Udays came over to (Ṭalḥah) and whispered something to him, then he went back to his comrades and said, "Do not let anyone go in to see this man or leave his house."

'Uthmān said to me, "These are Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh's orders." He continued: "O God, protect me from Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh, for he has incited all these people against me. By God, I hope nothing will come of it and that his blood will be shed. He has abused me unlawfully. I heard the Messenger of God say, 'The blood of a Muslim is lawful only in three cases: a man who disbelieves after having professed Islam is put to death; a man who commits adultery is stoned; a man who kills except in legitimate retaliation for another is put to death.'[351] So why should I be killed?" Then 'Uthmān went back (into the house).

350. Reading "Busr" instead of "Bishr," and "'Ayyāsh" instead of "'Abbās," in accordance with de Goeje, Introductio, dcxxix.

351. The last clause is quoted from Qur'ān 5:35. The context is significant in view of the charges laid against 'Uthmān by his opponents (see also below, I,

According to Ibn 'Ayyāsh: I wanted to leave, but they blocked my path until Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr passed by and said, "Let him go." They did so.

According to Muḥammad (b. 'Umar al-Wāqidī)—Ya'qūb b. 'Abdallāh al-Ash'arī—Ja'far b. Abī al-Mughīrah—Sa'īd b. 'Abd al-
[3001] Raḥmān b. Abzay—his father: I witnessed the day they went in against 'Uthmān. They entered the house through an opening in the residence of 'Amr b. Ḥazm. There was some skirmishing and then they got in. By God, I have not forgotten that Sūdān b. Ḥumrān came out and I heard him say, "Where is Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh? We have killed Ibn 'Affān!"

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar (al-Wāqidī)—Shuraḥbīl b. Abī 'Awn—his father—Abū Ḥafṣah al-Yamāni: I used to belong to a Bedouin. Marwān liked me and purchased me along with my wife and son, and then freed us all. I used to accompany him. When 'Uthmān was put under siege, the Banū Umayyah prepared to defend him, and Marwān entered the [caliph's] residence [and stayed] with him. I too was there. By God, I initiated the fighting among the people by throwing [a stone] from the roof of the house at a man of [the tribe of] Aslam named Niyār and killed him. Then fighting broke out and I descended. The people battled at the door, and Marwān fought until he fell down. I carried him off and brought him into the house of an old woman and locked him in. The people set fires at the doors of 'Uthmān's residence, and one of them was set ablaze. 'Uthmān said, "The burning door only signals something more terrible.[352] None of you must raise his hand [to resist them]. For by God if I were the furthest of you all from them, they would walk over you to kill me, and if I were the closest of you to them, they would not go past me. I will endure patiently, as the Messenger of God enjoined upon me. I shall suffer the death that Almighty God has decreed for me (kataba lī)."

Marwān said, "By God, you shall not be killed while I yet hear!" Then, sword in hand, he went toward the door reciting this poem as a proverb:

3023): "Whosoever slays a soul not to retaliate for a soul slain, nor for corruption done in the land, shall be as if he had slain mankind altogether."

352. Mā iḥtaraqa 'l-bābu illā limā huwa a'ẓamu minhu.

The woman with the flowing hair,
the soft palm and fingertips,
Knows that I strike fear in the vanguard, [3002] on a steed quick as the qaṭā-bird in the well-watered valley.[353]

According to Muḥammad [b. 'Umar al-Wāqidī]—'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥārith b. al-Fuḍayl—his father—Abū Ḥafṣah: On Thursday I dropped a stone from the roof of the house and killed a man of [the tribe of] Aslam named Niyār. They sent to 'Uthmān and demanded his murderer. ['Uthmān] responded, "I do not know who killed him." They spent the night before Friday [that is, Thursday evening] berating us like fire. In the morning they attacked, and the first one to climb onto our roofs was Kinānah b. 'Attāb, holding a torch. They way had been opened for him through the house of the Ḥazm clan. Then naphtha-soaked firebrands penetrated [the compound] right behind him. We fought them for a hour, standing on blazing wood. I heard 'Uthmān say to his companions, "After the fire there will be nothing. The wood has burned, the doors have burned. Whoever still obeys me must cling to his own house. The rebels (qawm) are only after me. They will repent of killing me. By God, even if they left me alone, I believe I would not wish to live. My health is ruined; my teeth have fallen out and my bones have weakened."

Then he said to Marwān, "Sit down. Do not go out." But Marwān disobeyed him and said, "By God, you will not be killed and no one will get to you while I can yet hear." Then he went out against the people. I said, "I cannot abandon my master," and I went out alongside him to defend him. We were only a few men, and I heard Marwān reciting:

The woman with the flowing hair,
the soft palm and fingertips knows.

Then he shouted, "Who will step forth [against me]?" He raised [3003] the bottom of his mailed shirt (dir') and tucked it in his belt. Ibn al-Nibā' jumped on him and struck him down from behind with a blow on his neck. No pulse could be detected, and I brought him into the house of Fāṭimah bt. Aws, the grandmother of Ibrāhīm b. al-'Adī. 'Abd al-Malik and the Banū Umayyah always remembered the clan of al-'Adī for that.

353. Not an easy verse; cf. Caetani, Annali, VIII, 182. De Goeje's proposed emendation of azū'u ("I urge on") instead of arū'u ("I frighten") is doubtful, since Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 79, cites the same lines with arū'u.

It was related to me by Aḥmad b. 'Uthmān b. Ḥakīm—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Sharīk—his father—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Ya'qūb b. 'Utbah b. al-Akhnas—Ibn al-Ḥārith b. Abī Bakr—his father, Abū Bakr b. al-Ḥārith b. Hishām: I can still see[354] 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Udays al-Balawī as he was leaning with his back against the mosque of God's Prophet, while 'Uthmān lay besieged. Marwān b. al-Ḥakam emerged and said, "Who will step forth [against me]?" 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Udays said to some son of 'Urwah, "Go fight this man." A tall young slave rose to fight him, seized the edge of his mailed shirt, and stabbed him in his girdle. His thigh was unprotected, and Marwān lunged at him, but 'Urwah's son struck him on the neck. I can still see him twisting around, and 'Ubayd b. Rifā'ah al-Zuraqī rose up to finish him off. But Fāṭimah bt. Aws, the grandmother of Ibrāhīm b. 'Adī (sic), leaped on him. She had nursed Marwān and his children, and she said, "If you only want to kill the man, he has already been killed. But if you mean to toy [3004] with his flesh, that is shameful." So he left him alone, and (the Banū Umayyah) were grateful to her ever after. Later on, they appointed her son Ibrāhīm a governor.

According to Ibn Isḥāq: When 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Udays al-Balawī set out from Egypt for Medina, he said:

From Bilbays and Upper Egypt (the she-camels) came,
their flanks covered in chain mail,
Demanding God's due against Sa'īd until they brought back what we sought for.

It was related to me by Ja'far b. 'Abdallāh al-Muḥammadī—'Amr b. Ḥammād and 'Alī b. Ḥusayn—Ḥusayn b. 'Īsā—his father: When the three days following the Feast of Sacrifice[355] had passed

354. Ka-annī anẓuru ilā 'Abda 'l-Raḥmāni: lit., "[It is] as if I were looking at 'Abd al-Raḥmān."

355. Ayyām al-Tashrīq, the three days from 11 to 13 Dhū al-Ḥijjah following the ritual sacrifice ('Īd al-Aḍḥā), which takes place on 10 Dhū al-Ḥijjah. These days represent the holiday at the conclusion of the Pilgrimage rites proper. See A. J. Wensinck and J. Jomier, "Ḥadjdj," *EI*², III, 36.

(the rebels) surrounded 'Uthmān's house, but he insisted on retaining his office, and sent to assemble his retainers and close associates (ḥashamuhu wa-khāṣṣatuhu). One of the Prophet's Companions, a venerable old man named Niyār b. 'Iyāḍ, arose and called out, "'Uthmān!" ('Uthmān) looked down at him from the roof of his house. (Niyār) reminded him of God and implored him in God's name to dissociate himself from (his evil associates).[356] And while he was speaking, one of 'Uthmān's associates shot and killed him with an arrow. ('Uthmān's opponents) claimed that the man who shot him was Kathīr b. al-Ṣalt al-Kindī, and at this they said to 'Uthmān, "Turn the murderer of Niyār b. 'Iyāḍ over to us that we may kill him in retaliation." He replied, "I will not kill a man who has defended me while you intend to murder me." When they perceived this they rushed at ('Uthmān's) door and set it ablaze. Marwān b. al-Ḥakam emerged from 'Uthmān's residence leading a band of men against them. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ and al-Mughīrah b. al-Akhnas b. Sharīq al-Thaqafī, the ally of the Banū Zuhrah, both did the same, and the fighting raged fiercely.

They were driven to fight by the news that reinforcements from [3005]
Baṣrah had made camp in Ṣirār, a night's journey from Medina, while the Syrians were approaching as well. Thus, they fought bitterly at the door of the house, and al-Mughīrah b. al-Akhnas al-Thaqafī attacked the rebels (qawm), reciting:

A lovely serving girl,
    Adorned with necklace and anklets,
Knows my skill with the sword blade.

He was assailed in turn by 'Abdallāh b. Budayl b. Warqā' al-Khuzā'ī, who was saying:

If you wield the sword as you say, stand fast against a noble opponent who attacks Bearing a Mashrafī sword with polished edge.

'Abdallāh struck and killed (al-Mughīrah), and Rifā'ah b. Rāfi', of the clan of Zurayq among the Anṣār,[357] charged Marwān b. al-

356. fa-nashadahu 'llāha wa-dhakkarahu 'llāha lammā i'tazalahum. For this idiom see Wright, Arabic Grammar, II, 339D–340A. See also de Goeje, Introductio, dcxxix.

357. Zurayq was a clan in the tribe of Khazraj, one of the two main Medinese Ḥakam and struck him down. He drew back from him, thinking he had killed him. 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr suffered numerous wounds. 'Uthmān's supporters (al-qawm) were routed and retreated toward the palace (qaṣr). At the door they held fast and fought a fierce battle there.

In the battle at the door, Ziyād b. Nu'aym al-Fihrī was killed, along with several other companions of 'Uthmān. The people continued to fight until 'Amr b. Ḥazm al-Anṣārī opened the door of his residence, which lay adjacent to 'Uthmān b. 'Affān's. He shouted to the people, and they advanced through his house against (the defenders of 'Uthmān), fighting them in the courtyard of ['Uthmān's] house until they fled and the door was abandoned to (the rebels). (The defenders) fled into the streets of Medina, while 'Uthmān remained behind with a few associates and members of his household. 'Uthmān was killed, and they were killed along with him.

[3006] It was related to me by Ya'qūb b. Ibrāhīm—Mu'tamir b. Sulaymān al-Taymī—his father—Abū Naḍrah—Abū Sa'īd, the client (mawlā) of Abū Usayd al-Anṣārī: One day 'Uthmān gazed down upon them [from his rooftop] and said, "Peace be upon you." But he heard no reply from any of the people, unless someone perchance responded silently. ['Uthmān] said, "I adjure you by God, do you know that with my own money I purchased [the well] of Rūmah, highly esteemed for its sweet water, and that I made it available to every Muslim.[358] "Yes," they answered. He said, "Why am I kept from drinking from it, so that I have to break my fasting with salt water? I adjure you by God, do you know that I bought such-and-such a piece of land and added it to the [Prophet's] mosque?" "Yes," they said. He went on, "And do you know anyone among the people except me who is prevented from worshipping there? I adjure you by God, did you hear the Prophet of God mention such things concerning it, or did God mention the like in His clear Book?" Calls for restraint spread, and the people began to say, "Let us go easy with the Commander tribes from whom the Anṣār were drawn. See Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 154, 169–70.

---

358. Fa-ja'altu rishā'i minhā ka-rishā'i rajulin min 'l-muslimīna. Lit., "I made my rope from it like the rope of any man among the Muslims."

of the Faithful." Then al-Ashtar arose—I do not know whether it was that day or another—and said, "Perhaps ('Uthmān) has deceived you." The people trampled him underfoot and he encountered rough treatment.[359]

Another time I [that is, Abū Sa'īd] saw him looking down at [his opponents]. He exhorted and admonished them, but his exhortations made no impression on them. [His] preaching used to affect the people the first time they heard it, but when it was repeated it had no impact. Then ('Uthmān) opened the door and placed the Qur'ān before him. He did this, having dreamed during the night that God's Prophet was saying [to him], "Break the fast with us tonight."[360]

According to Abū al-Mu'tamir—al-Ḥasan: Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr went up to him and seized his beard, saying, "You have behaved toward us in a manner which Abū Bakr would not have done." Then he went out and left him. Another man, named the Black Death, entered ('Uthmān's) presence and throttled him and slapped him.[361] Then he went out and said, "By God, I have never seen anything softer than his throat. By God, I throttled him until I saw his soul shaking in his body like the soul of a jinn." Then he went out.

According to Abū Sa'īd's account: A certain man went in to [3007]
'Uthmān, in front of whom lay the Qur'ān, and he said, "The Book of God is between you and me." [The intruder] went for him with his sword; ('Uthmān) protected himself with his hand and it was cut. I do not know whether he sliced [the hand] clear off or cut it without severing it. Then he said, "Yea, by God, this is the first palm which has crossed the Qur'ān."

According to an account besides that of Abū Sa'īd: Al-Tujībī went in to ('Uthmān) and wounded him with a broad iron-tipped arrow, and his blood dripped on this verse: "God will suffice you for them; He is the All-Hearing, the All-Knowing."[362] [The blood]

---

359. Fa-waṭi'ahu 'l-nāsu ḥattā laqiya kādhā wa-kādhā.

360. The motif of 'Uthmān's dream is developed more fully in Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 82.

361. Caetani (Annali, VIII, 188) translates: "e strangolato il Califfo, lo spaccio con la spada." But in my judgment he is reading too much into the second verb (khafaqahu); 'Uthmān is not done away with just yet.

362. Qur'ān 2:131. In the present context the whole verse is significant: "And if is still on that copy of the Qur'ān and has not been scraped off. According to Abū Sa'īd's account, the daughter of al-Farāfiṣah [that is, 'Uthmān's wife] took her jewelry and placed it in her bosom before he was killed. When he was wounded, or perhaps killed, she wailed over him. One of [the assassins] said, "God fight her! How heavy her buttocks are!" And so I knew that the enemy of God desired only the things of this world.

[3008] The version of Sayf [b. 'Umar] is as follows: It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Badr b. 'Uthmān—his paternal uncle: The last sermon preached by 'Uthmān before a congregation (jamā'ah) was this: "Verily, Almighty God has only given you this world so that through it you might seek the next. He did not give it to you as something to rely on. Verily this world will vanish and the next will endure. Perishable things must not make you heedless and distract you from things everlasting. Prefer that which endures to that which perishes, for this world will pass away, and God is the goal of our journey. Fear Almighty God, for fear of Him is a shield against His evil and a means to dwell with Him. Beware lest God's [favor toward you] be altered; cling to your community (jamā'ah) and do not be divided into factions. 'Remember God's blessing upon you when you were enemies, and He brought your hearts together, so that by his blessing you became brothers.' "[363]

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Talḥah and Abū Ḥārithah and Abū 'Uthmān: When 'Uthmān had accomplished his aims at that gathering, and he and the Muslims had resolved to endure patiently and to resist [the rebels] through God's power, he said, "May God have mercy on you. Go to the door and have those who have been barred from me join you." He sent to Ṭalḥah, al-Zubayr, 'Alī, and a number [of others] and ordered them to draw near. They gathered together, and he looked down at them and said, "O people, be seated." So they sat down together, both newly arrived rebels and loyal established residents.[364] Then he said, they believe in the like of that you believe in, then they are truly guided; but if they turn away, then they are clearly in schism; God will suffice you for them; He is the All-Hearing, the All-Knowing."

---

363. Qur'ān 3:98.

364. Fa-jalasū jamī'an 'l-muḥāribu 'l-ṭāri'u wa'l-musālimu 'l-muqīmu. Caetani

"O men of Medina, I commend you to God, and I ask Him to restore the caliphate for you after me. Now, by God, I will not go to see anyone after today, until God has carried out His judgment in my regard. I will certainly leave those outside my door alone, [3009] giving them no pretext that they can use against you to damage God's religion or [the affairs of] this world, until Almighty God disposes of all this as He wishes." He commanded and entreated the Medinese to return [to their homes]. They all went away, save for al-Ḥasan, Muḥammad [b. Ṭalḥah], Ibn al-Zubayr, and others like them. These took their place at [the caliph's] door in accordance with their fathers' command. Many people returned to join them, while 'Uthmān stayed in his house.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Abū Ḥārithah and Abū 'Uthmān and Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: The siege itself lasted forty nights, while [the rebels] stayed [in Medina] for seventy altogether.[365] Eighteen days after the siege had begun, a band of horsemen made up of tribal leaders (rukbān min al-wujūh) arrived and stated that some men from the provinces had prepared to move against [the besiegers]—Ḥabīb from Syria, Mu'āwiyah from Egypt [sic], al-Qa'qā' from Kūfah, and Mujāshi' from Baṣrah. On this news, they cut 'Uthmān off from the people and denied him everything, even water. 'Alī had been bringing some of what he wanted.

[The attackers] sought for pretexts [to justify their acts] but none were offered them. During the night, they launched stones into ['Uthmān's] house, in the hope that stones would be thrown at them and they could say, "We have been attacked." 'Uthmān called out to them, "Do you not fear God? Do you not know that there are others besides me in the house?" They replied, "No, by God, we did not throw [anything] at you." "Who threw [stones] at us?" he said. "It was God," they answered. "You lie," he said. "If Almighty God had thrown [stones] at us, He would not have missed us, but you did."

[Annali, VIII, 209] translates: "E tutti sederono tanto i recenti ribelli, che i fedeli costanti." But in my opinion the distinction intended is between outsiders and Medinese, not between newly aroused rebels and loyalists of long standing.

365. Kāna 'l-ḥasru arba'īna laylatan wa-'l-nuzūlu sab'īna. Caetani [Annali, VIII, 209] translates: "L'assedio dura 40 giorni, e gli abitanti della casa erano 70."

'Uthmān looked down [from his rooftop] onto the clan of Ḥazm, who were his neighbors, and dispatched one of 'Amr's sons to 'Alī [with this message]: "They have denied us water. If you can send [3010] us some, do so." [He sent the same message] to Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr, and to 'Ā'ishah and the other wives of the Prophet. The first to come to his aid were 'Alī and Umm Ḥabībah. 'Ali came shortly before dawn and said, "O people, neither Believers nor unbelievers act like this. Do not cut off supplies from this man. The Romans and Persians give food and drink to their captives. This man did not resist you, so how can you think it lawful to besiege and kill him?" "No, by God, we will show no mercy,"[366] they answered. "We will not let him eat or drink." Then ('Alī) threw down his turban in the house [and said], "I have done what you asked me to do." He went home.

Then Umm Ḥabībah came on a mule of hers with a saddle containing a waterskin. They said, "This is the Mother of the Faithful, Umm Ḥabībah,"[367] and struck her mule on the face.[367] She said, "The wills of the Banū Umayyah are with this man; I want to meet with him and ask him about this, so that the property of orphans and widows will not be lost." "She is lying," they said. They lunged at her and severed the mule's rope with a sword. The mule ran away with Umm Ḥabībah. Its saddle slipped, but the people got to her and held her [on the animal]. She had almost been killed, and they brought her to her house.

'Ā'ishah prepared to flee by going on the Pilgrimage. She asked her brother (Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr) to accompany her, but he refused. She said, "By God, if I can make it so that God will frustrate their efforts, I will surely do so." Ḥanẓalah the scribe [3011] came up to Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr and said, "Muḥammad, the Mother of the Believers asks you to accompany her and you do not. Then Bedouin wolves invite you to do unlawful things and you go along with them." (Muḥammad) replied, "What is that to you, son of the woman of Tamīm?" (Ḥanẓalah) replied, "Son of the woman of Khath'am, if there is a struggle over this affair, the

366. Wa-lā nu'mata 'aynin—an idiomatic phrase. See Goeje, Introductio, dxxi.

367. The usual appellation for the wives of the Prophet; it is given Qur'ānic sanction in 33:6.

clan of 'Abd Manāf[368] will overpower you in it." Then he departed, saying:

I am astonished at the depths into which the people plunge, desirous of the Caliphate's end.
Should it disappear, all good would pass from them as well, and thereafter they would suffer shameful humiliation.
They would be as the Jews or Christians—they would all alike have lost their way.

He proceeded to Kūfah, and 'Ā'ishah was filled with rancor against the Egyptians. Marwān b. al-Ḥakam came to her and said, "Mother of the Faithful, if you remained [in Medina] they would be more likely to show respect to this man." She responded, "Do you want me to be treated as Umm Ḥabībah was? I find no one who will defend me. No, by God, I am not to be blamed. I do not know what the actions of these people will lead to."[369]

When Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr heard what had happened to 'Alī and Umm Ḥabībah, they stayed in their homes. The clan of Ḥazm[370] continued to bring water to 'Uthmān whenever the guards appointed to maintain surveillance over them were careless.

'Uthmān looked down at the people [from his rooftop] and called to 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās. He was summoned, and ['Uthmān] said, "Go. You will command the Pilgrimage this year." Now 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās was among those stationed at the door, and he responded, "O Commander of the Faithful, I prefer the struggle (jihād) against these people to the Pilgrimage." But ['Uthmān] entreated him to go, so Ibn 'Abbās departed and commanded the Pilgrimage that year.

---

368. 'Abd Manāf comprises both 'Abd Shams (the clan to which the Umayyads belonged) and Hāshim (the Prophet's clan). These two lineages were of course hostile to each other during the Prophet's lifetime, as well as during the succession struggles after 'Uthmān. Here, however Ḥanẓalah asserts that 'Uthmān can count on the combined support of both lineages against the rebels. Cf. note 251 above.

369. Wa-lā adrī ilā mā yuslimu amru hā'ulā'i. See de Goeje, Introductio, ccxcvi, sub verbo salima.

370. In contrast to all previous citations, the Ḥazm clan is here presented as a defender of the embattled Caliph.

'Uthmān turned his will over to al-Zubayr, and he left [the house] with it. Concerning al-Zubayr, there is disagreement over whether he was present at ['Uthmān's] murder or had already [3012] departed. 'Uthmān said, "'O my people, let not the breach with me move you, so that there smite you the like of what smote the people of Noah.'[371] O God, 'set a barrier between these factions and what they hope for, as was done with the likes of them aforetime.'"[372]

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Amr b. Muḥammad: Laylā bt. 'Umays sent to Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr and Muḥammad b. Ja'far and said, "Verily the lamp consumes itself as it gives light to the people. Do not sin in a matter that you may bring on to someone who has not sinned against you. This matter that you are pursuing today will affect someone else tomorrow. Beware lest your deeds today become a source of grief to you." But they were obstinate and went off in anger, saying, "We will not forget what 'Uthmān has done to us." She was saying, "He did nothing to you except to compel you to obey God."

Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ encountered the two men. There was some hostility between him and Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr, and he ignored the latter as he was leaving Laylā's house. At that [Muḥammad] recited the following verse to him:

Be quick to show your love for a friend;
be not a shadow stubbornly clinging to one who betrays [friendship].[373]

Sa'īd responded in kind:

You shall see a well-placed blow from one exposed to attack and averse to violence.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah and Abū Ḥārithah and Abū

371. Qur'ān 11:91.
372. Qur'ān 34:52, but with the initial verb changed from the perfect to the imperative.
373. Cf. Lane, Lexicon, I, 2069, sub verbo 'aḍḍa.

'Uthmān:[374] The people (al-nās) learned that the members of the Pilgrimage caravan all meant to attack the Egyptians and their allies, and to combine this [meritorious act] with the Pilgrimage. [3013] When [the rebels] heard this and learned of the disgust [felt for them] by the men of the garrison towns, Satan gripped them and they said, "Our only way out of this situation is to kill this man. The people will be too preoccupied with that to pay attention to us."

Their only hope of escape was to kill him. They assaulted the door but were held off by al-Ḥasan, Ibn al-Zubayr, Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah, Marwān b. al-Ḥakam, Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ, and the sons of the Companions who had stayed with them. As they fought with swords, 'Uthmān cried out, "Fear God, fear God! You are absolved from defending me." When they refused [to lay down their arms], he opened the door and went out with shield and sword to hold them back. When the Egyptians saw him they retreated. ['Uthmān's supporters] chased after them, but he restrained them and they withdrew. The situation was distressing for both sides. ['Uthmān] entreated the Companions not to reenter [his residence], but they refused to leave and came back in, and he bolted the door against the Egyptians.

Al-Mughīrah b. al-Akhnas b. Sharīq had been one of those who made the Pilgrimage, then he hastened [back to Medina] with a number of his fellow pilgrims and reached 'Uthmān before he was killed. He participated in the skirmish, entered the house with the others, and took his place inside the door. "How would we find any excuse before God," he said, "if we abandoned you while we could prevent them [from killing you] until we ourselves die?"

During those days 'Uthmān took up the Qur'ān in tears, praying and keeping the text beside him. When he became fatigued he would sit up and read in it, for people used to regard reciting the Qur'ān as a form of worship. Meantime his defenders (qawm), whom he had restrained, were between him and the door. When the Egyptians remained unable to break in though no one was keeping them away from the door, they brought fire and set the door and portico (saqīfah) ablaze. The door and portico burned until, as the wood blazed, the portico collapsed onto the door. Then, as 'Uthmān prayed, the men in the house rose up and [3014] fended off (the assailants). The first to go out against them was al-Mughīrah b. al-Akhnas, chanting:

374. Several words seem to be missing in the next two lines. I have followed the paraphrase of this passage in Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil (Beirut), III, 174.

A lovely serving girl,
Adorned with jeweled necklaces,
Knows my skill with the sword blade.
I will surely defend my friend from you all
With a hard unnicked blade.

Al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī went forth, saying:

Their religion is not my religion, and I am not one of them, until I journey to the heights of Shamām.

Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah went forth, saying:

I am the son of the man who defended him at Uḥud and drove off bands of men in spite of Ma'add.[375]

Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ went forth, saying:

We endured patiently on the Day of the House, as Death approached, smiting with our swords to defend the son of Arwā.[376]
On the day of terror in the House we came to his aid;
our sword blows spoke to them for us as Death pierced within.

The last to go out was 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr. 'Uthmān ordered him to take his [namely, 'Uthmān's] will to his father, and to go to the people in the house and command them to go home. So 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr was the last of them to leave, and he never

375. The battle of Uḥud, fought against Qurashi forces on the outskirts of Medina in 3/625, was a serious setback for the Muslims, and very nearly a disastrous one, since the Prophet was wounded there. However, Ṭalḥah (along with various others) was able to get him to safety. See Ibn Isḥāq, Sīrah, pp. 574–77; transl. Guillaume, pp. 381–83. Ma'add is the ancestor of the Northern Arabs, to whom Quraysh belonged; here it refers to the latter tribe only.

376. 'Uthmān's mother was Arwā bt. Kurayz. See above, note 251, and Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 1.

ceased to laud his own conduct[377] or to tell the people about the final circumstances of 'Uthmān's death.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah and Abū Ḥārithah and Abū 'Uthmān: [The rebels] set the door ablaze as 'Uthmān performed the prayer. He had begun with the verse, "Ṭā Hā. We have not [3015 sent down the Qur'ān upon thee for thee to be unprosperous."[378] He recited quickly and was not distressed by the noise. He proceeded without making an error or stuttering until he completed [his recitation] before they could get to him. Then he returned, sat down in front of the sacred text (muṣḥaf), and recited, "Those to whom the people said, 'The people have gathered against you, therefore fear them.' But it increased them in faith, and they said, 'God is sufficient for us; an excellent Guardian is He.'"[379]

Al-Mughīrah b. al-Akhnas, outside the house with his comrades, chanted these verses:

The woman with the flowing hair,
    The jewels and soft fingertips knows
My oath to my friend is sincere,
    Secured by a glittering sharp-edged blade.
I shall not seek pardon if I break my word.[380]

Abū Hurayrah came up as the people were withdrawing from the house, save for that band that had courted death in a fierce assault. He stood up among them and said, "I am your leader." Speaking in the Himyarite tongue, he said, "Hādhā yawm ṭāba 'mḍarbu"—which means, "Now it is lawful and good to fight."[381] And [Abū Hurayrah] called out, "O my people, how is it with me that I call you to salvation and you call me to the Fire?"[382]

---

377. Fa-mā zāla yadda'ī bihā. See de Goeje, Introductio, ccxl, sub verbo da'ā.

378. Qur'an 20:1.

379. Qur'ān 3:167. This is part of a section that discusses the battle of Uḥud.

380. Lā astaqīlu in aqaltu qīlī. A difficult line, which Caetani (Annali, VIII, 214) renders as follows: "[in tale cosa] non mi dichiaro sciolto da obbligo, seppure in altre circostanze io rescinda qualche patto."

381. Innahu min 'l-qitāli wa-ṭāba. I have followed de Goeje (Introductio, dcxxix) in reading ḥalla in place of min.

382. Qur'ān 40:44. One of Pharaoh's subjects, converted by the signs of Moses, is trying (in vain) to persuade the king and his counselors to heed the prophet.

On that day Marwān rushed out, shouting, "Which man will oppose me?" A man of the Banū Layth called al-Nibāʿ stepped forward against him. They traded two blows; Marwān struck him on his lower leg, while his opponent struck him at the base of the neck and threw him down. Marwān fell and lay prostrate and [3016] each man's comrades dragged him away. The Egyptians said [to ʿUthmān's defenders], "By God, were it not that you would be a decisive proof (ḥujjah) against us within the Community (ummah), we would kill you, for we gave due warning."[383]

Al-Mughīrah said, "Who will come forth against me?" A man came forward and they set to, as (al-Mughīrah) said:

With the hard sword I smite them,
As the brave youth smites
Who despairs of life.

His opponent responded: [lacuna].

The people said, "Al-Mughīrah b. al-Akhnas has been killed." The man who had killed him said, "Verily we belong to God!" "What is wrong with you?" asked ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿUdays. He replied, "While I was asleep, I dreamt that someone came to me and said, 'Announce to the killer of al-Mughīrah b. al-Akhnas [that he will be] in the Fire,' and (that deed) has been visited upon me."

Qabāth al-Kinānī killed Niyār b. ʿAbdallāh al-Aslamī. The people (al-nās) stormed the house from the houses around it and occupied it without those stationed at the door having noticed them. The tribesmen (al-qabāʾil) fell upon their own members [who were defending ʿUthmān] and carried them off after they had been overpowered in trying to defend their caliph (amīr). They delegated a man to kill (ʿUthmān). Having been appointed for the deed, he entered the house and went in before him. "Abdicate and we will spare you," he said. "Woe to you," replied (ʿUthmān). "I have not violated a woman, either in the Time of Ignorance or in Islam. Nor have I sung songs or expressed carnal desires or touched my genitals with my right hand since I swore allegiance to the Messenger of God. I shall not remove a shirt that Almighty God has placed upon me. I shall remain in my appointed place until God bestows honor upon the virtuous (ahl al-saʿādah) and abases the sinners." [The would-be assassin] went out, and they said, "What did you do?" "We are trapped," he responded. "By God, only his murder can save us from the people, but it is not lawful for us to murder him."

383. See 3016, note a, and de Goeje, Introductio, dcxxx.

Then they sent in a second man, from the Banū Layth. "What tribe does this man belong to?" said 'Uthmān. "[I am] from Layth," he responded. "You are not my companion in death (ṣāḥibī)," said ['Uthmān]. "How is that?" asked the other. ['Uthmān] said, "Are you not among those persons for whose safety the [3017] Prophet prayed in such-and-such a battle?" "Indeed I was," he answered. "Then you will not lose your way," said ['Uthmān]. [The man] went back out and departed from the rebels (al-qawm).

Then they sent in a third man, from Quraysh. He said, "'Uthmān, I am your murderer." He answered, "No, such-and-such, you will not kill me." "How is that?" asked [the intruder]. He replied, "The Messenger of God sought forgiveness for you in such-and-such a battle. You will not be tempted to sin against forbidden blood." [The man] sought God's forgiveness, went back out, and departed from his comrades.

'Abdallāh b. Salām came forth and stood at the door of the house, forbidding them to kill ['Uthmān]. "O my people," he said, "Do not unsheathe God's sword against yourselves. By God, if you draw it you will not put it back in its scabbard. Woe to you! Your government today is based on the whip, and if you kill him it will rest only on the sword.[384] Woe to you! Your city is surrounded by God's angels. By God, if you kill him they will surely forsake it." "What is this to you, son of a Jewess?" they said, and he withdrew.

The last one to go in to ['Uthmān] and then come back to the rebels was Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr. 'Uthmān said to him, "Woe to you. Are you angry at God? Have I done you any injury, save to uphold His rightful claims on you?" At this he recoiled and went away.

When Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr came out and they learned that he had failed, Qutayrah al-Sakūnī, Sūdān b. Ḥumrān al-Sakūnī, 384. Inna sulṭānakum 'l-yawma yaqūmu bi'l-dirrati fa-in qataltumūhu lā yaqum illā bi'l-sayfi. That is, the existing political order is based on the Caliph's legitimate right to demand obedience and punish malefactors; if he is overthrown, however, government will be rooted solely in violence and terror.

and al-Ghāfiqī rose up and attacked ['Uthmān]. Al-Ghāfiqī struck [3018] him with an iron tool he was carrying and kicked the Qur'ān with his foot. The sacred text flew over, dropping into ('Uthmān's) hands, and his blood flowed upon it. Sūdān b. Ḥumrān came up to strike him, and Nā'ilah bt. al-Farāfiṣah bent over him and warded off the sword with her hand. He aimed at her and struck off her fingers. As she turned to flee, he fondled her hips and said, "How large her buttocks are!" Then he struck 'Uthmān and killed him. Some of 'Uthmān's slaves entered alongside the rebels (qawm) to defend him. 'Uthmān had manumitted certain of them, and when they saw that Sūdān had struck him, one of them fell on him and cut off his head. Qutayrah jumped on the slave and killed him. (The rebels) pillaged the house and drove out those who lived there, then they locked the three dead men inside.

When they went out into the courtyard of the house, another of 'Uthmān's slaves jumped on Qutayrah and killed him. The rebels coursed through the house taking everything they found, even what was on the women. One man, named Kulthūm b. Tujīb, snatched Nā'ilah's head wrap. Nā'ilah turned away, and he said, "Woe to your mother! How full your buttocks are!" A slave of 'Uthmān saw him and killed him, then was killed himself. The rebels shouted to one another: "Every man should keep an eye on his comrades."[385] Within the house they cried out, "Seize the Public Treasury! No one must get there ahead of you!" The guards of the Public Treasury—in which there were but two sacks—heard their voices and said, "Run! These people are only after worldly goods." They fled, while (the rebels) came to the Treasury and pillaged it.

[3019] The people (al-nās) were of different minds about the matter.[386] The residents [of Medina] lamented, "We belong to God and to Him we shall return," while the outsiders rejoiced. The rebels (al-

---

385. Wa-tanādā 'l-qawmu abṣir rajulun man ṣāḥibuhu. Caetani (Annali, VIII, 216) reads the second verb as abṣara and translates: "Il popolo si disse, l'un l'altro: 'Uno ha avuto soddisfazione dell'altro.'" However, I can find no warrant for rendering abṣara in this manner.

386. Wa-māja 'l-nāsu fīhi. See de Goeje, Introductio, cdxcvi, sub verbo mawj, and Caetani, Annali, VIII, 216. On the key words tānī' ("resident") and ṭārī ("outsider") in the following sentence, cf. Caetani, loc. cit.; and note 364 above (text, I, 2008, ll. 15–16).

qawm) now regretted [their acts]. Al-Zubayr had already left Medina and made camp on the road to Mecca so that he would not witness ('Uthmān's) murder. The news of 'Uthmān's murder having reached him while he was there, he said, "Verily we belong to God and to Him we shall return. May God have mercy on 'Uthmān and avenge him." "The rebels regret their deeds," he was told. (Al-Zubayr) replied, "They planned this and brought it about. 'And a barrier is set up between them and what they desire.'"[387]

The news reached Ṭalḥah, and he said, "May God have mercy on 'Uthmān, and may He avenge both him and Islam." He was told, "The rebels regret their deeds." "May they perish!" he replied, and recited the verse, "They will not be able to make any testament, nor will they return to their people."[388]

'Alī came and was told of 'Uthmān's murder. "May God have mercy on 'Uthmān," he said, "and replace [the evil we have suffered] with good." When he was told, "The rebels regret their deeds," he recited the verse: "Like Satan, when he said to man, 'Disbelieve.'"[389]

Sa'd (b. Abī Waqqāṣ) was sought out while he was in his garden. He had said, "I will not witness his murder." When he learned of his death, he said, "We have taken refuge in something contemptible, and have become contemptible thereby."[390] Then he recited, "Those whose striving goes astray in the present life, while they think that they are working good deeds,"[391] and said, "O God, make them regret this, and seize them."

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Mujālid—al-Sha'bī—al-Mughīrah b. al-Shu'bah: I said to 'Alī, "This man is going to be murdered, and if he is killed while you are in Medina, they will hold you responsible. Go and stay in such-and-such a place. If you do this, the people will seek you out, even if you are in a cave in Yemen." But ('Alī) refused.

---

387. Qur'ān 34:53.
388. Qur'ān 36:50.
389. Qur'ān 59:16. The whole verse reads: "Like Satan, when he said to man, 'Disbelieve'; then, when he disbelieved, he said, 'Surely I am quit of you. Surely I fear God, the Lord of all Being.'"
390. See de Goeje, Introductio, ccxlv, sub verbo danā.
391. Qur'ān 18:104.

When 'Uthmān had been under siege for twenty-two days, they set fire to the door. Many people were in the house, among them [3020] 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr and Marwān. "Permit us [to fight]," they said, but he responded, "The Messenger of God has laid an obligation ('ahd) on me, and I will suffer it patiently. The rebels would not have set fire to the door of the house unless they were after something more important. I forbid any man to court death in battle." Then all the people left, and he called for the Qur'ān to be brought. Al-Ḥasan was with him as he recited from it, and he said, "Your father is in a grave situation now. I beg of you to leave."

'Uthmān ordered Abū Karib—a man of [the tribe of] Hamdān—and one of the Helpers to stand guard at the door to the Public Treasury, which contained just two sacks of silver coin. When the fire was eventually extinguished,[392] Ibn al-Zubayr and Marwān skirmished with (the assailants). The two men were threatened by Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr, and when he entered 'Uthmān's presence they both fled. (Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr) seized ('Uthmān's) beard, and he said, "Let go of my beard! Your father would not have grabbed it." So he let go. Then (the rebels) came in and attacked ('Uthmān); one was striking him with the iron tip of his scabbard and another was beating him with his fists. A man with broad iron-tipped arrows came and stabbed him in the throat, and the blood flowed down on the Qur'ān. Even as they did this they were afraid to kill him, but he was old and lost consciousness. Still others came in, and when they saw that he was unconscious, they dragged him away by the leg. Nā'ilah and her daughters screamed. Al-Tujībī drew his sword to plunge it into ('Uthmān's) belly. Nā'ilah shielded him, but (al-Tujībī) cut her hand, then leaned on ('Uthmān's) chest with his sword. 'Uthmān—may God be pleased with him—was murdered before sunset. Someone cried out, "How is it that his blood is lawful and his property forbidden?" So they pillaged everything, and then broke into the Public Treasury. The two guards threw down the keys and fled for their lives, shouting, "Flee! Flee! This is what the rebels (al-qawm) are after."

---

392. Some words are missing at this point. See text, I, 3020, note d.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar (al-Wāqidī)—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abd al-'Azīz—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad: Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr, accompanied by Kinānah b. Bishr b. 'Attāb, Sūdān b. Ḥumrān, and 'Amr b. al-Ḥamiq, reached 'Uthmān by climbing over the wall from the house of 'Amr b. Ḥazm. They found 'Uthmān, with his wife Nā'ilah, reading the Sūrah of the Cow from the Qur'ān. Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr came up to them and seized 'Uthmān's beard. "May God disgrace you, you hyena," he said. 'Uthmān replied, "I am no hyena. I am God's servant and the Commander of the Faithful." Muḥammad said, "Neither Mu'āwiyah nor anyone else has been of any use to you." 'Uthmān said, "Son of my brother, let go of my beard. Your father would not have gripped it like this." Muḥammad replied, "Had my father seen you doing these things, he would have denounced you for them, and I mean to do worse to you than grab your beard." 'Uthmān said, "I seek God's help and support against you." Then (Muḥammad) pierced his forehead with a broad iron-tipped arrow that he was holding. Kinānah b. Bishr raised some arrows of the same kind that he was holding, and plunged them from the base of 'Uthmān's ear down to his throat. Then he fell on him with his sword until he killed him. [3021]

According to 'Abd al-Raḥmān—Abū 'Awn: Kinānah b. Bishr struck his forehead with an iron bar. He pitched forward, face down, and Sūdān b. Ḥumrān al-Murādī beat him after he had fallen and killed him.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar (al-Wāqidī)—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī al-Zinād—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥārith: The one who killed him was Kinānah b. Bishr b. 'Attāb al-Tujībī. The wife of Manẓūr b. Sayyār al-Fazārī used to say: We had gone on the Pilgrimage, and we did not learn of 'Uthmān's murder until, while we were at al-'Arj[393], we heard a man singing in the darkness: [3022]

Yea, the best of the people, save three, is the one murdered by al-Tujībī who came from Egypt.

393. Al-'Arj: "A mountain pass between Mecca and Medina, on the Pilgrimage road, mentioned along with al-Suqyā by al-Ḥāzimī.: (Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-Buldān, III, 637). Yāqūt mentions another al-'Arj, near al-Ṭā'if, some 78 miles from Medina, but the former seems to be the place intended here.

As to 'Amr b. al-Ḥamiq, he jumped on 'Uthmān and sat on his chest—he was still barely alive—and stabbed him nine times. 'Amr said, "I stabbed him three times for God's sake, and six times because of the anger in my breast against him."

According to Muḥammad (b. 'Umar al-Wāqidī)—Isḥāq b. Yaḥyā—Mūsā b. Ṭalḥah: I saw 'Urwah b. Shīyam strike Marwān's neck with his sword on the Day of the House, and he severed one of his neck muscles. Marwān survived, but with a bent neck. Marwān is the one who used to say:

On the Day of the House I did not say to [my] people, "Hold back.
Go easy. Prefer life to death."
Rather I said to them, "Smite with your swords so that they reach even the man in his prime."[394]

According to Muḥammad al-Wāqidī—Yūsuf b. Ya'qūb—'Uthmān b. Muḥammad al-Akhnasī: 'Uthmān was under siege [3023] before the Egyptians' arrival. The Egyptians arrived on one Friday and killed him on the following Friday.

It was related to me by 'Abdallāh b. Aḥmad al-Marwazī—his father—Sulaymān—'Abdallāh—Ḥarmalah b. 'Imrān— Yazīd b. Abī Ḥabīb: Nahrān[395] al-Aṣbaḥī was responsible for 'Uthmān's murder, and he was the one who killed 'Abdallāh b. Busrah. He belonged to the tribe of 'Abd al-Dār.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar (al-Wāqidī)—al-Ḥakam b. al-Qāsim—Abū 'Awn, the client (mawlā) of al-Miswar b. Makhramah: the Egyptians steadfastly abstained from shedding ('Uthmān's) blood and from fighting until ['Uthmān's] reinforcements from Baṣrah and Kūfah in Iraq and from Syria approached. Their coming encouraged the rebels (al-qawm) to attack. They learned that detachments had departed from Iraq and from Egypt, the latter sent by Ibn Sa'd. Previously Ibn Sa'd had not been in 394. The last hemistich reads: bi-asyāfikum kaymā yaṣilna ilā 'l-kahli. Caetani (Annali, VIII, 185) translates: "Battete tanto forte con le vostre spade da giungere fino in mezzo alle spalle." However, kahl normally means "in the prime of life," while the word for "the base of the neck" is kāhil.

395. The first letter of this name is uncertain: I have followed Ibrāhīm's reading.

Egypt, having fled to Syria. They said, "We must deal quickly with ('Uthmān), before the reinforcements arrive."

According to Muḥammad (b. 'Umar al-Wāqidī)—al-Zubayr b. 'Abdallāh—Yūsuf b. 'Abdallāh b. Salām: While he was under siege, and (the rebels) had surrounded the house on every side, 'Uthmān looked down upon them and said, "I adjure you by Almighty God, do you know that when the Commander of the Faithful 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb was struck down, you beseeched God to bless you and to unite you (in choosing) the best among you (to succeed 'Umar)? What is your opinion of God, then? Do you say that He did not answer you, and that you were of no importance to him, even though at that time you were the (only) adherents of the truth among his creatures and were of one mind in all your affairs? Or do you say that His religion was of no account to God and He did not care to whom He gave authority over it, even though God was worshipped through this religion, [3024] and its adherents had not yet fallen into schism? (If you say this), then you are turning your responsibilities over to someone else or even neglecting them altogether, and you will be punished (for that).[396] Or do you say that I was chosen without consultation? (If that is so) you are rebellious indeed—and God will abandon the Community (al-ummah) if it disobeys Him—for you did not consult among yourselves concerning the imām nor make an effort to discover his reprehensible traits. Or do you say that God did not know what my conduct would be? In some things I have done well and satisfied men of sound religion (ahl al-dīn). I have not yet committed any act offensive either to God or to you which God—glory be to Him!—did not know of on the day He chose me and attired me with the garment of His grace. I adjure you by God, do you know of the good actions which God long ago conferred upon me, and through which He has caused me to bear witness to His rights? The struggle against His enemy is (one of His) rights, and it will be the duty of all those who succeed me to undertake what still remains (of this struggle).[397] No, do not kill me, for a man may be put to death only in three cases: when he commits adultery, when he disbelieves after accepting Islam, or when he takes another's life except in legitimate retaliation.[398] Verily, if you kill me, you will place the sword upon your own necks, and Almighty God will not lift it from you until the Day of Resurrection. Do not kill me, for if you do, you will never pray together again, nor will you ever join together in sharing out booty (fay'), nor will God ever remove dissension from among you."

396. See de Goeje, Introductio, ccclxix, sub verbo 'aqaba; and ibid., dlxv, sub verbo wakala.

397. Wa-anshudukum bi-'llāhi hal ta'lamūna lī min sābiqati khayrin wa-salafi khayrin qaddamahu 'llāhu lī wa-ashhadanīhi min ḥaqqihi wa-jihādu 'aduwwihi

They replied to him, "You say that after 'Umar, the people asked Almighty God for guidance in choosing someone to rule over them, and having sought God's guidance, they chose you. Truly all God's acts are the best acts, but God—glory be to Him!—has made your case a test for His servants. You refer to your long-standing ties and priority with the Messenger of God. You did indeed possess ties of long-standing and precedence, and you were worthy of authority (wilāyah), but since then you have changed and brought about innovations that you are well aware [3025] of. You mention the trials that will afflict us if we kill you. But it is not right to fail to uphold the truth against you out of fear of discord (fitnah) sometime in the future. You say that it is lawful to kill a man only in three cases. But in the Book of God, we find that other men are put to death besides the three named by you. [We find that] the man who spreads corruption in the land is put to death,[399] and likewise the oppressor who fights to continue his oppression and the man who prevents justice (al-ḥaqq) in any way and resists it, then scornfully battles against it. You have committed oppression. You have scorned justice, resisting it and preventing it from being carried out. You refuse to exact punishment against yourself for those whom you willfully wronged. You have clung tenaciously to the caliphate (imārah) over us, and you have been tyrannical in your legal judgments and in the allocation of booty. If you allege that you were not arrogant towards us, and that those who have risen up to defend you from us are fighting without orders from you,[we say that] they fight only ḥaqqun 'alā kulli man jā'a min ba'dī an ya'rifū lī faḍlahā. The text is quite difficult to interpret; cf. Caetani, (Annali, VIII, 171), who in fact omits a segment of it.

398. Cf. above, p. 199 (text, I, 3000) and note 351.

399. Qur'ān 5:37.

because you maintain your grip on the caliphate. Were you to abdicate, they would depart without fighting on your behalf."

The Conduct of 'Uthmān b. 'Affān—May God Be Pleased with Him

It was related to me by Ziyād b. Ayyūb—Hushaym—Abū al-Miqdām—al-Ḥasan b. Abī al-Ḥasan: I entered the mosque, and there was 'Uthmān b. 'Affān reclining upon his cloak. Then two water carriers came to him with a dispute, and he judged between them [on the spot].

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Umārah b. al-Qa'qā'—al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī: 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb had forbidden the notables of Quraysh (a'lām Quraysh) who were Emigrants to go out into the conquered territories (al-buldān) except with his permission, and [then only] for a set period of time. People complained [that 'Uthmān did not restrain them likewise.] Having heard this, he arose and said: "Verily I have tended Islam carefully, like a camel. It makes its appearance and grows into a young animal ready to ride. Then it passes through its sixth, seventh, and eighth years, and finally becomes a fully mature nine-year-old. Now, do we expect anything but declining vigor from a mature camel? Now surely Islam has reached [3026] maturity, and the Quraysh wish to usurp God's wealth for their own benefit to the exclusion of His [other] servants. Is Ibn al-Khaṭṭāb alive? He is not. I shall stand outside the pass of al-Ḥarrah[400] and grip the throats and waist-wrappers of Quraysh so that they tumble into Hellfire."[401]

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: When 'Uthmān ruled, he did not treat [the notables of Quraysh] as 'Umar had, and thus they traveled throughout the conquered territories. As they observed [these lands] and the things of this world (al-dunyā), and as the people in turn saw them, those who were obscure and without power or privilege in Islam attached themselves to (the notables of Quraysh), forming into factions around them.[402] The (Qurashīs) aroused their hopes, and in this manner they acquired precedence. Then they said, "(The Quraysh) are powerful, and we will become known to them and acquire precedence by gaining access to them and attaching ourselves exclusively to them." That was the first flaw to enter Islam, and the first discord (fitnah) to appear among the common people (al-ʿāmmah) was none other than this.

400. Shi'b al-Ḥarrah. The Ḥarrah is a broken lava field northeast of Medina, through which one must pass to get to Syria, Egypt, or Iraq. It was the site of the famous battle in 63/683 between the Medinese and an expeditionary force sent by Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah. See L. Veccia Vaglieri, "Ḥarra," *EI*², III, 226–27.

401. The text is obscure; cf. the version in Caetani, Annali, VIII, 61.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—ʿAmr—al-Shaʿbī: No sooner had ʿUmar died than the Quraysh were weary of him. He had penned them up in Medina and put restraints on them, saying: "The thing I most fear for this Community is that you will scatter throughout the conquered territories." If one of the Emigrants confined to Medina sought his permission to go on campaign—and (ʿUmar) had not restricted other Meccans in this manner—he would say: "You have obtained your reward by your campaigns with the Messenger of God. It is better for you to avoid entanglement in worldly affairs than to go on campaign now."[403] Now when ʿUthmān took power, he freed them from such restrictions. They betook themselves to the conquered territories, where the people attached themselves to them. Therefore (the Quraysh) preferred (ʿUthmān) to ʿUmar.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Mubashshir b. al-Fuḍayl—Sālim b. Abdallāh: When ʿUthmān was caliph, he made the Pilgrimage every year of his [3027] reign except for the final Pilgrimage. He made the Pilgrimage with the wives of the Messenger of God, as ʿUmar used to do. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf was in his place, and he put Saʿīd b. Zayd in his own place, one at the head of the caravan and the other at its rear, and the people were secure.[404]

---

402. See de Goeje, Introductio, dcxxx.

403. Wa-khayrun laka min 'l-ghazwi 'l-yawma allā tarā 'l-dunyā wa-lā taraka.

404. This meaning of this sentence is obscure; presumably it is a vestige of a longer anecdote. On ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf's role as a critic of ʿUthmān's religious practices, see above pp. 38–40 (text, I, 2833–2835).

('Uthmān) wrote to the garrison towns that the Pilgrimage should be performed every year by the governors and by those who had complaints to lodge against them. He wrote to the people of the garrison towns [as follows]: "Command one another to do good and forbid one another to do evil. The believer should not humble himself, for, God willing, I will side with the weak against the strong as long as he suffers oppression." And things continued in this way, until certain factions (aqwām) used ('Uthmān) as a means to create schism within the Community (ummah).

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: 'Uthmān had not been caliph a year before certain men of Quraysh took over various properties (amwāl) in the garrison towns and the people attached themselves to them. This state of things continued for seven years, with every faction (qawm) desiring that its leader (ṣāḥib) should rule. Then Ibn al-Sawdā' converted to Islam and engaged in theological speculation. Through him the world fell into chaos and baneful innovations arose, and [his followers] claimed that 'Umar was superior to 'Uthmān.[405]

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Uthmān b. Ḥakīm b. 'Abbād b. Ḥunayf—his father: When the world fell into chaos and the ability of the people [to act rightly] came to an end, the first forbidden thing to appear in Medina was [the obtaining of auguries by observing] the flight of pigeons and [by] shooting clay pellets. In the eighth year [of his caliphate], 'Uthmān gave authority over these matters to a man from the tribe of Layth, and he clipped their wings and smashed the pellets.[406]

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb— [3028]

405. Again Ibn al-Sawdā'—that is, 'Abdallāh b. Sabā'—emerges as the malign deus ex machina in Sayf's narrative. See above, pp. 64–65, 145–47 and note 107 (text, I, 2858–2859, 2942–2943).

406. Another obscure passage. I have adopted the general interpretation of Caetani (Annali, VIII, 63), though he admits he cannot find any external evidence for soothsaying practices of this kind. His translation of the phrase sanata thamānin as "per otto anni" must be rejected, since it contradicts both Arabic grammar and Sayf's theme that the community was troubled by unlawful practices only after the "conversion" of 'Abdallāh b. Sabā'.

Sayf—Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh[407]—ʿAmr b. Shuʿayb: ʿUthmān was the first to put a stop to [divining the future by observing] pigeons in flight and [by shooting] pellets. When (these practices) appeared in Medina, he put a certain man in charge of them, and he prohibited (the people) from performing them.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Sahl b. Yūsuf—al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad—his father: An account similar to the above. Then he added the following: Drunkenness began to occur among the people. ʿUthmān dispatched a patrol armed with staffs to make the rounds among them, and thus he prevented (such behavior) among them. Afterwards (drunkenness) intensified, and ʿUthmān publicly proclaimed the divinely prescribed punishments and protested to the people about (their behavior). They agreed that they should be flogged in cases of wine drinking, and a certain number of them were arrested and flogged.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Mubashshir b. al-Fuḍayl—Sālim b. ʿAbdallāh: When unlawful innovations made their appearance in Medina, certain men left to go to the garrison towns as fighters in the Holy War and to be close to the Arabs [who dwelt there]. Some of (these men) came to Baṣrah, others to Kūfah, still others to Syria. (These newcomers) all denounced the sons of the (warriors) who had settled in the garrison towns (abnāʾ al-muhājirīn bi'l-amṣār) for evils like those that had arisen among the Medinese. Only the Syrians were exempt from their strictures. They returned in a body to Medina, save for those residing in Syria, and informed ʿUthmān about what they had discovered. Then ʿUthmān stood up in the midst of the people to give the Friday sermon, saying: "O people of Medina, you are the very root of Islam. The people sow corruption only if you do, and they are upright only if you are. By God, by God, by God! If I learn of any innovation on the part of anyone of you, I shall send him into exile without fail. Verily, I do not mean to learn about anyone who has made any statement or demand apart from those [who have already come to my attention]. As to your predecessors, their members used to be cut off without any of them being able to say a word about the evidence for or against him." Henceforth, whenever 'Uthmān [3029] found any of them committing an evil deed or drawing a weapon—whether a staff or something more lethal—he would send him into exile. Their fathers raised a hue and cry over this, until he learned that they were saying, "What an unlawful innovation exile is, albeit that the Messenger of God exiled al-Ḥakam b. Abī al-'Āṣ." ('Uthmān) replied, "Al-Ḥakam was a Meccan, and the Messenger of God exiled him from there to al-Ṭā'if, and afterwards brought him back to his native town.[408] The Messenger of God exiled him for his crimes, and brought him back after having pardoned him. (The Prophet's) successor [namely, Abū Bakr] sent men into exile, as did 'Umar after him. I swear by God, I shall accept pardon from you, and on my part I shall freely extend it to you. [Fearful] things are close at hand, and I desire them to befall neither us nor you. I stand watch anxiously; be yourselves on guard and consider [what may happen]."

407. Not Muḥammad b. ʿUbaydallāh, as in Prym's text. See de Goeje, Introductio, dcxxx.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Abdallāh b. Sa'īd b. Thābit and Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd: Someone asked Sa'īd b. al-Musayyab what had impelled Muḥammad b. Abī Ḥudhayfah to rebel against 'Uthmān. (Sa'īd) replied: "He was an orphan under the guardianship of 'Uthmān, for 'Uthmān was responsible for the orphans among his kinsfolk and took care of all of them. Then (Muḥammad) asked 'Uthmān to appoint him as a governor when the latter became caliph. 'Uthmān responded, "My son, if I thought you were well-suited for office and you had asked me for a governorship, I would appoint you.[409] But that is not the case." (Muḥammad) said, "Then give me leave to go and find some way to support myself." ('Uthmān) replied, "Go wherever you wish." He outfitted him out of his own possessions, provided him with sustenance, and gave him gifts. Now when (Muḥammad) reached Egypt he became one of those who were

408. Al-Ḥakam b. Abī al-'Āṣ was the father of Marwān; he was exiled as punishment for his obdurate opposition to the Prophet. The hill town of al-Ṭā'if, better watered and cooler than Mecca, was a common summer residence of the Meccan elite.

409. Law kunta riḍan thumma sa'altanī 'l-'amala la-'sta'maltuka. Caetani (Annali, VIII, 65) translates as follows: "Se tu fossi stato facile a contentare e m'avessi chiesto una provincia, io te l'avrei data."

angry with ('Uthmān) because he had refused to appoint them to office.

In regard to 'Ammār b. Yāsir, (Sa'īd b. al-Musayyab) states: Words were exchanged between ('Ammār b. Yāsir) and 'Abbās b. 'Utbah b. Abī Lahab.[410] 'Uthmān had both of them beaten. That incident—that is, the affair on account of which they were beaten—has caused bad feeling between the families of 'Ammār and 'Utbah up until the present.

[3030] It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Abdallāh b. Sa'īd b. Thābit: I asked Ibn Sulaymān b. Abī Ḥathmah [about this incident], and he informed me that it consisted of an exchange of calumnies.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Mubashshir: I asked Sālim b. 'Abdallāh what had impelled Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr to rebel against 'Uthmān. He responded, "Anger and greed." "How is that," I said? He replied, "(Muḥammad) held his place in Islam, but various parties (aqwām) deluded him and he coveted [even more]. He had a bold manner and a certain right [to the caliphate] attached to him, but 'Uthmān was contemptuous of him and made no effort to conciliate him.[411] So one thing was added to another, and he became a man despised (mudhammam) after having been highly praised (muḥammad)."

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Mubashshir—Sālim b. 'Abdallāh: When 'Uthmān ruled he was lenient with (the people). He contested claims vigorously but did not void a single rightful claim. So they loved him for his leniency, and that induced them to submit to the commandments of Almighty God.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Sahl—al-Qāsim: Among 'Uthmān's novel acts—and he was regarded with approval for it—is that he struck a man during a quarrel in which the latter had belittled al-'Abbās b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib. When people brought this up to him, he said, "So, if the Messenger of God shows honor to his uncle, shall I allow contempt for him? Anyone who does that is an opponent of the Messenger of God, as is anyone who approves of such an act."

410. 'Abbās is perhaps the grandson of the infamous uncle of the Prophet cursed in Qur'ān 111.

411. A very obscure passage, Wa-kānat lahu dāllatun fa-lazimahu ḥaqqun fa-akhadhahu 'Uthmānu min ẓahrihi wa-lam yudhin.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Ruzayq b. 'Abdallāh al-Rāzī—'Alqamah b. Marthad—Ḥumrān b. Abān: 'Uthmān sent me to al-'Abbās after he had received the oath of allegiance, and I summoned (al-'Abbās) before him. He said, "Why have you called me to your service?" ('Uthmān) replied, "I have never needed you more than I do today." (Al-'Abbās) said, "So long as you adhere to five things, the Community will not jerk its nose rings [from your grasp]." "What [3031] are they," asked ('Uthmān)? (Al-'Abbās) said, "Abstention from killing, showing affection, pardoning offences, affability, and keeping secrets."

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar (al-Wāqidī)—Ibn Abī Sabrah—'Amr b. Umayyah al-Ḍamrī: The older men of Quraysh were passionately fond of khazīrah.[412] I was having a supper of khazīrah with 'Uthmān, made from some of the best cooked meat I had ever seen. It contained sheep's stomachs, and the broth was made of milk and fat. 'Uthmān said, "What do you think of this food?" "It is the finest I have ever eaten," I replied. He continued, "God have mercy upon Ibn al-Khaṭṭāb! Did you ever eat khazīrah with him?" "Yes," I said, "and the morsel almost dissolved in my hand when I went to put it in my mouth. There was no meat in it, and its broth was made of fat without milk." 'Uthmān said, "You are right. By God, 'Umar fatigued those who followed him, and he would seek to turn them away from these things and towards austerity. No, by God, I do not eat from public funds (māl al-muslimīn) but only from my own. You know that I was the wealthiest man of Quraysh and the most single-minded merchant among them. I have never ceased eating soft and delicate foods. I have attained a great age, and it is the most delicate food that I like best. I know of no accusation that anyone can bring against me on account of this."

According to Muḥammad (al-Wāqidī)—Ibn Abī Sabrah—'Āṣim b. 'Ubaydallāh—'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir:[413] During Ramaḍān, I used to

412. Khazīrah is a staple dish among the bedouin, a sort of stew consisting of cooking broth and pieces of meat, to which salt and flour have been added.

413. The isnād is corrected in accordance with de Goeje, Introductio, dcxxx.

break my fast with 'Uthmān, and he would serve us food of finer quality than 'Umar used to. Every night, I saw on 'Uthmān's table lamb and things made with fine flour. I never saw 'Umar eat [3032] anything made of sifted flour, nor any sheep save old mutton. I spoke to 'Uthmān about this, and he replied, "God be merciful to 'Umar and to those who endure what 'Umar used to endure."

According to Muḥammad [al-Wāqidī]—'Abd al-Malik b. Yazīd b. al-Sā'ib—'Abdallāh b. al-Sā'ib—his father: The first tent I ever saw in Minā was one belonging to 'Uthmān, along with another belonging to 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir b. Kurayz. 'Uthmān was the first to add the third call to prayer on Fridays, which was declaimed from al-Zawrā'. 'Uthmān was the first caliph who used sifted flour.[414]

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: 'Uthmān heard that Ibn Dhī al-Ḥabakah al-Nahdī was performing magical spells [nīranj]. According to Muḥammad b. Salamah: Verily, it was a spell. So ['Uthmān] sent to al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah [in Kufah] to ask him about this. If it was the case, [al-Walīd] was ordered to punish him. Thus, [al-Walīd] summoned [Ibn Dhī al-Ḥabakah] and interrogated him. The latter said, "This is just sleight-of-hand, something to amuse people." Then [al-Walīd] ordered him to be severely chastised. He informed the people about him and read out 'Uthmān's letter to them: "You have all been dealt with earnestly, and you are obligated to be earnest in your conduct, so beware of those who act in jest." Then the people turned against 'Uthmān and wondered at his concern for matters of this kind.

[Ibn Dhī al-Ḥabakah] was angered, and he was one of those who rebelled [against 'Uthmān] and struck him down. Letters were [3033] written to 'Uthmān about him, and when ['Uthmān] exiled certain persons to Syria, he also exiled Ka'b b. Dhī al-Ḥabakah and Mālik b. 'Abdallāh, who were alike in their religious thought and conduct, to Dunbāwand, because it was a land of sorcery.[415] In regard to this, Ka'b b. Dhī al-Ḥabakah said to al-Walīd:

---

414. This paragraph recalls 'Uthmān's liturgical innovations as well as his taste for luxury. Al-Zawrā' was the name of the Caliph's residence; see above, pp. 31–32, 70 and note 121 [text, I, 2827, 2864].

415. Dunbāwand means Damāvand, the great mountain north of Tehran. To its

By my life, if you expel me you will find no path leading to the downfall which you covet for me.
I have long hoped to return, O son of Arwā, to come back to what is rightfully mine—a calamity has snatched that away.
My exile in these lands and my bitter reviling of God Himself will be brief;
My imprecations against you will be long,
every day and night, in this Dunbāwand of yours.

When Sa'īd (b. al-'Āṣ) became governor, he brought (Ka'b) back [to Kūfah]. He treated him well and wished to help him, but (Ka'b) was ungrateful to him and responded only with evil.

In the time of al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah, Ḍābi' b. al-Ḥārith al-Burjumī borrowed a dog called Qurḥān from a band of the Helpers in order to hunt gazelles. When he failed to return it, the Helpers were disgusted and sought the aid of his fellow tribesmen (qawmuhu) against him. These latter banded together against him, snatched the dog from him and returned it to the Helpers. He derided them about this affair in the following words:

The deputation of Qurḥān, not I, has imposed upon itself a task at which the broad-cheeked woman perseveres, burdened with fatigue.[416]
They have passed the night in comfort, amply fed, as though an amir had given them the marzubān's house.
Do not abandon your dog! For it is your mother, and disrespect to mothers is a grave sin indeed.

On this account they complained about him to 'Uthmān. He [3034] sent for him, chastised him severely, and threw him in prison, as he was accustomed to do with the Muslims. That was too much for (Ḍābi'), and he stayed in prison until he died there. In regard to flank the tyrant Zohhak (al-Ḍaḥḥāq) was chained, and it was also the home of the wonderful sīmurgh, the bird which nurtured the infant Zal, Rustam's father. Finally, sorcerers were believed to reside there. Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 371. On the Syrian exiles, see above, pp. 112–29 (text, I, 2907–2926).

---

416. A rather puzzling line, even with de Goeje's proposed reading of taẓallu instead of taḍillu (Introductio, dcxxx): Tajashshama dūnī wafdu Qurḥāna khuṭṭatan / taẓallu laḥā 'l-wajnā'u wa-hya ḥasīru.

['Uthmān's] assassination, he excused himself to his companions in these words:

I resolved but did not act, though I was on the verge.
Would that I had acted, that I had fled leaving his wives in tears.[417]
By her who speaks, Ḍābi' has died in prison.
Who then opposes him? He has found no one to dispute him.
By her who speaks, God must not send Ḍābi' away.
How excellent is the youth whom you forsake and to whom you contrive excuses!

Because of these events [his son] 'Umayr b. Ḍābi' became an adherent of Ibn Sabā'.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Mustanīr—his brother: I know of no one who rode forth to war against 'Uthmān who was not [eventually] killed. A few individuals banded together in Kūfah—among them al-Ashtar, Zayd b. Ṣūḥān, Ka'b b. Dhī al-Ḥabakah, Abū Zaynab, Abū Muwarri', Kumayl b. Ziyād, and 'Umayr b. Ḍābi'—and they stated: "No, by God, no man can hold his head high[418] so long as 'Uthmān has authority over the people." Then 'Umayr b. Ḍābi' and Kumayl b. Ziyād said, "We shall kill him," and rode forth to Medina. As for [3035] 'Umayr, he shrank back, but Kumayl b. Ziyād dared to assault ('Uthmān). He was sitting, waiting for [the right moment to strike], when 'Uthmān came up to him and slapped his face. (Kumayl) fell back on his buttocks and exclaimed, "You hurt me, Commander of the Faithful!" ('Uthmān) said, "Are you not a murderer?" "No, by God—apart from Whom there is no god," replied (Kumayl), and he swore [he was telling the truth]. The people gathered around him and said, "We will examine him, O Commander of the Faithful." ('Uthmān) responded, "No, for God has bestowed forgiveness, and I do not wish to learn anything

417. Hamamtu wa-lam af'al wa-kidtu wa-laytanī / fa'altu wa-wallaytu 'l-bukā'a ḥalā'iluh. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil (Beirut), III, 183, gives a variant of this line: Hamamtu wa-lam af'al wa-kidtu wa-laytanī / taraktu 'alā 'Uthmāna tabkī ḥalā'iluh.

418. Lā wa'llāhi lā yarfu'u ra'sun.

contradicting what he has said." He continued, "If things are as you say, Kumayl, then submit to me"—and he knelt down—"for by God, I can only think that you have designs against me. If you are telling the truth, then may God reward [you] abundantly. But if you are lying, may He abase [you]." [Kumayl] sat up in front of him and said, "Beware!" ['Uthmān] said, "I leave [you to your own devices]."

[Kumayl and 'Umayr] lived on until their longevity was much talked about among the people.[419] Now when al-Ḥajjāj arrived [in Kūfah] he said, "Those enlisted for the expedition of al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufrah should report to their posts; let no one neglect his duty."[420] So 'Umayr [b. Ḍābi'] stood up before him and said, "I am but a frail old man, but I have two strong sons. Send one or both of them in my place." "Who are you," asked al-Ḥajjāj? "I am 'Umayr b. Ḍābi'," he answered. Then [al-Ḥajjāj] said, "By God, forty years ago you rebelled against Almighty God, and I shall make an example of you to the Muslims. You wrongfully defended the man who stole the dog. Your father, when he was in chains, determined [to take revenge against 'Uthmān], and you resolved [to do the same] but then shrank back. Now I am determined to act, and I will not shrink back." And so ['Umayr's] head was struck off.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—a man of the Banū Asad: It is told of ['Umayr b. Ḍābi'] that he had attacked 'Uthmān along with the other assailants. When al-Ḥajjāj came [to Kūfah] and announced [the campaign against the Khārijites], a certain man presented something to him in order to purchase his exemption from military service, and [al-Ḥajjāj] accepted it from him.[421] Now when [al-Ḥajjāj] was named

---

419. Fa-baqiya ḥattā akthara 'l-nāsu fī najā'ihimā. Caetani [Annali, VIII, 68] translates: "E restarono i due [i.e., Kumayl and 'Uthmān], finchè la gente s'affollo meravigliata del colloquio." However, I can find no warrant for rendering najā' in this manner. My version is suggested by Ibn al-Athīr's loose paraphrase [Kāmil [Beirut], III, 183]: Wa-baqiya ilā ayyāmi 'l-Ḥajjāji fa-qatalahumā.

420. Sayf b. 'Umar's taste for unexpected chronological leaps shows up here. Al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf was made governor of Iraq by 'Abd al-Malik in 75/694, in order to pursue the struggle against the Kharijites. Al-Ḥajjāj at once mounted a massive and ultimately successful campaign for this purpose under the command of al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufrah. See Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 227–31; Hawting, First Islamic Dynasty, 66–67.

421. Lammā qadima 'l-Ḥajjāju wa-nādā bimā nādā bihi 'araḍa rajulun 'alayhi

[3036] governor, Asmā' b. Khārijah said, "The matter of 'Umayr has been one of the things worrying me." (Al-Ḥajjāj) asked, "And who is 'Umayr?" "This old man here," he replied. (Al-Ḥajjāj) said, "You have reminded me of the assault, which I had forgotten. Is he not one of those who rebelled against 'Uthmān?" (Asmā') replied, "He is indeed." (Al-Ḥajjāj) continued, "And is there someone else in Kūfah [who was also implicated]?" "Yes," said (Asmā'), "Kumayl." (Al-Ḥajjāj) said, "Bring 'Umayr before me," and he struck off his head. He demanded Kumayl also, but he had fled, so he held the tribe of al-Nakha' responsible in his stead. Al-Aswad b. al-Haytham said to him, "What do you want with an old man? His old age should be enough for you." "Verily, by God," replied (al-Ḥajjāj), "you should hold your tongue with me, or else I will certainly slice off your head." He said, "Go ahead!"

When Kumayl perceived the anguish suffered by his fellow tribesmen, even though they numbered two thousand warriors, he said, "Death is better than fear when two thousand are filled with fear because of me and have been denied [their stipends]." Then he set out and presented himself before al-Ḥajjāj. The latter said to him, "You are a man who harbored evil designs; the Commander of the Faithful did not find you out, and you were not satisfied until you made him subject to reprisal when he fended you off." (Kumayl) answered, "On what grounds will you put me to death? Will you kill me because he was forgiving or because I am yet in good health?" (Al-Ḥajjāj) said, "Adham b. Muḥriz, kill him!" (Adham) said, "Is the reward [for this deed] to be shared between you and me?" "Yes," said (al-Ḥajjāj). Adham replied, "Nay. Rather, you will obtain the reward, while whatever sin there may be will fall upon me." Mālik b. 'Abdallāh, who had been one of those exiled [to Syria],[422] said these words:

The son of Arwā did an injustice to Kumayl;
he pardoned him for it, for the one who seeks to avenge himself is blameworthy.

---

mā 'iwaḍa nafsihi. I have followed Caetani's interpretation of this elliptical passage (Annali, VIII, 68).

422. See above, pp. 120–29 text, I, 2916 ff.).

(Kumayl) said to him, "I shall not vilify you today for such a thing,
O Abū 'Amr, while you are still imām.
Go easy! By Him Whom Quraysh worships with us [3037]
my head is unlawful to the great man.
In forgiveness there is security whose excellence is well known among the people, though for retaliation we incur no sin.
Had the Just One ['Umar] known what you do,
he would have forbidden it to you, brooking no dispute."

It was related to me by 'Umar b. Shabbah—'Alī b. Muḥammad (al-Madā'inī)—Suḥaym b. Ḥafṣ: Rabī'ah b. al-Ḥārith b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib was 'Uthmān's business partner (sharīk) during the Time of Ignorance. Al-'Abbās b. Rabī'ah said to 'Uthmān, "Write to Ibn 'Āmir on my behalf and ask him to lend me 100,000 [dirhams]." He did write, and (Ibn 'Āmir) gave that sum to him outright. (Ibn 'Āmir) also assigned his house to him, [and it is known as] the House of al-'Abbās b. Rabī'ah nowadays.

It was related to me by 'Umar (b. Shabbah)—'Alī—Isḥāq b. Yaḥyā—Mūsā b. Ṭalḥah: Ṭalḥah owed 50,000 [dirhams] to 'Uthmān. When 'Uthmān went to the mosque one day, Ṭalḥah said to him, "Your money is ready, so take it." ('Uthmān) replied, "It is yours, Abū Muḥammad, to support you in fulfilling the manly virtues."

It was related to me by 'Umar (b. Shabbah)—'Alī—'Abd Rabbihi b. Nāfi'—Ismā'īl b. Abī Khālid—Ḥakīm b. Jābir: 'Alī said to Ṭalḥah, "I adjure you by God, send the people away from 'Uthmān."[423] (Ṭalḥah) replied, "No, by God, not until the Banū Umayyah voluntarily submit to what is right."

It was related to me by 'Umar (b. Shabbah)—'Alī—Abū Bakr al-Bakrī—Hishām b. Ḥassān—al-Ḥasan: Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh sold 'Uthmān a property of his for 700,000 [dirhams], and ('Uthmān) brought (the money) over to him. Then Ṭalḥah said, "Surely a man who possesses so much wealth and stores it in his own house, in ignorance of what may befall him by the command of [3038] Almighty God—God, Glory be to Him, has made that man a fool!" That night his messenger plied the streets of Medina dividing up the cash until morning. By morning, (Ṭalḥah) did not have a single dirham left. Al-Ḥasan said: "He came here seeking the dinar and the dirham"—or, according to other reports: "the yellow and the white."

423. Anshuduka 'llāha illā radadta 'l-nāsa 'an 'Uthmāna. Caetani (Annali, VIII, 69) has misconstrued the meaning of this phrase, for which see Wright, Arabic Grammar, II, 339D–340A.

In this year—that is, 35 (656)—'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās led the people on the Pilgrimage at 'Uthmān's command. This was related to me by Aḥmad b. Thābit al-Rāzī—one who related [it] to him—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar.

The Reason Why 'Uthmān Ordered 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās to Lead the Pilgrimage in This Year

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar al-Wāqidī—Usāmah b. Zayd—Dāwūd b. al-Ḥuṣayn—'Ikrimah—('Abdallāh) b. 'Abbās: [This took place] when 'Uthmān was under siege for the last time. 'Ikrimah states: I asked Ibn 'Abbās, "Were there two sieges?" Ibn 'Abbās replied, "There were." The first siege lasted for twelve [days]. When the Egyptians appeared, 'Alī met them at Dhū Khushub and induced them to leave. By God, 'Alī was a sincere friend to ('Uthmān), until he aroused 'Alī's anger against him. Marwān, Sa'īd, and their kinsmen began to incite him against 'Alī, so that he would be eager to take offence.[424] They would say, "Had ('Alī) so desired, no one would have spoken to you [as the rebels have]." This refers to the fact that 'Alī used to advise and counsel him and to speak very harshly about Marwān and his kin. The latter used to tell 'Uthmān, "('Alī) treats you like this even though you are his imam, his brother-in-law, the son of his paternal uncle and aunt. What do you suppose he has hidden from you?" Their criticism of 'Alī was so relentless that ('Uthmān) decided to conduct affairs without him.

I [that is, 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās] entered ('Alī's) presence on the day I set out for Mecca and mentioned to him that 'Uthmān had called on me to go there. ('Alī) said, "'Uthmān does not seek honest counsel from anyone. He has surrounded himself with a [3039] circle of perfidious advisers. There is not one among them who has not taken possession of some district, devouring its revenues and treating its inhabitants shamefully." I replied to him: "He has ties of kinship [to you] and a claim [to your support]. If you think it right to act independently of him, you should do so, for otherwise you will not absolve yourself [from the consequences of his acts]."

424. Fa-yataḥammala. See de Goeje, Introductio, cciii–cciv, sub verbo ḥamala.

Ibn 'Abbās says, "Now God knows that I saw ('Alī) relent and become gentle toward 'Uthmān, then I would see him greatly distressed."

According to 'Ikrimah—Ibn 'Abbās: 'Uthmān said to me, "Ibn 'Abbās, go to Khālid b. al-'Āṣ in Mecca and tell him that the Commander of the Faithful sends his greetings and says: 'I have been under siege every day since such-and-such a date. I cannot drink except from the brackish water in my house, and I am barred from using a well that I purchased with my own money at Rūmah. Only the people drink there, while I get nothing from it. I can eat only what is in my own house; I am prevented from obtaining anything in the marketplace. As you see, I am under siege.' Command [Khālid b. al-'Āṣ] to lead the people on the Pilgrimage, for there is no one to do it. If he refuses, then you will lead the Pilgrimage."

I reached the Pilgrimage caravan[425] on the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth days [of Dhū al-Ḥijjah]. I came to Khālid b. al-'Āṣ and told him what 'Uthmān had said to me. He replied, "Is that possible in view of the hostility of those whom you see here?" He refused to lead the Pilgrimage and said, "You lead the people on the Pilgrimage, for you are the son of 'Alī's paternal uncle, and this responsibility belongs only to him. You are more worthy [than I] to carry it out on his behalf."

Thus, I led the people on that Pilgrimage. Then at the end of the month I returned to Medina. There I discovered that 'Uthmān had been killed and the people were thronging around 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib. When 'Alī saw me he got away from the people and came up to me. Whispering, he said, "What do you think about what has happened? A terrible thing indeed has taken place, as you see, 425. I follow the emendation of de Goeje, Introductio, dcxxx.

something that no one can control." I responded, "In my opinion the people must inevitably turn to you today. I also think that no [3040] one can receive the oath of allegiance today without being suspected of the murder of this man." However, ('Alī) refused not to have the oath of allegiance sworn to him, and thus he was suspected of ('Uthmān's) blood.[426]

According to Muḥammad (al-Wāqidī)—Ibn Abī Sabrah—'Abd al-Majīd b. Suhayl—'Ikrimah: Ibn 'Abbās recounts: 'Uthmān said to me, "I have named Khālid b. al-'Āṣ b. Hishām to be governor in Mecca. The Meccans have heard about what the people have done [here in Medina], and I fear that they will bar him from office. He will refuse [to accept that] and will fight them in the Sanctuary of Almighty God, in which He has established His peace—both (the Meccans) and those people 'who have come from every deep ravine that they may witness things profitable to them.'[427] Therefore I have thought it best to give you authority over the Pilgrimage." Along with all this, ('Uthmān) wrote a letter to the pilgrims, asking them to uphold his rights against those who were besieging him.

Ibn 'Abbās set out and encountered 'Ā'ishah in al-Ṣulṣul.[428] She said, "Ibn 'Abbās, I entreat you by God: abandon this man, sow doubt about him among the people, for you have been given a sharp tongue. Their powers of discernment have been clarified, the beacon light is raised high to guide them, and (the Caliph's associates) have milked the lands that once abounded in good things.[429] I have seen Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh take possession of the keys to the public treasuries and storehouses. If he becomes caliph, he will follow in the path of his paternal cousin Abū Bakr."

According to (Ibn 'Abbās): I said, "O Mother (of the Believers), if

---

426. Fa-abā illā an yubā'aya fa'ttuhima bi-damihi. Caetani (Annali, VIII, 263) translates: "Egli rifiuto il califfato, e fu sospettato (ugualmente)."

427. Qur'ān 22:28–29. The reference is to those performing the Pilgrimage in obedience to God's commandment. Presumably 'Uthmān fears that innocent and pious pilgrims would be caught up in the conflict between Khālid and the Meccans.

428. Al-Ṣulṣul: a locality near Medina, some seven miles south on the road toward Mecca. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-Buldān, III, 413.

429. Wa-taḥallabū min 'l-buldāni li-amrin qad jamma. A very puzzling passage, in part because the subject of the first verb is not identified.

some evil were to befall that man [namely, 'Uthmān], the people would seek asylum only with our companion [namely, 'Alī]." She replied, "Be quiet! I have no desire to defy or quarrel with you."

According to Ibn Abī Sabrah: 'Abd al-Majīd b. Suhayl informed me that he had made a copy from 'Ikrimah of the letter written by 'Uthmān. Here it is:

> In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. From God's servant 'Uthmān, Commander of the Faithful, to the Believers and Muslims. Peace be with you, and to you I praise God—there is no god but He.
>
> To proceed: Verily I call on you to remember Almighty God, who has bestowed benefits upon you, taught you [3041] Islam, guided you away from error, delivered you from unbelief, shown you clear proofs, lavished sustenance upon you, and given you victory over the enemy. "And He has lavished on you His blessings."[430] For verily Almighty God says, and His saying is the truth, "If you count God's blessing, you will never number it; surely man is sinful, unthankful."[431]
>
> The Almighty also says, "O Believers, fear God as He should be feared, and see you do not die save in surrender [that is, as Muslims]. And hold you fast to God's bond, together, [and do not scatter; remember God's blessing upon you when you were enemies, and He brought your hearts together, so that by His blessing you became brothers. You were on the brink of a pit of Fire, and He delivered you from it; even so God makes clear to you His signs; haply so you will be guided. Let there be one nation of you, calling to good, and bidding to honor, and forbidding dishonor; those are the prosperers. Be not as those who scattered and fell into variance after the clear signs came to them;] those there awaits a mighty chastisement."[432]

---

430. Qur'ān 32:19.
431. Qur'ān 14:37.
432. Qur'ān 3:97–101. In many of the Qur'ānic citations in this letter, only the opening and closing words are quoted in the text. Ṭabarī's readers, of course, would have been able to supply the missing lines from memory. In certain cases,

He has also said, and His saying is the truth, "O Believers, remember God's blessing upon you, and His compact (mīthāq) which he made with you, when you said, 'We have heard and we obey.' "[433]

He has also said, and His saying is the truth, "O Believers, if an ungodly man comes to you with a tiding, [make clear, lest you afflict a people unwittingly, and then repent of what you have done. And know that the Messenger of God is among you. If he obeyed you in much of the affair, you would suffer; but God has endeared to you belief, decking it fair in your hearts, and He has made detestable to you unbelief and ungodliness and disobedience. Those—they are the right-minded,] by God's favor and blessing; God is All-Knowing, All-Wise."[434]

[Remember also] the saying of the Almighty, "Those that sell God's covenant ('ahd Allāh) and their oaths for a little price . . . for them awaits a painful chastisement."[435]

He has also said, and His saying is the truth, "So fear God as far as you are able, [and give ear, and obey, and expend well for yourselves. And whosoever is guarded against the avarice of his own soul,] those—they are the prosperers."[436]

He has also said, and His saying is the truth, "Break not the oaths after they have been confirmed [and you have made God your surety; surely God knows the things you do. And be not as a woman who breaks her thread, after it is firmly spun, into fibres, by taking your oaths as mere mutual deceit, one nation being more numerous than another nation. God only tries you thereby; and certainly He will make clear to you upon the Day of Resurrection that whereon you were at variance. If God had willed, He would have made you one nation; but He leads therefore, I have supplied the omitted passages [in square brackets] so as to clarify 'Uthmān's meaning.

---

433. Qur'ān 5:10.
434. Qur'ān 49:6–8.
435. Qur'ān 3:71.
436. Qur'ān 64:16.

astray whom He will and guides whom He will; and you will surely be questioned about the things you wrought. Take not your oaths as mere mutual deceit, lest any foot should slip after it has stood firm and you should taste evil, for that you barred from the way of God, and lest there should await you a mighty chastisement. And do not sell the covenant of God for a small price; surely what is with God—that is better for you, did you but know. What is with you comes to an end, but what is with God abides,] and surely we shall recompense those who were patient their wage, according to the best of what they did."[437]

He has also said, and His saying is the truth, "Obey God, and obey the Messenger and those in authority among you. [If you should quarrel on anything, refer it to God and the Messenger, if you believe in God and the Last Day; that is better,] and fairer in the issue."[438]

He has also said, and His saying is the truth, "God has promised those of you who believe and do righteous deeds [that He will surely make you successors in the land, even as He made those who were before them successors, and that He will surely establish their religion for them that He has approved for them, and will give them in exchange, after their fear, security: 'They shall serve Me, not associating with Me anything.'] Whoso disbelieves after that, those—they are the ungodly."[439] [3042]

He has also said, and His saying is the truth, "Those who swear obedience to thee swear obedience in truth to God; [God's hand is over their hands. Then whosoever breaks his oath breaks it but to his own hurt; and whosoever fulfills his covenant made with God,] God will give him a mighty wage."[440]

To continue. Almighty God desired for you absolute obedience and unity (al-samʿ wa'l-ṭāʿah wa'l-jamāʿah),

437. Qur'ān 16:93–98.
438. Qur'ān 4:31.
439. Qur'ān 24:54.
440. Qur'ān 48:10.

and warned you against rebellion, schism, and discord. He informed you about what your predecessors had done, presenting it to you so that He might have it as proof against you. If you rebel against Him, then accept the counsel of Almighty God and beware of His punishment, for you will never find a community (ummah) that has been destroyed save after it has fallen into discord. [Such a community can be saved] only if it has a head who can unite it. If ever you do that, you will not perform the prayer together, your enemy will be given power over you, and you will disagree as to what is lawful or forbidden. If you do that, no true religion (dīn) will remain before God—glory be to Him—and you will be divided into sects. Now Almighty God has said to His Messenger, "Those who have made divisions in their religion and become sects, thou art not of them in anything; their affair is unto God, then He will tell them what they have been doing."[441] Verily I enjoin upon you what God has enjoined, and I warn you of His chastisement. For Shu'ayb said to his people (qawm), "O my people, let not the breach with me move you, so that there smite you the like of what smote the people of Noah . . . [And ask forgiveness of your Lord, then repent to Him; surely my Lord is] All-Compassionate, All-Loving."[442]

To continue: Verily certain groups (aqwām) among those who have been talking in this way have maintained to the people that they but summon [them] to the Book of Almighty God and to the truth, and that they desire neither this world nor any conflict over it. When the truth was presented to them, behold the people were at variance concerning it: among them are those who accept the truth when it is presented to them and [then] turn away from it, and among them are those who abandon the truth and renounce it in this matter, desiring to snatch it without any right. My life has seemed long to them and their hopes of governing have been deferred, and so they seek to hasten [God's] decree [by murdering me.]

441. Qur'ān 6:160.
442. Qur'ān 11:91–92.

They have written you that they returned [to their homes] on the basis of [certain promises] which I gave them; I am not aware that I have neglected any of my promises to them. They have been seeking, so they allege, [the enforcement of] the divinely authorized punishments (al-ḥudūd).[443] I said, "Inflict them upon those whom you know to have violated any one of them. Inflict them upon anyone near or far who has wronged you." They said, "The Book of God is to be recited aloud." I replied, "Then let him who recites do this, except for one who inserts something that God has not revealed in the Book." They said, "The deprived man ought to be provided for, and the public wealth (al-māl) should be expended in such a way that sound custom (al-sunnah al-ḥasanah) may be followed thereby. The [caliph's] one-fifth share and the [fixed] alms tax should not be exceeded. Capable and trustworthy men should be placed in authority. The wrongs [suffered by] the people should be charged against those who have committed them." Now I am content with this and have persevered in doing it. I came to the Prophet's wives to speak with them, saying, "What do you command me?" They answered, "You should assign governorships (tu'ammirū) to 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ and 'Abdallāh b. Qays [namely, Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī] and leave Mu'āwiyah [in office]. An amir ['Umar?] made him governor before you; he sees to the well-being of his province and his army is content with him. Send 'Amr back [to Egypt], for his army is content with him. Make him governor and he will restore good order in his territory." Now I did all that, and ['Amr] has since then transgressed against me and violated right conduct. [3043]

I have written to you and to my associates who have made allegations concerning the matter. They have sought to hasten God's decree, barred me from the prayer, and kept me from the mosque. They have stolen what they could in Medina. I have written this letter to you at a time when they are giving me one of three choices. First, they may retaliate against me for every man whom I have struck, rightly or wrongly, except that some portion of it will be forgone. Alternatively, I may resign my office (al-amr) and they will assign it to someone else. Or finally, they may send to the provincial garrisons (al-ajnād) and to the inhabitants of Medina who obey them, and thus declare themselves free of the absolute obedience to me that God has enjoined upon them.

443. Emended in accord with de Goeje, Introductio, dcxxx.

To them I have replied [as follows]. As for my exacting retaliation against myself, caliphs before me used to strike [men] in error and retaliation was not demanded against any of them, and I know that they are aiming only [3044] against me. As for my abdicating the caliphate (al-imārah), I would rather they rage against me than to resign from the work of Almighty God and His caliphate. As for your statement—"they will send to the provincial garrisons and the inhabitants of Medina and thus be quit of obedience to me"—I am not an agent of yours, nor did I compel them to obey beforehand. Rather, they voluntarily accepted (obedience to me), seeking to please Almighty God and to resolve discord. As to him among you who desires only this world, he shall obtain of it only what Almighty God has prescribed for him. He who desires only God's face, the Abode hereafter, the well-being of the Community (al-ummah), the seeking of Almighty God's pleasure, and the sound custom (al-sunnah al-ḥasanah) laid down by the Messenger of God and the two caliphs after him, (that man) shall surely be rewarded for that by God.

Your reward is not in my hands. If I bestowed upon you the whole world, it would neither be a fair price for your religion nor would it compensate you in any way. So fear God and take into account His reward. I am not content—nor will God (Glory be to Him!) be content—that anyone among you should violate His covenant ('ahd). As for what (the rebels) will force me to choose between, it adds up simply to deposing [me] and naming a new caliph (al-naz' wa'l-ta'mīr). I have been master of myself and those with me, I have seen to [the enforcement of] God's judgment (ḥukm) and [avoided] altering the benefits [bestowed] by God—Glory be to Him. I have hated evil custom, division within the Community, and the shedding of blood. I adjure you by God and by Islam to take only what is right—and you will be given that by me—and to abandon wrongdoing against those with rightful claims. Deal justly between us, as Almighty God has commanded you. I adjure you by God—Glory be to Him—who has appointed for you the covenant and mutual support in God's affair—for God has said, and His saying is true, "Fulfill the covenant ('ahd); surely the covenant shall be asked of."[444] This is an excuse before God; perhaps you will be mindful. [3045]

To continue: "Yet I claim not that my soul was innocent—surely the soul of man incites to evil—except inasmuch as my Lord had mercy; truly my Lord is All-Forgiving, All-Compassionate."[445] If I have chastised certain groups (aqwām), I have desired only good thereby, and I turn in repentance to Almighty God from every [evil] deed I have committed and seek His forgiveness. Verily none forgives sins but He. Surely the mercy of my Lord comprehends everything. Only the nation (al-qawm) that has gone astray despairs of God's mercy, and He accepts repentance from His servants and pardons evil deeds and knows what they do. I ask Almighty God to forgive me and you, to reconcile the hearts of this Community to what is good, and to make sin hateful to it.

Peace be upon you and the mercy of God and His blessings, O Believers and Muslims.

Ibn 'Abbās states: I read this letter out to them in Mecca, one day before the Day of Watering.[446]

---

444. Qur'ān 17:36.
445. Qur'ān 12:53.
446. Yawm al-tarwiyah, "the Day of Watering," falls on 8 Dhū al-Ḥijjah. It

According to (al-Wāqidī)—Ibn Abī Sabrah—'Abd al-Majīd b. Suhayl—'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Utbah—Ibn 'Abbās: 'Uthmān summoned me and put me in charge of the Pilgrimage. I went to Mecca, where I led the people in the Pilgrimage rites and read 'Uthmān's letter out to them. Then I arrived back in Medina, and the oath of allegiance had been rendered to 'Alī.

'Uthmān's Burial Place, and Those Who Led the Prayer for Him and Took Charge of His Funeral Rites

[3046] It was related to me by Ja'far b. 'Abdallāh al-Muḥammadī—'Amr b. Ḥammād and 'Alī b. Ḥusayn—Ḥusayn b. 'Īsā—his father—Abū Maymūnah—Abū Bashīr al-'Ābidī: 'Uthmān['s corpse] was thrown aside and left unburied for three days. Then Ḥakīm b. Ḥizām al-Qurashī, who was a member of the clan of Asad b. 'Abd al-'Uzzā, and Jubayr b. Muṭ'im b. 'Adī b. Nawfal b. 'Abd Manāf spoke to 'Alī about his burial, seeking his permission for ['Uthmān's] family to see to that. 'Alī granted them his permission, but when news of this spread, people lay in wait for ['Uthmān's body] by the road, armed with stones. A few members of his family set out with [his body], intending to take him to an enclosure in Medina named Ḥashsh Kawkab, where the Jews used to bury their dead. Now when ['Uthmān's body] was brought out before the people, they stoned his bier and were bent on throwing him to the ground. When 'Alī heard that, he sent and demanded that they leave him alone. They did so, and ['Uthmān's body] was hurried along and interred in Ḥashsh Kawkab. When Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān gained supremacy over the Muslims (al-nās), he ordered that enclosure to be razed and transferred ['Uthmān's body] to al-Baqī'.[447] Then he commanded the people to bury their dead around his grave, until ultimately [those graves] adjoined the cemetery of the Muslims.

---

marks the day on which the pilgrims leave Mecca for the pilgrimage station of 'Arafāt. Muslim commentators explain the name by saying that on this day the pilgrims collect water to supply themselves and their animals during the forthcoming rites. See A. J. Wensinck and J. Jomier, "Ḥadjdj," *EI*², III, 35.

447. Al-Baqī' or Baqī' al-Gharqad is the principal cemetery area in Medina, some 150 meters due east of the Prophet's Mosque. The name implies that it was

It was related to me by Ja'far—'Amr and 'Alī—Ḥusayn[448]—his father—al-Mujālid b. Sa'īd al-Hamdānī—Yasār b. Abī Karib—his father Abū Karib, who had been an official in charge of 'Uthmān's treasury: 'Uthmān was buried at twilight. Only Marwān b. al-Ḥakam, three of his freedmen (mawālī), and his fifth daughter were present at his funeral. His daughter wailed in mourning and raised her voice in lament for him. The people took stones and hooted "Long-bearded old idiot!" She was nearly stoned.[449] Then [3047] they said, "(Go to) the compound, the compound." And thus he was interred in a compound outside [Medina].

According to al-Wāqidī—Sa'd b. Rāshid—Ṣāliḥ b. Kaysān: When 'Uthmān was killed, a certain man said, "He will be buried at Dayr Sal', the Jewish cemetery." Ḥakīm b. Ḥizām replied, "That will never be, so long as one member of the lineage of Quṣayy remains alive."[450] Things almost came to blows, and Ibn 'Udays al-Balawī said, "Old man, what harm does it do you where he is buried?" Ḥakīm b. Ḥizām responded, "He will be buried nowhere but at Baqī' al-Gharqad, where his brother-in-law and his young son are buried." And so Ḥakīm b. Ḥizām, along with twelve men including al-Zubayr, set out with ('Uthmān's body), and Ḥakīm b. Ḥizām led the funeral prayer for him.

According to al-Wāqidī: In our judgment, the best-attested testimony is that Jubayr b. Muṭ'im led the funeral prayer for him.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar (al-Wāqidī)—al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. 'Uthmān—Makhramah b. Sulaymān al-Wālibī: 'Uthmān was killed on Friday morning. (His kin and supporters) could not bury him, and Nā'ilah bt. al-Farāfiṣah sent to Ḥuwayṭib b. 'Abd al-'Uzzā, Jubayr b. Muṭ'im, Abū Jahm b. Ḥudhayfah, Ḥakīm b. Ḥizām, and Niyār al-Aslamī. They all responded, "We cannot originally marked by a stand of thorn trees. See W. C. Brice, Historical Atlas of Islam, 23; al-Harawi, Guide des lieux de pèlerinage, 211–16.

448. Instead of "Ḥasan"; emended in accordance with de Goeje, Introductio, dcxxx.

449. Na'thal was a common epithet flung at 'Uthmān by his enemies; see de Goeje, Introductio, cccxliv, sub verbo ṭūl.

450. Quṣayy was the eponymous ancestor of several of the most influential clans of Quraysh in Mecca, including 'Abd Manāf (the common ancestor of the Prophet and 'Uthmān). His prestige was based on his control of the cult of the Ka'bah and his welding the various clans of Quraysh into an effective tribal unit. See G. Levi della Vida, "Ḳuṣayy," *EI*², V, 519–20.

take (his body) in the daytime with these Egyptians at the gate." Thus, they held off until the evening. Then these men (qawm) entered ['Uthmān's house], but they were barred from him. Abū Jahm said, "By God, no one will keep me from him unless I die along with him. Bear him away!" And so ('Uthmān's body) was carried to al-Baqī'.

Nā'ilah followed behind them with a slave of 'Uthmān's and a lamp, which she lighted at al-Baqī'. At length they came to a stand of date palms in an enclosure. They broke through the wall and then buried him among those date palms, with Jubayr b. Muṭ'im leading the funeral prayer for him. Nā'ilah left intending to talk [about 'Uthmān's burial place], but the mourners (qawm) scolded [3048] her, saying, "We are afraid that this rabble may go dig him up." And so Nā'ilah returned to her home.

According to Muḥammad (al-Wāqidī)—'Abdallāh b. Yazīd al-Hudhalī—'Abdallāh b. Sā'idah: For two nights after he was killed, 'Uthmān remained [where he had fallen] and they were unable to bury him. Then four men bore (his body) away—Ḥakīm b. Ḥizām, Jubayr b. Muṭ'im, Niyār b. Mukram, and Abū Jahm b. Ḥudhayfah. When he was laid down so that the funeral prayer could be performed for him, a band of the Helpers came and forbade them to perform the prayer. These included Aslam b. Aws b. Bajrah al-Sā'idī and Abū Ḥayyah al-Māzinī among several others. They forbade ('Uthmān's supporters) to bury him at al-Baqī'. Abū Jahm said, "Bury him, for God and His angels have blessed him." "No, by God," they said, "he will never be buried in the Muslims' cemetery." So they buried him in Ḥashsh Kawkab. When the Banū Umayyah reigned, they had that garden[451] included in al-Baqī', and it is today the cemetery of the Banū Umayyah.

According to Muḥammad (al-Wāqidī)—'Abdallāh b. Mūsā al-Makhzūmī: When 'Uthmān was killed, (his assassins) tried to cut off his head, but Nā'ilah and Umm al-Banīn[452] fell upon him and stopped them. The two women screamed and beat [their] faces and rent their clothing. In the face of this, Ibn 'Udays said, "Leave him." And thus 'Uthmān, his corpse still unwashed, was taken out and brought to al-Baqī'. (The mourners) wanted to perform the funeral prayer for him in the place set aside for funerals, but the Helpers refused (to allow that). 'Umayr b. Ḍābi' appeared while 'Uthmān was stretched out upon a door. ('Umayr) jumped on him and broke one of his ribs, saying, "You left Ḍābi' in prison until he died there."

451. Ḥashsh. The narrator may intend a pun, since ḥashsh means not only "garden" but also "privy."

452. Another of 'Uthmān's wives, the daughter of 'Uyaynah b. Ḥiṣn b. Ḥudhayfah b. Badr al-Fazārī. See Caetani, Annali, VIII, 300–1, and below, p. 254 (text, I, 3056).

It was related to me by al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Abū Bakr b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Uways—his grandfather's paternal uncle, al-Rabī' b. Mālik b. Abī 'Āmir—(Al-Rabī''s) father: I was one of 'Uthmān's pallbearers when he was killed. We carried him upon a door, and his head was bumping up and down on the door because we were walking so fast. We were possessed with fear until we [3049] interred him in his grave in Ḥashsh Kawkab.

As for Sayf (b. 'Umar's) account, it was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Abū Ḥārithah and Abū 'Uthmān and Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: When 'Uthmān was killed, Nā'ilah sent for 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Udays and said to him, "You are the closest of the rebels (qawm) in kinship and the best suited of them to deal with my situation. Have these corpses removed from me." But he abused and reviled her until, in the depths of the night, Marwān went out and came to 'Uthmān's house. He was joined by Zayd b. Thābit, Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh, 'Alī, al-Ḥasan, Ka'b b. Mālik, and most of the Companions who were present (in Medina). Meantime boys and women assembled in the place set aside for funerals. They had 'Uthmān brought there, and Marwān led the prayer for him. Afterwards they took him to al-Baqī' and buried him there, in the part adjacent to Ḥashsh Kawkab.

The next morning, they came (to collect the bodies of) 'Uthmān's slaves who been killed with him and brought them out (for burial). When (the rebels) saw them, they stopped them from burying (the slaves). So (the mourners) took them into Ḥashsh Kawkab. That evening, they brought out two of the dead slaves and buried them beside 'Uthmān. Each (corpse) was accompanied by five persons and a woman, Fāṭimah, the mother of Ibrāhīm b. 'Adī.[453] Then they returned (to Medina) and came to Kinānah b.

453. On Fāṭimah see above, p. 202 (text, I, 3003–3004).

Bishr. They said to him, "You are the most closely related to us among the rebels. Order these two corpses in ('Uthmān's) house to be taken out." (Kinānah) spoke to (the other rebels) about this, but they refused. He said, "I am a protected neighbor of the members of 'Uthmān's clan living in Egypt and of those allied with them. Bring these two out. Throw them out!" So (the two corpses) were dragged by their feet and thrown onto the pavement, where [3050] the dogs devoured them. The two slaves who were killed on the Day of the House were called Nujayḥ and Ṣubayḥ, and their names were paramount among the slaves because of their merit and bravery. The people did not remember the name of the third slave (who had been killed in that event).

'Uthmān was not ritually washed, and was wrapped (for burial) in his garments, still bloody. Nor were his two slaves ritually washed.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Mujālid—al-Sha'bī: 'Uthmān was buried at night, and Marwān b. al-Ḥakam led the funeral prayer for him. His daughter and Nā'ilah bt. al-Farāfiṣah went out wailing behind him.

The Date of 'Uthmān's Murder

All authorities agree that he was killed in Dhū al-Ḥijjah, but they differ as to the year. Some say that he was killed on 18 Dhū al-Ḥijjah in the year 36 (7 June 657), but the great majority say that he was killed on 18 Dhū al-Ḥijjah in the year 35 (17 June 656).

(The following) was related to me by al-Ḥārith b. Muḥammad—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar (al-Wāqidī)—Abū Bakr b. Ismā'īl b. Muḥammad b. Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ—'Uthmān b. Muḥammad al-Akhnasī. It is also stated on the authority of al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Abū Bakr b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Sabrah—Ya'qūb b. Zayd—his father: 'Uthmān was killed on Friday afternoon, 18 Dhū al-Ḥijjah, in the year 36. His caliphate lasted for twelve years, less twelve days, and he was eighty-two years old.

[3051] According to Abū Bakr—Muṣ'ab b. 'Abdallāh: 'Uthmān was killed on Friday afternoon, 18 Dhū al-Ḥijjah, in the year 36.

According to others, he was killed on 18 Dhū al-Ḥijjah in the year 35.

It was related to me by Ja'far b. 'Abdallāh (al-Muḥammadī)—'Amr b. Ḥammād and 'Alī—Ḥusayn[454]—his father—al-Mujālid b. Sa'īd al-Hamdānī—'Āmir al-Sha'bī: 'Uthmān was besieged in the house for twenty-two nights, and he was killed early on the morning of 18 Dhū al-Ḥijjah, in the year 25 dating from the death of the Messenger of God.

It was related to me by Aḥmad b. Thābit al-Rāzī—one who related it to him—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar: 'Uthmān was killed on Friday, 18 Dhū al-Ḥijjah, in the year 35. His caliphate lasted twelve years, less twelve days.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah and Abū Ḥārithah and Abū 'Uthmān: 'Uthmān was killed on Friday, 18 Dhū al-Ḥijjah in the year 35, at precisely eleven years, eleven months, and twenty-three days since the assassination of 'Umar.

According to Zakariyā' b. 'Adī—'Ubaydallāh b. 'Amr—Ibn 'Aqīl: 'Uthmān was killed in the year 35.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Abū Ḥārithah and Abū 'Uthmān and Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: 'Uthmān was killed on Friday, 18 Dhū al-Ḥijjah, in the last hour [before sunset]. [3052]

According to others, he was killed on Friday morning.

According to Hishām b. al-Kalbī: 'Uthmān was killed on Friday morning, 18 Dhū al-Ḥijjah in the year 35. His caliphate lasted twelve years less eight days.

It was related to us by al-Ḥārith (b. Muḥammad)—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar (al-Wāqidī)—al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. 'Uthmān—Makhramah b. Sulaymān al-Wālibī: 'Uthmān was killed on Friday morning, 18 Dhū al-Ḥijjah, in the year 35.

According to others, he was killed during the ayyām al-tashrīq.[455]

It was related to me by Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—his father, Abū Khaythamah—Wahb b. Jarīr—his father—Yūnus b. Yazīd al-Aylī—al-Zuhrī: Some authorities claim that 'Uthmān was killed during the ayyām al-tashrīq, while others state that he was killed on Friday, 18 Dhū al-Ḥijjah.

---

454. See above, note 448.

455. On the ayyām al-tashrīq (11–13 Dhū al-Ḥijjah), see above, note 355.

'Uthmān's Life Span

The early scholars (al-salaf) who preceded us differ on this, some saying that he lived eighty-two years.

[3053] It was related to me by al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar (al-Wāqidī): When 'Uthmān was killed, he was eighty-two years old.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar—al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. 'Uthmān—Makhramah b. Sulaymān al-Wālibī: 'Uthmān was killed at the age of eighty-two.

According to Muḥammad (b. 'Umar)—Sa'd b. Rāshid—Ṣāliḥ b. Kaysān: 'Uthmān was killed when he was eighty-two years and some months old.

Others state that he was ninety or eighty-nine.

According to al-Ḥasan b. Mūsā al-Ashyab—Abū Hilāl—Qatādah: 'Uthmān was killed at the age of eighty-nine or ninety.

Others state that he was killed when he was seventy-five, and this figure is given on the authority of Hishām b. Muḥammad (b. Sā'ib al-Kalbī).

According to some authorities, he was killed at the age of sixty-three; this statement is linked by Sayf b. 'Umar to a body of informants. It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Abū Ḥārithah and Abū 'Uthmān and Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: 'Uthmān was killed when he was sixty-three years old.

According to others, he was killed at the age of eighty-six.

[3054] It was related to me by Muḥammad b. Mūsā al-Ḥarashī—Mu'ādh b. Hishām—his father—Qatādah: 'Uthmān was killed when he was eighty-six.

'Uthmān's Personal Appearance

It was related to me by Ziyād b. Ayyūb—Hushaym—Abū al-Miqdām—al-Ḥasan b. Abī al-Ḥasan: I entered the mosque and saw 'Uthmān reclining on his cloak. I looked closely at him. He possessed a handsome face, though it had pockmarks left by smallpox, and his arms were covered with hair.

It was related to me by al-Ḥārith (b. Muḥammad)—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar (al-Wāqidī): I asked 'Amr b. 'Abdallāh b.

'Anbasah and 'Urwah b. Khālid b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr b. 'Uthmān and 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī al-Zinād about 'Uthmān's personal appearance, and I discerned no difference of opinion among them. According to them, he was a man neither short nor tall, with a handsome face and fine skin. He had a full beard, reddish-brown in color. He was strong-boned and broad-shouldered. He possessed a thick head of hair, and used to saffron his beard.

It was related to me by Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—his father—Wahb b. Jarīr b. Ḥāzim—his father—Yūnus b. Yazīd al-Aylī—al-Zuhrī: 'Uthmān was a man of medium stature, with much hair and a handsome face. He was bald on the front, and walked bowlegged.

The Date of His Conversion to Islam and of His Seeking Refuge

It was related to me by al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar: 'Uthmān's conversion to Islam was of long-standing, having taken place before the Messenger of God entered the house of al-Arqam. He was among those who left Mecca and sought refuge in Abyssinia, both the first and second time. He was accompanied on both occasions by his wife Ruqayyah, the daughter of the Messenger of God.[456] [3055]

The Kunyah of 'Uthmān b. 'Affān

It was related to me by al-Ḥārith b. Muḥammad—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar (al-Wāqidī): In the Time of Ignorance, 'Uthmān b. 'Affān bore the kunyah Abū 'Amr. But after the coming of Islam, a son was borne to him by Ruqayyah, the daughter of the Messenger of God, and he named him 'Abdallāh. He took his kunyah from him, and the Muslims now called him Abū 'Abdallāh. 'Abdallāh was six years old when a rooster pecked him on the eye, and he fell ill and died in Jumādā I in the year 4 of the Hijrah (October–November 625). The Messenger of God led the funeral prayer for him, and 'Uthmān placed (his body) in the grave.

456. On these events see Watt, Muhammad at Mecca, pp. 109–17.

'Uthmān's Lineage

He is 'Uthmān b. 'Affān b. Abī al-'Āṣ b. Umayyah b. 'Abd Shams b. 'Abd Manāf b. Quṣayy. His mother is Arwā bt. Kurayz b. Rabī'ah b. Ḥabīb b. 'Abd Shams b. 'Abd Manāf b. Quṣayy; her mother in turn was Umm Ḥakīm bt. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib.

His Children and Wives

1. Ruqayyah and Umm Kulthūm, both daughters of the Messenger of God. Ruqayyah bore him 'Abdallāh.

[3056] 2. Fākhitah bt. Ghazwān b. Jābir b. Nusayb b. Wuhayb b. Zayd b. Mālik b. 'Abd [sic] b. 'Awf b. al-Ḥārith b. Māzin b. Manṣūr b. 'Ikrimah b. Khaṣafah b. Qays b. 'Aylān b. Muḍar. She bore him a son and he named him 'Abdallah—that is, 'Abdallāh the Younger (al-Aṣghar), who died at an early age.

3. Umm 'Amr bt. Jundab b. 'Amr b. Ḥumamah b. al-Ḥārith b. Rifā'ah b. Sa'd b. Tha'labah b. Lu'ayy b. 'Āmir b. Ghanm b. Duhmān b. Munhib b. Daws, of [the tribe of] Azd. She bore him 'Amr, Khālid, Abān, 'Umar, and Maryam.

4. Fāṭimah bt. al-Walīd b. 'Abd Shams b. al-Mughīrah b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar b. Makhzūm. She bore him al-Walīd, Sa'īd, and Umm Sa'īd.

5. Umm al-Banīn bt. 'Uyaynah b. Ḥiṣn b. Ḥudhayfah b. Badr al-Fazārī. She bore him 'Abd al-Malik, who died at an early age.

6. Ramlah bt. Shaybah b. Rabī'ah b. 'Abd Shams b. 'Abd Manāf b. Quṣayy. She bore him 'Ā'ishah, Umm Abān, and Umm 'Amr.

7. Nā'ilah bt. al-Farāfiṣah b. al-Aḥwaṣ b. 'Amr b. Tha'labah b. al-Ḥārith b. Ḥiṣn b. Ḍamḍam b. 'Adī b. Janāb b. Kalb. She bore him Maryam.

According to Hishām b. al-Kalbī: Umm al-Banīn bt. 'Uyaynah b. Ḥiṣn bore 'Abd al-Malik and 'Utbah to 'Uthmān. Likewise, Nā'ilah bore 'Anbasah.

[3057] According to al-Wāqidī: By Nā'ilah, 'Uthmān had a daughter named Umm al-Banīn. She is the one who was married to 'Abdallāh b. Yazīd b. Abī Sufyān. When 'Uthmān was killed, [his wives] Ramlah bt. Shaybah, Nā'ilah, Umm al-Banīn bt. 'Uyaynah, and Fākhitah bt. Ghazwān were all living in his household. However, ʿAlī b. Muḥammad (al-Madāʾinī) claims that he had divorced Umm al-Banīn even while he lay besieged.

These are the wives whom he took, both in the Time of Ignorance and in Islam, and his male and female children.

The Names of ʿUthmān's Provincial Governors during This Year

According to Muḥammad b. ʿUmar (al-Wāqidī)—ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī al-Zinād: When ʿUthmān was killed, his provincial governors were as follows:

1. in Mecca, ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥaḍramī;
2. in al-Ṭāʾif, al-Qāsim b. Rabīʿah al-Thaqafī;
3. in Ṣanʿāʾ, Yaʿlā b. Munyah;
4. in al-Janad, ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Rabīʿah;[457]
5. in Baṣrah, ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĀmir b. Kurayz—he had left his post, but ʿUthmān had appointed no one to replace him;
6. in Kūfah, Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣ—he had been driven out and was not permitted to reenter the city;
7. in Egypt, ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿd b. Abī Sarḥ—when he came to [consult with] ʿUthmān, Muḥammad b. Abī Ḥudhayfah had usurped power there; ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿd had named al-Sāʾib b. Hishām b. ʿAmr al-ʿĀmirī as his deputy in Egypt, but Muḥammad b. Abī Ḥudhayfah drove him out;
8. in Syria, Muʿāwiyah b. Abī Sufyān.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Abū Ḥārithah and Abū ʿUthmān: When ʿUthmān died, Muʿāwiyah held authority in Syria. Muʿāwiyah's lieutenants were as follows: in Ḥimṣ, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Khālid b. al-Walīd; in Qinnasrīn, Ḥabīb b. Maslamah; in Transjordan, Abū al-Aʿwar b. Sufyān; in Palestine, ʿAlqamah b. Ḥakīm al-Kinānī; in command [3058] of naval forces (ʿalā al-baḥr), ʿAbdallāh b. Qays al-Fazārī; in charge of justice, Abū al-Dardāʾ.

457. Instead of "b. Rabīʿah"; see de Goeje, Introductio, dcxxx.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Aṭiyyah: When 'Uthmān died, his officials in Kūfah were as follows: in charge of public worship was Abū Mūsā (al-Ash'arī); in charge of tax revenues from the Sawād were Jābir b. 'Amr al-Muzanī[458]—who was also superintendant of the dike (ṣāḥib al-musannāt) beside Kūfah—and Simāk al-Anṣārī; in command of the army was al-Qa'qā' b. 'Amr. [The subgovernors of the districts attached to Kūfah were as follows:]

1. in Qarqīsiyā', Jarīr b. 'Abdallāh;
2. in Ādharbayjān, al-Ash'ath b. Qays;
3. in Ḥulwān, 'Utaybah b. al-Nahhās;
4. in Māh, Mālik b. Ḥabīb;
5. in Hamadan, al-Nusayr;
6. in al-Rayy, Sa'īd b. Qays;
7. in Iṣfahān, al-Sā'ib b. al-Aqra';
8. in Māsabadhān, Ḥubaysh;[459]

The public treasury was under 'Uqbah b. 'Amr, and at the time of 'Uthmān's death, Zayd b. Thābit executed justice on his behalf.

Citations from 'Uthmān's Sermons

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad—'Awn b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Utbah:[460] After the oath of allegiance had been rendered to him, 'Uthmān preached to the people in these words: "To proceed: I have been burdened [with a heavy load], and I have accepted it. Verily I will be a follower, not an innovator. Verily, you may demand three things from me, beyond [obedience to] the Book of Almighty God and the way (sunnah) established by His prophet. [First,] that I follow those who preceded me in matters that you have agreed upon and established. [Second,] that I adhere to the path laid out by pious and virtuous men (ahl al-khayr) in matters that you have not established by general consensus. [Third,] that I avoid coercion against you save in cases where you have deemed it necessary. Verily, this world is a verdant meadow that has been made [3059] to seem desirable to the people and toward which many among them incline. Do not rely on this world and put no trust in it, for it is not a thing to be trusted. Know that it leaves nothing behind save him who has left it behind."

458. Instead of Jābir b. Fulān; see de Goeje, Introductio, dcxxx.

459. Māsabadhān (Middle Persian, Masptan) is a district in the central Zagros mountains about 300 km. northeast of Kūfah. See Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 127, 142, 154.

460. Instead of 'an 'Utbah; see de Goeje, Introductio, dcxxx.

It was transmitted to me in writing by al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Badr b. 'Uthmān—his paternal uncle: The last sermon that 'Uthmān preached before an assembled congregation was [as follows]: "Almighty God has given you this world only so that you may seek thereby the world to come. He did not give it to you that you should rely upon it. Verily this world perishes, while the world to come endures, so be certain that things perishable do not make you heedless or distract you from things everlasting. Prefer that which endures to that which passes away, for this world will be cut off and [our] journey is toward God. Fear Almighty God, for the fear of Him is a shield against his terrible power and a means of access to Him. Beware of the Divine wrath. Adhere to your community (jamā'ah); do not divide into hostile sects. 'Remember God's blessing upon you when you were enemies, and He brought your hearts together, so that by His blessing you became brothers.'"[461]

Those Who Led the People in Prayer in the Mosque of the Messenger of God while 'Uthmān Was under Siege

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar (al-Wāqidī)—Rabī'ah b. 'Uthmān: The muezzin Sa'd al-Qaraẓ came to 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib on that day and asked, "Who will lead the people in prayer?" 'Alī responded, "Summon Khālid b. Zayd." [Sa'd] did so, and Khālid b. Zayd led the people in prayer. That was the first day it was known that the name of Abū Ayyūb al-Anṣārī was Khālid b. Zayd.[462] He led them in prayer for some days, then 'Alī took over this office thereafter.

461. Qur'ān 3:98.
462. I follow the fuller reading in Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil (Beirut), III, 187.

[3060] According to Muḥammad (al-Wāqidī)—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abd al-'Azīz—'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr b. Ḥazm: The muezzin came to 'Uthmān and called him to the prayer. But ('Uthmān) said, "I am not coming out to pray. Go to someone who is." The muezzin came to 'Alī, and he commanded Sahl b. Ḥunayf [to lead the prayer]. (Sahl) thus led the prayer on the day when the final siege of 'Uthmān commenced. This was the night on which the new moon [signaling the beginning of Dhū al-Ḥijjah] was sighted. (Sahl) led them in prayer until the Feast of Sacrifice,[463] when 'Alī led the festival prayer. Then he [continued to] lead them in prayer until ('Uthmān) was killed.

According to (al-Wāqidī)—'Abdallāh b. Nāfi'—his father—Ibn 'Umar: When 'Uthmān was besieged, Abū Ayyūb led the people in prayer for some days, then 'Alī led them in the Friday and festival prayers until ('Uthmān) was killed.

The Threnodies Composed for 'Uthmān

After his murder the poets spoke about him—some in praise, some in derision, some in tearful lamentation, some in gleeful joy. Those who lauded him included Ḥassān b. Thābit al-Anṣārī, Ka'b b. Mālik al-Anṣārī, and Tamīm b. Ubayy b. Muqbil, as well as others.

Ḥassān praised and lamented him and derided his murderer, in these words:

Have you abandoned your campaigns on the roads [leading to the frontier]?
And do you now make war against us at Muḥammad's grave?
How evil the guidance which you give the Muslims!
[3061] How evil the willful sinner's command!
If you advance [against us], we shall make the hospitality all mild and gentle offered to your chiefs around Medina, into a spear.
Or if you turn back, what an evil thing is the purpose for which you have traveled [here];

463. That is, 10 Dhū al-Ḥijjah.

the like of your amir's command was ill guided.
It is as though the Prophet's Companions were fattened animals to be slaughtered at eventide by the mosque gate.
I weep for Abū 'Amr as befits his virtuous conduct;
he has made his dwelling in Baqī' al-Gharqad.

He also says:

If the house of Ibn Arwā stands desolate—one door beaten down, another burnt and shattered—
Then he who seeks the good may encounter what he desires therein, and fame and good repute may strive [to enter] it.
O people, display your true selves!
For sincerity and falsehood are not equal in God's sight.
Uphold the rights of the people's lord, and you will learn of [3062] bands of horsemen [coming to your aid], and behind them yet other bands.
Leading them is Ḥabīb,[464] the meteor of death, wearing a breastplate, with anger displayed upon his face.

[Ḥassān] composed many verses about ['Uthmān]. Ka'b b. Mālik al-Anṣārī spoke in these words:

Woe, O men, for thy life, robbed by force [from thee, 'Uthmān], and for thine overflowing tears, now dry!
Alas for a fearful thing which has befallen me, which has crushed the mountains, so that in vast convulsions they have fallen.
The caliph's murder was a thing atrocious;
a terrifying calamity has arisen thereby.
Before the murder of the Imām the very stars bow down;
and because of it the sun is in eclipse.
Ah, how grief burdened my soul, when at early morn they hoisted the bier onto their shoulders.

464. Instead of khabīth, "a vicious man," in accordance with Ibrāhīm's text [IV, 424, n. 5]. Ibrāhīm explains this as an allusion to Ḥabīb b. Maslamah al-Fihrī, placed by Mu'āwiyah in command of the Syrian troops whom he had dispatched [too little and too late] to aid 'Uthmān.

They brought their brother and lowered him into the grave.
What does his grave, covered over, conceal—
What benefit, what sovereignty and sense of duty, wherein he led the way among the people, what meritorious deed?
How many an orphan did he support;[465]
the wretched would visit his house time and again.
Without cease he would receive them and mend their wrongs, until I heard the sound of anxious sighing.
He has made his dwelling in al-Baqī', and [his assassins] have scattered, resolved to flee.
The Fire is their rendezvous for having murdered their Imam, honest 'Uthmān, in his palace.[466]
To dignified forbearance he added duty, and the good in him was manifest and known to all.
[3063] O Ka'b, cease not to weep for a lord, so long as you shall live and travel throughout the lands.
Even as an old man I shall mourn Abū 'Amr, and lament their perverted deed, since he was no fool.
Let the horsemen mourn him as they defend [us] against calamity between mountain defiles and soldiers in serried ranks.
They have murdered you, 'Uthmān—by thy life, the murder of a man undefiled [by sin], in the shelter [of his own home].

Ḥassān composed these lines:

He whom death gladdens with unmixed joy, let him come into a den of savage lions[467] in the house of 'Uthmān—
[Let him come against] men clad in iron mail, wearing helmets fitted with nose guards to adorn their bodies.
By patience you will be redeemed, O my mother and [the children] whom she bore.

---

465. Lit., "Of how many an orphan would he set the bones."
466. See de Goeje (Introductio, dcxxx), who suggests al-balāṭ in place of al-tilād (text) or al-bilād (ms.).
467. The lions are 'Uthmān's assassins.

Patient suffering in the face of something hateful may at times bring [us] benefit.
We were well-pleased with the Syrians as they made haste [to aid us], and with the amir [Mu'āwiyah] and [our] brothers.
Verily I will be among them, whether they are absent or present.
So long as I live and am called Ḥassān,
Very soon you will hear in their lands,
"God is most great! Vengeance for 'Uthmān!" [3064]
Would that I knew, would that the birds would inform me, what went on between 'Alī and Ibn 'Affān.

Al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah b. Abī Mu'ayṭ spoke these words in urging on 'Umārah b. 'Uqbah:[468]

Yea, the best of men save three[469] has been killed by al-Tujībī, who came from Egypt.
If my opinion of my mother's son is sound,
'Umārah will not seek vengeance.
He will pass the night, mulling revenge for Ibn 'Affān, encamped between Khawarnaq and the Castle.[470]

To this al-Faḍl b. 'Abbās added the following verses: [3065]

Do you seek a vengeance to which you have no right?
What is Ibn Dhakwān al-Ṣafūrī next to 'Amr?"[471]
Just as the ass's foal claims descent from her mother [the horse] and forgets her father [the ass] when she vies with those possessing rightful pride.
Verily the best of men after Muḥammad [i.e., 'Alī], is 468. Al-Walīd had been 'Uthmān's governor in Kūfah; 'Umārah is his reluctant brother. Al-Walīd and 'Uthmān were half-brothers, since both had the same mother; it is this fact that gives the second line in the following poem its sting.

469. That is, Muḥammad, Abū Bakr, and 'Umar.

470. Khawarnaq was a famous, almost legendary palace near al-Ḥīrah erected for Bahram Gur (420–438) by the Lakhmid king al-Nu'mān al-A'war. Presumably the "Castle" (al-qaṣr) refers to another such palace (perhaps the one named Sadīr) in al-Ḥīrah. See L. Massignon, "Khawarnaḳ," *EI*², IV, 1133.

471. The point of this line is a bit obscure. 'Amr was 'Uthmān's eldest son (born before he became a Muslim). Ibn Dhakwān seems to have been a son of 'Uthmān's half-brother al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah by a Jewish woman from Sepphoris (al-Ṣaf-the executor of the Chosen Prophet in the sight of God,

The first who prayed, the twin to His prophet, and the first to strike down the sinners at Badr.
Had the Helpers seen wrong done to your cousin, they would have brought him aid against his wrong.
It is shame enough [for him] that they advised his death and surrendered him to the Egyptian mobs.

Al-Ḥubāb b. Yazīd al-Mujāshiʿ, the paternal uncle of al-Farazdaq,[472] spoke these words:

By my father's life, you must not mourn.
The best man, save only a few, has perished.
The people have become fools in their religion, and behind him Ibn ʿAffān has left enduring evil.
You who reproach [him]: every man perishes, so follow the path of virtue to God.

---

fūriyyah], a village near Nazareth. A man of such dubious descent could hardly claim to be the avenger of his lineage.

472. The famous Umayyad court poet, d. ca. 110/728. See R. Blachère, "al-Farazdaḳ," *EI*², II, 788–89.

The History of al-Ṭabarī

VOLUME XVI

The Community Divided

TRANSLATED BY ADRIAN BROCKETT

The Events of the Year

35 (cont'd) (655/656)

[3066]

ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib was given allegiance[1] as caliph in Medina in this year.

An Account of the Allegiance—Who Gave It and When

Earlier biographers give different accounts. According to some of them, the Companions of the Messenger of Allāh asked ʿAlī whether he would accept investiture on their behalf and on behalf of the Muslims, but he declined. When they refused to accept his decision, however, and asked him again, he did accept.

Details of this account and its authorities.

According to Jaʿfar b. ʿAbdallāh al-Muḥammadī[2]—ʿAmr b. Ḥammād[3] and ʿAlī b. Ḥusayn—Ḥusayn—his father[4]—ʿAbd al-

1. Done with a handclasp, as in any contractual agreement; see Lane, 285a–b; *EI*², s.v. Bayʿa.
2. For this informant, see also I, 2983, 2986, 3004.
3. Ibn Ṭalḥah; see I, 2986.
4. ʿĪsā; see I, 2986.

Malik b. Abī Sulaymān al-Fazārī[5]—Sālim b. Abī al-Jaʿd al-Ashjaʿī[6]—Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah:[7] I was with my father when ʿUthmān was killed. He got up and entered his house, and the Companions of the Messenger of Allāh came to him and said, "This man has been killed, and the people must have an imām. We know of no one at this time more suitable for this, of greater precedence in Islam, and of closer relationship to the Messenger of Allāh than yourself." He said, "Don't do this. It's better that I be a wazīr than an amīr." They replied, "No, by Allāh! We will go no farther until we have given allegiance to you." He said, "It should be done in the mosque then. Allegiance must not be given [3067] secretly or without the approval of the Muslims."

According to Sālim b. Abī al-Jaʿd—ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās:[8] I did not like the idea of ʿAlī's going to the mosque because I was afraid there would be a commotion around him, but he insisted on going there. When he went in, the Muhājirūn and the Anṣār[9] went in too and gave him allegiance, and everyone else followed suit.

According to Jaʿfar [b. ʿAbdallāh al-Muḥammadī]—ʿAmr and ʿAlī—Ḥusayn—his father—Abū Maymūnah—Abū Bashīr al-ʿĀbidī: I was in Medina when ʿUthmān was killed.[10] The Muhājirūn and the Anṣār gathered, among them Ṭalḥah[11] and al-Zubayr,[12] and they came to ʿAlī and said, "Abū Ḥasan, let us give you allegiance." He said, "I have no need to be caliph; I am with you anyway and whomever you choose, I will be satisfied. So just make your choice." They replied, "We'll choose no one but you." They came and saw him a number of times after the murder of ʿUthmān, and on the last visit they said to him, "The people's interests are not served except by a single authority, and things

5. D. 145/763; U. Sezgin, 192–93.
6. D. 100/718; known as a muḥaddith; U. Sezgin, 193.
7. Son of ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib. Cf. the similar report with a different lower isnād, p. 5, below; Caetani, VIII, §370.
8. ʿAlī's famous first cousin, *EI*², s.v. For this report, cf. Caetani, VIII, 371.
9. In the Qurʾān these twice form a pair. The Muhājirūn were Meccans who had performed the hijrah, or emigration, to Medina, and the Anṣār were Medinan allies, or helpers.
10. For this report, cf. Caetani, VIII, 372.
11. Ibn ʿUbaydallāh; *EI*¹, s.v.
12. *EI*¹, s.v.

have taken too long."[13] He replied, "You have come to see me a number of times, and here you are again, so let me make a suggestion. If you accept it, I will agree to take command; but, if you don't, I'll be quit of it." They replied, "Whatever you say we will accept, Allāh willing." So he mounted the minbar (pulpit), and the people crowded around, and he said, "I was unwilling to take command of you, but you insisted that I should. You must be aware, however, that I ask for no authority from which you are excluded, other than to hold the keys to your treasury. Know also that I would never take a dirham from it without your permission. Is this acceptable?" They agreed. So he said, "O Allāh, bear witness against them!" and he accepted their allegiance on this condition. Abū Bashīr added, "I was standing that very day by the Messenger of Allāh's minbar, and I heard his words."

According to ʿUmar b. Shabbah[14]—ʿAlī b. Muḥammad[15]—Abū Bakr al-Hudhalī—Abū al-Mulayḥ:[16] On Saturday, 18 Dhū al-Ḥijjah (June 17), when ʿUthmān was killed, ʿAlī went out to the market. A crowd followed him and hurried up to him,[17] so he went into the courtyard of Banū ʿAmr b. Mabdhūl[18] and said to Abū ʿAmrah b. ʿAmr b. Miḥṣan,[19] "Lock the door!" The crowd then came and knocked at the door, and Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr entered with them and said, "Stretch out your hand, ʿAlī!" and the two of them gave allegiance to him. Ḥabīb b. Dhu'ayb[20] was [3068]

13. Caetani, VIII, 372 n. 1, rejects these accounts of delay and says that ʿAlī allowed himself to be proclaimed on the very day of ʿUthmān's murder, as in ʿUmar b. Shabbah's report, and al-Ṭabarī's remark, (p. 15, below) that people reckon ʿAlī's caliphate from ʿUthmān's murder.

14. D. c. 259/873; Petersen, 92 n. 45; Nagel, 230–33. For this report, cf. Caetani, VIII, 375.

15. More usually called Abū al-Ḥasan al-Madā'inī, from Baṣrah, b. 135/752, d. 215–31/830–45; *EI*², s.v. al-Madā'inī. See also Petersen, 92–99, esp. 98.

16. Following Ibrāhīm's vocalization.

17. Wa-bahashū fī wajhihi. Al-bahsh ilā "hastening to get something"; Ibn Manẓūr, VII, 155.5; cf. Hava, 49; p. 100, below. Glossed irtāḥū ilayh; "pleased with him," in 428 n. 1.

18. A tribe of the Anṣār (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 186).

19. Bashīr, who fell by ʿAlī's side at Ṣiffīn (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 186, II, 225).

20. Al-Balādhurī calls him Qabīṣah b. Dhu'ayb al-Asadī but is probably confused. Qabīṣah b. Dhu'ayb al-Khuzā'ī was the well-known secretary to ʿAbd al-Malik (Caskel and Strenziok, II, 454; VIII, 329) but is not known to have had a brother Ḥabīb (Caskel, table 199).

looking at Ṭalḥah when he gave allegiance and said, "It is a withered hand that first gave allegiance. No good will come of this!"[21] ʿAlī then went out to the mosque and ascended the minbar, his sandals in his hand, wearing a waist wrap and a cape[22] and a silk turban, supporting himself on a bow. All those there gave him allegiance. Then they brought Saʿd,[23] and ʿAlī said, "Give allegiance." But he replied, "I won't do so until the people have, but, believe me, you've nothing to fear from me." ʿAlī said, "Let him go." Then they brought Ibn ʿUmar,[24] and ʿAlī said, "Give allegiance." And he replied, "I won't do so until the people have." "Bring me a guarantor,"[25] ʿAlī said to him. "I don't see why I should,"[26] replied Ibn ʿUmar. "Let me cut his head off," said al-Ashtar,[27] to which ʿAlī replied, "No, leave him alone! I'll be his guarantor. I knew it; you[28] are as rude as a man as you were as a child."

According to Muḥammad b. Sinān al-Qazzāz—Isḥāq b. Idrīs—Hushaym—Ḥumayd—al-Ḥasan: I saw al-Zubayr b. al-ʿAwwām give allegiance to ʿAlī in one of the palm gardens in Medina.

According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—his father[29]—Wahb b. Jarīr—[3069] his father—Yūnus b. Yazīd al-Aylī—al-Zuhrī:[30] The people gave

21. La yatimmu hādhā al-amr, as also p. 14, below. "This affair will not finish well"; (Caetani, VIII, 324).

22. Perhaps sleeved like a ṭaylasān; cf. Lane, 1894c, 1886c.

23. Ibn Abī Waqqāṣ (cf. p. 9, below), the famous Meccan general and governor of Kūfah. He is said to have retired from politics at this time; hence, "you have nothing to fear from me" (EI[1], s.v.). He was a member of the electoral council that elected ʿUthmān; see p. 10, below.

24. ʿAbdallāh, son of the caliph preceding ʿUthmān (and therefore especially esteemed). He was a nonvoting adviser to the electoral council and at the election of other caliphs is said to have conformed to the will of the majority, as here (EI[2], s.v.). See also Caetani, IX, 22 n. 4.

25. Ḥamīl, glossed kafīl in IA, 191, and in an editor's note in Ibrāhīm, 428 n. 3.

26. A rude reply; cf. p. 34, below.

27. Mālik b. al-Ḥārith al-Nakhaʿī, an early comer to Kūfah and one of the qurrāʾ or paratribal elements (Hinds, "Alignments," 357ff., esp. 360), a persistent agitator against ʿUthmān and the ruling elite and a supporter of ʿAlī. He is said to have been one of those who besieged ʿUthmān's house (I, 2989–90) and regarded as one of his murderers (Hinds, "Murder," 460). For his threats against those reluctant to give ʿAlī allegiance, see also pp. 12–14, below; al-Dīnawarī, 152. See also EI[2], I, 704. He died in 37/658.

28. I.e., Ibn ʿUmar; cf. IA, 205, where ʿAlī says it to him after trying to persuade him to join him against ʿĀʾishah. See Glossarium, CCXXXI; p. 34, below.

29. Zuhayr b. Ḥarb.

30. ʿUbaydallāh b. Saʿīd? (Wellhausen, 5). See also Juynboll.

allegiance to ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib, so he sent for al-Zubayr and Ṭalḥah. He then invited them to give allegiance, but Ṭalḥah delayed.[31] Unsheathing his sword Mālik al-Ashtar then said, "By Allāh! You had better give allegiance, or else I will strike you through the forehead." "There is no way out of this," said Ṭalḥah, and he gave allegiance, followed by al-Zubayr and everyone else. Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr then asked ʿAlī to give them the governorships of al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah. "You are to stay with me. I need you to share the burden," he replied. "I would be lost without you."

According to al-Zuhrī: There is another report according to which he said to them, "If you wish, give allegiance to me, or, if you wish, I'll do so to you." They replied, "We'll give allegiance to you." A little later they explained, "We only did it out of fear for our lives, since we knew that he would never give us allegiance." Four months after ʿUthmān's murder, they went down[32] to Mecca.

According to ʿUmar b. Shabbah—Abū al-Ḥasan [al-Madāʾinī]—Abū Mikhnaf[33]—ʿAbd al-Malik b. Abī Sulaymān—Sālim b. Abī al-Jaʿd—Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah: The evening ʿUthmān was killed I was with my father [ʿAlī] until he withdrew to his house. A group of the Companions of the Messenger of Allāh then came to him and said, "This man has been killed, and the people must have an imām." "Maybe there should be an electoral council," he replied. "You are our choice," they replied, to which he said, "To the mosque then! For it must be all the people's choice." So ʿAlī went to the mosque, where he was given allegiance. Apart from a very small number, all the Anṣār gave him allegiance. At this Ṭalḥah remarked, "A dog just licking its nose is all we'll get from this!"[34]

---

31. Following the text's and Ibrāhīm's emendations, *fa-talakkā, fa-talakka*ʾ. Caetani, VIII, 323, "sought an excuse to evade doing it." Pointing the ms. fa-talakkaz, see Hava (Syrian dialect), would mean "scoffed."

32. Reading either the ms. fa-ṭamarā, or Prym's and Ibrāhīm's emendation faẓaharā (Lane, 1879b–c, 1926b–c). Caetani, VIII, 323, "they went to Mecca." For the four months, see p. 43, below (a continuation of this report), and *EI*², 414.

33. The famous historian.

34. I.e., no position in the rule. The ms. has ka-nakhsah "A dog poking its nose [in the earth] is all we'll get from this!" I.e., "we are only going to get hurt" for the text's ka-ḥissah. For the latter, de Goeje suggests "As much as a dog's nose smells, i.e., a very small thing" (Glossarium, CLXCII), but to judge by today's sniffer dogs this is not an apt simile.

[3070] According to ʿUmar [b. Shabbah]—Abū al-Ḥasan [al-Madāʾinī]—an elder from Banū Hāshim—ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥasan: When ʿUthmān was killed the Anṣār gave allegiance to ʿAlī, apart from a very small number of them, among whom were Ḥassān b. Thābit,[35] Kaʿb b. Mālik,[36] Maslamah b. Mukhallad,[37] Abū Saʿīd al-Khudrī,[38] Muḥammad b. Maslamah,[39] al-Nuʿmān b. Bashīr,[40] Zayd b. Thābit,[41] Rāfiʿ b. Khadīj,[42] Faḍālah b. ʿUbayd,[43] and Kaʿb b. ʿUjrah.[44] They were all of the ʿUthmāniyyah.[45]

According to ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan: Someone then asked him, "How come these men of the ʿUthmāniyyah refused to give allegiance?" He replied, "As for Ḥassān, he was a poet who didn't care what he did. As for Zayd b. Thābit, ʿUthmān put him in charge of the dīwān[46] and the treasury,[47] and, when ʿUthmān was besieged, he twice called out, 'Anṣār! Be helpers[48] of Allāh!' to which Abū Ayyūb[49] replied, 'You're only supporting him because he gave you many date palms.'[50] And, as for Kaʿb b. Mālik, ʿUthmān had put him in charge of alms from Muzaynah and let him keep what he took from them."[51]

[Again according to ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan]—anonymous—al-

35. A Khazrajī poet from Medina (*EI*², s.v.), to whom poetry is ascribed in the Sīrah of Ibn Hishām. Cf. the slightly different list, p. 9, below.

36. Another Khazrajī poet to whom poetry is ascribed in the Sīrah of Ibn Hishām. After ʿUthmān's death he went to Muʿāwiyah (*EI*², s.v.).

37. Al-Khazrajī (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 187, II, 401). Ibn Makhlad, according to Ibn Khaldūn, I, 439, and Caetani, VIII, 325.

38. Saʿd b. Mālik al-Khazrajī (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 188, II, 500).

39. Fought at Badr (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 180, II, 424). Al-Dīnawarī, 152.

40. A Khazrajī poet (Caskel and Strenziok, II, 451). After ʿUthmān's death he went to Muʿāwiyah, who later gave him the governorship of Kūfah (*EI*¹, s.v.).

41. Khazrajī secretary to the Prophet (*EI*¹, s.v.). The most prominent figure in the traditions about the collection of the Qurʾān; see Burton, index, s.v.

42. Companion of the Prophet and kinsman of Muḥammad b. Maslamah (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 180, II, 483), or perhaps al-Balī (329), kinsman of Kaʿb b. ʿUjrah.

43. Died as qāḍī of Damascus (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 177, II, 243).

44. Al-Balī, Companion of the Prophet (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 329, II, 366).

45. I.e., partisans of ʿUthmān.

46. The central register, said to have been instituted by ʿUmar (*EI*², s.v.).

47. Bayt al-māl (*EI*², s.v.).

48. Anṣār.

49. Khālid b. Zayd al-Najjārī al-Anṣārī; fought at Badr and was a close ally of ʿAlī. D. c. 49/669 (*EI*², s.v. Abū Ayyūb; Caskel and Strenziok, I, 186, II, 343).

50. ʿIḍdān. IA, 191, has ʿibdān "slaves."

51. They should have been for the poor.

Zuhrī: A group of people fled from Medina to Syria without giving allegiance to ʿAlī, and Qudāmah b. Maẓʿūn,[52] ʿAbdallāh b. Sallām,[53] and al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah[54] did not give allegiance either.

According to others, Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr only gave allegiance to ʿAlī unwillingly, and some said al-Zubayr did not give it at all.

Those who said this

According to ʿAbdallāh b. Aḥmad al-Marwazī—his father—Sulaymān—ʿAbdallah—Jarīr b. Ḥāzim—Hishām b. Abī Hishām, [3071] mawlā of[55] ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān—a Kūfan elder—another elder: ʿUthmān was besieged while ʿAlī was in Khaybar,[56] and, when he came back, ʿUthmān sent a message for him to come, so he set off quickly. So I said, "I'll set off with him and overhear their conversation." When ʿAlī came to him, ʿUthmān spoke with him, praised Allāh, and continued: "I have certain legal claims on you, the claim of Islam, the claim of brotherhood—as you know, the Messenger of Allāh made you and me brothers at the time he made the Companions brothers—and claims of blood and marriage, and the pacts and agreements you swore with me individually. By Allāh! Let's suppose none of these claims had any force and we behaved as if we were back in a jāhiliyyah. Then it would be thanks to the neglect of Banū ʿAbd Manāf[57] if the Taymī[58] usurped their power." ʿAlī praised Allāh and said, "All that you 52. Al-Qurashī; fought at Badr and was governor of Baḥrayn under ʿUthmān (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 24, II, 470).

53. Is this the Medinan Jewish convert? (*EI*², s.v.; Watt, 197). Ibn Khaldūn I, 439. The ms. has ʿAbdallāh b. Salāmah (al-Aslamī(?) the companion of the Prophet; Caskel, table 201, no. 118; Ibn Hishām, 837, 842), but Prym suggests that the ms. originally may have read ʿAbdallāh b. Sallām wa-Salamah b. Salāmah, presumably following IA, 191, who has ʿAbdallāh b. Sallām wa-Ṣuhayb b. Sinān wa-Salamah b. Salāmah b. Waqsh. Cf. p. 9, below.

54. A Thaqafī from Ṭāʾif and governor of al-Baṣrah under ʿUmar (who was killed by his slave) and of al-Kūfah under Muʿāwiyah. During the caliphates of ʿUthmān and ʿAlī he retired from prominence (*EI*¹, s.v.).

55. Prym (followed by Caetani, VIII, 326) suggests inserting "the family of," but it was customary to refer to people in this way long after the original client and patron were dead.

56. An oasis, said to have been largely Jewish at the time of the Prophet, c. 150 km/95 miles to the north of Medina (*EI*², s.v.).

57. The clan of ʿUthmān (ʿAbd Shams) and ʿAlī (Hāshim).

58. Banū Taym was Ṭalḥah's clan; i.e., "Ṭalḥah will become caliph."

have mentioned about your claims on me is quite right, and your remark that, were we in such a jāhiliyyah, then it would be thanks to the neglect of Banū ʿAbd Manāf if the Taymī usurped their power is also true. I'll show you."[59] So ʿAlī then left and went to the mosque, where he saw Usāmah[60] sitting, so he called him and took hold of his arm and then set off for Ṭalḥah. I followed him, and we went into Ṭalḥah b. ʿUbaydallāh's house, which was crowded[61] with people. ʿAlī went up to Ṭalḥah and said, "What's this awful situation you've fallen into?" He replied, "Abū Ḥasan, you blame me after things have gotten so far out of [3072] control?"[62] ʿAlī said nothing in reply and came to the treasury and said, "Open this door!" When he could not get the keys he said, "Break it down!" So the door of the treasury was forced open, and he said, "Bring out the money!" He then began distributing the money to all the people.[63] When those who were in Ṭalḥah's house heard what ʿAlī was doing, they began secretly slipping away to him until Ṭalḥah was left on his own. When ʿUthmān heard of this, he was pleased. Ṭalḥah then walked back to ʿUthmān's house. I said to myself, "By Allāh! I'll see what he says." So I followed him. He asked ʿUthmān's permission to enter, and when he went in he said, "Commander of the Faithful, Allāh have mercy on me, I repent to him. I wanted something, but Allāh prevented me from attaining it." ʿUthmān replied, "By Allāh! You haven't come repentant but defeated. Allāh will punish you, Ṭalḥah."

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Saʿd—Muḥammad b. ʿUmar [al-Wāqidī][64]—Abū Bakr b. Ismāʿīl b. Muḥammad b. Saʿd b. Abī

---

59. I.e., "I won't let Ṭalḥah take over."

60. Ibn Zayd b. Ḥārithah. Zayd was the Prophet's adopted son and former slave (EI[1], s.v.). Usāmah was a protégé of the Prophet and later of ʿUthmān and is said not to have given ʿAlī allegiance; see p. 9, below, and EI[1], s.v.

61. Reading diḥās as in Ibrāhīm, Addenda, DCXXXI, and Glossarium, CCXXXVI. Ibn Manẓūr (VII, 379 l. 14) cites the report about Ṭalḥah, in which his house was diḥās, ay dhāt diḥās, wa-huwa al-imtilāʾ wa-al-ziḥām. See also Hava, 198: daḥḥas "to fill (a house): crowd)."

62. Lit., "after the girth has touched the two teats"; it should be much farther forward; see Freytag, I, 293.

63. To wrong-foot Ṭalḥah.

64. D. 207/823 (EI[1]). See also Petersen, 84 n. 5.

Waqqāṣ[65]—his father [Ismāʿīl]—Saʿd [b. Abī Waqqāṣ].[66] Ṭalḥah said, "I gave allegiance with a sword over my head." I do not know whether the sword was over his head or not, but I do know he gave allegiance unwillingly. The people gave allegiance to ʿAlī in Medina, but seven men were cautious and did not give it. They were Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ, Ibn ʿUmar, Ṣuhayb,[67] Zayd b. Thābit, Muḥammad b. Maslamah, Salamah[68] b. Waqsh, and Usāmah b. Zayd. As far as we know, not one of the Anṣār refrained from giving allegiance.

According to al-Zubayr b. Bakkār—his father's brother Muṣʿab b. ʿAbdallāh—his father, ʿAbdallāh b. Muṣʿab—Mūsā b. ʿUqbah[69] [3073]
—Abū Ḥabībah,[70] mawlā of al-Zubayr: When the people killed ʿUthmān and gave allegiance to ʿAlī, the latter went to al-Zubayr and asked if he could come in. I informed al-Zubayr so he unsheathed his sword and put it under his bed and said, "Let him in!" So I let him in, and he greeted al-Zubayr, who was standing opposite him.[71] He then left, and al-Zubayr said, "Something occurred to the man that made him leave quickly. Stand where he was, and see whether any part of the sword would have been visible." I did so and could see the point of the sword, so I told him, and he said, "That's what hurried the man up." As he left, the people questioned ʿAlī, and he answered, "I found the most dutiful and friendly nephew,"[72] so they thought it had gone well. ʿAlī said that al-Zubayr had given him allegiance.

---

65. The ms. (according to Prym, by dittography) has Abū Bakr b. Ismāʿīl b. Muḥammad b. ʿUmar.

66. Al-Qurashī, leader at Qādisiyyah; d. Kūfah 50 or 55 (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 20, II, 495; EI[1]).

67. Ibn Sinān of Taghlib b. Wāʾil (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 163, II, 540; cf. IA, 191, and p. 66, below).

68. As in the text and Ibrāhīm. The ms. has Maslamah, apparently by dittography. IA has "Salamah b. Salāmah b. Waqsh [al-Anṣārī]"; cf. p. 7, above; Caskel and Strenziok, I, 179, II, 505.

69. Ibn Abī ʿAyyāsh al-Asadī, an important early historical writer; d. 141/758 (F. Sezgin, 286).

70. See Ṭabarī, I, 2981.

71. Reading either bi-naḥwihi, as in the text, or bi-naḥrihi, as in Ibrāhīm; Addenda, DCXXXI; Glossarium, DIII.

72. Awṣal refers to ṣilat al-raḥim. Al-Zubayr was the son of Ṣafiyyah, sister of Abū Ṭālib. He was also the son of the Prophet's wife Khadījah's brother and married Asmāʾ; daughter of Abū Bakr and sister of ʿĀʾishah.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)[73]—Shuʿayb—Sayf b. ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Sawād b. Nuwayrah, Ṭalḥah b. al-Aʿlam,[74] Abū Ḥārithah, and Abū ʿUthmān: Medina remained under the [interim] governorship of al-Ghāfiqi b. Ḥarb[75] for five days after the murder of ʿUthmān. During this time all the parties searched unsuccessfully for someone who would agree to take command. The Egyptians approached ʿAlī, but he hid from them and took refuge in the walled gardens of Medina. When they found him, he withdrew from them and repeatedly disowned them and their plan. The Kūfans searched unsuccessfully for al-Zubayr, so they sent messengers to wherever he was. He also withdrew from them and disowned their plan. The Baṣrans searched for Ṭalḥah, and when he encountered them he, too, withdrew from them and repeatedly disowned their plan. They were thus agreed about murdering ʿUthmān, but at odds over whom they wanted next. On finding no one to assist or respond, they adopted the evil course of accepting the first person to respond and said, "We'll appoint none of these three." So they sent a [3074] message to Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ: "You were a member of the electoral council,[76] and we are unanimous [that you should lead]. So come forward for us to give you allegiance." He sent a message back: "Ibn ʿUmar[77] and I are not candidates, so I do not want to be involved in any way," and he quoted:

Never mix bad things with something good!
Disrobe yourself of them, and escape naked!

Then they came to Ibn ʿUmar ʿAbdallāh and said, "You are the son of ʿUmar, so take this leadership up!" "It involves vengeance," he replied, "so I am not going to interfere with it. Look for someone else." This left them at a loss, not knowing what to do, even though they were in control of the city.

---

73. Ibn Yaḥyā (Wellhausen, 5). See F. Sezgin's discussion of kitābah (241).

74. Al-Ḥanafī (see p. 52, below). A frequent authority of Sayf's but about whom little is known; see Hinds, "Sayf b. ʿUmar's Sources," 8.

75. Al-ʿAkkī, participant in the Egyptian opposition to ʿUthmān in Medina; see Hinds, "Murder," 456.

76. Al-shūrā, which elected ʿUthmān; see Smith, 142–63; Humphreys, 1990, 3 n. 5.

77. ʿAbdallāh; see note 24, above.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Sahl b. Yūsuf —al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad: When they[78] found Ṭalḥah he refused and said,

"One of the surprises of fate and time is that I have remained alone, able neither to make bitter nor sweet."[79]

When they heard this they said, "You are threatening us!"[80] So they stood up and left him. When they found al-Zubayr and said they wanted him, he also refused and said,

"When you saddle up to leave a house in Fayḥān[81] and its courtyard,[82] the soldiers swear at you."

When they heard this they said, "You are threatening us." When they found ʿAlī and said they wanted him, he also refused and said,

"If the leaders of my people complied with me,
I would give them a command that would subdue[83] the enemies."

When they heard this they said, "You are threatening us," and they stood up and left him.

According to ʿUmar b. Shabbah—Abū al-Ḥasan al-Madāʾinī—Maslamah b. Muḥārib—Dāwūd b. Abī Hind—al-Shaʿbī: After ʿUthmān was killed the people came to ʿAlī in the market in Medina and said to him, "Stretch out your hand so we can give you allegiance!" "Don't be precipitate!" he replied. "ʿUmar was a gifted man, yet he entrusted the matter to an electoral council, so wait until the people get together and consult." At this the people [3075]

78. The regicides again.

79. I.e., without any control at all. Ṭalḥah had expected to rule.

80. The frustrated ambitions expressed in the verse made them feel they would not fare well if he were caliph.

81. A name with a pleasant sound in Arabic, in this case, Medina. Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 282, has a Fayḥān in Muzaynah territory. Al-Zubayr is referring to himself and implying that the Medinans have treated him badly.

82. Reading wa-bāḥatihā with Ibrāhīm for the text's wa-bāʿatihā "and its merchants."

83. The editor of IA (196 n. 3) suggests bi-dhabḥi for yudīkhu, i.e., "a command to slaughter," but the latter reading is the famous one. This verse comes in two other Sayf reports in the text, pp. 19 (again from the mouth of ʿAlī) and 40, below (from the mouth of ʿĀʾishah and with a different second hemistich).

turned away from ʿAlī. Some of them then said, "If the men return to their garrisons with the news of the murder of ʿUthmān, and no one taking on the command after him, we won't be safe from schism and the disintegration of the community." So they went back to ʿAlī, and al-Ashtar took hold of ʿAlī's hand, but ʿAlī took his hand away and closed it. Al-Ashtar then said, "Yet again! After three times?![84] By Allāh! If you reject the rule again, you will look at it with pain for a long time."[85] The crowd then gave him allegiance. The Kūfans say that the first to give allegiance was al-Ashtar.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Abū Ḥārithah and Abū ʿUthmān: Early on the Thursday, the fifth day[86] after ʿUthmān's assassination, [the besiegers][87] gathered the Medinese together. They then realized that Saʿd and al-Zubayr had left town, and they found that Ṭalḥah had gone off to a walled garden of his. They also found that the Umayyads had fled, all but those who were unable to do so. Al-Walīd and Saʿīd had fled to Mecca among the first who had left, and Marwān had followed them. Others followed successively. When the Medinese assembled before the [besiegers], the Egyptians said to the Medinese, "You are the people of the electoral council. You decide on the imamate and your decision holds good for the community as a whole. So, look for a man to appoint to office, and we will go along with you." At this most of them said, "ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib! He is our choice."

According to ʿAlī b. Muslim—Ḥabbān[88] b. Hilāl—Jaʿfar b. Sulaymān—ʿAwf: As for me, I swear that I heard Muḥammad b. Sīrīn[89] say that ʿAlī came and said to Ṭalḥah, "Put out your hand, Ṭalḥah, so that I can give you allegiance." Ṭalḥah had replied, "You have more right. You are Commander of the Faithful, so put

84. I.e., before allegiance was given to Abu Bakr, ʿUmar, and ʿUthmān; see p. 51, below; Addenda, DCXXXI.

85. For the text's ʿaynayka de Goeje suggests ʿanyataka; see Glossarium, CDXXV; Addenda, DCXXXI. The latter is obscure and might mean "you will certainly confine your trouble to it for a time," i.e., "you will have trouble this time" (Lane, 2181a), but the text's reading is the famous one. IA conveniently omits this report.

86. See note 13, above.

87. The Kūfans, Baṣrans, and Egyptians.

88. Ḥibbān, according to Caetani, VIII, 333.

89. The famous traditionist (*EI*² s.v.).

out your hand." ʿAlī put out his hand, and he gave him allegiance.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad [3076] and Ṭalḥah: The Egyptians then said, "It's up to you,[90] people of Medina! We've given you two days and, by Allāh! if you don't sort it out,[91] tomorrow we'll kill ʿAlī and Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr and many others beside." The people then came to ʿAlī and said, "We give you allegiance, for you see what has happened to Islam and how much we have suffered at the hands of relatives."[92] "Leave me alone and look for someone else," ʿAlī replied. "We are confronted with a problem that has so many different aspects that no agreement can be reached on it."[93] "We beg you by Allāh," they said. "Don't you see what we see? Don't you see Islam? Don't you see civil war? Don't you fear Allāh?" "I agree to your request on the basis of what I see," he replied, "but you must realize that I do so, provided that I may lead you the way I know. Should you leave me, then I am no different from any of you, except for the fact that I am the most ready of you to hear and obey the one you place in authority over you." On that understanding they dispersed to meet again the next day. The people then discussed it among themselves and said, "If Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr join in,[94] then things will come right." So the Baṣrans sent one of their number, Ḥakīm b. Jabalah al-ʿAbdī,[95] with a group of men to al-Zubayr and said, "Be careful! Be straight with him!"[96] They brought him at sword point. To Ṭalḥah they sent a Kūfan, al-Ashtar, with a group

90. Dūnakum, or "Beware!"

91. Pointing the ms. tufrikhū, see Lane, 2362c. The text and Ibrāhīm adopt IA's tafraġū, meaning the same.

92. Min dhawī al-qurba, a reference to ʿUthmān's nepotism. IA has min bayn al-qurā, "the villages."

93. Lit., "many aspects, which hearts will not stand up to and minds will be puzzled by."

94. The allegiance.

95. Supporter of ʿAlī and leader of the Baṣran opposition to ʿUthmān. He was killed with seventy of his fellow ʿAbdīs defending al-Baṣrah before the Battle of the Camel; see p. 78, below. He was an outsider (Hinds, "Murder," 460–62). For the vocalization Ḥakīm, see Caskel and Strenziok, II, 295; Petersen, 81; Hinds, "Murder," 460. The text, IA (e.g., 214), Wellhausen (139), and Caetani, IX, 45–46, 65–66, have Ḥukaym.

96. Ḥābā here means to show false respect in order to make someone approve of you, to say things you want people to hear (Lane, 507c, gives meanings like "treat gently"). Ibrāhīm and Wellhausen (159) emend the text's and IA's lā tuḥābihi (here and with Ṭalḥah below) to lā tuḥāddihi "Don't stand up against him!" (cf. p. 58), but this does not fit. De Goeje also dismisses this emendation (Addenda, DCXXXI; Glossarium, CLXXIX).

of men and said, "Be careful! Be straight with him!" They brought him at sword point. The Kūfans and the Baṣrans were each well pleased at their captive's ignominy, and the Egyptians were de-[3077] lighted at what the Medinese had agreed to,[97] the Kūfans and the Baṣrans having been humiliated by being made subordinate to the Egyptians and a dependent group among them, and thus become even more enraged against Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr. When Friday came and the people gathered in the mosque, ʿAlī arrived to ascend the minbar and said, "Men! By common consent and permission the matter is in your hands. Nobody has a right to it but him whom you appoint. We dispersed yesterday in agreement on a decision, so if you wish, I will take control. But if not, I will bear no anger against anyone." "We hold to our opinion that we had when we left you yesterday," they replied, and they brought Ṭalḥah and said, "Give allegiance!" He said, "I only do this unwillingly." So it was a man with a withered hand who was the first to give allegiance. There was a man who was looking on disapprovingly[98] from the back of the crowd, and when he saw that Ṭalḥah was the first to give allegiance he said, "We belong to Allāh and to him we return.[99] The first hand to give allegiance to the Commander of the Faithful is a withered hand. No good will come of this!"[100] Al-Zubayr was then brought, and he said similar words to Ṭalḥah and gave allegiance. However, there are different accounts about him. Then a group of men were brought who had held back, and they said, "We give allegiance on the understanding that the Book of Allāh is upheld toward both relative and stranger, rich man and poor." He accepted this and then everyone else proceeded to give allegiance.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Abū Zuhayr al-Azdī—ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Jundab—his father: When ʿUthmān was killed and the people agreed on ʿAlī, al-Ashtar went and brought Ṭalḥah [to the mosque], who said to him, "Let me see what the people will do." But he did not let him and brought him,

97. I.e., ʿAlī. The Egyptian insurgents had always been pro-ʿAlī, whereas those from al-Kūfah were pro-al-Zubayr and those from al-Baṣrah pro-Ṭalḥah.

98. Glossarium, CCCLXXXIV.

99. Said on hearing of someone's death (Qur'ān 2:156). On p. 3, above, the man was named as Ḥabīb b. Dhu'ayb.

100. See p. 4, above.

pushing him violently. So he ascended the minbar and gave allegiance.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad b. Qays—al-Ḥārith al-Wālibī: Ḥakīm b. Jabalah brought al-Zubayr [to the mosque] to give allegiance, and al-Zubayr said, "One of the thieves of ʿAbd al-Qays[101] brought me, and I gave allegiance with a sword[102] at my neck." [3078]

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: Everyone then gave allegiance.

According to Abū Jaʿfar [al-Ṭabarī]: After these who had made stipulations,[103] those who had been brought[104] then complied as well. The authority of the Medinese was thus acknowledged as it had been in the past—except that the outsiders and riffraff came to have a say in it[105]—and they returned to their homes.

The Settlement of the Affair by Giving of Allegiance to ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib

According to Abū Jaʿfar [al-Ṭabarī]: ʿAlī was given allegiance on Friday, 25 Dhū'l-Ḥijjah (June 24), but people reckon it from the day that ʿUthmān was killed.[106]

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Sulaymān b.

---

101. I.e., Ḥakīm; see p. 13, above.

102. Al-lujj. This was allegedly the name of al-Ashtar's sword (al-Zabīdī, II, 93) rather than that of Ḥakīm.

103. The Medinans, specifically those who had held back.

104. Forcibly like Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr. Ṭabarī's Arabic is not clear.

105. Law lā makānu al-nuzzāʿ wa-al-ġawġāʾ fīhim. Generally al-nuzzāʿ/nuzzāʿ al-qabāʾil/al-nuzzāʿ min al-qabāʾil are strangers from certain tribes who live as neighbors to tribes other than theirs (Ibn Manẓūr, s.v.; Hinds, "Murder," 462), but in this section of al-Ṭabarī's history the words always apply to some of 'Uthmān's killers, e.g., p. 55, below. In the text here there has been some misunderstanding of the phrase law lā makānu al-nuzzāʿ wa-al-ġawġāʾ fīhim. Following Caetani (VIII, 335, 404), Petersen (152) takes this to be a thinly veiled reference to the Saba'iyyah and translates here "[the discontent of as-Saba'iyyah] already (then) was instrumental in fostering discords and tumults among them." However, this is to vocalize the ms. makānu al-nizāʿ, to take ġawġāʾ to mean "clamor, confusion of noise," and not to translate law lā. The Saba'iyyah were the alleged followers of 'Abdallāh b. Saba', accused by anti-Shī'ī factions of being a Jew who introduced extreme 'Alid doctrine (*EI*², s.v.; al-'Askarī, passim; Ḥusayn, I, 43, 98–100, 131; Petersen, 78 ff.; Wellhausen, 6). He was probably not a Jew (Levi della Vida, 495).

106. The Saturday before, the 18th.

Abī[107] al-Mughīrah—ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn: ʿAlī, in his first khuṭbah (sermon) as caliph,[108] praised and extolled Allāh and then said:

> Almighty and Glorious Allāh has sent down a Book that guides. In it He has made clear what is good and what is evil, so take hold of the good and leave the evil. Perform the religious duties to Allāh, and He will lead you to Paradise. Allāh has made a number of inviolable ordinances, which are well known, and He has favored the inviolability of the Muslim over all others, strengthening the Muslims with the declaration and belief in one God. A Muslim is someone from whom[109] people are safe, except when there is just cause; and it is not allowed to harm a Muslim, except when it is obligatory. Hasten to > [3079] the common cause, because the particular cause of each individual is death. The people are in front of you and behind you, urging you on, remember,[110] it is the Hour! Keep your load [of sins] light, and you will reach [Paradise quickly]. People are simply awaiting their Hereafter. Servants of Allāh! Fear Him in your dealings with His other servants and His places.[111] You are responsible even for land and animals, so obey Almighty and Glorious Allāh! Don't go against Him! So when you see good, follow it; when you see bad, leave it alone. "Remember when you were few in the land and considered weak."[112]

When ʿAlī had finished his sermon and was still on the minbar, the Egyptians recited:

Take it, but beware, Abū Ḥasan!
We are settling the leadership the way we fix a nose rein.[113]

---

107. Prym suggests deleting "Abī"; Caetani, VIII, 335, does not.
108. Al-Jāḥiẓ II, 50 ff., citing Abū ʿUbaydah, and Ibn Abī al-Ḥadīd (I, 272 ff.) have quite different versions of his first khuṭbah. Cf. also al-Shaykh al-Mufīd, 46.
109. Lit., "from whose tongue and hand."
110. Reading wa-innamā, as in the ms. This gives more emphasis than Prym's wa-inna mā, in which the mā is presumably zā'idah for the sake of rhetoric.
111. Rhetoric: Ittaqū Allāha ʿibādahu fi ʿibādihi wa-bilādihi.
112. Qur'ān 8:26. the implied remainder of the verse tells of Allāh's support.
113. This line also comes on p. 139, below.

The line should read:[114]

Take it to you, but beware, Abū Ḥasan!

ʿAlī recited in reply:

I was unable to do something and have no excuse.
I will be shrewd after this and carry on.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: As ʿAlī was about to leave for his house, the Saba'iyyah[115] recited:

Take it to you, but beware, Abū Ḥasan!
We are settling the leadership the way we fix a nose-rein,
With an army's assault like barriers[116] against ships, with Mashrafiyyah swords like rivers of milk.[117]

And we stab the kingship with a flexible sword like a rope, until it is trained not to resist.[118]

ʿAlī then recited some verses, mentioning how they had left the camp, expecting[119] the fulfillment of a promise they had been given, at a time when some people criticized them, so they had returned to them, unable to desist until:[120]

I was unable to do something and have no excuse. [3080]
I will be shrewd after this and carry on.
I will lift from behind me what I have been dragging and will join up what has been separated and scattered.

---

114. To make the meter more correct.
115. Al-Sabā'iyyah in the text, here as always.
116. Asdād, "mounds (cataracts) that obstruct sailing," with the strength of which the strength of a military marching column is being compared (Glossarium, CCLXXXVIII).
117. I.e., very many of them.
118. I.e., until it has been completely subdued (Glossarium, CDLXXXIV).
119. Or "insisting on": wa-al-kaynūnah ʿalā.
120. The ms. is corrupt; a line has been repeated by dittography but deleted, leaving a space. De Goeje translates this passage "and that they were holding the Medinans by promises that they had agreed with them, and motivated by which they had returned to them; whereas the Medinans were not able to resist" (Glossarium, CCCXCI).

If the speedy conqueror Death does not oppose me or they desert me when weapons are hastily taken up.

Then, when ʿAlī had gone inside [his house], Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr, along with a number of Companions, came to him in a group and said: "ʿAlī! We stipulated that Allāh's punishments should be applied.[121] These people participated in the death of this man and have thereby forfeited their lives." "My friends," he replied, "I am not unaware of what you know, but how can I deal with people who rule us, not we them? Your own slaves have rebelled with them, and your bedouin have joined them. They live with you, imposing on you what they want. So can you see a way of achieving any of what you want?" "No," they said. "No indeed," replied ʿAlī. "I think there is only one thing to be said, and I expect you will agree. This is something that does not belong to Islam,[122] and so these people will find that they have a persistent problem. This is that Satan has never made a religious law,[123] and those who follow his decree will disappear from the earth forever. If it is stirred up, Muslims will take up different positions with regard to this matter. One group will share your views, another will have views you do not share, and a third will disagree with both, until the people calm down and return to their senses and claims can be settled. So stop complaining to me, and see what will happen [3081] to you. Then return to me." ʿAlī was extremely restrictive with Quraysh and prevented them from leaving town under any circumstances. This reaction in him had been stirred up by the flight of the Umayyads. Then the people [who had assembled at his house] dispersed, some of them saying: "If this upheaval goes on, we won't be able to overcome these corrupt men.[124] Leaving

121. Iqāmat al-ḥudūd (sing. ḥadd). This phrase, translated as "Allāh's punishments" or "restrictive ordinances," occurs several times in the text (see index), e.g., on p. 39, below, where ʿĀ'ishah claims Qur'ānic justification for setting up a ḥadd over ʿUthmān's murder by stating that it was unjust (maẓlūm); she is referring to Qur'ān 17:33, which allows blood revenge in such cases: wa-lā taqtulū al-nafsa allatī ḥarrama Allāh illā bi-al-ḥaqqi waman qutila maẓlūman fa-qad ja'alnā li-wālihi sulṭānan fa-lā yusrif fī-al-qatli innahu kāna manṣūran. Cf. *EI*², s.v. al-Djamal.

122. Lit., "This is an affair of a jāhiliyyah."

123. Sharīʿah.

124. The killers of ʿUthmān.

this to what ʿAlī said[125] is better." Others were saying: "We will fulfill our duty[126] and won't delay the matter.[127] By Allāh! In his opinions and orders ʿAlī pays no attention to us, and we definitely see him being more harsh than anyone against Quraysh."

When ʿAlī was told this, he stood up, praised Allāh, and magnified Him. He then mentioned their excellence, his need for them, and his regard for them and that he was working for their defense. He pointed out that he wanted no more power over them than that and that his reward was with Almighty and Glorious Allāh. He then proclaimed, "The religious obligation to protect a slave who fails to return to his masters is null and void."[128] The Saba'iyyah then conspired with the bedouin to fight.[129] "We'll get the same treatment tomorrow," they said, "and we won't have any argument against them."

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: ʿAlī went out to the people on the third day and said: "All you citizens, expel the bedouin from among you! And all you bedouin, go back to your own wells!" But the Saba'iyyah refused, and the bedouin followed their lead. So ʿAlī went into his house, followed by Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr and a number of the Companions of the Prophet. And ʿAlī said: "Your revenge is right in front of you! So kill!"[130] They replied, "They[131] won't understand that!"[132] But ʿAlī replied: "By Allāh! Tomorrow they'll be yet more dim-witted and rebellious," and he recited:

If the majority of my people complied with me, [3082]
I would give them a command that would subdue the enemies.[133]

---

125. I.e., temporizing.
126. I.e., kill the killers.
127. ʿAlī's position.
128. An attempt to split off the slave elements of the opposition. See also *EI*², s.v. ʿAbd; Dhimma; cf. Ayoub.
129. Fa-tadhāmarat. The fifth stem, "then angrily blamed each other over their loss," might be preferable; it is a bit early for talk of fighting.
130. ʿAlī is mocking Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr. They had advocated immediate revenge, but here they were retreating from the (alleged) regicides.
131. The Saba'iyyah and the bedouin.
132. I.e., "It's no use trying to convince them that retaliation is right"; they are making excuses.
133. ʿAlī is criticizing Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr and their followers for not listening to his advice. Cf. p. 11, above, and p. 40, below.

Ṭalḥah then said, "Allow me to go to al-Baṣrah, and you'll be shocked by how quickly I can rally a force."[134] "Let me think about it," ʿAlī replied. Al-Zubayr said, "Allow me to go to al-Kūfah, and you'll be shocked by how quickly I can rally a force." ʿAlī replied, "Let me think about it."

Al-Mughīrah [b. Shuʿbah] heard about this meeting. He came to see ʿAlī and said: "You have the right of obedience and sincere advice. What will happen tomorrow is protected by a good decision today and destroyed by failing to make one today. Confirm Muʿāwiyah in his governorship; confirm Ibn ʿĀmir[135] in his and the other governors over their provinces. Then, when you receive their obedience and the armies' allegiance, you can replace or leave them." "I will see," he said. Al-Mughīrah then left ʿAlī, but he returned the following day and said: "I advised you to make a decision yesterday, but now a better one is that you dismiss them from office with haste. Then it will be known who obeys you and who does not, and your authority will be accepted." As al-Mughīrah was leaving, ʿAbdallah b. ʿAbbās met him on his way in. When he got to ʿAlī he said: "I've just seen al-Mughīrah leaving you. What did he come to you about?" "He came to me yesterday about such and such, and he came to me today about such and such." "As for yesterday," Ibn ʿAbbās replied, "he advised you well, but, as for today, he misled you." "What should be done then?" asked ʿAlī. Ibn ʿAbbās said:

> What you should have done was to have left when the man was killed or even before that and gone to Mecca, entered your house, and locked the door behind you. Then, if the Arabs[136] should have amassed and become stirred up after your withdrawal, they would only have had you [to turn to]. But today there are among the Umay-

134. Lit. "horses," i.e., against the regicides, but there is an element of threat against ʿAlī.

135. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĀmir b. Kurayz of ʿAbd Shams Quraysh, first maternal cousin of ʿUthmān, who made him governor of al-Baṣrah in 29 (649/50); see I, 2828 ff.; Caskel and Strenziok, I, 13, II, 106. He joined forces with ʿĀ'ishah in Mecca (Abbot, ʿĀ'ishah, 133).

136. Al-ʿArab, especially the settled ones, as opposed to al-Aʿrāb, the bedouin. Here they are assembling without a leader; cf. pp. 22, 41, below.

yads some[137] who approve the search for revenge [for ʿUthmān], saying that you had a share in the affair. They will mislead the people and make demands similar to what the Medinese have made. You cannot fulfill what they[138] want, but neither can they[139]—even if matters should turn out in their favor[140]—so they would be even more unable [than you] to fulfill their[141] claims and more ineffective, except for the suspicions they have already managed to stir up [against you]. [3083]

Al-Mughīrah confessed, "I gave him good advice, by Allāh! but when he didn't accept it, I misled him." And he left to go to Mecca.

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Saʿd—al-Wāqidī—Ibn Abī Sabrah —ʿAbd al-Majīd[142] b. Suhayl—ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUtbah —Ibn ʿAbbās: ʿUthmān called for me and appointed me over the Ḥajj. So I left for Mecca, organized the Ḥajj for the people, and read ʿUthmān's letter to them. I then came to Medina. ʿAlī had already been given allegiance there, and when I came to him in his house I found al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah having a private interview with him. So he detained me until al-Mugīrah had left him. Then I asked, "What did this man say to you?" ʿAlī replied, "He said to me on a previous occasion: 'Send ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĀmir and Muʿāwiyah and ʿUthmān's governors their contracts, confirming them in office and that they should get the people's allegiance to you, for they will bring peace to the land and will calm the people.' But I[143] rejected his suggestion that day and said: 'By Allāh! Even if I had had only one hour of one day, I would have made the decision not to appoint any one of these. Nor should any of their ilk be appointed!' As he left me I realized he thought I was mistaken. So he came back to me again today and said: 'I made that first suggestion to you, but you disagreed with me. So

137. Nöldeke suggests reading qawm or rijāl "a group" (Addenda, DCXXXI).
138. The Medinese.
139. The Umayyads.
140. I.e., "Should you let them stay in office," as al-Mughīrah advised.
141. The Medinese.
142. As in Ibrāhīm; Addenda, DCXXXI. The text has al-Ḥamīd.
143. I.e., ʿAlī.

I had another idea. That is that you do as you thought and dismiss them and look for assistance from those you trust. Allāh's help [3084] will suffice; their[144] fighting power is less than it was.'"

So I said to ʿAlī, "The first time he gave you good advice, but the last time he deceived you." "Why do you say he gave me good advice?" asked ʿAlī. "Because you know that Muʿāwiyah and his allies are men of the world," replied Ibn ʿAbbās, "and, should you confirm their posts, they wouldn't care who had the overall command. But should you remove them they would say, 'He has assumed overall command without an electoral assembly, and he killed our companion,' and they would stir up the Syrians and Iraqis to rebel against you. I'm also not at all sure that Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr won't turn against you." "Regarding what you said about confirming them, replied ʿAlī, "then, by Allāh I've no doubt that it would be best for iṣlāh[145] in this life. But I have obligations to the truth, and I know ʿUthmān's governors, so by Allāh! I'll never appoint a single one of them! If they come[146] it'll be best for them, for if they stay back I'll be generous to them with the sword." "Then do as I say," Ibn ʿAbbās replied. "Enter your house and stay on your estate in Yanbūʿ.[147] Lock the gate after you, for the Arabs are stirred up[148] and milling around en masse, and they won't find anyone apart from you [to turn to]. But, by Allāh! If you rise up with these men[149] today, the people will make you responsible for the blood of ʿUthmān tomorrow."

But ʿAlī ignored this advice and said to Ibn ʿAbbās: "Go to Syria! I've appointed you its governor." "This isn't the right decision," replied Ibn ʿAbbās. "Muʿāwiyah is a man[150] of Banū Umayyah. He is the son of ʿUthmān's father's brother and governor of Syria. I won't be safe from his breaking my neck for ʿUthmān. Or else the [3085] least he will do is throw me in jail and pass sentence on me." "Why?" ʿAlī asked him. "Because you and I are related," he said, "and because everything imputed to you is imputed to me also.

144. The Umayyads.
145. (Re)conciliation, setting things right (EI[1], s.v.).
146. I.e., and give allegiance.
147. As in Ibrāhīm; IA. It is the port of Medina on the Red Sea (EI[1], s.v.).
148. After ʿAlī's withdrawal (cf. p. 20, above).
149. The regicides.
150. I.e., he has a responsibility to retaliate.

No, you should write to Muʿāwiyah, raise his hopes, and make him promises!" But ʿAlī refused and said, "By Allāh! This will never be."

According to Muḥammad—Hishām b. Saʿd—Abū Hilāl—Ibn ʿAbbās: Five days after the murder of ʿUthmān, I arrived in Medina from Mecca. I went to go and visit ʿAlī but was told that al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah was with him. So I sat at the entrance for an hour. When al-Mughīrah came out, he greeted me and said, "How long ago did you get here?" "This past hour," I replied. I then went into ʿAlī, and greeted him. He asked me, "Did you meet al-Zubayr and Ṭalḥah?" "I met them in al-Nawāṣif."[151] "Who was with them?" he asked. "Abu Saʿīd b. al-Ḥārith b. Hishām with a Qurashī force," I replied. ʿAlī then said: "I'm sure they'll never refrain from coming out and saying, 'We seek repayment for ʿUthmān's blood.' By Allāh! We know that they are the ones who killed ʿUthmān."

"Commander of the Faithful!" said Ibn ʿAbbās. "Tell me about the business with al-Mughīrah and why he had a private audience with you." He said: "He came to me two days after the murder of ʿUthmān and said to me, 'May I have a private word with you?' I agreed, and he said: 'Good advice costs nothing. You are the most excellent in the community, and I have some sincere advice for you. I advise you to return ʿUthmān's governors to office this year, so write to them confirming their governorships. When they have given you allegiance and things have settled down under your command, then you may remove or confirm whomever you wish.' So I replied, 'By Allāh! I don't compromise my religion by cheating, nor do I give contemptible men [a say] in my command.'[152] 'If you insist on rejecting this suggestion,' he replied, 'then remove whomever you will, but leave Muʿāwiyah. Muʿāwiyah is daring, [3086] and the Syrians listen to him. Moreover, you have good reason to keep him in office, for ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb made him governor of the whole of Syria.' 'By Allāh! no,' I replied. 'I would never appoint Muʿāwiyah as governor, even for two days!' Al-Mughīrah then left me without further suggestion. However, he came back again and said to me: 'I gave you some advice, but you didn't agree with me.

151. Yāqūt has a place of this name only in what he thinks is ʿUmān (V, 306).
152. Cf. I, 1545 l. 18, 1546 l. 3, where ʿUmar says something similar.

So I thought about it and realized that you were right. You should not assume your authority deceitfully. There should be no fraud in your rule'"

"So I said to ʿAlī," said Ibn ʿAbbās, "his first suggestion advised you well; his last deceived you. I advise you to confirm Muʿāwiyah. If he gives you allegiance, then I will undertake to topple him from his position." ʿAlī replied, "By Allāh! no. I will give him nothing but the sword." And he quoted the following verse:

Death, if I die without weakness, is no disgrace when the soul meets its destruction.[153]

"Commander of the Faithful!" I replied, "you're a courageous man, but you aren't a warmonger. Didn't you hear the Messenger of Allāh say, 'War is deceit'?"[154] "Indeed I did," said ʿAlī. "By Allāh! If you do as I say," replied Ibn ʿAbbās, "I'll take them back to the desert after a watering,[155] and I'll leave them staring at the backside of things whose front side they have no idea of, and you will incur neither loss nor guilt." "Ibn ʿAbbās," said ʿAlī, "I don't want anything to do with these mean schemes of yours or of Muʿāwiyah's. You give me advice, and I consider it. If I go against you, then you do as I say." "I will," I replied. "Obedience is my first and foremost obligation to you."

The Expedition of Qusṭanṭīn, King of Rūm, against the Muslims

Abū Jaʿfar al-Ṭabarī said: According to Muḥammad b. ʿUmar al-Wāqidī—Hishām b. al-Ghāz—ʿUbādah b. Nusayy: In this year, [3087] that is, 35, Qusṭanṭīn b. Hirqal[156] set sail with a thousand ships for the territory of the Muslims. But Allāh caused a windstorm[157]

153. Ibn Manẓūr, XIV, 20.

154. Al-ḥarb khudʿah; Wensinck, I, 443b. For slight variations in meaning, see Lane, 710a.

155. I.e., as above, "I'll topple them."

156. Rather than Constantine, son of Heraclius, who died in 641 (Bury, et al., 391), this was Constantine (popularly called Constans), the nephew of Heraclius, who became sole emperor in 641. See also Humphreys, 74 n. 128.

157. Cf. Qurʾān 17:69.

to overpower and drown them. Qusṭanṭīn b. Hirkal, however, survived and got to Sicily.[158] But they prepared a bath for him there, and when he got in they killed him, saying, "You killed our leaders."

158. These events have been telescoped. Constantine went to Sicily in 663, some seven years later, and it was not until 668 that he was blinded by soap in the bath and killed by being hit on the head with a silver ewer (Bury et al., 394–95).

The Events of the Year 36

(June 30, 656–June 18, 657)

Alī Sends Out His Governors to the Garrison Cities[159]

At the beginning of the year 36 ʿAlī despatched his governors.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: ʿAlī sent his governors to the garrison cities: ʿUthmān b. Ḥunayf[160] to al-Baṣrah; ʿUmārah b. Shihāb, who had the merit of a hijrah,[161] to al-Kūfah, ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbbās[162] to Yemen; Qays b. Saʿd[163] to Egypt; and Sahl b. Ḥunayf[164] to Syria.

As for Sahl, he set off until he came to Tabūk,[165] where some 159. IA, 201–5; Caetani, IX, 8–12.

160. Al-Anṣārī (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 177, II, 579).

161. Wa-kānat lahu hijrah, i.e., with the Prophet, "one of the Muhājirūn" (Caetani, IX, 8). Al-Dīnawarī (149) calls him ʿUmārah b. Ḥassān, who was a Kalbī (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 289, II, 571).

162. Brother of ʿAbdallāh. Later he was joint leader of al-Ḥasan's army but deserted to Muʿāwiyah.

163. Ibn ʿUbādah al-Anṣārī (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 187, II, 462). See p. 175, below. Later he was joint leader of al-Ḥasan's army.

164. Al-Anṣārī, brother of ʿUthmān, who fought at Badr (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 177, II, 498).

165. About 350 miles northwest of Medina.

horsemen met him and said, "Who are you?" He replied, "A commander." "Over what?" they asked. "Over Syria." "If ʿUthmān has sent you, you are more than welcome, but, if someone else has, go back to where you came from," they said. "Have you not heard what has happened?" he asked. "Indeed we have," they replied. So he went back to ʿAlī.

As for Qays b. Saʿd, when he reached Aylah[166] some horsemen met him and said, "Who are you?" "I am one of ʿUthmān's defeated fugitives,[167] and I am looking for someone to take refuge with who will give me military support," he replied. "But who are you?" they asked. "Qays b. Saʿd." "You may pass," they said. So he continued on his way until he reached Egypt.

Now the Egyptians split into factions. One faction gave allegiance to ʿAlī[168] and so were with Qays b. Saʿd. Another faction refused to give allegiance and withdrew to Kharbitā,[169] saying: "We will join you if ʿUthmān's murderers are executed. Otherwise we will stay in this area[170] to keep up our opposition[171] unless we achieve what we want." A third faction said, "We are with ʿAlī so long as he does not retaliate against our brothers,"[172] and thus they did give allegiance. Qays wrote to the Commander of the Faithful about all this. [3088]

As for ʿUthmān b. Ḥunayf, he set off, and no one resisted his entry into Baṣrah. Ibn ʿĀmir[173] showed no decisiveness, determination, or independent initiative to fight him. The people there 166. Modern Eilat, at the top of the Gulf of ʿAqabah.

167. Fāllah; Ibn Manẓūr, XIV, 46 ll. 12 ff.; Caetani, IX, 9. Qays was shrewder than Sahl. He mentioned ʿUthmān, rather than ʿAlī. That he had to go to Egypt alone and disguised suggested to Caetani (IX, 11 n. 1) that Muʿāwiyah had taken every precaution to prevent ʿAlī's representatives from reaching Egypt.

168. Dakhalat fī al-jamāʿah.

169. Following Ibrāhīm. The text has both Khiribtā and Kharibtā, the latter noted as corresponding more closely to the Coptic form. Hence it was preferred by Caetani (IX, 11 n. 2), who inferred that because it was west of Alexandria (al-ḥawf al-gharbī), this opposition to ʿAlī was not instigated by Muʿāwiyah. See also p. 179, below. IA, 201, 205, has Kharanbā, which is an error; see Yāqūt, II, 355, 362.

170. Fa-naḥnu ʿala jadīlatinā; see Lane, 392c; p. 105, below. Or perhaps "we will continue this course of action."

171. Ḥattā nuḥarrik "and keep alive the agitation" (Caetani, IX, 8), "create trouble" (De Goeje's turbas movit, Glossarium, CLXC).

172. I.e., those who killed ʿUthmān.

173. ʿAbdallah b. ʿĀmir b. Kurayz.

also were divided. One faction followed the opposition, another faction gave allegiance to ʿAlī, and a third said, "We shall see what the Medinans do, and we will do likewise."

As for ʿUmārah, he advanced as far as Zubālah,[174] where Ṭulayḥah b. Khuwaylid[175] met him. Now this man, when he had heard of what had happened to ʿUthmān, had gone out calling for revenge for his blood, saying: "How I regret what has happened! It has not escaped me, nor have I caught up with it.[176]

If only I had been a youth when it happened,
I would have turned and attacked in the fray and set to."[177]

Ṭulayḥah went out with those who had responded to al-Qaʿqāʿ[178] and accompanied him until he got to al-Kūfah, whereupon he was met by ʿUmārah, who was approaching al-Kūfah. "Go back!" Ṭulayḥah said. "The people aren't interested in anyone replacing their commander.[179] If you refuse, I will cut off your head." So ʿUmārah went back, saying: "Beware of danger when it comes near you![180]

---

174. On the Mecca-Kūfah road between Wāqiṣah and al-Thaʿlabiyyah (Yāqūt, III, 129).

175. Al-Asadī, a riddah leader who was defeated by Khālid b. al-Walīd at Buzākha in A.H. 11 yet distinguished himself at the battles of Qādisiyyah and Nihāwand (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 50, II, 559; cf. Hinds, "Kūfan Political Alignments," 353). Caetani (IX, 11 n. 3) thought it probable that the names of bedouin warriors like Ṭulayḥah and al-Qaʿqāʿ were simply added to the narration by Sayf to give it body.

176. I.e., "I was still living when it happened and have yet to fulfill my duty to retaliate."

177. The last word, wa-ʾaḍaʿ, might mean "and put in [my feet]," i.e. "I would fight mounted and on foot." The religious poet Waraqah b. Nawfal al-Qurashī (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 19, II, 587) is said to have spoken the first hemistich regarding the Prophet (Ibn Manẓūr, IX, 395 l. 1).

178. Ibn ʿAmr b. Mālik al-Tamīmī (*EI*², s.v.). He was a leader at Qādisiyyah, sent in 35 by ʿUthmān's governor in Kūfah to help ʿUthmān during the insurrection; nevertheless, he was an ally of ʿAlī and later one of ʿAlī's leaders in the Battle of the Camel. See also Donner, 390–91; Landau-Tasseron.

179. Abū Mūsā al-Ashʿarī, ʿUthmān's governor in Kūfah; see p. 29, below.

180. Iḥdhar al-khaṭar mā yumāssuk (mā ẓarfiyyah). It is omitted in IA, 202. Caetani interprets it as "Guard against the next danger. Bad. . . ." (IX, 9). Nöldeke suggests inserting lam, to read mā lam yumāssuk, but de Goeje sees a conative element to the verb, providing the meaning quando te tangere conatur "when it tries to touch you" (Addenda, DCXXXI). Iḥdhar could be aḥdhar, an elative: "The danger most to be guarded against is. . . ."

Bad is better than worse."[181] So he returned to ʿAlī with the news. [3089]
This saying dogged ʿUmārah from the time[182] of this difficult situation until he died.

ʿUbaydallah b. ʿAbbās set off for Yemen, so Yaʿlā b. Umayyah[183] gathered up all the tax revenue and left Yemen with it. He went his way[184] to Mecca, where he arrived carrying the money.

When Sahl b. Ḥunayf turned back from his journey to Syria and heard the news and when the others had returned, ʿAlī called Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr and said: "What I was warning all you people about has happened, and it can only be contained by suppressing it. It is a fiery rebellion;[185] the more it is fueled, the more it increases and flares out."[186] "Then let us leave Medina," the two replied, "for either you let us go, or we will treat you with scornful disobedience."[187] "I will keep control by political means as long as that is possible," ʿAlī replied, "but if there is no choice the final cure[188] will be cautery." So he wrote to Muʿāwiyah[189] and Abū Mūsā.[190] The latter wrote back that the Kūfans had obeyed and given allegiance, clarifying in the letter who was unwilling to do so, who was willing, and who was in between in such a way that it was as though[191] ʿAlī were actually there in the presence of the Kūfans. ʿAlī's messenger to Abū Mūsa was 181. This justifies his return, which was obviously a bad thing but not as bad as getting killed.

182. Wright, II, 165D.

183. Al-Tamīmī, on ʿĀ'ishah's side at the Battle of the Camel, was killed at Ṣiffīn on ʿAlī's side. He was usually called Yaʿlā b. Munyah after his mother (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 67, II, 590; Abbott, Aishah, 134 n. 139).

184. Lane, 652c.

185. Fitnah.

186. Istanārat, i.e., "it must be stopped now." IA, 202: istathārat "provokes, rouses, is seditious."

187. Nukābir. IA, 202: nukāthir "vie in number."

188. Reading dawā' as in Ibrāhīm and Caetani, IX, 10, rather than dā', as in the text and IA, 202.

189. The first Umayyad caliph.

190. ʿAbdallāh b. Qays b. Sulaym al-Ashʿari, Companion of the Prophet, replaced al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah as ʿUmar's governor of al-Baṣrah in 17/638; he was one of the two arbitrators appointed at Ṣiffīn and probably died 42/662–63 (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 273, II, 116; *EI*², s.v. al-Ashʿarī).

191. Reading ka-an ʿAlī or ka-anna ʿAliyyan, as in Ibrāhīm and Glossarium, DL 6 ll. 5–6, for kān ʿAlī in the text.

Maʿbad[192] al-Aslamī, and his messenger to Muʿāwiyah was Sabrah al-Juhanī.[193] When Sabrah came to him, Muʿāwiyah neither wrote [3090] anything nor replied to him but sent him away. Each time ʿAlī tried to get[194] a reply from Muʿāwiyah, he said no more than

Be firm and steadfast as a fortress, or you will find[195]
a devouring war from me, setting wood and coal ablaze, Over your neighbor and your son, for his[196] murder was a hideous act, turning the hair on temples and the sides of the neck white, Ruled and rulers alike becoming incapacitated by it, and no master or arbiter for it will be found but I.

Each time al-Juhanī tried to get him to write a reply, Muʿāwiyah said no more than these verses. When Ṣafar came, the third month after ʿUthmān's murder,[197] Muʿāwiyah called a man from the Banū Rawāḥah of the Banū ʿAbs called Qabīṣah[198] and handed him a sealed scroll with the address "From Muʿāwiyah to ʿAlī." He said, "When you enter Medina, hold the scroll from the bottom."[199] He then advised him what to say and dismissed ʿAlī's messenger. So they both set off, arriving at Medina on the first day of Rabīʿ al-Awwal. When they entered Medina, al-ʿAbsī held up the scroll as ordered, and the people came out to see it. They then returned to their houses, aware that Muʿāwiyah was rebelling. He then went to visit ʿAlī and handed him the scroll. He broke its seal but found nothing written inside it. So he asked the messenger, "What is going on?" "Am I safe?" he replied. "Yes," replied ʿAlī. "Messengers are safeguarded and may not be killed." "What 192. Following IA, 202. The text seems to have Saʿīd.

193. Al-Ḥajjāj b. Ghāziyah al-Anṣārī, according to al-Dīnawarī, 150 l. 11. Caetani puts little store in the accuracy of either (IX, 15 n. 1). Caskel and Strenziok have al-Ḥajjāj b. Ghuzayy, with a brother Ghāziyah of al-Qayn (I, 313).

194. Tanajjaz, as in the text and IA, 202. ʿAlī appears to have sent more than one messenger.

195. As in Caetani IX, 10. Ibrāhīm has aw khudan and IA, 202 aw khudhā "or take!" for aw jidan (energetic imperative) in the text.

196. ʿUthmān.

197. Ṣafar was in fact only the second month after ʿUthmān's murder (Caetani, IX, 12 n. 5).

198. Caetani (IX, 10). Rawāḥah was a clan of ʿAbs (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 132).

199. So that the lack of the title "caliph" for ʿAlī was for all to see (Caetani, IX, 10).

is going on is that I have come from a people who will be satisfied only by retaliation." "Against whom?" asked ʿAlī. "Against you yourself.[200] I left sixty thousand elders of the community crying [3091] at the sight of the shirt of ʿUthmān as it was raised up for them and draped over the minbar in Damascus." "They are seeking revenge for ʿUthmān's blood against me?" exclaimed ʿAlī. "This is making me as badly wronged as ʿUthmān was![201] By Allāh! You know I am innocent of any involvement in ʿUthmān's murder. By Allāh! We will stab his murderers,[202] unless Allāh should will otherwise.[203] If He wants a thing, He attains it. Leave now!" "Am I still safe?" asked Muʿāwiyah's messenger. "You are still safe." So al-ʿAbsī left, whereupon al-Saba'iyyah shouted out, "This dog, this emissary of dogs, kill him!" So al-ʿAbsī called out: "Men of Muḍar! Men of Qays![204] To your horses and your arrows! I swear by Allāh! may His name be exalted, if you kill me[205] four thousand eunuchs will retaliate against you. Look at you! Where are your real men and your mounts!" There was much shouting against him,[206] but Muḍar protected[207] him, telling him, "Keep quiet!" But he replied: "No, by Allāh! These men will never succeed. What they have been threatened with is coming to them."[208] They repeated, "Keep quiet!" But he carried on: "What they feared is upon them. There is no more for them to do. Their time is up![209] By Allāh! This evening will not pass without their humiliation becoming evident.

---

200. Min khayṭ nafsik, lit., "against your spinal cord" or "the cord of your neck" (IA, 203: min khayṭ raqabatik). See also Abbot, Aishah, 135–36.

201. Alastu mawtūran katirat ʿUthmān, following IA, 203. See Ibn Manẓūr, VII, 135 l. 22.

202. Reading naja'u (root wj) in the text. Ibrāhīm and IA, 203, have najā, which would mean "His real murderers, by Allāh! are going free."

203. A Qur'ānic phrase; see, e.g., Qur'ān 6:111, 7:89, 12:76.

204. ʿAbs was part of Ghaṭafān, a northern Qays tribe, and Qays was part of Muḍar (*EI*², s.v. Ḳays ʿAylān; Hawting, 54).

205. Understood. This is cryptic Arabic, but it seems that al-ʿAbsī is insulting and ridiculing them—first, implying that so many of them are attacking a single man and, second, that they are not real men because retaliation, like for like, will be by eunuchs.

206. Wa-taʿāwaw ʿalayhi; Lane, 2186a. IA, 203, has wa-taʿāwanū ʿalayhi "So they ganged up on him."

207. Reading manaʿathu.

208. Here and in his next words he is using Qur'ānic words and phrases.

209. Lane, 1181b.

Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr Ask ʿAlī If They Can Leave

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr asked ʿAlī if they could go on the ʿumrah[210] pilgrimage. He allowed them to go, and they entered Mecca.

Now the men of Medina wished to learn ʿAlī's opinion about Muʿāwiyah and his rebellion so they could find out what he thought about fighting fellow Muslims.[211] Would he venture against him or abstain? They had heard that ʿAlī's son al-Ḥasan[212] [3092] had gone to see him and counseled him to stay put and not get involved with them. So they secretly made Ziyād b. Ḥanẓalah al-Tamīmī, who was devoted to ʿAlī, go to him to find out. He did so and sat with him for an hour. ʿAlī then said to him, "Get ready, Ziyād!" "For what?" "You are going to attack Syria!" "Patience and conciliation would be better," replied Ziyād, and he quoted:

He who does not take many matters gently gets bitten fiercely by eyeteeth and stamped underfoot.[213]

ʿAlī then quoted the following verse, implying that he did not want to [accept his advice to take it easy]:

When you combine the clever mind, the strong sword, and self-confidence, oppressive situations will avoid you.[214]

Ziyād then went back out to the people. They were waiting for him and asked, "What have you discovered?" "Listen, men! It's the sword!" They now realized what ʿAlī was going to do. ʿAlī then called Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah and handed him the banner. He put ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās in charge of the right flank and ʿUmar b. Abī Salimah[215] or ʿAmr b. Sufyān b. ʿAbd al-Asad[216] in charge of the left. He called Abū Laylā b. ʿUmar b. al-Jarrāḥ,[217] the son of 210. The shorter pilgrimage, performed at any time of year.

---

211. Ahl al-qiblah, i.e., the Syrians (Caetani, IX, 23).

212. *EI*², s.v.

213. By camels, i.e., if one does not relax in life, difficulties come; from the muʿallaqah of Zuhayr; see al-Zawzanī, 87.

214. A verse of Ibn Barāqah al-Hamadhānī; see Ibrāhīm, 445 n. 2; IA, 204.

215. For the same configuration later, see p. 84, below.

216. Al-Qurashī. For his father and brother, ʿAbdallāh and Habbār, see Caskel and Strenziok, I, 22.

217. Al-Qurashī. For Abū ʿUbaydah and al-Jarrāḥ, see Caskel and Strenziok, I, 35; *EI*², s.v. Abu ʿUbaydah.

Abū ʿUbaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ's brother, and set him over the vanguard. He appointed Qutham b. ʿAbbās[218] deputy for Medina but did not give positions to anyone who had opposed ʿUthmān. He wrote to Qays b. Saʿd,[219] ʿUthmān b. Ḥunayf,[220] and Abū Mūsā[221] with orders to send their men toward Syria. He then dedicated himself to getting ready and equipping himself.

He made a speech to the Medinan people, calling them to rise up against the schismatics:

> Almighty and Glorious Allāh sent a guiding, guided Messenger with an eloquent Book and a clear, upright message.[222] If someone dies without following it, they are the real losers.[223] Innovations and deceptions, these are what cause the loss of the Hereafter, except for those whom [3093]
> Allāh protects. In the rule of Allāh is total protection for you. Give Him therefore your obedience, without deviousness or compulsion. By Allāh! You must do it, or He will take the rule of Islam away from you and never bring it back to you until rule is fixed back[224] in Medina.[225] Rise up against these men, whose aim is to make divisions in your community! Hopefully Allāh will restore through you what the provincials have ruined, and you will accomplish[226] your duty.

As they were thus engaged, news suddenly arrived that the Meccans were going in a completely different direction. So ʿAlī stood up among them to address them on the subject and said:

> Almighty and Glorious Allāh has appointed pardon and forgiveness to those who oppress this community and success and salvation to those who are loyal to the rule and straightforward. Those for whom truth is restrictive

218. Brother of ʿAbdallāh (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 6, II, 473).
219. In Egypt.
220. In al-Baṣrah.
221. In al-Kūfah.
222. Amr, lit., "order."
223. I.e., of the hereafter.
224. Reading ya'riza with the text and IA, 204.
225. See Ibrāhīm, 445 n. 3, and Addenda, DCXXXI.
226. Reading wa-taqḍūn, as in IA, 205.

> adopt falsehood. Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr and the Mother of the Faithful have certainly joined together in discontent with my rule and have called on the people to set things right,[227] but I will be patient as long as I have no fear about your unity. I will hold back if they do the same, and I will not take much action over the reports I hear about them.

But news then came to him that they were heading for Baṣrah to see the people there and to set things right,[228] so he made preparations to go out against them. "If they have done this," he said, "then the structure of the community will have been badly damaged. Had they stayed with us they would have been neither molested nor compelled [to do what they objected to]."

The Medinans were stunned by the severity of the problem, so [3094] ʿAlī sent Kumayl al-Nakhaʿī[229] to get ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar.[230] When he brought him ʿAlī said, "Join up with me!" "I am a member of the Medinan community," he replied. "I am simply one man among them. They have taken up this position, and I am in it with them. I am not going to go my own way. If they come out to fight [against you], so will I. If they hold back, so will I." "Then give me a surety that you won't come out," said ʿAlī. "No, I'm not giving you surety," ʿAbdallāh replied. "But for my experience of your brusque nature as a child and as a man," said ʿAlī, "you would see another reaction from me.[231] Let him be! I will be surety for him."[232]

So ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar returned to Medina, where they were saying: "No, by Allāh! We don't know what to do. We are dubious about this whole matter. We will stay here until light is thrown upon it and it becomes clear." He left the same night and told ʿAlī's daughter Umm Kulthūm[233] what he had heard from the 227. Iṣlāḥ.

---

228. Iṣlāḥ.
229. Kumayl b. Ziyād, kinsman of al-Ashtar (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 264, II, 373).
230. Probably in Medina.
231. Reading la-ankartanī as in Ibrāhīm and Addenda, DCXXXI, lit., "you would not know me." See also p. 4, above.
232. Cf. Qur'ān 12:72.
233. Not the daughter of the Prophet (EI[1], s.v.).

men of Medina. He said that he was leaving on the ʿumrah pilgrimage but maintaining obedience to ʿAlī, except with respect to mobilizing forces. He was completely honest. He then stayed with her. The next morning someone said to ʿAlī, "Something far worse for you than Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr and the Mother of the Faithful and Muʿāwiyah put together happened yesterday." "What was that?" "Ibn ʿŪmar has left for Syria."

So ʿAlī went to the marketplace, called for riding beasts, made the men mount, and arranged scouts for each road. Medina was in commotion. When Umm Kulthūm heard what ʿAlī was doing, she called for her mule and mounted it on a saddle.[234] She found ʿAlī standing in the marketplace, dividing the men into groups to look for ʿAbdallāh. She asked: "What's wrong with you? Don't get worked up about this man! The rumors and tales that have reached you are completely contrary to what has happened. I guarantee him." ʿAlī was delighted. "You can go," he said to them. "She didn't lie, nor did he. He has my trust." So they left.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: When ʿAlī saw these things[235] from the Medinans he was not satisfied with their obedience unless they also supported him. He stood up in their midst and got the Medinan leaders to gather round him and said: "The end of this affair will be made good only by what made good its beginning.[236] You have seen the results of Almighty Allāh's judgment on those of you who died.[237] Assist Allāh, and He will give you victory[238] and set your situation right." Two prominent Anṣāris then joined ʿAlī: Abū al-Haytham al-Tayyihān,[239] a veteran of the Battle of Badr, and Khuzaymah b. Thābit[240] (not the [3095]

234. Fī raḥl. Addenda, DCXXXI suggests rajl "with a group of men."
235. Reading wa lammā raʾā . . . ma raʾā, as in Ibrāhīm; cf. Addenda, DCXXXI.
236. I.e., the way of the Prophet.
237. During ʿUthmān's killing.
238. Cf. Qurʾān 47:7.
239. Of ʿAbd al-Ashhal through his mother (Watt, 159, 180; cf. Caskel and Strenziok, I, 179).
240. Caskel and Strenziok (I, 182, II, 351) have only one Khuzaymah b. Thābit "Dhū Shahādatayn" and say he took part with ʿAlī at the Battles of the Camel and Ṣiffīn.

Khuzaymah called Dhū Shahādatayn, who died during ʿUthmān's time[241].

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad—ʿUbaydallāh—al-Ḥakam: He was asked, "Was Khuzaymah b. Thābit Dhū al-Shahādatayn present at the Battle of the Camel?" "No, that wasn't he but some other Anṣārī. Dhū al-Shahādatayn died during the time of ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān."

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Mujālid—al-Shaʿbī: By Allāh, alongside whom no other deity exists! No more than six, or seven at the most, of those present at Badr[242] fought in this fitnah.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—ʿAmr b. Muḥammad—al-Shaʿbī: By Allāh, alongside whom no other deity exists! Only six of those present at Badr fought in this affair; there was no seventh. "You contradict each other,"[243] I remarked.[244] "No we don't. It's just that al-Shaʿbī wasn't sure whether or not Abū Ayyūb had already joined up when Umm Salimah[245] sent him to ʿAlī after Ṣiffīn. He was sure that he had joined ʿAlī, however, at the time of al-Nahrawān."[246]

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿīd b. Thābit—a man—Saʿīd b. Zayd: Four Companions of the Prophet [3096] never got together and surpassed others in achieving something good without ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib's being one of them.

Later, when Ziyād b. Ḥanẓalah saw the men's lack of action on behalf of ʿAlī, he hurried up to ʿAlī and said, "There may be those who hold back from you, but we are active for you and will fight for your sake."

ʿAlī was walking in Medina one day when he heard Zaynab bint Abī Sufyān[247] saying, "The causes of our complaint about injustice[248] are two: a man with eye shadow and an eye-shadow

241. Year 37 (Caetani, IX, 627–28).

242. A force of about 300, who became special men in Muslim history, fought at this first battle of the Prophet's career in 2/624 (*EI*², s.v.).

243. ʿAmr and Mujālid (see previous tradition).

244. Sayf.

245. Hind bt. al-Mughīrah, one of the Prophet's wives (Watt, 396), often called Umm Salamah.

246. Year 38/658.

247. Sister of the first Umayyad caliph, Muʿāwiyah.

248. Presumably the killing of ʿUthmān.

case."[249] "She should be well aware that I[250] am not a target of retaliation for her!" said ʿAlī.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: ʿUthmān was killed on 18 Dhū al-Ḥijjah (June 17, 35). The governor of Mecca was ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĀmir al-Ḥaḍramī,[251] and ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās was in charge of the pilgrimage at the time. ʿUthmān had sent him while under siege. Some of them traveled back to Medina hastily with Ibn ʿAbbās in two days. They arrived after ʿUthmān had been killed but before ʿAlī had received allegiance. Banū Umayyah fled and reached Mecca. On Friday, 25 Dhū al-Ḥijjah (June 24), ʿAlī was given allegiance. The fugitives rushed to Mecca, where ʿĀ'ishah was staying to perform the Muḥarram[252] ʿumrah pilgrimage. As they hastened in she asked them for news.[253] "'Uthmān has been killed," they told her, "but no one has agreed to take command." "But how shrewd they are!"[254] ʿĀ'ishah responded. "For they do this after all the frus-

249. Mudammam wa-mukḥulah makes a parallelism and can mean "a man with eyeshadow and an eyeshadow case," perhaps implying two dissimulators. These could be Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr; oppression against ʿUthmān, head of the Umayyads, had come from them. So Prym (text n. c), but this does not make much sense of the following humā. According to Addenda, DCXXXI and Ibrāhīm (448 n.), Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr (brother of ʿĀ'ishah) and Muḥammad b. Jaʿfar b. Abī Ṭālib (ʿAlī's nephew), who are often paired (they had the same mother), are probably meant, but in this case anā (the emendation for humā) is difficult. If the reference is taken to be to the two Muḥammads, Ibrāhīm's hammā ("She is well aware that those two didn't hasten to retaliate against her") provides a little more sense. Nöldeke (Addenda, DCXXXI) considers the first to refer to Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr but reads mudhammam "much blamed, most blameworthy," possibly a distortion of muḥammad "much praised" (Wellhausen, 159). This is possible, as Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr was said to have been one of the first to enter ʿUthmān's presence and humiliate him, but the parallelism is lost. In the text 3217, l. 16, Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr is indeed called "Mudhammam," the opposite of "Muḥammad," by ʿĀ'ishah, and the similar alliterative opposite—akhūk al-birr . . . ʿaqūq—on p. 157, below (3217 l. 2) disallows a pointing mudammam. Nöldeke further considers mukḥulah to refer to ʿAlī, which fits anā (Wellhausen, 159), i.e.: "Why is the woman saying this? I didn't kill ʿUthmān." See also Ibn ʿAbd Rabbihi (II, 278 ll. 5–16, esp. l. 15), where mudhammam could even refer to ʿAlī, although, according to Caetani, IX, 70, it refers to Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr (cf. p. 100, below).

250. Reading anā (Wellhausen, 159); see note 249.

251. Abbott, Aishah, 130 ff.

252. A special ʿumrah for the first month of the year.

253. Abbott, Aishah, 129 ff.

254. Wa-lākin akyās. De Goeje, referring to the marginal gloss, suggests insert-trated attempts that went on between you to improve the situation."[255] Then she completed the ʿumrah, left, and arrived at Sarif,[256] where she was met by a maternal relative called ʿUbayd b. Abī Salimah, called after his mother Umm Kilāb.[257] He was from Banū Layth,[258] with whom she had friendly connections. "What news?" she asked. He kept silent and then muttered some-[3097] thing. "Confound you! Is it bad for us or good?" "You don't know! ʿUthmān was killed, and they waited eight nights." "Then what did they do?" she asked. "They made the men of Medina agree to elect ʿAlī, and the city is under the control of the rebels." At this she returned to Mecca and said not a word. Indeed she said nothing until she had dismounted at the door of the mosque, gone to the Ḥijr,[259] and curtained herself off, and the people had gathered round.

"People of Mecca!" she said. "The mob of men from the garrison cities and the watering places and the slaves of the people of Medina have[260] conspired together. They charged this man who was killed yesterday with deceit, with putting young men in high positions where older ones had been before, and with reserving certain specially protected places[261] for them, although they[262] had been arranged before him and could not properly be changed. Nevertheless he went along with these people, and in an attempt to pacify them he withdrew from these policies. When they could then find neither real argument nor excuse, they became irrational. They showed their hostility openly, and their deeds didn't fit their words. They spilled forbidden blood, they violated the sacred city, they appropriated sacred money, and they profaned the sacred month. By Allāh! One of ʿUthmān's fingers is better than a whole world of their type. Save yourselves from being associated with ing hiya after wa-lākin, which would take the phrase out of ʿĀ'ishah's response (Addenda, DCXXXII).

---

255. I.e., with ʿUthmān before his death, because the attempts failed.

256. Six to twelve miles from Mecca (Yāqūt, III, 212).

257. I.e., ʿUbayd b. Umm Kilāb. Correctly emended by Prym; see p. 52, below.

258. Part of Bakr b. ʿAbd Manāt of Kinānah (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 36; Watt, 81).

259. The semicircular wall by the Kaʿbah. See also p. 53, below.

260. Prym suggests qad "already" was to have been added here.

261. Which should have been the right of all Muslims. Cf. *EI*², s.v. ḥimā.

262. Following Prym's emendation.

them, and let others punish them and their followers be scared off. By Allāh! Even if what they reckon against him were a crime he would have been cleared of it, as gold is cleaned of its impuri- [3098] ties or a garment of its dirt, for they have rinsed[263] him as a garment is rinsed with water." "I'm here with her, the first to seek revenge," called out ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĀmir al-Ḥaḍramī. He was indeed the first to respond and to get others to do so.

According to ʿUmar b. Shabbah—Abū al-Ḥasan al-Madā'inī—Suḥaym, the mawlā of Wabrah al-Tamīmī—ʿUbayd b. ʿAmr al-Qurashī: ʿĀ'ishah had left [Medina] while ʿUthmān was being besieged. A man [just in from Medina] called Akhḍar came up to her in Mecca, so she asked, "What are the people doing?" "ʿUthmān has killed the Egyptians,"[264] he replied. "We belong to Allāh and to Him we return!"[265] exclaimed ʿĀ'ishah. "Does he kill people who come seeking justice and denouncing injustice? By Allāh! We don't approve of such a thing." Presently another man came. "What are the people doing?" she asked. "ʿUthmān has been killed by the Egyptians," he replied. "Akhḍar amazes," she said. "He alleged that the killed was the killer." It was about him that the saying "More lying than Akhḍar"[266] was coined.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—ʿAmr b. Muḥammad—al-Shaʿbī: After ʿUthmān had been killed ʿĀ'ishah left Mecca on her way to Medina. She met a maternal relative and asked, "What news?" "ʿUthmān has been killed, and the people have agreed on ʿAlī. The mob rules." "I don't think this is over yet," she said [to those with her]. "Take me back!" So she set off back to Mecca.

When she had entered, ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĀmir al-Ḥaḍramī, ʿUthmān's governor there, came to her and asked, "What made you return, Mother of the Faithful?" "The fact that ʿUthmān has been killed unjustly[267] and that as long as the mob rules order will not be established. Seek revenge for the blood of ʿUthmān, and you will strengthen Islam!" So ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĀmir al-Ḥaḍrami became the first to respond to her call, and this was the first response by 263. With blood.

264. Al-miṣriyyīn, perhaps "the men from the garrison cities," but the leaders of the insurgents were Egyptians (Hinds, "Murder").

265. Qur'ān 2:157, said on hearing of someone's death.

266. Akdhab min Akhḍar.

267. Qur'ān 17:33; EI[1], 414a.; p. 18 and n. 121, above.

Banū Umayyah[268] in the Ḥijāz. After this their morale re-[3099] turned,[269] and they were joined by Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣ, al-Walīd b. ʿUqbah, and the rest of Banū Umayyah. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĀmir [b. Kurayz] from Baṣrah, Yaʿlā b. Umayyah from Yemen, and Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr from Medina had joined them. After lengthy deliberations they all agreed on al-Baṣrah. "Listen, you people!" ʿĀ'ishah addressed them. "This is a heinous crime, a forbidden thing. March therefore to your brothers in al-Baṣrah and denounce it! The Syrians have already done this on your behalf.[270] We hope Almighty and Glorious Allāh will help ʿUthmān and the Muslims[271] get their blood revenge speedily."

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: The first to respond were ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĀmir and Banū Umayyah, who had hastened toward Mecca after ʿUthmān's murder. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĀmir [b. Kurayz] then came to Mecca, as did Yaʿlā b. Umayyah, and they met there. Yaʿlā had brought 600 camels and 600,000 dirhams. He stopped the camels and encamped at al-Abṭaḥ. Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr joined them, and, when they met ʿĀ'ishah, she asked, "What news?" "The news is that we loaded up lock, stock, and barrel, fleeing Medina and its rabble and bedouin, and left behind us a confused populace, neither acknowledging right nor rejecting wrong and not defending themselves." "Agree on a plan of action; then mobilize yourselves against this mob!" replied ʿĀ'ishah and quoted the verse:

If the leaders of my people complied with me,
I would save them from ropes[272] or dismemberment.

After consultation the men said, "To Syria!" "Those stationed[273] in the province of Syria have already done the job for you up there," replied ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĀmir. "Then where to?"
[3100] Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr asked him. "To al-Baṣrah," he answered. "I 268. The narrator is confusing the two ʿAbdallāhs here. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĀmir b. Kurayz was of Umayyah.

269. After being dashed at ʿUthmān's murder.

270. By rebelling against ʿAlī and calling for blood revenge, so there is no need to go there to get support.

271. As though ʿAlī were not one.

272. I.e., imprisonment. This verse is usually quoted by ʿAlī with a different second hemistich; see p. 19, above. Abbott, Aishah, 137.

273. Covering both Prym's emendations yastamirr and yastaḥriz.

have influence there, and they like Ṭalḥah." "May Allāh damn you!" they exclaimed. "You make neither peace nor war. Why didn't you stay there, as Muʿāwiyah did, and do the job for us? We could have gone to al-Kūfah and blocked all the roads against these people."[274] Thus they did not find his response acceptable. But when their minds had been made up to go to al-Baṣrah they said, "Mother of the Faithful, leave Medina alone! Those with us aren't sufficient for that mob there. Accompany us to al-Baṣrah. We will arrive at a city now lost to us. They will produce their allegiance to ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib as an argument against us, but you will mobilize them, just as you did with the Meccans. Then you will be able to sit back, and, if Allāh puts things right, it will be as you want. If not, we will leave things to Him and do our best to push the case forward until Allāh executes His will." "Agreed!" she said on hearing this—for the matter could be resolved only by her.

Now the wives of the Prophet were with ʿĀ'ishah in wanting to go to Medina, but when she changed her mind for al-Baṣrah, they also gave up the idea. The men then went to consult Ḥafṣah,[275] who said, "My opinion is subordinate to ʿĀ'ishah's." When nothing therefore was left but to set off they asked, "How can we depart when we don't have the wherewithal to equip the army?" "I have 600,000 dirhams and 600 camels, so mount them!" said Yaʿlā b. Umayyah. "And I have such and such," added Ibn ʿĀmir. This set them up, and the crier called out: "The Mother of the Faithful and Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr are proceeding to al-Baṣrah. Whoever desires to fortify Islam, to fight the sacrilegious, and to [3101] seek revenge for the blood of ʿUthmān but who does not have a mount or equipment, then here is equipment, and here are funds." They then mounted 600 men—beside those who already had mounts—on 600 she-camels,[276] making a total of 1,000, and they supplied themselves with money. They called out that they were ready to leave, and they set off walking.

Ḥafṣah wanted to go with them, but ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar[277] came and asked her to stay. She stayed but sent a message to ʿĀ'ishah:

274. ʿUthmān's killers.
275. Bint ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, wife of the Prophet (Watt, 396).
276. They were he-camels a minute ago!
277. Her brother.

"ʿAbdallāh has prevented me from coming out." "May Allāh forgive him!" said ʿĀ'ishah.[278] Umm al-Faḍl bint al-Ḥārith[279] sent a man from Juhaynah[280] called Ẓafr and paid him to go secretly to ʿAlī with her letter. So he came to ʿAlī with Umm Faḍl's letter and news.

According to ʿUmar b. Shabbah—ʿAlī—Abū Mikhnaf—ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī ʿAmrah[281]—his father:[282] Abū Qatādah said to ʿAlī: "Commander of the Faithful! The Messenger of Allāh invested me with this sword, and I put it in its sheath. It has been there too long, and the time for unsheathing it has now come—against this company of criminals who constantly deceive the community. So, if you wish, put me in the front line." Umm Salimah then got up and said: "Commander of the Faithful! But for the fact that I would be disobeying Allāh[283] and that you wouldn't accept it from me, I would come out with you. But here is my son ʿUmar[284]—dearer to me than my very self, by Allāh! He will come out with you and will be there with you at your battles." At that ʿUmar came out and stayed with ʿAlī, who made him governor of Baḥrayn until he replaced him with al-Nuʿmān b.
[3102] ʿAjlān al-Zuraqī.[285]

According to ʿUmar—Abū al-Ḥasan—Maslamah—ʿAwf: Yaʿlā b. Umayyah assisted al-Zubayr with 400,000 dirhams and provided mounts for seventy men from Quraysh. He also had ʿĀ'ishah mounted on a camel called ʿAskar, which he had obtained for 80 dinars. As they set off [from Mecca] ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr looked toward the mosque and said, "Never have I seen anything more of a blessing to the seeker of good or the shunner of evil than you."

---

278. I.e., she would not.

279. The wife of ʿAbbās, ʿAlī's uncle, and full sister of Maymūnah, one of the Prophet's wives (Watt, 380, 397; see Abbott, Aishah, 139, n. 153 for other references).

280. Watt, 81–87, 409.

281. Addenda, DCXXXII. Born before 10/622 (U. Sezgin, 190). The text has Abū ʿUmrah.

282. Abū ʿAmrah al-Anṣārī al-Najjārī, a Companion of the Prophet (U. Sezgin, 190).

283. Qur'ān 33:33.

284. Before she married the Prophet she was married to Abū Salimah (Salamah, according to Watt, 396), who died at Uḥud.

285. Caskel and Strenziok, I, 192, II, 451.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: When al-Mughīrah[286] and Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣ[287] had traveled a day's journey from Mecca with the army, Saʿīd asked al-Mughīrah, "What's the best course of action?" "I'm sure the best course is to stand aside. They[288] won't succeed. But, should Allāh give him victory, then we can come to him and say, 'Our emotions and our inclinations were with you.'" So they stood aside and stopped traveling. Saʿīd then returned to Mecca and stayed there. ʿAbdallāh b. Khālid b. Asīd[289] returned with them.

According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—his father—Wahb b. Jarīr b. Ḥāzim—his father—Yūnus b. Yazīd al-Aylī—al-Zuhrī: They went down[290]—Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr—to Mecca four months after the killing of ʿUthmān. Ibn ʿĀmir, a very rich man, was there,[291] and Yaʿlā b. Umayyah had arrived with him with a large sum of money and more than 400 camels. They gathered together in ʿĀ'ishah's house and exchanged opinions.[292] "Let's go to ʿAlī and fight him," they said. "We don't have the strength to fight the people of Medina," one of them replied. "Let us rather go and enter al-Baṣrah and al-Kūfah. Ṭalḥah has a following and popularity in al-Kūfah, and al-Zubayr has popularity and support in al-Baṣrah."[293] So they agreed to go to al-Baṣrah and al-Kūfah, and ʿAbdallāh b. [3103] ʿĀmir gave them much money and camels. Seven hundred men from Medina and Mecca set off, and others joined, until their number reached 3,000. News of their departure reached ʿAlī,[294] who put Sahl b. Ḥunayf al-Anṣārī in charge of Medina, set off himself, and traveled to Dhū Qār,[295] where he pitched camp. It took him eight nights to get there with a company of Medinans.

---

286. Ibn Shuʿbah al-Thaqafī (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 118, II, 419).

287. Al-Qurashī, governor of Kūfah (30–34) and of Medina (49–56) (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 9, II, 500).

288. I.e., ʿĀ'ishah's army.

289. Al-Qurashī, third cousin of Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣ (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 9, II, 112).

290. Reading ṭamarā for ẓaharā; cf. p. 5, above, of which this is a continuation. For the four months, see p. 5, above; *EI*², 414.

291. Bihā yajurr al-dunyā or perhaps "where Ibn ʿĀmir had great influence."

292. Fa-adārū al-raʾy. Ibrāhīm has fa-arādū.

293. With the insurgents in Medina, the Kūfans were backing al-Zubayr and the Baṣrans were backing Ṭalḥah; see p. 10, above.

294. Addenda, DCXXXII.

295. A watering place near al-Kūfah in the direction of Wāsiṭ (*EI*², s.v.).

According to Aḥmad b. Manṣūr—Yaḥyā b. Maʿīn—Hishām b. Yūsuf, qāḍī of Ṣanʿā'—ʿAbdallāh b. Muṣʿab b. Thābit b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr[296]—Mūsā b. ʿUqbah—ʿAlqamah b. Waqqāṣ al-Laythī: At Dhāt ʿIrq[297] on their way Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr and ʿĀ'ishah inspected the army. ʿUrwah b. al-Zubayr[298] and Abū Bakr b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥārith b. Hishām[299] they found too young, so they sent them back.

According to ʿUmar b. Shabbah—Abū al-Ḥasan—Abū ʿAmr—ʿUtbah b. al-Mughīrah b. al-Akhnas: At Dhāt ʿIrq Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣ met Marwān b. al-Ḥakam[300] and his men and asked: "Where are you heading for? Those from whom you seek revenge are on the rumps of camels.[301] Kill them, and then go back to your houses! Don't kill yourselves!" "No, we will press on," replied Marwān. "Hopefully we will kill every one of the killers of ʿUthmān." Saʿīd then spoke in private with Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr: "If you are victorious, to whom will you give the caliphate? Tell me the truth." "To one of us, whichever the men choose." "No," he replied. "Give it to ʿUthmān's son. You've come out in revenge for his blood, haven't you?" "You want us to pass over the elders of the Muhājirūn and appoint their sons over them?" replied Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr. "But you seem to want me to work to remove it from Banū ʿAbd Manāf!"[302] answered Saʿīd and left. ʿAbdallāh b. Khālid b. Asīd left also.

[3104] "Saʿīd's opinion is the right one," said al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah. "Let all those here from Thaqīf go back!"[303] So he went back, but the main company continued, among them Abān b. ʿUthmān[304] and al-Walīd b. ʿUthmān. Then they disagreed about the route to

296. Governor of Medina and then Yemen under Rashīd (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 19, II, 115).

297. On the borders of Najd and Tihāma on the Mecca-Iraq road (Yāqūt, IV, 107–8).

298. The well-known traditionist (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 19, II, 575).

299. Al-Qurashī. For his brothers, see Caskel and Strenziok, I, 19.

300. The future caliph Marwān I, 64–65/683–85.

301. I.e., here with you.

302. I.e., from ʿAlī. Saʿīd is curtly reminding Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr that not only is ʿAlī one of the Muhājirūn, but he also belongs to their best group.

303. Three hundred went back at this point, according to some accounts, leaving 700.

304. Ibn ʿAffān, governor of Medina, 75–83/694–701 (Caskel and Strenziok, II, 101). Al-Walīd was also governor of Medina (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 11).

take, saying. "Whom shall we summon to our cause?"[305] When al-Zubayr was alone with his son ʿAbdallāh and Ṭalḥah was alone with ʿAlqamah b. Waqqāṣ al-Laythī (whom he preferred to his son), one said, "Go to Syria!" and the other, "Go to Iraq!" So the two then discussed the matter between themselves and agreed to go to al-Baṣrah.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Makhlad[306] b. Qays—al-Agharr: When Banū Umayyah, Yaʿlā b. Munyah, Ṭalḥah, and al-Zubayr had gathered in Mecca, they consulted together. They all agreed to seek revenge for the blood of ʿUthmān and to fight the Saba'iyyah until they were avenged and requited. ʿĀ'ishah then ordered them to go to Medina, but the men all decided on al-Baṣrah and made her change her opinion. Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr said to her: "Unless you go out and give the command you gave in Mecca and then return, we shall be going to a lost place, one that will have gone over to ʿAlī.[307] He forced us to give him allegiance, so they will use that against us and leave our cause." So it was announced, "ʿĀ'ishah is going to al-Baṣrah, but 600 camels are not enough for you to satisfy[308] the rabble and hordes[309] of bedouin and slaves spread out [along the way] who are ready with outstretched arms to assist the first caller." ʿĀ'ishah then sent a mes- [3105] sage to Ḥafṣah. She wanted to come out, but Ibn ʿUmar advised her strongly against it, so she stayed. Accompanied by Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr, ʿĀ'ishah set off and appointed ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAttāb b. Asīd al-Qurashī leader of the prayer. He led them in the prayer as they traveled and in al-Baṣrah until he was killed.[310] Marwān set off with her along with most of the rest of Banū Umayyah, apart from those who were too scared. At Awṭās[311] she turned to the right, 600 horseriders with her, not counting those with other 305. I.e., the Iraqis or the Syrians?

306. Ibrāhīm has Muḥammad.

307. I.e., Ibn ʿĀmir's influence in al-Baṣrah would be lost if they did not go there then.

308. I.e., as gifts, reading tughnūn with Ibrāhīm and Wellhausen, 159. The text's tuʿnūn might mean "to subdue." Cf. Lane, 2178b–c, and Glossarium, CCCLXXXI.

309. Reading wa-jalabah with Ibrāhīm and Nöldeke (Addenda, DCXXXII) for the text's wa-jāliyah. Wellhausen, 159 suggests wajā'ilah, which would mean very much the same, comparing p. 51, below, and points out the unusual syntax.

310. At the Battle of the Camel (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 8, II, 128).

311. A wādī in Hawāzin territory, where the Battle of Ḥunayn was fought.

beasts. Then she turned right again one night, leaving the road as though they were a caravan seeking pasture near the seashore, not one of them going close to al-Munkadir,[312] Wāsiṭ,[313] or Faljˌ[314] That year was a fruitful one, and as they came to al-Baṣrah ʿĀ'ishah quoted the following verses.[315]

Leave the lands of mass oppression when their waters[316] are pure there, and proceed with fear!
Choose those plants[317] outside the settled areas, and graze there, and [choose] a place down in a valley, deep and well watered.

According to ʿUmar—Abū al-Ḥasan—ʿUmar b. Rāshid al-Yamāmī—Abū Kathīr al-Suḥaymī—Ibn ʿAbbās: The followers of the camel set out, numbering 600, among them ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Bakrah and ʿAbdallāh b. Ṣafwān al-Jumaḥī.[318] As they were passing Bi'r Maymūn,[319] they came upon a she-camel that had just been slaughtered, and blood was flowing from her neck. They saw this as a bad omen.

When Marwān had left Mecca he had called to prayer, so now as he arrived he went up to Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr and asked, "Which [3106] one of you should I hail as caliph when I call to prayer?" "Abū ʿAbdallāh!" replied ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr. "Abū Muḥammad!" replied Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah. ʿĀ'ishah then sent to Marwān, asking: "What are you up to? Are you wanting to make divisions in our leadership? Let my sister's son[320] lead the prayer." So ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr did so until they came to al-Baṣrah. Muʿādh b. ʿUbaydallāh remarked [later], "If victory had been ours we would 312. A road between Yamāmah and Syria or al-Kūfah (Yāqūt, V, 216).

313. Wāsiṭ al-Yamāmah, not the famous Wāsiṭ, built only forty years later.
314. On the road between al-Baṣrah and Yamāmah or between al-Baṣrah and Mecca (Yāqūt, IV, 272).
315. As though to the whole company and in optimistic mood.
316. I.e., people.
317. I.e., allies.
318. Al-Qurashī (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 24, II, 118).
319. An ancient well in the environs of Mecca; *EI*², s.v.
320. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr's mother was ʿĀ'ishah's sister Ṣafiyyah.

have been caught up in civil war: Al-Zubayr wouldn't have let Ṭalḥah rule, nor would Ṭalḥah have let al-Zubayr."

ʿAlī Leaves for al-Rabadhah[321] on His Way to al-Baṣrah

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Sahl b. Yūsuf—al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad: News about Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr and the Mother of the Believers reached ʿAlī, so he appointed Tammām b. al-ʿAbbās[322] over Medina and sent Qutham b. al-ʿAbbās to Mecca. He then set out, hoping to intercept them on the road and intending to block their path. At al-Rabadhah, however, it became clear to him from news brought by ʿAṭāʾ b. Riʾāb, mawlā of al-Ḥārith b. Ḥazn,[323] that they had passed by ahead of him.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: ʿAlī was in Medina when he heard the news of their decision to leave [Mecca] for al-Baṣrah and of what Ṭalḥah, al-Zubayr, ʿĀʾishah, and their followers had all decided upon. On hearing about ʿĀʾishah's speech,[324] ʿAlī set out against them in haste with the troops he had been mustering to go to Syria.[325] He was also joined by those Kūfans and Baṣrans who were active and quickly equipped, totaling 700. ʿAlī's plan was to catch up with them and stop them leaving. Just then ʿAbdallāh b. Salām[326] met him and [3107] took hold of his reins, warning: "Don't leave Medina,[327] Commander of the Faithful! By Allāh! If you do, neither you nor rule over the Muslims will ever return here again." Those there began swearing at him, but ʿAlī said: "Leave him alone! He's a good man and a Companion of Muḥammad." ʿAlī nevertheless set off, but on reaching al-Rabadhah he heard that they had passed through ahead of him, so he ordered a halt at al-Rabadhah to confer.

---

321. Within three days of Medina on the road to Mecca (Yāqūt, III, 24); it was the burial place of Abū Dharr al-Ghifārī.

322. Caskel and Strenziok, I, 6, II, 544.

323. Ibn Bujayr al-ʿĀmirī (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 110, II, 307).

324. To the pilgrims in Mecca.

325. To confront Muʿāwiyah.

326. Following Ibrāhīm and Addenda, DCXXXII. He was the famous Jewish convert to Islam. The text has Sallām.

327. See Addenda, DCXXXI on p. 33, above.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Khālid b. Mihrān al-Bajalī—Marwān b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Ḥumaysī[328]—Ṭāriq b. Shihāb:[329] We had left al-Kūfah on the ʿumrah pilgrimage when we heard of the killing of ʿUthmān. When we got to al-Rabadhah in the early dawn we encountered troops, some of them urging[330] each other on. "What's going on?" I asked. "It's the Commander of the Faithful," they replied. "What's happened to him?" "Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr have got the better of him, so he has come out to block their way and force them back. But he now hears that they have gone on ahead of him, so he wants to pursue them farther." "We belong to Allāh, and to Him we return,"[331] I replied. "Either I join ʿAlī and fight these two men and the Mother of the Faithful, or else I disobey him. What a sorry state of affairs!" So I went and joined him. The prayer was performed before dawn, with ʿAlī praying out front. Then, when he had completed it, his son al-Ḥasan came up to him, sat down, and said, "I gave you orders, but you disobeyed me, so tomorrow you will be killed in a place of destruction[332] with no one to help you." So ʿAlī said to him: "You do go on whimpering like a little girl![333] What orders did you give me that I disobeyed?" "When ʿUthmān was besieged," he replied, [3108] "I commanded you to leave Medina so that when he was killed you wouldn't be present. Then the day he got killed I commanded you not to take on the allegiance until the delegations from the garrison cities and the Arab tribesmen and every area's allegiance had come to you. Then, when these two men[334] did what they did, I commanded you to stay at home until they had got their settlement.[335] If things then went badly wrong, it would clearly

328. Ibrāhīm has al-Khumaysī.
329. Ibn ʿAbd Shams of Bajīlah (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 223, II, 557).
330. Following Ibrāhīm's yaḥdū for the text's yadū.
331. Qur'ān 2:151. Said when faced with a catastrophe, like the choice here.
332. I.e., in battle. Reading bi-maḍīʿa with Ibrāhīm, Addenda DCXXXIII, and Wellhausen, 159. This could also mean "a desolate place," which might fit the following phrase better. The text has bi-maṣbaʿah "in arrogance." IA, 222 n. 1, has bi-maʿṣiya "in disobedience/sin," which is extremely derogatory, but it fits al-Ḥasan's amartuk fa-aṣaytanī. Cf. note 349, below; for other instances of these words used of subordinates to their superiors, see p. 194, below.
333. Taḥinn ḥanīn al-jāriyah. Ibrāhīm follows IA and has takhinn khanīn . . . "sniveling." The same applies to p. 51, below.
334. Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr.
335. Ḥattā yaṣṭaliḥu. They had been calling for iṣlāḥ.

have been others' doing. But you disobeyed me in all this." 'Alī replied, "All right, dear boy, as for your words, 'If only you had left Medina when 'Uthmān was besieged,' by Allāh! we were under siege no less than he! Then, as for your words 'Do not take on the allegiance until allegiance from the garrison cities comes,' the choice of ruler belonged to the people of Medina, and we didn't want to destroy that tradition. Then, as for your words 'when Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr left,' the whole Muslim community was facing weakness. By Allāh! Since I became caliph things have continually gone against me and diminished me, and I never attain anything I should. Then, as for your words 'Sit at home,' how then could I fulfill my responsibilities? What do you want me to be? Do you want me to be like the hyena that gets surrounded and calls dabābi dabābi[336] until its hocks are untied[337] and it is forced to come out? This is no situation for me to be in. If I don't look after my responsibilities and concerns in this question, then who will? So that's enough, dear boy."

The Buying of the Camel for 'Ā'ishah and the Report about the Dogs of al-Ḥaw'ab[338]

According to Ismā'īl b. Mūsā al-Fazārī—'Alī b. 'Ābis al-Azraq—Abū al-Khaṭṭāb al-Hajarī—Ṣafwān b. Qabīṣah al-Aḥmasī—al-'Uranī, the owner of the Camel:[339] I was traveling on my camel one day when a rider appeared in front of me. "Owner of the camel," he asked, "will you sell your camel?" "Yes," I replied. [3109]
"For how much?" "A thousand dirhams."[340] "You must be mad," he said. "Can a camel cost a thousand dirhams?" "Yes, this Camel of mine." "How so?" "I've never gone after anyone on him," I replied, "without catching up with him, and no one has ever[341]

336. Said to be the sound by which a hyena is enticed from its lair; see Glossarium, CCLXXV, as also for a dismissal of the view that it should rather be zabābi zabābi, as in Addenda, DCXXXII. See also lane, 1208b.

337. After capture.

338. A watering place of Abū Bakr b. Kilāb on the Ḥijāz-Baṣrah road (Yāqūt, II, 314).

339. IA, 210, 222.

340. In 20/641 the top annual stipends for various grades of Muhājirūn and Anṣār were only 3,000 to 5,000 dirhams (Hinds, "Kūfan Alignments," 349).

341. Ibrāhīm omits qaṭṭ.

come after me when I was on him without my escaping them." "If you knew whom we wanted him for," he replied, "you'd give us a better deal." "So whom do you need him for?" I asked. "For your mother." "But I left my mother sitting in her tent, not wanting to go anywhere." "I want it for the Mother of the Faithful, ʿĀ'ishah, that's who." "He's yours, then. Take him for nothing!" "No, no! Come back with us to where we're camped," he replied, "and we'll give you a Mahriyyah she-camel[342] and some dirhams as well."

So I went back, and they gave me a Mahriyyah she-camel of hers and 400—or was it 600?—dirhams as well. He then asked me, "Brother of ʿUraynah, can you guide the way?"[343] "Certainly! Better than most," I replied. "Come with us then!" So I went with them. Every time I passed by a valley or a watering place they questioned me about it, until we came late one evening to the water of al-Ḥaw'ab and the dogs there barked at us. "What water is this?" they asked. "The water of al-Ḥaw'ab," I replied. At this ʿĀ'ishah shrieked at the top of her voice and hit the upper foreleg of her camel to make it kneel down. "By Allāh!" she said. "I'm the one the dogs of al-Ḥaw'ab have barked at night at![344] Take me back!" She said this three times. She then made her camel kneel, and so did everyone else around her; they remained like this with her, refusing to move for a full twenty-four hours. Ibn al-Zubayr then came up to her and said: "Escape! Escape! ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib is upon you, by Allāh!" So they saddled up and insulted me.[345] So I went a different way.

I had not gone far before I came upon ʿAlī and about 300 riders [3110] with him. "Rider!" ʿAlī called out to me, so I went up to him. "Where did you come upon the howdah?" he asked. "In such and such a place," I replied, "and this is her she-camel. I sold them my male." "She rode him then, did she?"[346] "She did," I replied, "and I accompanied them until we got to the water of al-Ḥaw'ab, 342. I.e., from Mahra in ʿUmān. Mahriyyah camels were famous for their speed and intelligence (Lane, 2740b).

343. Dalālah is not just knowledge of a route but also of its tribal agreements.

344. See p. 68, below; Abbott, Aishah, 143–44.

345. Implying that al-ʿUranī had told them a lie; see p. 68, below, where Ibn al-Zubayr makes it explicit.

346. Indicating that she was on the warpath (Abbott, "Women").

whereupon the dogs there barked at her and she said these words. So when I saw their confusion, I turned and left, and they moved off." "Can you guide us to Dhū Qār?" asked ʿAlī. "I could be the best guide around." "Come with us then!" said ʿAlī. So we traveled until we stopped at Dhū Qār. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib asked for two saddlebags; they were joined together, and a camel saddle was brought and put on top of them. He then walked up, got up on it, and let both his legs down on one side. He then praised and magnified Allāh and prayed for blessings upon Muḥammad and said to those present, "You have seen what these people and this woman have done!" Just then al-Ḥasan[347] came up in front of him, crying. "Here you come whimpering[348] like a little girl!" ʿAlī said to him. "Yes indeed!" replied al-Ḥasan. "I gave you orders, but you disobeyed me, so today you will be killed in a place of destruction[349] with no one to help you." "Tell the men what you commanded me to do!" said ʿAlī. "When the people went to ʿUthmān I commanded you not to receive allegiance until the Arabs had amassed,[350] for they would never make a major decision without you. But you didn't obey me. Then, when this woman set off and her followers did what they did, I commanded you to stay in Medina and to send for those of your followers who would comply with you." "By Allāh! Yes, he did say all that! But my little son! I'm not one to be like the hyena listening for the sound of a falling stone.[351] The Prophet died, and I saw no one more fit for the command than I, but the people gave allegiance to Abū Bakr, so I followed suit. Then Abū Bakr passed away, and I [3111] saw no one more fit for the command than I. But the people gave allegiance to ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, so I followed suit. Then ʿUmar passed away, and I saw no one more fit for the command than I. But they made me just one of six votes, and the people gave allegiance to ʿUthmān. Again, I followed suit. The people then came to ʿUthmān and killed him. Then they came to me and gave 347. His son.

348. See p. 48, above.
349. I.e., in battle. Reading bi-maḍīʿa with Ibrāhīm for the text's bi-maṣbaʿah, "in arrogance," see note 332, above.
350. Cf. p. 45, above.
351. "I'm not going to be duped"; see Ibn Manẓūr, XVI, 12 l. 17; Ibn Abī al-Ḥadīd, I, 223–25; Guillaume, 732, n. 301; p. 49, above.

me allegiance obediently and voluntarily. I will therefore fight whoever opposes me with those who follow me "until Allāh judges between me and them. He is the best judge."[352]

ʿĀ'ishah's Remark "By Allāh! I Will Seek Vengeance for the Blood of ʿUthmān!" and Her Departure for al-Baṣrah with Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr and Their Followers[353]

According to ʿAlī b. Aḥmad b. al-Ḥasan al-ʿIjlī (in writing)—al-Ḥusayn b. Naṣr al-ʿAṭṭār—his father, Naṣr b. Muzāḥim al-ʿAṭṭār[354]—Sayf b. ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Nuwayrah and Ṭalḥah b. al-Aʿlam al-Ḥanafī.[355] Also[356] ʿUmar b. Saʿd[357]—Asad b. ʿAbdallāh—a scholar contemporary with the events: As ʿĀ'ishah arrived at Sarif on her way back from visiting Mecca, ʿUbayd[358] b. Umm Kilāb met her. He was ʿUbayd[359] b. Abī Salāmah but named after his mother. "What is the matter?" ʿĀ'ishah asked him. "They killed ʿUthmān and then did nothing for eight nights." "What did they do then?" she asked. "The people of Medina handled the affair by consensus, and matters proceeded very well for them. They agreed upon ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib." "By Allāh!" she replied. "Would that the sky were overturned if the command is [3112] decided in favor of your leader! Take me back! Take me back!"[360] So she departed for Mecca, saying: "By Allāh! ʿUthmān has been killed unjustly,[361] and I will seek revenge for his blood!" Ibn Umm Kilāb said to her: "How is that? By Allāh! You were the first to incline the blade against ʿUthmān and were saying 'Kill

352. Qur'ān 7:87 (where it has baynanā, rather than baynī wa-baynahum). Shu'ayb is addressing the people of Madyan.

353. IA, 206.

354. Author of Waqʿat Ṣiffīn.

355. Are these names fuller than usual because they come at the start of a new volume?

356. Al-Ḥusayn heard it from; cf. Caetani, IX, 33.

357. Or Saʿīd; cf. the text, 3111 n. d.

358. For the text's ʿAbd. He was from Banū Layth and related to ʿĀ'ishah on her mother's side (see p. 38, above; IA, 206).

359. For the text's ʿAbd. For Abū Salāmah, see Watt, 378, 396.

360. To Mecca to get support. Mecca would still have been crowded from the ḥājj.

361. Cf. Qur'ān 17:33.

Na'thal,[362] for he has become a disbeliever!'" "They asked him to repent," she replied, "and then they killed him. I said things, and they said things, but my latter statement was better than my former one." Ibn Umm Kilāb then recited:[363]

From you come new opinions, from you comes change, from you are the winds, and from you the rain!
You ordered the killing of the imām and told us that he was an unbeliever.
Suppose we did obey you and kill him;
nevertheless his killer, to our mind, was the one who issued the order.
The roof did not fall down from over us;
our sun and moon were not eclipsed.
The people have given allegiance to one with power, who will remove the sting and establish pride.
He will put on the clothes for war.
He who fulfills is not like he who has broken contract.

She then set off for Mecca. She dismounted by the entrance of the mosque and made for the Ḥijr, where she curtained herself off. The people gathered around her, and she said to them, "'Uthmān has been killed unjustly, and, by Allāh, I will seek vengeance for his blood!"

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah:[364] 'Alī was worried which direction[365] 'Ā'ishah's party might take, and he did not know their destination. He preferred them to go to al-Baṣrah, so when he learned that they had taken[366] the Baṣrah road he was pleased and remarked, "The Arab leaders and the families with pedigree are in al-Kūfah." Ibn 'Abbās, however, replied, "What pleases you about that displeases me. Al-Kūfah is a garrison town. There are indeed Arab tribal leaders there, [3113] but they do not have the support of many of the people.[367]

362. An insulting nickname for 'Uthmān; it means "hyena."
363. Caetani, IX, 34.
364. Muir, 242. IA glosses part of and omits the whole last third of this (terse) report. Caetani, IX, 35, omits all of it. See also p. 80, below.
365. Reading min, rather than Ibrāhīm's man.
366. Yu'āriḍūn; see Lane, 2004b, 2005a; IA, 205.
367. Cf. Hinds, "Kûfan Political Alignments," 351.

What is more, some of them are ambitious for authority that they cannot attain. This being so, they stir up trouble against[368] the one who has attained it until they break his power[369] and corrupt one another." "You appear to be right," replied ʿAlī, "but I will select the people of obedience in preference[370] to anyone else, and I will rely on[371] those of them who have the greatest priority and seniority[372] in Islam. If they settle down, we shall forgive them and set them right. If that satisfies them, it will be best for them; if it does not, we shall be forced to set them right, which will be bad for those already in a bad situation."[373] "Satisfaction is the only way,"[374] replied Ibn ʿAbbās.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: When Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr, the Mother of the Faithful, and the Muslims of Mecca had decided to leave for al-Baṣrah and to take revenge on ʿUthmān's killers, al-Zubayr and Ṭalḥah went out to meet Ibn ʿUmar, and they invited him to hasten and help[375] them. He said, "I am from Medina, and, if the people of Medina agree to rise up, so will I. But, if they agree to remain quiescent, I will too." So the two left him and returned.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Saʿīd b. ʿAbdallāh—Ibn Abī Mulaykah: When he was about to depart, al-Zubayr gathered his sons.[376] He said farewell to some but ordered others to come out with him, including both sons of Asmāʾ.[377]

---

368. Reading ʿalā, rather than ʿalayya "he who has attained [what he wanted] will stir up trouble against me," as in Ibrāhīm; IA, 205 l. 13.

369. Ḥattā yaftaʾahu; see Glossarium, CCCXCVII. IA has ḥattā tuksar ḥiddatuhu "until their vehemence is broken."

370. Taking al-uthrah li- to mean wa-innī astaʾthir ʿalā; cf. note 539, below. It could also be translated as "preference will be given to the people of obedience."

371. Wa-alḥaqu bi- or "and the truth is to be found among" if wa-laḥaqqu bi- is read.

372. Sābiqah wa-qudmah or "veterans of the early campaigns"; see Hinds, "Kûfan Political Alignments," 348, 352; Humphreys, 57, 58 n. 95.

373. Or "bad for those it is bad to."

374. I.e., you won't be able to do it by force.

375. Al-khufūf; see Hava, s.v., and Ibrāhīm, n. 1.

376. Ḥamzah, ʿUrwah, ʿAmr, Jaʿfar, ʿAbdallāh, ʿUbaydah, Muṣʿab, and al-Mundhir (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 19). For others, see al-Zubayrī, 236.

377. Bint Abī Bakr. She was the mother of ʿAbdallāh, ʿUrwah, and al-Mundhir (EI[1], s.v. Zubayr). The two referred to here are the latter two, ʿAbdallāh not being in question, as the eldest and the only one full grown.

"So and so, stay!" he said. "'Amr,[378] stay!" When 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr saw this, he said, "'Urwah, stay! Mundhir, stay!"[379] "Certainly not!" replied al-Zubayr. "I will take my two sons [from Asmā'] as companions and enjoy their company." He said: "If you are taking all your sons, then go! But, if you are leaving any behind, you must leave those two. Don't expose Asmā' only from among your wives to childlessness." At this he wept and left the two of them behind. They departed and came to the mountains of Awṭās, where they turned right and followed a road going toward al-Baṣrah, leaving the main road to al-Baṣrah on the left. When they neared al-Baṣrah, they entered it and rode up al-Munkadir. [3114]

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Ibn al-Shahīd—Ibn Abī Mulaykah: Al-Zubayr and Ṭalḥah departed and went separate ways. 'Ā'ishah then departed for Dhāt 'Irq, followed by the Mothers of the Faithful.[380] There has never been a day more full of tears for or against Islam than that day, called the Day of Wailing. She put 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Attāb in charge. He led the prayer and acted as arbiter[381] among the people.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh—Yazīd b. Ma'n al-Sulamī: When her army turned right at Awṭās, they came upon Malīḥ b. 'Awf al-Sulamī, who was supervising his property. He greeted al-Zubayr. "Abū 'Abdallāh," he said, "What's going on?" "The Commander of the Faithful has been attacked and killed with neither blood revenge nor excuse." "By whom?" "By the riffraff from the garrison towns and outsiders from the tribes assisted by bedouin and slaves." "So what do you want to do?" asked Malīḥ. "To rally the people and let this blood be revenged," said al-Zubayr, "lest it be spilled in vain, because, if it is, the power of Allāh will be forever weakened among us. If the people aren't separated from acts like this, then no imām will survive without being killed by this sort [of scoundrel]."[382] "By Allāh!" he said. "To neglect this would be ex- [3115]

378. A later opponent of his brother 'Abdallāh (Caskel and Strenziok, II, 187).

379. 'Urwah, later a prominent traditionist, was born 23–29 (so he would have only been thirteen years old at the most at the time) and died 91–99 (EI[1], s.v.). Al-Mundhir died 73/692 with 'Abdallāh in Mecca (Caskel and Strenziok, II, 430).

380. Other wives of the Prophet.

381. Glossarium, CCCLIII.

382. Glossarium, CCCXXXIII.

tremely serious, and who knows what it might lead to?" They then both said farewell to each other and departed, and the army traveled on.

Their Entry into al-Baṣrah and the Battle between Them and ʿUthmān b. Ḥunayf

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: The army traveled on until, after turning off the road at the esplanade of al-Baṣrah, they were met by ʿUmayr b. ʿAbdallāh al-Tamīmī. "Mother of the Faithful!" he said. "I implore you in Allāh's name to contact those men today to whom you haven't[383] yet sent any message, and He will then protect you from them." "You have given me sound advice," she said. "You are[384] a good man." "Then send Ibn ʿĀmir [b. Kurayz] immediately," he replied. "Let him enter. He has contacts. Let him go to them, and then let them meet the rest of the Baṣran people. You may then go yourself, and they will listen to the reasons why you have all come." So she sent him, and he stole into al-Baṣrah and went to his contacts. ʿĀ'ishah then wrote to a number of Baṣran leaders, to al-Aḥnaf b. Qays,[385] to Ṣabrah b. Shaymān,[386] and to other similar prominent men. She then moved across to al-Ḥufayr and awaited information in response. When the men of al-Baṣrah heard of this, ʿUthmān b. Ḥunayf called ʿImrān b. Ḥuṣayn,[387] a newcomer,[388] and teamed him up with Abū al-Aswad al-Duʾalī,[389] a veteran.[390] "Go to this woman," he said, "and find out what's in her mind and in the minds of those with her." They set off and reached her and the people there while they were at al-Ḥufayr. Their request

383. Ibrāhīm omits lam.

384. Ibrāhīm omits wa-anta.

385. Called al-Aḥnaf (*EI*², s.v.), although his name was al-Ḍaḥḥāk, leader of Tamīm in Baṣrah; died 67/686–86 (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 76, II, 146, 240).

386. Leader of the Azd al-Sarāt in al-Baṣrah and on ʿĀ'ishah's side in the Battle of the Camel (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 216, II, 534).

387. Al-Kindī (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 236, II, 357).

388. Rajul ʿāmmah (Hinds, "Kûfan Political Alignments," 354).

389. Ẓālim b. ʿAmr b. Sufyān of Kināmah, died either 69 or 99–101 (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 43, II, 199, 614; Brockelmann, I, 42, 98, S, I, 72). He was an early grammarian.

390. Rajul khāṣṣah (Hinds, "Kûfan Political Alignments," 354).

for permission to enter was granted, and after greetings they said: "Our commander has sent us to you to ask where you are heading. Are you going to tell us?" [3116]

"By Allāh!" she replied. "I am not one to conduct things in secret or to cover up information for her sons. The riffraff of provincials and outsiders from the tribes committed aggression in the Messenger of Allāh's sacred enclave, perpetrated crimes there, and gave refuge to the criminals. They therefore deserve the curse of Allāh and His Messenger along with what they have been debited for killing the imām of the Muslims without blood debt or excuse. They desecrated sacred blood and shed it; they plundered sacred property and profaned the sacred city and the sacred month. They ruined people's honor and persons and stayed in the houses of people who hated their staying there—harming and intimidating, useless and fearless of Allāh, incapable of restraint and insecure. I have therefore come out among the Muslims to let them know what this group has perpetrated, how those left behind me are faring, and what they have to do to set things right." She then recited: " 'There is no good in most secret talks, unless someone be arranging charity or good works or setting things right[391] between people.'[392] To set things right[393] we are raising support from those whom Almighty and Glorious Allāh and His Messenger have commanded[394]—the young and the old, the male and the female. So this is our concern: [There is] a right we are enjoining on you and encouraging you toward, and [there is] a wrong we are prohibiting you from and urging you to alter."

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: Abū al-Aswad and ʿImrān then left her. They came to Ṭalḥah and asked him, "What brings you here?" "The search for revenge for the blood of ʿUthmān." "But didn't you give allegiance to ʿAlī?" they asked. "I did—but with the sword against my neck. However, I don't demand the abrogation[395] of my allegiance to ʿAlī—provided he doesn't obstruct our way to ʿUthmān's killers."

---

391. Iṣlāḥ.
392. Qur'ān 4:114.
393. Iṣlāḥ.
394. I.e., who are able-bodied.
395. Lane, 2997c; Glossarium, CDXLIII, suggests, "I don't forgive ʿAlī or forget."

They then came to al-Zubayr and asked him, "What brings you [3117] here?" "To seek revenge for the blood of ʿUthmān." "But didn't you give allegiance to ʿAlī?" they asked. "I did—but with the sword against my neck. However, I don't demand the abrogation of my allegiance to ʿAlī—provided he doesn't obstruct our way to ʿUthmān's killers." Then they returned to the Mother of the Faithful to bid farewell to her. She said goodbye to ʿImrān and said: "Abū al-Aswad! Watch out that whim doesn't steer you into the Fire!" She then sent them on their way, quoting the Qur'ānic verse "Be upright toward Allāh, witnesses of justice! [. . . and do not follow caprice]."[396] Her public announcer then called out that she was setting off, so the two of them went to ʿUthmān b. Ḥunayf. Abū al-Aswad hastened to speak before ʿImrān and said:

"Ibn Ḥunayf! They have advanced against you, so hurry [toward them]!
Stab at the enemy, struggle, and endure!
Go out to them with breastplate and robe rolled up for action!"

"We belong to Allāh and to Him we return!"[397] said ʿUthmān. "By the Lord of the Kaʿbah! The millstone of Islam is turning out of balance, and look at the way it will swagger on round!"[398] "It's true, by Allāh!" added ʿImrān. "It will grind you long and hard, and those of you left won't add up to much." "So what do you advise me to do, ʿImrān?" "I'm not getting involved, so don't you either!" he replied. "No," said ʿUthmān. "I will stop them until ʿAlī the Commander of the Faithful comes." "But Allāh will judge as He wishes,"[399] said ʿImrān and left for his house, and ʿUthmān carried out his plan. Hishām b. ʿĀmir then came to him and said, "ʿUthmān, this plan you are intent on will lead to worse than what you hate most. It's a tear that won't get mended, a fracture that won't be repaired. So comply with their wishes until ʿAlī's command comes. Don't oppose them."

[3118] But ʿUthmān refused and announced to the people that they

396. 4:135, where the text is in a different order: "Be strict observers of justice, witnesses to Allāh."
397. Qur'an 2:157, said on hearing of a calamity.
398. I.e., "look at the deception that will go on!" Cf. Glossarium, CCLXXXIII.
399. Cf. Qur'ān 5:1.

should make preparations. So they put on their weapons and gathered together at the main Friday mosque. Now ʿUthmān devised a stratagem to trick the people and see how they were thinking. So he ordered them to make preparations and also ordered a man to go and infiltrate among them, pretending to be a Qaysī from al-Kūfah. He did so and stood up and said: "Listen, you men! I am Qays b. al-ʿAqadiyyah al-Ḥumaysī. This army that has come to you, if they have come out of fear, then they have come from the place where even birds are safe![400] But, if they have come seeking revenge for ʿUthmān's blood, then we aren't ʿUthmān's killers.[401] So do what I say with this army. Send them back where they came from!" Then al-Aswad b. Sarīʿ al-Saʿdī[402] stood up and replied: "Are they in fact claiming that we are the killers of ʿUthmān? They have fled to us only to get our assistance[403] against those killers of ʿUthmān among us and others. If the army has been forced out of its quarters as you suggested,[404] then who will protect it from this expulsion—men or cities?"[405] But they pelted him[406] with stones, so ʿUthmān realized that they had allies in al-Baṣrah who would support them, and it demoralized him.

ʿĀ'ishah and her men then advanced as far as al-Mirbad.[407] They entered it at the top, where they stayed. They halted there until ʿUthmān and his army had come out. Those Baṣrans who wanted to join ʿĀ'ishah did so. They gathered in al-Mirbad and collected together until it was choked with men. Ṭalḥah, on the right side of al-Mirbad with al-Zubayr, then spoke up. ʿUthmān was on its left, and they all listened to what he was about to say. He praised Allāh and magnified Him. Then he mentioned the caliph ʿUthmān and his good qualities and the city and how it had been 400. I.e., so why did they ever leave Mecca? Hunting is forbidden in the Meccan sacred enclave.

401. I.e., they've come to the wrong place.

402. Pro-ʿĀ'ishah.

403. Ibrāhīm follows Nöldeke in correcting yastaʿīnū to yastaʿīnūn (Addenda, DCXXXII).

404. Out of fear.

405. He is calling for help. Alternatively, "then who can prevent them [in their turn] from expelling men or even cities?" if al-rijāla aw al-buldāna is read.

406. Qays; Prym, n. f.

407. The market and camel camp southwest of the city (al-ʿAlī, 282; Massignon, 157; Le Strange, 45).

profaned. Then he emphasized what a terrible thing it was that [3119] had happened and called upon them to seek revenge for his blood. "To do so will glorify Allāh's religion and dominion," he said, "and to seek revenge for the blood of the unjustly killed[408] caliph is [to carry out] one of the divine punishments.[409] If you do it, you will have done right, and authority will return to you. If you neglect it, neither power nor order will be yours." Al-Zubayr then spoke similarly. Those on the right side of al-Mirbad said: "They are both correct and have spoken the truth. They have spoken justly and have ordered aright." But those on the left side said: "They have lied and acted treacherously. They have spoken falsely and have ordered so. Both gave allegiance, yet here they come saying these things." The people then threw dirt at one another and pelted one another with stones, raising an uproar.[410]

Then ʿĀ'ishah spoke up. She had a strong voice—it could be extremely loud, like the voice of a woman of high rank.[411] She praised Glorious and Almighty Allāh and magnified Him. "The people used to accuse ʿUthmān of crimes he never did," she said.

> They would belittle his governors and then come to us in Medina to ask our advice over tales they told us about them, expecting good words from us to solve things.[412] But, whenever we looked into the matter, we would find him innocent, God-fearing, and faithful and would find them lying, treacherous,[413] and deceitful, attempting to do the opposite of what they were showing. Then, when they became strong enough to rely on greater numbers, they did so. They attacked his house and desecrated sacred blood, sacred property, and the sacred city without blood debt or excuse. Therefore what is now imperative—408. Maẓlūm. See p. 39, above.

409. Ḥadd min ḥudūd Allāh, or prescriptive ordinances or statutes (*EI*², s.v.).
410. Wa-arhajū, or "dust."
411. A jalīlah was a woman who used to urge on fighters with her high voice.
412. Reading wa-yarawn ḥusnan min kalāminā (with Ibrāhīm), which is not all that different from the text's wa-yurawn ḥusnan min killāminā "and were shown a good thing in our speaking (i.e., were spoken to well and rightly) about reconciliation between them."
413. Ibrāhīm omits ghadarah.

and you have no alternative—is to arrest the killers of ʿUthmān and establish the authority of the Book of Almighty Allāh, which says "Have you not seen those who were given a part of the Book being called to the Book of Allāh for it to judge between them?"[414] [3120]

Then the followers of ʿUthmān b. Ḥunayf split into two. One group said: "By Allāh! She is correct and has spoken the truth. By Allāh! Her advice is acceptable." But the others said: "By Allāh! You all lie. We don't accept what you say." Then they threw dirt at one another and pelted one another with stones, raising an uproar.

When ʿĀ'ishah saw this, she went down, as did the people on the right flank. They went away from ʿUthmān to take up a position in al-Mirbad at the tanners' location. The followers of ʿUthmān remained where they were, pushing and shoving each other until they separated. Some went down to ʿĀ'ishah; others stayed with ʿUthmān at the entrance to the road. ʿUthmān b. Ḥunayf and his followers then took up a position at the entrance to the road—the road leading to the mosque—on the right of the tanners' location, where they confronted their opponents and barred them from its entrance.

According to Naṣr b. Muzāḥim—Sayf—Sahl b. Yūsuf—al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad: Jāriyah b. Qudāmah al-Saʿdī[415] came up and said: "Mother of the Faithful! By Allāh! The killing of ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān is a lesser matter than your coming out from your house on this accursed camel, exposing yourself to armed combat! Allāh curtained you off and gave you sanctity. You have torn down the curtain and profaned your sanctity.[416] Anyone who thinks you should be fought also thinks you should be killed. If you have come to us obedient, then return home! If you have been forced by someone to come to us, then seek help from the people [against him]!"

414. "But a party of them then turn away in opposition" (Qur'ān 3:23)—the implication being that anyone who opposes "us in Medina" has departed from Islam.

415. Al-Tamīmī, faithful ally of ʿAlī (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 75, II, 259).

416. The Prophet's wives stayed screened off behind a special curtain and had a special status. Cf. Qur'ān 33:33. By coming out, ʿĀ'ishah exposed and disgraced herself.

A young ghulām[417] from Banū Saʿd[418] then went out to Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr and said: "As for you, Zubayr, you are the disciple of the Messenger of Allāh, and as for you, Ṭalḥah, you preserved the Messenger of Allāh with your own hand.[419] I see your Mother [3121] is with you. Have you brought your wives too?"[420] "No," they both replied. "I have nothing to do with you then," the Saʿdī said and withdrew. He said the following verses about this:

You preserved the honor of your wives yet led out[421] your mother.
By Allāh! There is little justice in this!
She was commanded to trail her hems at home, but she had a whim to cross the deserts at the gallop, [Making herself] a target that her sons must defend by fighting with arrows and Khaṭṭī spears[422] and swords.
Her curtains have been ripped down by Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr.[423]
No further tale needs to be told about them!

A ghulām from Banū Juhaynah then came up to Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah,[424] who was a pious man, and said, "Tell me about the killers of ʿUthmān." "I will," he replied. "ʿUthmān's blood divides into three: A third is debited against the woman of the howdah, that is, ʿĀ'ishah; a third is against the rider of the red camel, that is, Ṭalḥah;[425] and a third is against ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib." The ghulām laughed and said, "Well, well! I see that I'm wrong!" and left him for ʿAlī. He composed a poem about this:[426]

I asked Ibn Ṭalḥah about someone who perished in the heart of Medina and was not buried.[427]

---

417. A slave boy (*EI*², s.v.).
418. I.e., Jāriyah's clan.
419. At the Battle of Uḥud.
420. Cf. pp. 101, 126, below. Caetani, IX, 41, n. 1.
421. Wa-qudtum, perhaps with an implication of "were a pimp with" (Lane, 2572c).
422. After al-Khaṭṭ, a strip of coast on the Persian Gulf (*EI*², s.v.; Lane, 760c).
423. By talking to them face to face.
424. Killed in the Battle of the Camel (Caskel and Strenziok, II, 424).
425. His own father!
426. Caetani (IX, 41 n. 3) considers this preceding story made up to provide a framework for the poem. IA omits it all.
427. ʿUthmān was not buried until after the allegiance to ʿAlī.

"There were three of them," he replied. "They murdered Ibn ʿAffān, so weep![428]
That woman in her howdah, she owes a third,
and the rider of the red camel owes another.
ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib owes the last third.
We are in a flat, unhealthy land!"[429]
So I said, "You are right about the first two but wrong about the resplendent third."

Return to Sayf's account from Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah [3122]

Abū al-Aswad and ʿImrān left;[430] Ḥakīm b. Jabalah approached, having come out with horsemen. He initiated battle, so ʿĀ'ishah's men aimed their spears but held back so that they[431] would do so too. But he did not desist and was not to be turned back and began fighting them. ʿĀ'ishah's[432] followers held back, except from defending themselves. Ḥakīm urged on his horsemen and attacked with them,[433] calling out: "She belongs to Quraysh.[434] Her cowardice and indecision[435] will certainly destroy her!" So they fought at the entrance to the road. Those in the houses round about who liked one or other of the parties looked down [from their roofs] and threw stones at the other side. Then ʿĀ'ishah ordered her men to go to the right to the graveyard of Banū Māzin, where they waited a while. The opposing forces hastened toward them, but night intervened. So ʿUthmān returned to the castle and the men to their tribes.

Then Abū al-Jarbā',[436] a member of Banū ʿUthmān[437] b. Mālik b. ʿAmr b. Tamīm, came to ʿĀ'ishah, Ṭalḥah, and al-Zubayr and advised them to take up a better position. They thought his

428. Or "and he wept."

429. I.e., this is a very bad situation, but the text is uncertain. Prym's emendation fits the meter.

430. They were ʿUthmān's messengers to ʿĀ'ishah, Ṭalḥah, and al-Zubayr; see p. 56, above.

431. Ḥakīm and his men (IA, 214).

432. IA, 214.

433. IA, 214.

434. Disliked by other tribes because of their superiority.

435. Reading ṭaysh with the text and taking the next letter as a line filler (Prym, n. e).

436. ʿĀṣim b. Dulaf (Caskel and Strenziok, II, 203).

437. More correctly, Ghaylān (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 82; Prym, who leaves it as ʿUthmān, as a feature of Sayf's tradition. Ibrāhīm does also).

advice was good. They followed his suggestion and left the graveyard of Banū Māzin and went toward al-Baṣrah's dam, opposite al-[3123] Jabbānah,[438] as far as al-Zābūqah.[439] They then moved on to the graveyard of Banū Ḥiṣn, backing on to the Dār al-Rizq,[440] and spent the night preparing themselves. All night the men kept coming to them, and when morning came they were ready to fight in the open area in front of Dār al-Rizq.

In the morning ʿUthmān b. Ḥunayf went to them just before sunrise, as did Ḥakīm b. Jabalah, talking excitedly and clutching a spear. "At whom are you swearing and saying what I hear?" asked a man from ʿAbd al-Qays. "ʿĀ'ishah," he replied. "Son of a slut!" he said. "Do you say such things to the Mother of the Faithful?" Ḥakīm thrust the head of his spear through the center of his chest and killed him. He then went past a woman as he was swearing at her, that is, at ʿĀ'ishah, and she said, "Who could have driven you to such abuse?" "ʿĀ'ishah," he replied. "Son of a slut!" she said. "Do you say such things to the Mother of the Faithful?" Ḥakīm stabbed her through the center of her chest, killed her, and went off.[441]

Once they had gathered, they stood over against them. There was an intense battle at Dār al-Rizq that day, from sunrise until afternoon. There were a great many fatalities among ʿUthmān b. Ḥunayf's men, and the wounds were heavy on both sides. ʿĀ'ishah's crier kept calling out, asking them to hold back, but they refused. It was only when evil had touched them hard and bitten into them that they called out to ʿĀ'ishah's followers to make peace and negotiate, and the latter acceded. So they made promises to each other[442] and drew up a document between them to the effect that they would send a messenger to Medina and that when he returned, if the two had given their allegiance under duress,[443] then ʿUthmān would leave them and yield al-Baṣrah to 438. The desert burial ground.

439. Al-ʿAlī, 292; lit., "angle of a house" (Lane).

440. Store for soldiers' pay; shown in the center of Massignon's map of old Baṣrah, 157.

441. This paragraph could be an interpolation. Caskel and Strenziok note that Sayf paints Ḥakīm very badly (II, 295).

442. Wa-tawāʿadū. IA, 214 has wa-tawādaʿū "they made peace."

443. Their allegiance to ʿAlī.

them both. But, if they had not been forced, then Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr would leave.

The document ran:

> In the name of Allāh, the Merciful and Compassionate. This is the agreement reached between Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr and their allies from the Muslims and the Believers, and ʿUthmān b. Ḥunayf and his allies from the Muslims and the Believers. That ʿUthmān will remain where he was and with what he had when the truce was drawn up, and that Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr will remain where they were and with what they had when the truce was drawn up, until such time as the representative and messenger of the two parties, Kaʿb b. Sūr,[444] returns from Medina. Neither of the two parties will harm the other in mosque, market, street, or place of access. There shall be mutual abstention from fighting between them[445] until Kaʿb returns with the information. If he returns to report that the people forced Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr, then the command belongs to them, and it is up to ʿUthmān whether he leaves and goes to his own chosen place or joins Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr. If he returns to report that they were not forced, then the command belongs to ʿUthmān, and it is up to Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr whether they stay and give their allegiance to ʿAlī or whether they go to their own chosen place. The Believers shall assist the party that is successful. [3124]

So Kaʿb left for Medina. The people there gathered together for his arrival—it was a Friday. He stood up and said: "Men of Medina! I am the messenger to you from the people of al-Baṣrah. Did these people force these two men to give allegiance to ʿAlī, or did they give it voluntarily?" Not one of those assembled answered 444. An influential Azdī and Baṣran judge (Abbot, Aishah, 150; Caskel and Strenziok, I, 211, II, 366), who fell in the Battle of the Camel. This sentence could be a gloss.

445. See Lane, 2206c, where a similar phrase from the treaty of al-Ḥudaybiyyah is cited.

except Usāmah b. Zayd,[446] who stood up and said: "I swear by Allāh! They[447] were definitely coerced into giving allegiance." Tammām[448] gave the order, and Sahl b. Ḥunayf and others sprang upon him. Fearing that Usāmah would be killed, Ṣuhayb b. Sinān and Abu Ayyūb Zayd[449] leaped in with a number of Companions of the Messenger of God, including Muḥammad b. Maslamah.[450] "By Allāh!" swore Ṣuhayb. "Break off from the man!" They did [3125] so, and Ṣuhayb led him out by the hand and took him into his house. "You knew that the hyena is stupid,"[451] he said. "Wasn't the silence we were keeping good enough for you?" "No, by Allāh! But I had no idea that things would reach this pass. It has led us into disaster."

So Kaʿb returned. Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr had meanwhile kept a count of incidents, all of which were of the sort one would make note of—among them that Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah, who was in the habit of performing prayers [in the mosque], happened to stand close to ʿUthmān b. Ḥunayf. Some of the Zuṭṭ and Sayābijah[452] then feared that he had come for some other reason,[453] so they pushed him away.[454] Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr then sent ʿUthmān a message: "That's one thing you've done!"[455]

News of the events in Medina reached ʿAlī, so he hastily sent a letter to ʿUthmān, accusing him of weakness and saying: "By Allāh! The two weren't forced except out of fear of schism and for the sake of unity and merit. If they want to depose me, they have

---

446. Al-Kalbī (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 291, II, 576), son of the Prophet's adopted son, Zayd, and leader of the successful raid against Mu'tah just before the Prophet's death (Watt, 323, 343).

447. Ibrāhīm has innahumā for the text's innahum, following Addenda, DCXXXII.

448. Ibn al-ʿAbbās (IA, 215).

449. Brother of Usāmah?

450. Al-Khazrajī (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 180, II, 424), leader of various successful expeditions for the Prophet (Watt, 340–41, 411).

451. I.e., "You knew that those people would get angry"; Freytag, I, 405.

452. The guards of ʿUthmān b. Ḥunayf. The Zuṭṭ were a gypsy type of people, probably originally from India (EI[1], s.v.). The Sayābijah were merceneries from Sind (EI[1], s.v.).

453. Quite rightly.

454. Emending the text's and Ibrāhīm's fa-naḥḥayāh to fa-naḥḥūh. Otherwise, either, as Prym notes, there must be a lacuna in the text, or there is a false dual from the Zuṭṭ and Sayābijah.

455. Many others will follow.

no excuse; but, if they want something else, then we'll look into the matter with them." The letter reached ʿUthmān b. Ḥunayf.

Kaʿb then arrived, and they sent a message to ʿUthmān: "Go away from us!" But ʿUthmān argued [against withdrawing],[456] on the basis of ʿAlī's letter, saying, "This is another question, distinct from the one we were negotiating." Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr then assembled their army. It was a cold, dark night with wind and rain.[457] They headed for the mosque, arriving there at the time of the evening prayer. But the Baṣrans were in the habit of postponing it, and ʿUthmān b. Ḥunayf had not yet arrived, so Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr put ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAttāb as imām. At this the Zuṭṭ and Sayābijah unsheathed their weapons and thrust them among them. Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr's men advanced against them, and they battled inside the mosque and kept on until they had killed [3126] all forty of them. They then sent their fighters in to ʿUthmān to bring him out to them. When he came to them, they debased[458] him, and not one hair was left on his face. Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr considered this very serious and sent a report to ʿĀ'ishah about what had happened, seeking her advice. She sent back, saying: "Set him free! Let him go where he wants. Don't imprison him!"[459] So they expelled the guards who were with ʿUthmān in the castle, and they entered it. They used to alternate guarding ʿUthmān, forty each day and forty each night.

ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAttāb led the prayer in the evening and at dawn, and he was the messenger between ʿĀ'ishah and Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr. He would come to her with news and then take her response back to them. He was the messenger of their army.

According to ʿUmar b. Shabbah—Abū al-Ḥasan—Abū Mikhnaf—Yūsuf b. Yazīd—Sahl b. Saʿd: When they had captured ʿUthmān b. Ḥunayf, they sent Abān b. ʿUthmān to ʿĀ'ishah to find out what they should do with him. "Kill him!" she said. But a woman said: "I beg you by Allāh, Mother of the Faithful! Remember ʿUthmān and his Companionship with the Prophet!" "Send Abān back!" ʿĀ'ishah said. So they did so, and she said to him, "Imprison him, 456. Despite the double evidence that they had been forced.

457. Nadan. IA has maṭar.
458. By plucking his beard, lit., "trampled on him."
459. Cf. the next report, where she first orders him to be killed.

but don't kill him!" "If I had known this was why you called for me," he replied, "I wouldn't have returned." Mujāshiʿ b. Masʿūd[460] then said to them, "Flog him and pluck the hair of his beard!" So they flogged him forty lashes, plucked the hair of his beard, his head, and his eyebrows and eyelashes and imprisoned him.

According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—his father—Wahb b. Jarīr b. Ḥāzim—Yūnus b. Yazīd al-Aylī—al-Zuhrī: I was told that, when Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr heard that ʿAlī had encamped at Dhū Qār, they left for al-Baṣrah and took the road to al-Munkadir. ʿĀ'ishah [3127] then heard the dogs barking and asked, "What water is this?"[461] "Al-Ḥaw'ab," they replied. "We belong to Allāh, and to Him we return,"[462] she exclaimed. "I am she! I heard the Messenger of God say in the presence of his wives, 'I wish I knew at which of you the dogs of al-Ḥaw'ab will bark!'"[463] and she wanted to turn back. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr came up to her, and it is said that he told her, "Whoever said that this was al-Ḥaw'ab was lying,"[464] and then persisted with her until she set off. They came to al-Baṣrah, the governor of which was ʿUthmān b. Ḥunayf, and he asked them, "What makes you angry at your companion?"[465] "We don't consider him more eligible for leadership than we," they replied, "after what he has done." "The man[466] made me governor, so I will write to him and inform him why you have come," said ʿUthmān, "on the condition that I lead the prayer until his reply comes." So they held back from him, and he rode off.

But they waited only two days and then attacked ʿUthmān and fought with him at al-Zābūqah near the supply center.[467] They gained the upper hand and captured ʿUthmān. They were about to kill him, but then they feared the wrath of Anṣār. So they attacked his hair and body instead.

Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr then rose to make speeches and said:

460. Killed in the Battle of the Camel (Caskel and Strenziok, II, 419).
461. See p. 50, above.
462. Qur'ān 2:157.
463. See Wensinck, VI, 340, for Arabic sources.
464. Said to have been the first shahādah bi-al-zūr (false testimony) in Islam.
465. ʿAlī. IA, 216.
466. ʿAlī.
467. Madīnat al-rizq, often dār al-rizq.

"People of al-Baṣrah! Repentance should fit the crime. We wanted the Commander of the Faithful only to get ʿUthmān to satisfy [our complaints]. We didn't want him to be killed, but the fools prevailed over the wise men and killed him." "But Abū Muḥammad!" the people replied to Ṭalḥah. "The letters you sent us said otherwise." "Did you receive any letter from me about what he was doing?" asked al-Zubayr, going on to mention ʿUthmān's murder and what led to it and to emphasize ʿAlī's blame in it. At this a man from ʿAbd al-Qays stood up facing him and said: "Be silent, man! And listen so that we may speak." ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr retorted, "What position are you in to speak?" "Company [3128] of Muhājirūn!" said the ʿAbdī. "You were the first to respond to the Messenger of God, and you gained favor through that, and then everyone else entered Islam following your example. Then when the Messenger of God died you gave allegiance to one of your number, but, by Allāh! you didn't consult us in any way about it. We gave our approval nevertheless and went along with you, and Almighty and Glorious Allāh blessed the Muslims through His caliphate. Then he died, having appointed a man caliph in his place over you. Again, you didn't discuss it with us, but we gave our approval and accepted. When this caliph died, he placed the decision in the hands of six men, and you chose ʿUthmān and gave him allegiance without consulting us. Then you found some fault with this man, so you killed him without consulting us. Then you gave allegiance to ʿAlī without consulting us. So what exactly are you angry with him about that we should join and fight him? Has he appropriated booty or carried out some injustice? Has he done something you object to such that we should join you against him? If not, then what's going on?" Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr's men then tried to kill this ʿAbdī, but his clansmen stood in their way. But the next morning they leaped upon him[468] and his men and killed seventy men.[469]

Return to Sayf's account from Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah

By the following morning the treasury and the guards were under Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr's control. The people were also with 468. In two mss. of IA "upon ʿUthmān."

469. Cf. Conrad.

them—those who were not were under cover trying to keep hidden. So first thing that morning they sent a message [to ʿĀ'ishah] that Ḥakīm was still there among the opposing company. "Don't detain ʿUthmān! Let him go!" came her reply. So they let ʿUthmān go, and he left and went where he wanted. The morning found [3129] Ḥakīm b. Jabalah with his horsemen at the ready with his ʿAbdī followers and allies of theirs from the splinter groups[470] of Rabīʿah. They then headed for Dār al-Rizq, Ḥakīm saying, "I'm not his brother if I don't come to his[471] aid." He began insulting ʿĀ'ishah, and a woman from his own tribe[472] heard him. "Son of a bitch!" she said. "It's you that deserves the insults." So he stabbed her and killed her. The ʿAbdīs, apart from those consumed by their hatred, were enraged at this. "Yesterday you did an evil deed,[473] and you've done the like again today," they said. "By Allāh! We will leave you, so that Allāh may retaliate against you." So they went back and left him. So Ḥakīm b. Jabalah[474] continued with those outsiders from all the tribes who had attacked and surrounded ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān with him. They had realized that they could no longer maintain any position in al-Baṣrah, so they gathered to him, and he took them to al-Zābūqah near Dār al-Rizq.

"Kill only those who fight you!" proclaimed ʿĀ'ishah, "and call out to those who are not ʿUthmān's killers to withdraw from us! For the killers of ʿUthmān are the only ones we are after. We will not start against anyone else." Ḥakīm then began the fighting, unintimidated[475] by the herald.[476] "Praise Allāh!" said Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr, "for He has assembled those we wish to retaliate against among the Baṣrans. O Allāh! Do not spare a single one of them! Take retaliation against them today,[477] and kill them!"

---

470. Hinds, "Murder," 462.

471. ʿUthmān b. Ḥunayf.

472. ʿAbd al-Qays.

473. He killed a man.

474. Following Ibrāhīm and Wellhausen, 159. The text and Addenda, DCXXXII, have ʿUthmān bin Ḥunayf.

475. Reading wa-lam yuraʿ (stem I passive, Lane, 1187c) with Ibrāhīm and Wellhausen, 159. Wa-lam yarʿu (the text and Glossarium, CCLXV) would mean "not refraining because of" (Lane, 1108a). De Goeje, following Nöldeke, unnecessarily suggests emending it to wa-lam yanzi' "did not incline to" (Addendum, DCXXXII).

476. Reading munādi for the text's munādā.

477. Wa-aqid minhum al-yawm. The ms. has wa-aqdimhum li-al-yawm "and bring them all on to the Day!"

So they fought them with all their might, and the fight could not have been more fierce. There were four leaders, including Ḥakīm. Ḥakīm faced Ṭalḥah, Dharīḥ[478] faced al-Zubayr, Ibn al-Muḥarrish[479] faced ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAttāb, and Ḥurqūṣ b. [3130] Zuhayr[480] faced ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b.[481] al-Ḥārith b. Hishām.[482] Ṭalḥah advanced his army toward Ḥakīm, who had 300 men and who began brandishing his sword and reciting:

I strike them with a stiff [sword],[483]
    as a frowning young man strikes,
Despairing of life,
    hankering after [heavenly] rooms

A man then struck his foot and cut it off. He crawled until he got hold of it and threw it at his opponent. It hit him in the body and knocked him down. Ḥakīm then went and killed him, propped himself up against him, and recited:

Thigh of mine! Fear not!
    My arm is still with me,
And with it I will protect my shank.[484]

He then went on, in rajaz meter:

It is not to my shame that I die.
    Shame among people is fleeing.
Perishing does not make glory into disgrace.

A man then came up to Ḥakīm, half dead with his head on the other man,[485] and asked, "What has happened to you, Ḥakīm?" "I've been killed." "By whom?" "By my cushion." He then carried him off to be among seventy of his men. While standing on 478. Ibn ʿAbbād al-ʿAbdī was one of the main leaders of the Baṣran opposition to the caliph ʿUthmān (Hinds, "Murder," 461).

479. Ibn ʿAbd ʿAmr al-Ḥanafī was another main leader of the Baṣran opposition to the caliph ʿUthmān (Hinds, "Murder," 461).

480. Al-Saʿdī was the overall leader of the Baṣran opposition to the caliph ʿUthmān (Hinds, "Murder," 461). Later he became a Khārijī opponent of ʿAlī.

481. From ʿAttāb to this word is missing from the ms.

482. Caskel and Strenziok, I, 23, II, 129.

483. No use using wood that is not seasoned and mature. See Humphreys, 214 for the same poem, with a slight difference.

484. This third verse added to the text from IA.

485. Reading ʿalā al-ākhar with Ibrāhīm and Wellhausen, 159; see Addenda, DCXXXII) for the text's ʿalā ākhar.

one foot that day with the swords overcoming them, Ḥakīm said, without faltering as he said it: "When we left these two men they had given ʿAlī allegiance and obedience. Then they come rebelling, waging war and seeking revenge for the blood of ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān. They made a split between us,[486] when we were fellow citizens together and good neighbors. O Allāh! They don't want [retaliation for] ʿUthmān!"[487] "You scum!" someone cried out. "Now that Allāh's punishment bites you, you hide your grief [3131] behind the words of the one who promoted you and your followers for what you committed against the unjustly wronged imām and for splitting the community and shedding blood and gaining worldly goods. So taste the penalty[488] of Allāh and His vengeance, and take up residence [in hell], you and those with you!"

Dharīḥ and those with him were killed, but Ḥurqūṣ b. Zuhayr and a group of his followers escaped and took refuge with their tribe. Then Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr's public announcer in al-Baṣrah called out, "Those of you who have anyone among your tribes who attacked Medina, bring him to us!" They were brought to them as dogs are and killed. Out of all the Baṣrans, only Ḥurqūṣ b. Zuhayr escaped—his tribe, Banū Saʿd, protected him. For this it paid very dearly and was given a time limit to release him. All this alienated Banū Saʿd. It was formerly allied to ʿUthmān, but now its people said, "We're pulling out of this dispute."[489]

The ʿAbdīs joined in rage with Banū Saʿd because of those [seventy] of them who were killed after the battle and those who fled to them because they wanted to maintain obedience to ʿAlī. Then Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr ordered the troops to be given their pay, provisions, and [other] dues; and they gave the obedient ones bonuses. But ʿAbd al-Qays and many of Bakr b. Wāʾil[490] defected when they disdained to give them bonuses and rushed to the treasury. But the people there attacked them and inflicted casu-

---

486. Baṣrans.
487. They want something else.
488. Cf. Qurʾān 5:95.
489. Naʿtazil.
490. This tribe belonged to the same people—later known as Rabīʿah—as ʿAbd al-Qays (*EI*², s.v.).

alties among them. This group[491] then left and set off down the road to ʿAlī.

Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr then settled down in al-Baṣrah, the only revenge outstanding there being on Ḥurqūṣ, and wrote to the Syrians about what they had done and achieved:

> We came out to wage war and to uphold the Book of Allāh by carrying out Allāh's punishments on the high and the low, on the many and the few. Only Allāh himself can [3132] > turn us away from all this. The cream of the Baṣrans and their best-bred gave us allegiance, and their dregs and their strangers rebelled against us. They forced us back with arms, saying, among other things, "We will take the Mother of the Faithful hostage" because she commanded them[492] to do right and encouraged them toward it! And Allāh showed them the example of the Muslims[493] time after time. Then, when there remained neither proof nor excuse, the killers of the Commander of the Faithful rushed headlong into battle and came out to their graves. None of them escaped to tell the tale except Ḥurqūṣ b. Zuhayr, and Allāh Most High will wreak vengeance on him, if He wills! They were as described by Allāh,[494] and we implore you by Allāh for the safety of your very souls—you must rise up as we have done. We will meet Allāh, and so will you, but we have already exonerated ourselves and fulfilled our duty.

They sent this [to Syria] by the hand of Sayyār al-ʿIjlī and wrote similarly to the Kūfans by a man from Banū ʿAmr b. Asad[495] called Muẓaffar b. Muʿarriḍ. They wrote to the people of Yamāmah,[496] whose governor at that time was Sabrah b. ʿAmr al-ʿAnbarī, by al-Ḥārith al-Sadūsī,[497] and they wrote to the people

---

491. ʿAbdīs and Bakrīs.
492. Ibrāhīm wrongly has amartahum.
493. Fa-aʿṭāhum . . . sunnat al-Muslimīn, i.e., to try to reason with the opponent before taking up arms (Glossarium, CCCLXVII).
494. In the Qurʾān, i.e., in hell.
495. Of Rabīʿah (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 141, II, 172).
496. Some seventy miles southeast of present-day al-Riyāḍh.
497. Ibn Shujāʿ b. al-Ḥārith b. Sadūs? (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 153).

of Medina by Ibn Qudāmah al-Qushayrī, who secretly infiltrated among them.

ʿĀ'ishah then wrote to the Kūfans by their messenger:

> After greetings. I am reminding you of Allāh and of Islam. Uphold the Book of Allāh by carrying out what it says: "Fear Allāh and hold on tight to His rope!"[498] Follow His Book, for we came to Baṣrah, and we appealed to them to uphold the Book of Allāh by carrying out His punishments. The upright among them responded to us, but the good-for-nothings received us with weapons and said, "We will certainly make you follow ʿUthmān [b. ʿAffān]."[499] [They said this] in order to increase[500] the ineffectiveness of the punishments [of Allāh], and they rebelled and accused us of unbelief and spoke very badly to us. But we recited the Qur'ānic verse: "Have you not seen those who > [3133] have been given part of the Book? They are called to the Book of Allāh, that it may judge between them, [but. . .]."[501] Some of them then acknowledged me but disagreed among themselves, so we let them be. But this didn't prevent those with the earlier opinion from drawing swords against my followers. ʿUthmān b. Ḥunayf insisted that their only course of action[502] was to fight me. But Allāh protected me with devout men, and He threw their trickery back in their faces.[503] We then spent twenty-six days inviting them to the Book of Allāh and to carry out His punishments, in this case with respect to the prevention of the shedding of blood of anyone who had not deserved capital punishment.[504] But they refused and produced various arguments, which we accommo-

498. Conflation and contraction of parts of two verses, 3:102–3.

499. I.e., to the grave.

500. Reading li-yazīdū with Ibrāhīm rather than the text's li-yartaddū "forsake the punishments unenforced."

501. Qur'ān 3:23; see note 414, above, for the implication.

502. Reading illā with the text and Ibrāhīm for illā mā in the ms. De Goeje's suggested lammā (Addenda, DCXXXII) "urged them on when they fought," is unnecessary.

503. Lit., "throats."

504. Homicide does not in fact occasion ḥadd in classical law (*EI*², s.v. Ḥadd).

dated. But they became afraid and treacherous; they became deceitful and ganged together.[505] But Allāh collected the blood revenge for ʿUthmān from them[506] and retaliated, and only one of them escaped. Allāh helped us and protected us from them by means of ʿUmayr b. Marthad and Marthad b. Qays[507] and men from Qays and men from al-Ribāb[508] and al-Azd.[509] So [people of al-Kūfah] do not withdraw your approval from anyone except the killers of ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān, that Allāh might receive His rights. Do not argue on behalf of the traitors,[510] or protect them, and do not approve of the attenuation[511] of Allāh's punishments, lest you join the ranks of the unjust. I am writing [this] to specific men. Stop the people's protecting these killers or assisting them, and remain in your houses. These men were not satisfied with what they did to ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān and with splitting the togetherness of the community and going against the Book and the sunnah: they [went farther and] even accused us of unbelief over our commands and our encouragement to them to uphold the Book of Allāh and carry out His punishments. They spoke to us in a very bad way. But the devout disagreed with all this and found their words very serious. "You aren't satisfied with killing the imām," they said, "but even come out against the wife of your Prophet. For commanding you the truth you would kill her, the Companions of the Messenger of God, and the leaders of the Muslims!" Then they, and ʿUthmān b. Ḥunayf with them, [3134] cajoled whoever would join up with them—ignoramuses, riffraff, Zuṭṭ, and Sayābijah. So we took shelter from them

505. Fa-khāfū wa-ghadarū wa-khānū wa-ḥasharū. Wellhausen, 159, emends fa-khāfū to fa-khānū to make, in his view, a better rhetorical parallelism. De Goeje thinks Wellhausen had not noticed that khānū would then come twice and suggests fa-ḥāfū "but they acted unjustly" for the second element (Addenda, DCXXXII). Ibrāhīm omits "wa-ḥasharū."

506. Reading thaʾrahum with Ibrāhīm for the text's thaʾrahu.

507. From Madhḥij? (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 269).

508. Of Tamīm (Watt, 138).

509. Southern Arabs (*EI*², s.v.; Hawting, 54).

510. Ibrāhīm omits ʿan: "Do not quarrel with the traitors."

511. Lane, 989b.

with a section of the garrison, and this was how it was for twenty-six days. We were calling them to the truth and not to intervene between us and the truth, but they practiced deception and treachery. We did not do the same. They used Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr's allegiance [to ʿAlī] as evidence against them, and they dispatched a messenger [to Medina], who returned to them with evidence [they were not wanting]. But they did not accept the truth and would not put up with it, so they came at me before first light to kill me and those with me who were fighting them. They continued until they reached the threshold of the house where I was staying. A guide was with them, leading them to me, but they found some men at the door of my house, among them ʿUmayr b. Marthad, Marthad b. Qays, Yazīd b. ʿAbdallāh b. Marthad, and some men from Qays, and some men from al-Ribāb and al-Azd. So the millstone ground them round—the Muslims encircled them and killed them. Thus Allāh caused all the Baṣrans to agree with Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr's aims. So if we killed seeking our revenge, our excuse is more than sufficient.

The battle took place on 25 Rabīʿ II 36/21 October 656. ʿUbayd b. Kaʿb[512] held that it was in Jumādā.[513]

According to ʿUmar b. Shabbah—Abū al-Ḥasan—ʿĀmir b. Ḥafṣ—his teachers: It was a man called Ḍukhaym[514] from al-Ḥuddān[515] who beheaded Ḥakīm b. Jabalah. His head was dangling backward, hanging on only by its skin, and his face was turned against his back. Ibn al-Muthannā al-Ḥuddānī said: "the man who killed Ḥakīm was Yazīd b. al-Asḥam al-Ḥuddānī. Ḥakīm was found killed between the dead bodies of Yazīd b. al-Asḥam and Kaʿb b. al-Asḥam.

[3135] According to ʿUmar—Abū al-Ḥasan—Abū Bakr al-Hudhalī—Abū al-Malīḥ: When Ḥakīm b. Jabalah had been killed, they tried to kill ʿUthmān b. Ḥunayf, but he said: "As you wish, but Sahl b.

512. Caskel and Strenziok, I, 245/ 301/ II, 560.
513. I.e., at least five days later; cf. pp. 81, 133, below.
514. Or perhaps Suḥaym; cf. the following Yazīd and text n. e.
515. Of al-Azd (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 216).

Ḥunayf is governor of Medina. If you kill me, he will retaliate on my behalf."[516] So they let him go.

They were at variance over [who should lead] the prayer, so ʿĀ'ishah appointed ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr, and he led the prayer. Now al-Zubayr wanted the army to be given its pay and what was in the treasury to be divided, but ʿAbdallāh his son pointed out, "If the army is paid it will disperse." So they agreed to put ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Bakr[517] in charge of the treasury.

According to ʿUmar—Abū al-Ḥasan ʿAlī—Abū Bakr al-Hudhalī[518]—al-Jārūd b. Abī Sabrah: It was the night when ʿUthmān b. Ḥunayf had been captured. In the square in front of Madīnat al-Rizq sat provisions for supplying the army. Now ʿAbdallāh was about to supply his men with them, but Ḥakīm b. Jabalah had heard what had been done to ʿUthmān, and he said, "I have no fear of Allāh if I don't come to his aid!" so he went along with a company of men, mostly from ʿAbd al-Qays but some from Bakr b. Wā'il. Ibn al-Zubayr then approached Madīnat al-Rizq and asked, "What do you want, Ḥakīm?" "We want to get supplies from these provisions," he replied, "and we want you to release ʿUthmān so that he can stay in the governor's house until ʿAlī comes, as you agreed in writing between you. By Allāh! If I could find supporters against you with whom to smash you, I wouldn't put up with this from you, but I would kill the same number from you as you killed [from us]! To spill your blood is now in fact lawful for us, to the extent of those of our brothers you've killed. Do you have no fear of Almighty and Glorious Allāh! On what grounds do you consider the shedding of blood lawful?" "It was to repay ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān's blood," replied Ibn al-Zubayr. "But those you killed, did they kill ʿUthmān?![519] Do you not fear Allāh's hatred?" he replied. But ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr said to him: "We will not supply you with any of these provisions. Nor will we release ʿUthmān b. Ḥunayf until he withdraws his allegiance to ʿAlī." "O Allāh! You are a just arbiter. Be my witness!" exclaimed Ḥakīm, and, turning to his men, he said: "I have no doubts about [3136]

516. Intaṣar; cf. Qur'ān 54:10.
517. The son of the first caliph (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 21, II, 128).
518. Sulmī b. ʿAbdallāh (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 58, II, 518).
519. Whether a question or a statement, this is heavy sarcasm, to which ʿAbdallāh has no reply.

fighting these men! Anyone who does, let them leave!" So he fought them, and a fierce battle ensued. A man struck Ḥakīm in the foot and cut it off,[520] so Ḥakīm grabbed it, hurled it, and hit him in the neck, knocking him down senseless. Ḥakīm b. Jabalah then crawled over to him, killed him, and rested his head against him. "Who killed you?" asked a passer-by. "My pillow."

Seventy from ʿAbd al-Qays were killed there. Al-Hudhalī added: Ḥakīm said the following verses when his foot was cut off:

When my courage faltered, I said to the foot, "Foot of mine! don't be frightened!
I still have my forearm to assist me."

ʿĀmir and Maslamah added: Ḥakīm's son al-Ashraf and brother al-Riʿl b. Jabalah[521] were killed with him.

According to ʿUmar—Abū al-Ḥasan—al-Muthannā b. ʿAbdallāh—ʿAwf al-Aʿrābī:[522] A man came up to Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr while they were in the mosque in al-Baṣrah. "I ask you in Allāh's name," he said, "did the Messenger of God ever give the two of you any authority to set out like this?" Ṭalḥah rose [to go] and gave no reply, so the man adjured al-Zubayr, who said, "No, but we heard you had dirhams so we've come to share them with you!"

According to ʿUmar—Abū al-Ḥasan—Sulaymān b. Arqam—Qatādah—Abū ʿUmrah, the mawlā of al-Zubayr: When the Baṣrans gave allegiance to al-Zubayr and Ṭalḥah, al-Zubayr said, [3137] "Are there not a thousand horsemen to ride with me to ʿAlī?! I will attack him, either by night or in the morning, and I should kill him before he reaches us!"[523] But no one responded. "This really is the fitnah[524] we were told about!" he continued. "Do you call it a fitnah when you are fighting in it?!" his mawlā said to him. "We see, damn you! But we do not understand.[525] There's never before been a situation when I didn't know my next step, but with this one—I don't know whether I'm coming or going."

520. Omitted in Ibrāhīm.
521. Khayyāṭ wrongly "al-Zaʿl."
522. Occurs in an isnād in Humphreys, Crisis, 33.
523. ʿAlī was on the way to al-Baṣrah.
524. Dissension, civil war (*EI*², s.v.).
525. Glossarium, CXXXIV.

According to Aḥmad b. Manṣūr—Yaḥyā[526] b. Maʿīn—Hishām b. Yūsuf the qāḍī of Ṣanʿā'—ʿAbdallāh b. Muṣʿab b. Thābit b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr—Mūsā b. ʿUqbah—ʿAlqamah b. Waqqāṣ al-Laythī:[527] When Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr and ʿĀ'ishah set out, I noticed that Ṭalḥah preferred to sit alone and would flick his beard against his chest.[528] So I said to him: "Abū Muḥammad! I see that you prefer to sit alone and keep flicking your beard against your chest. If there's something you dislike [going on], sit [and talk about it]!" "ʿAlqamah b. Waqqāṣ," he replied to me, "we were all united against others. But now we've become two mountains of iron,[529] each seeking [to finish] the other. There was indeed something I did against ʿUthmān, and my penance for it can be nothing less than having my blood spilled in the course of seeking vengeance for his blood." "So send Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah back," I said, "for you have an estate and households, and if something happens[530] he can take your place." "I don't wish to stop anyone I see active in this affair."[531] he replied. So I went to Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah and said: "Why don't you stay home? Then if something happens to your father you can take his place in his households and estate." "I don't want to be asking this man and that man[532] about what happened to him," he replied.

According to ʿUmar b. Shabbah—Abū al-Ḥasan—Abū Mikhnaf—Mujālid b. Saʿīd:[533] When ʿĀ'ishah arrived at al-Baṣrah, she wrote to Zayd b. Ṣūḥān:[534] "From ʿĀ'ishah bint Abī Bakr, Mother of the Faithful, beloved of the Messenger of God, to her devoted son Zayd b. Ṣūḥān. After greetings. When this letter of mine reaches you, come and assist us in this undertaking! If you don't, then at least make the people abandon ʿAlī." He wrote back to her: "From Zayd b. Ṣūḥān to ʿĀ'ishah bint Abī Bakr al-Ṣiddīq, [3138]

526. Correcting the ms., according to p. 44, above.

527. From Kināmah, a Medinan traditionist, d. 65–86/685–705 (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 39, II, 155).

528. I.e., brooding and depressed.

529. I.e., armies bristling with weapons.

530. I.e., if you die.

531. In retaliation for ʿUthmān, i.e., like his son Muḥammad.

532. IA's al-rukbān "the travelers" is perhaps better.

533. Kūfan transmitter (mostly from al-Shaʿbī), d. 144/762 (U. Sezgin, 210).

534. In al-Kūfah. He was an ʿAbdī and had been among the Kūfan opponents of ʿUthmān (Abbott, Aishah, 153). He died in the Battle of the Camel (p. 132, below).

beloved of the Messenger of God. After greetings. If you withdraw from this undertaking and return home, then I will be your devoted son. If you don't, I will be the first to break with you." "May Allāh have mercy on the Mother of the Faithful!" said Zayd b. Ṣūḥān. "She was ordered to stay at home,[535] and we were ordered to fight. But she didn't do what she was ordered and ordered us to do it, and she did what we were ordered and ordered us not to do it!"

An Account of ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib's Advance toward al-Baṣrah

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—ʿUbaydah b. Muʿattib—Yazīd al-Ḍakhm:[536] While ʿAlī was in Medina news reached him that ʿĀ'ishah and Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr were headed for al-Baṣrah, so he hurriedly set off hoping to catch up with them and turn them back.[537] But on reaching al-Rabadhah he learned that they had sped on ahead, so he set up camp there for a few days. He then heard that their army was making for al-Baṣrah, so he worried no more.[538] "No one likes me more than the Kūfans," he said, "and there are Arab chiefs and leaders there." He then wrote to them: "I have chosen you specially out of all the garrison cities, in preference to the others."[539]

[3139] According to ʿUmar—Abū al-Ḥasan—Bishr[540] b. ʿĀṣim—Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Laylā—his father: ʿAlī wrote to the Kūfans: "In the name of Allāh, the Merciful, the Compassionate. After greetings. I have chosen you specially and to live among you because of what I know of your friendship [to me] and love for Almighty and Glorious Allāh and for His Messenger. So whoever of you joins me and assists me has

535. Qur'ān 33:33; cf. p. 89, below.

536. For a similar report, but from Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah, see p. 53, above.

537. To Medina.

538. Fa-surriya bi-dhālika ʿanhu wa-qāla inna ahl al-Kūfah. (Cf. surra bi-dhālika wa-qāla al-Kūfah (p. 53, above).

539. Taking wa-innī bi-al-uthrah to mean wa-innī ista'thir ʿalaykum; cf. note 370, above, and Prym's suggested inclusion khaṣaṣtukum. It could also be translated as "and I am taking preference."

540. Rather than Bashīr, here and in the next isnād, following Addenda, DCXXXII.

responded to the truth and fulfilled his duty [to Allāh]."

According to ʿUmar—Abū al-Ḥasan—Ḥibbān[541] b. Mūsā—Ṭalḥah b. al-Aʿlam and Bishr b. ʿĀṣim—Ibn Abī Laylā—his father: Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr and Muḥammad b. ʿAwn[542] were sent[543] to al-Kūfah, and the people went to Abū Mūsā to ask his advice about joining up. "As for the hereafter you should stay put, but as for the here and now you should join up. It's up to you!" When the two Muḥammads heard about these words of Abū Mūsā, they dissociated themselves from him and criticized him severely. But he replied: "By Allāh!Allegiance to ʿUthmān is still binding on me and binding upon your companion who sent you. If we are required to fight,[544] then before we do so, every single one of the killers of ʿUthmān, wherever he may be, would have to be killed."

It was the last day of Rabīʿ II 36/25 October 656 when ʿAlī [b. Abī Ṭālib] left Medina, and the sister of ʿAlī b. ʿAdī[545] from Banū ʿAbd al-ʿUzzā b. ʿAbd Shams said the following verse:

O Allāh! Hamstring ʿAlī [b. ʿAdī]'s camel!
And bless not any camel that carries him!
ʿAlī b. ʿAdī is certainly not up to it.

According to ʿUmar—Abū al-Ḥasan—Abū Mikhnaf—Numayr b. Waʿlah[546]—al-Shaʿbī:[547] When ʿAlī had stopped at al-Rabadhah, a company of Banū Ṭayyi'[548] came to him. "Here is a company of Banū Ṭayyi' that have come to you," he was told. "Some want to join up with you; some want to greet you." "May Allāh reward all of them well! But 'Allāh has favored the fighters over the stay-at-homes with a great reward.'"[549] Then they entered, and ʿAlī asked, "What would you testify our position to be?" "Whatever you wish," they replied. "May Allāh reward you well!" he said. [3140]

541. Following Addenda, DCXXXII, Ibrāhīm.
542. Or Muḥammad b. Jaʿfar; ʿAwn was Muḥammad's uncle, according to Prym.
543. Following Ibrāhīm's vocalization.
544. Or "If he wishes us to fight," reading arādanā for the text's uridnā (Addenda, DCXXXII).
545. Caskel and Strenziok, I, 14, II, 152. His sister is trying to keep him back.
546. Al-Hamdānī (U. Sezgin, 215).
547. ʿĀmir b. Sharāḥīl, d. 103/721 (U. Sezgin, 136).
548. A north Arabian tribe (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 176, 249, II, 555; Watt, 87–90).
549. Qur'ān 4:95.

"You became Muslims voluntarily, you fought the apostates, and you've paid your alms to poor Muslims in full."[550] Saʿīd b. ʿUbayd al-Ṭāʾī then rose and said: "Commander of the Faithful! Some people can express exactly what's in their minds. But Allāh knows! I can't do that. But I'll try my best. Allāh gives success. I know that I'll [always] give you my best advice, both secretly and openly, and I'll fight your enemies at every engagement. I will grant claims to you that I would not grant any of your contemporaries, because of your personal merit and your relationship [to the Prophet]." "May Allāh have mercy on you!" replied ʿAlī. "You've expressed your inner thoughts perfectly." He was killed with ʿAlī at Ṣiffīn, may Allāh have mercy on him!

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: When ʿAlī had arrived and set up camp at al-Rabadhah, he sent Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr and Muḥammad b. Jaʿfar to al-Kūfah with a letter to [the Kūfans]: "I have chosen you specially out of all the garrison cities, and I am urgently asking help from you because of what has happened. So be supporters and helpers of Allāh's religion! Give us assistance, and join with us! To set things right is what we are after, so that the community [3141] may revert to being brothers. Whoever approves of this and chooses it has approved of the truth and chosen it. Whoever disapproves of this has disapproved of the truth and belittled it." So the two men went off; ʿAlī stayed in al-Rabadhah, making preparations. He sent to Medina, requesting animals and weapons. These came to him, and his force multiplied.

He then stood up among the people and delivered this sermon:

> Through Islam Almighty and Glorious Allāh has made us great, has lifted us up,[551] and has made us brothers after lowness and fewness, after mutual dislike and distance.[552] The people progressed in this way for as long as He willed, with Islam as their religion, the right on their side, and the Book as their imām. But then this man was struck by the hands of that faction that Satan had stirred 550. Ṭayyiʾ were predominantly Christian (Watt, 89–90).

551. The ms. could read wa-waffaqanā "and gave us success" for the text's wa-rafaʿanā.

552. Sajʿ: baʿd dhillah wa-qillah wa-tabāghuḍ wa-tabāʿud.

> up to foment discord among this community. Mark my words! This community will not escape becoming split, just as previous communities split up. So we take refuge in Allāh from the evil that will be!

He then continued:

> What will be must without doubt come about. Mark my words! This community will split into seventy-three sects, the worst one being the one who professes my cause but doesn't perform my work. Indeed you have lived to see [this],[553] so hold fast to your religion, go aright with your Prophet's guidance,[554] and follow his sunnah. Examine what is obscure to you against the Qur'ān, and hold fast to what the Qur'ān tallies with and abandon what it disagrees with. Be well satisfied with Glorious and Almighty Allāh as Lord, with Islam as religion, with Muḥammad as Prophet, and with the Qur'ān as arbiter and imām.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: As 'Alī was about to leave al-Rabadhah for Baṣrah, a son of Rifā'ah b. Rāfi'[555] came up to him and asked, "Commander of the Faithful! What are you intending, and where are you taking us?" "Our aim and intention," replied 'Alī, "is iṣlāḥ—if they acknowledge our right and accept that from us."[556] "And if they don't accept that from us?" he asked. "Then," replied 'Alī, "we'll leave them[557] to make their justification, we'll give them the right to have it, and we'll be patient." "And if they aren't satisfied [with that]?" "We'll leave them alone as long as they leave us alone." "And if they don't leave us alone?" "We'll defend ourselves against them." "This is a good attitude," said Rifā'ah's son. Al-Ḥajjāj b. Ghaziyyah, one of the Anṣār, then stood up and said, [3142]

553. IA adds "them."

554. IA has "go aright with my guidance, for it is your Prophet's guidance."

555. Al-Zuraqī al-Khazrajī, who fought at Badr as an opponent of 'Uthmān (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 192, II, 487).

556. I.e., without fighting.

557. Reading nada'uhum with Ibrāhīm, for the text's nada'hum, as also in the next line (nu'tihim is clearly indicative). De Goeje (Glossarium, CCXL) suggests nad'uhum "we'll call on them to present their justification."

"I'm going to satisfy you with action just as you've satisfied me with words," and he recited:

Catch up with it! Catch up with it before it slips away!
Let us hurry and go up toward the clamor.
May my soul not find refuge if I fear death!

"By Allāh! I will help Almighty and Glorious Allāh, just as He called us Helpers."[558] The Commander of the Faithful then began the march. The vanguard was led by Abū Laylā b. ʿUmar b. al-Jarrāḥ,[559] with Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah holding the banner. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās led the right flank and ʿUmar b. Abī Salimah or ʿAmr b. Sufyān b. ʿAbd al-Asad led the left. ʿAlī marched off with 760 men, and ʿAlī's poet versified for him:

Set off in companies, and advance quickly![560]
For [ʿAlī] has decided. So be positive about it Until you and they encounter one another on steeds,[561] with which we will beat Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr.

He was in front of the Commander of the Faithful, ʿAlī, who was [3143] on a reddish-brown she-camel of his, pulling along a dark bay horse. At Fayd[562] they were met by a ghulām from Banū Saʿd b. Thaʿlabah b. ʿĀmir[563] called Murrah, who asked, "Who are all these?" "The Commander of the Faithful," came the reply. "A passing journey involving blood of passing souls!" he remarked. ʿAlī heard him and called him over and asked, "What's your name?" "Murrah." "May Allāh make your life bitter!"[564] said ʿAlī. "You're playing the soothsayer[565] for today, are you?"[566] "No, I'm an augur."[567]

---

558. Anṣār.
559. See p. 32, above, where the same men had charge of the same positions on leaving Medina.
560. Reading either the marginal gloss wa-khubbū or the text's wa-ḥuththū.
561. Glossarium, CCXXXIV. It is not clear exactly who "they" and "you" (pl.) are—perhaps ahl al-bayt and the present company.
562. Halfway between Mecca and al-Kūfah (Yāqūt, IV, 282).
563. Or ʿAmr, of Asad (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 171, II, 497).
564. Amarra.
565. Kāhin (*EI*², s.v.).
566. Reading al-yawm with Ibrāhīm and Glossarium, CCLXXXIV for the text's al-qawm: "You're the army's soothsayer?"
567. ʿĀʾif (*EI*², s.v.).

When they dismounted at Fayd, Asad and Ṭayyi' came to ʿAlī and put themselves at his service, but he said: "Stay at home! The Muhājirūn are enough." A Kūfan came to Fayd before ʿAlī had left. "Who's this man?" asked ʿAlī. "ʿĀmir b. Maṭar,"[568] he replied. "Al-Laythī?" "No, al-Shaybānī." "Tell me your news!" said ʿAlī. He did so, and when ʿAlī questioned him about Abū Mūsā he replied, "If you want peace,[569] then Abū Mūsā is the man; but, if you want to fight, then Abū Mūsā is not the man." "By Allāh!" said ʿAlī. "All I'm after is iṣlāḥ until it's completely rejected." "I've given you the news," he said and fell silent. ʿAlī also fell silent.

According to ʿUmar—Abū al-Ḥasan—Abū Muḥammad—ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmayr—Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah: ʿUthmān b. Ḥunayf came to ʿAlī at al-Rabadhah with the hair of his head, beard, and eyebrows all plucked out and said: "Commander of the Faithful! When you sent me I had a fine beard, but I return to you beardless." "You've earned a great reward,"[570] ʿAlī told him. "The people were ruled before me by two men who acted according to the Book. But when a third ruled them they said and did things. Then the people gave me allegiance. Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr also gave me allegiance, but then they withdrew it and incited the people against me. How strange that they should comply with Abū Bakr and ʿUmar yet oppose me. By Allāh! They know very well that I'm no less of a man than any of those who've passed on. O Allāh! Undo what the two of them have contracted, do not [3144] ratify what they have consolidated, and show them the evil of what they've done!"

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: When ʿAlī dismounted at al-Thaʿlabiyyah[571] news came of what had befallen ʿUthmān b. Ḥunayf and his guards. So he stood up and told the men the news and then said: "O Allāh! Spare me from the killing of Muslims that You have inflicted[572] on Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr, and deliver us from all these people!"

---

568. Layth is of Kinānah and Shaybān of Bakr b. Wā'il, both northern tribes.

569. Al-ṣulḥ.

570. Often said to someone suffering misfortune.

571. According to Yāqūt (II, 78) this is about halfway along the Mecca-Kūfah road, as it is between al-Shuqūq and al-Khuzaymah, which stand at thirds.

572. Killing a believer deliberately earns hellfire (Qur'ān 4:93).

Then when he reached al-Isād news came of what had befallen Ḥakīm b. Jabalah and the killers of ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān, so he said: "Allāh is great! Now that they have got their revenge, what will save me from Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr and them [from me]?"[573] and he recited the verses from the Qur'ān "Whatever calamity may happen on earth or to yourselves has been written down before We bring it into being."[574] He then recited the verse of poetry

Ḥakīm called with the call of courage and dismounted as he did onto the battleground.

Then when they reached Dhū Qār ʿUthmān b. Ḥunayf got to them, and he had not a hair on his face. When ʿAlī saw him, he looked at his companions and said,[575] "He left us as an elder and returned as a youth." ʿAlī stayed at Dhū Qār waiting for[576] Muḥammad and Muḥammad.[577] News then reached ʿAlī of what had befallen Rabīʿah and of the departure of ʿAbd al-Qays and their taking to the road, and he said, "ʿAbd al-Qays is the best of Rabīʿah, and Rabīʿah is all good." He then recited:

How deeply I mourn for Rabīʿah,
Rabīʿah who always heard [me] and obeyed.
Disaster fell upon them before I reached them.[578]
ʿAlī offers a prayer to be heard
[3145] That thereby they may reach the highest station.

Bakr b. Wā'il then presented themselves to ʿAlī, and he replied to them as he had to Ṭayyi' and Asad.[579]

Now, when Muḥammad and Muḥammad arrived in al-Kūfah and took Abū Mūsā the Commander of the Faithful's letter and made ʿAlī's orders known among the people, they were not[580] given any [positive] response. That evening some prominent wise men went to see Abū Mūsā and asked him, "what do you think about join-

573. I.e., the clash is now inevitable.
574. Qur'ān 57:22.
575. Jokingly to make ʿUthmān feel better.
576. Yalūm "criticizing," as in the manuscript, is unlikely.
577. Ibn Abī Bakr and Ibn ʿAwn/Ja'far.
578. See a variant of this hemistich, p. 125, below.
579. I.e., "Stay at home!"; see p. 85, above.
580. Reading lam with Ibrāhīm, for the text's fa-lam.

ing up [with ʿAlī]?" "Reason would have been possible yesterday,"[581] he replied, "but not today. What you gave no thought to in the past[582] is what has brought what you're witnessing down upon you. So what is left is two things, and that's all. Staying here leads to the hereafter; joining up leads to this world. So make your choice!" No one responded, so the two emissaries became angry and spoke roughly to Abū Mūsā. "By Allāh!" Abū Mūsā replied. "Allegiance to ʿUthmān is still binding on me and binding upon your companion. So, if there's no way out of fighting, the killers of ʿUthmān, wherever they may be, will have to be dealt with before we fight anyone." The two of them then left for ʿAlī and reached him at Dhū Qār, where they gave him the news.

Now ʿAlī had gone out with al-Ashtar, who had been in a hurry to go to al-Kūfah. ʿAlī said, "You, Ashtar, advised us to keep Abū Mūsā as governor, and you are always objecting. So go, you and ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās, and repair the mess you caused!" So ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās left with al-Ashtar and came to al-Kūfah. There they spoke with Abū Mūsā and tried to rally support against him among some of the Kūfans. But Abū Mūsā said to the Kūfans: "[Remember!] I was your leader on the day of al-Jaraʿah,[583] and I am your leader today." He then assembled the people and addressed them with this sermon:

> Men! The Companions of the Prophet, those who were with him on the battlefields, know more about Glorious and Almighty Allāh and about His Messenger than those who weren't Companions. So we [Companions] owe you [non-Companions] a duty,[584] and we will definitely fulfill it. Our advice was not to take Almighty and Glorious Allāh's authority lightly or be audacious before Him. The next piece of advice was that you should take those who had come to you from Medina and send them back there until they came to an agreement among themselves. For they know better than you who is right for the imamate, [3146]

581. Before ʿUthmān was killed.
582. Killing ʿUthmān.
583. A battle on a sandy hill that took place between Muslims during ʿUthmān's time (Ibn Manẓūr, IX, 397 l. 4).
584. Giving sincere advice (ḥaqq al-naṣīḥah).

and you shouldn't get involved in the matter. But, as for what's happened now, it's an endless[585] fitnah. The one asleep in it is better off, than the one awake in it. The one awake in it is better off than the one who stays at home from it. The one who stays at home from it is better off than the one who stands in it. The one who stands in it is better off than the one who rides in it. So be the ones all the Arabs look to![586] Sheathe your swords, take off your spearheads, cut your bowstrings, and shelter the oppressed and the persecuted until this affair is over and this fitnah has been dispelled.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: When Ibn ʿAbbās returned to ʿAlī with the news, he called his son al-Ḥasan and sent him [to al-Kūfah]. With him he sent ʿAmmār b. Yāsir,[587] saying, "Go and set right what you've messed up!" So the two headed off and entered the mosque [in al-Kūfah]. The first man to come to them was Masrūq b. al-Ajdaʿ.[588] He greeted them and turned to ʿAmmār and asked: "Abū al-Yaqẓān! Why did you all kill ʿUthmān?" "For swearing at our women and beating our bodies!" ʿAmmār replied. "By Allāh!" said Masrūq and quoted:[589] "'You have not punished as you were punished.[590] If only you had held back! Those holding back would have [3147] benefited.'" Abū Mūsā then came out and met al-Ḥasan and embraced him. He then turned to ʿAmmār and asked: "Abū al-Yaqẓān! Were you one of those who attacked the Commander of the Faithful, making yourself, along with the other profligates, liable for capital punishment?" "No, I did not," he replied. "Why do you abuse me?" But al-Ḥasan interrupted them; he turned to Abū Mūsā and asked: "Abū Mūsā! Why are you holding the people back from us? By Allāh! All we want is iṣlāḥ. The Commander of the Faithful

585. Ṣammāʾ, lit., "deaf."

586. Jurthūmah, a prominent place where people might congregate (Ibn Manẓūr, XIV, 362; Lane, 404c), i.e., "stay in your places, so that others will follow suit."

587. Companion of the Prophet who fell at Ṣiffīn on ʿAlī's side (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 272, II, 167; *EI*², s.v.).

588. Al-Hamdānī, a Kūfan scholar and traditionist (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 229, II, 401).

589. Qur'ān 16:126, modified so as to refer to the past, rather than the future.

590. I.e., you have overdone the retaliation.

is not the kind to be feared over anything." "You're right, and you're more precious to me than my father and mother," he replied, "but the adviser should be trusted. I heard the Messenger of Allāh say: 'It will be a fitnah. The sitter will be better off than the stander, the stander than the walker, the walker than the rider.' Almighty and Glorious Allāh made us brothers. He made our property and blood forbidden to each other when He said: 'Believers! Do not consume each other's capital in foolish pursuits . . . and do not kill each other! Allāh has great concern for you.'[591] Glorious and Almighty Allāh also said the verse that begins[592] 'Whoever kills a believer deliberately, hell is his punishment.'" 'Ammār got angry at this. He spoke harshly to him and stood up and said: "All of you listen! It was only to him personally that the Prophet said, 'You're better sitting in it than standing.'"[593] "Shut up, you slave!"[594] said a Tamīmī, standing up. "Only yesterday you were with the riffraff, and today you insult our commander!" Then Zayd b. Ṣūḥān and his group got up, and so did the rest of the people, but Abū Mūsā began restraining them. He then hurried to the minbar, and the people fell silent. Meanwhile, Zayd came on his donkey and stopped at the door of the mosque. He was carrying 'Ā'ishah's two letters, the one to himself[595] and the one to the Kūfan people. He had asked her to write a general public letter and had put it with his own. He therefore was coming with both, with [3148] the private letter and the public one, which said: "After greetings. Take no action, people [of al-Kūfah], and stay in your houses, except against the killers of 'Uthmān b. 'Affān." When he had finished reading, he said: "She was given an order and we were given an order. She was ordered to stay at home,[596] and we were ordered to fight until all fitnah had gone.[597] But she's ordering us to do what

591. Qur'ān 4:29.

592. Qur'ān 4:93, which continues, "forever and ever. Allāh's anger and curse is upon him and He has prepared an enormous punishment for him." Ibrāhīm omits "al-āyah."

593. The Prophet had had a sharp altercation with him one day, and Abū Mūsā had repented.

594. 'Ammār was black. He was the son of a mawlā of the Makhzūmī Abū Ḥudhayfah (*EI*², s.v.).

595. See p. 79, above; Abbott, 'Aishah, 153.

596. Qur'ān 33:33; cf. p. 80, above.

597. Qur'ān 2:193.

she was ordered and taking on herself[598] what we were ordered to do!" But up stood Shabath b. Ribʿī[599] and called out, "You ʿUmāni!" (Zayd was from ʿAbd al-Qays of ʿUmān, not from the Baḥraynīs).[600] "You stole at Jalūlāʾ,[601] and Allāh cut off your [hand]. You've disobeyed the Mother of the Faithful, so may Allāh kill you![602] What Almighty and Glorious Allāh ordered concerning iṣlāḥ among the people[603] was all that she was ordered. By the Lord of the Kaʿbah! You spoke and the people became incited."[604]

Then Abū Mūsā stood up and addressed the people:

> Obey me, and be the ones all the Arabs look to![605] The oppressed will come to you for shelter, and the afraid will find safety with you. We are the Companions of Muḥammad. We're better able to understand his words "When the fitnah approaches it confuses; when it retreats it makes things clear. Fitnah rips [the community] apart like a stomach ulcer. The winds fan it, from the north and south, from the east and west. Then it dies down for a while, but where it arises from no one knows. It renders the wise man inexperienced." Sheathe your swords,[606] > [3149] snap your spears, throw away your arrows, cut your bowstrings, and stay in your houses! Leave Quraysh—for[607] they've insisted on leaving Medina and on separating from those who know about the leadership—to mend its own tear and repair its own split. If it succeeds, then it will bring good things on itself; if it doesn't, then it will

598. Wa-rakibat mā umirnā bihi. Abbott, ʿAishah, 154–55 translates "while she rides to carry out the orders. . . .

599. Of Tamīm; he became a Khārijī after Ṣiffīn (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 68, II, 521).

600. Shabath was probably from these. Calling Zayd ʿUmānī was derogatory.

601. He confessed. A station in Iraq on the Khurāsān road, east of the Tigris, 34°10′ N, 45° E (*EI*², s.v.).

602. For the fulfilment of this wish, see p. 132, below.

603. Qurʾān 49:9–10.

604. Ibrāhīm notes that the text is obscure.

605. See p. 88, above.

606. Cf. p. 88, above.

607. Reading idh, following Ibrāhīm and Wellhausen (159), for the text's idhā. Leaving Quraysh means leaving ʿAlī, ʿĀʾishah, Ṭalḥah, and al-Zubayr.

bring death on themselves. Its oil[608] will flow on its skin. Trust me! Don't think I'm deceiving you! If you obey me you'll be safe spiritually and temporally, and those who caused this fitnah will suffer the blast of its heat.

Then Zayd stood up, lifted his handless arm, and said: "'Abdallāh b. Qays![609] Turn the Euphrates back on is course! Turn it back on itself to its source! If you can do that then you'll be able to do what you're proposing. No! Leave what you're incapable of achieving alone!" Then he recited two verses from the Qur'ān:[610] "Alif, lam, mim. Do the people think that they will be left alone saying 'We believe' and not be tested [by fitnah]?" and added, "Go and join the Commander of the Faithful and the Head of the Muslims! Do it quickly, all of you! And you'll be making the right decision."

Al-Qa'qā' b. 'Amr then stood up and said: "I give you all sincere advice. I'm concerned about you. I want[611] you to be correctly guided, so I will certainly tell you the whole truth. What the governor said is the correct course of action, if only it were possible. But as for what Zayd said—and Zayd [remember] is a part of[612]this fitnah—don't any of you be advised by him. No one who has launched into or embraced this fitnah will [be able to] extricate himself from it. The only view that really makes sense is [3150] that we have to have leadership to organize the people, to restrain the oppressor and strengthen the oppressed. Here is 'Alī. He is governing. He has been just in what he has called for, and that has been for iṣlāḥ and nothing else. So disperse, but keep your eyes and ears open to see how things develop!"[613]

Then Sayḥān[614] said: "Men! This situation and these people have to have a leader who will ward off the oppressor and strengthen the oppressed and unite the people. This leader of yours is calling you so that the dispute between him and his two companions

608. Reading samnuhā. Cf. Freytag, I, 614.
609. Abū Mūsā.
610. Qur'ān 29:12. Abū Mūsā's position is un-Qur'ānic.
611. The ms. has a number of questionable readings over the next few lines.
612. Ibrāhīm omits hādhā, and IA has 'aduww "Zayd is totally against," requiring a different meaning for al-amr.
613. Be witnesses.
614. Zayd's brother. The ms. has Ṣuḥār.

may be looked into. He has been entrusted with the community. He is the one with insight into religion, so whoever joins up with him we'll go along with them." ʿAmmār had calmed down after his initial outburst. When Sayḥān had finished his sermon he spoke up and said: "Here is the paternal cousin of the Messenger of Allāh calling you out against the wife of the Messenger of Allāh and Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr. I bear witness that she is his wife in the hereafter as well as this life,[615] so consider very carefully what is right, and then fight on its side!" Someone replied: "Abū al-Yaqẓān! The right is with the person about whom you bore witness that she will be in paradise and against the one about whom you didn't do so." "Desist, ʿAmmār!" said al-Ḥasan. "Iṣlāḥ has its proponents."[616]

Al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī then stood up and said: "Men! Respond to the call of your commander, and go join your brothers, for there will be those who hasten to him for this affair. By Allāh! That the controllers of the affair should be those with wisdom[617] is both [3151] better in this world and more beneficial in the next. So answer our call and assist us against this affliction of ours and yours!" The people were indeed sympathetic and responded favorably to al-Ḥasan.

Then some tribesmen from Ṭayyi'[618] came to ʿAdī[619] and asked: "What do you think? What are your orders?" "We'll wait and see what the people do." When ʿAdī was told of al-Ḥasan's undertaking and what opinions had been voice, he said: "We gave allegiance to this man ʿAlī, and he summoned us to something good and to look into this critical new situation. So we are going along and looking." Hind b. ʿAmr[620] then stood up and spoke: "The Commander of the Faithful summoned us and sent messengers to 615. ʿAmmār is here showing his impartiality.

616. I.e., my father ʿAlī and not you. ʿAmmār had not been doing too well; cf. p. 88, above.

617. I.e., ʿAlī's family or the addressees (in flattery).

618. An important north Arabian tribe (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 176, 249, II, 555).

619. Ibn Ḥātim, their leader, originally a Christian, fought at Qādisiyyah, and with ʿAlī at the battles of the Camel, Ṣiffīn, and Nahrawān (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 256, II, 139).

620. Al-Jamalī of Madhḥij, killed in the Battle of the Camel by ʿAmr b. Yathribī al-Ḍabbī (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 271, II, 283).

us, and now his son has come to us. So listen to what he says, and join his command. Hasten to the side of your commander! Look into this matter with him, and support him with your opinions!" Ḥujr b. ʿAdī[621] then stood up and spoke: "Respond, all of you, to the Commander of the Faithful. 'Hasten to fight! both light and heavy.'[622] Agree to it! I'll be the first of you." Then al-Ashtar got up and mentioned the Jāhiliyyah and its severity and Islam and its ease and went on to mention ʿUthmān. Al-Muqaṭṭaʿ b. al-Haytham b. Fujayʿ al-ʿĀmirī al-Bukkāʾī then went up to al-Ashtar and said: "Silence! Allāh make you ugly! A dog should be left alone with its barking!" So the people rose up and made al-Ashtar sit down, and al-Muqaṭṭaʿ stood and said: "After this we cannot put up with anyone coming along with bad comments about one of our imāms. ʿAlī is sufficient in our opinion. By Allāh! If people like this[623] disagree with ʿAlī, then let a man bite[624] his tongue in these meetings of ours! Accept therefore what al-Ḥasan and ʿAmmār are urging you to do!" "The old man is right" said al-Ḥasan and spoke up: "Listen, men! I set off early tomorrow morning, so let whoever wishes come out with me by land and whoever wishes by water."[625] Nine thousand set off with him—some by land, others on the water. Each seventh had its commander. Six thousand two hundred went on land, 2,800[626] by water. [3152]

According to Naṣr b. Muzāḥim al-ʿAṭṭār—ʿUmar b. Saʿīd—Asad b. ʿAbdallāh—a scholar contemporary with the events:[627] ʿAbd Khayr al-Khaywānī[628] went up to Abū Mūsā and asked him, "Were these two—that is, Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr—among those who gave allegiance to ʿAlī?" "Yes," he replied. "Did he do something bad to permit withdrawing allegiance to him?" "I don't know." "May you not know! And we'll not follow you until you do know! Abū Mūsā! Do you know anyone not involved in this

621. Of Kindah; he fought at Qādisiyyah, and with ʿAlī at the battles of the Camel and Ṣiffīn (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 236, II, 329).
622. Qur'ān 9:41, a call to jihād.
623. Prym's possible emendation, ḥakā, is difficult.
624. I.e., keep tight-lipped (Freytag, II, 694).
625. The Euphrates.
626. According to IA, 2,400.
627. Cf. p. 52, above.
628. Of Hamdān (Caskel and Strenziok, II, 125).

fitnah, as you claim it to be? Only four parties[629] remain—ʿAlī behind Kūfah, Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr in Baṣrah, Muʿāwiyah in Syria, and another party in the Ḥijāz, where no booty is gained and no enemy is fought." "There are no better people than they," replied Abū Mūsā, "where there is a fitnah." "Your deception has got the better of you, Abū Mūsā!" said ʿAbd Khayr.

[3153] Now al-Ashtar had gone to ʿAlī and said, "Commander of the Faithful! I already sent a man before these two, but I didn't see him sort anything out or get control over anything. These two are the most likely of those you've sent to get the matter sorted out in the way you wish, but I don't know what will happen. So if you—may Allāh ennoble you!—were to think of sending me after them [I think it would be good], for the Kūfans are my most loyal followers. If I went to them I don't expect a single one would oppose me." "Catch them up, then!" ʿAlī told him. So al-Ashtar headed for Kūfah, and when he got there the men had all gathered in the Great Mosque. So every tribe he passed that he saw had a group sitting together or in a mosque he would invite, "Follow me to the castle!" So he reached the castle with a large following and broke in and entered. Now Abū Mūsā was standing addressing the people in the mosque and telling them to hold back. "Men!" he said. "This fitnah is blind and deaf. It is trampling on its halter.[630] The sleeper in it is better off than the sitter.[631] The sitter in it is better off than the stander. The stander in it is better off than the walker. The walker in it is better off than the runner. The runner in it is better off than the rider. It is a fitnah that rips [the community] apart like a stomach ulcer.[632] It has come at you from the place where you were safe and leaves the wise man bewildered like someone without experience.[633] We, the congregation of the Companions of Muḥammad, are better able to understand the fitnah—when it approaches it confuses and when it retreats it discloses."[634] ʿAmmār then heckled him, and al-Ḥasan said to

629. Reading firaq following Ibrāhīm and de Goeje (Addenda, DCXXXIII) for the text's qurūn "leaders" (Glossarium, CDXXII).
630. I.e., it is out of control.
631. Cf. p. 89, above.
632. Cf. p. 90, above.
633. Cf. p. 90, above.
634. Cf. p. 90, above.

him: "Resign from the governorship over us! You with no mother![635] Step down from our minbar!" "Did you hear this from the Messenger of Allāh?" asked ʿAmmār. "Here's my hand to prove what I say,"[636] replied Abū Mūsā. "The Messenger of Allāh was saying something specifically to you," ʿAmmār said to him, "when he said, 'You're better off sitting than you will be standing in it.'"[637] ʿAmmār added, "Allāh overcomes whoever struggles against Him and rejects His words!" [3154]

According to Naṣr b. Muzāḥim al-ʿAṭṭār—ʿUmar b. Saʿīd—a man—Nuʿaym—Abū Maryam al-Thaqafī: By Allāh! I was in the mosque that day when ʿAmmār was addressing Abū Mūsā and saying those words to him, when out came some of Abū Mūsā's ghulāms to us. They were aggravatedly calling out: "Abū Mūsā! This man al-Ashtar entered the castle, beat us, and threw us out." So Abū Mūsā came down [from the minbar] and entered the castle, but al-Ashtar shouted at him: "Get out of our castle, motherless man! May Allāh eject your soul! By Allāh! You have been one of the secret dissenters[638] for a long time!" "Just give me this evening," he requested. "You may have it, but you're definitely not sleeping in the castle tonight." Men then entered and were rifling Abū Mūsā's belongings, but al-Ashtar stopped them and sent them out of the castle. "I've expelled him,"[639] he said, and held the men back from him.

The Commander of the Faithful Dismounts at Dhū Qār

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—ʿAmr—al-Shaʿbī: When they congregated at Dhū Qār ʿAlī received them with a group, which included Ibn ʿAbbās. He then welcomed them. "Men of al-Kūfah!" he said. "It was you who repelled the power of the Sasanians and their kings. You scattered their troops, and their inheritances fell to you. You enriched[640] your territory

635. A milder form of lā abā lak!
636. I.e., you can cut it off if I'm lying.
637. Cf. p. 89, above.
638. Munāfiqīn; see *EI*², s.v.
639. I.e., that is sufficient.
640. IA, "protected."

and assisted the Muslims against their enemy. So I am calling you to witness our Baṣran brothers with us. What we want is that they [3155] regain their senses, but if they persist we'll treat them with gentleness and keep ourselves apart from them as long as they don't initiate any injustice against us. Allāh willing, we won't neglect any course of action that might improve the situation. We'll choose it rather than one that will make things worse. There is no power except with Allāh!"

Seven thousand two hundred gathered at Dhū Qār. The whole of ʿAbd al-Qays also were waiting to join ʿAlī as he passed them on his way to Baṣrah, and they were . . .[641] thousand. A further 2,400 were on the river.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah (their transmission): When ʿAlī dismounted at Dhū Qār he sent three lots of envoys [to al-Kūfah]: Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr with Muḥammad b. Jaʿfar, then Ibn ʿAbbās with al-Ashtar, then his son al-Ḥasan with ʿAmmār. Everyone who had been active rushed to join in this cause—it was not that the leaders were sending in their men. There were 5,000 of them, half going by land and half by river. Those who had not yet been active or become involved, but had given ʿAlī their obedience,[642] also rushed to join and teamed up with the moderates.[643] They were 4,000. The leaders of the moderates were al-Qaʿqāʿ b. ʿAmr, Saʿr b. Mālik,[644] Hind b. ʿAmr, and al-Haytham b. Shihāb. The leaders of the activists were Zayd b. Ṣūḥān, al-Ashtar Mālik b. al-Ḥārith, ʿAdī b. Ḥātim, al-Musayyab b. Najabah,[645] and Yazīd b. Qays.[646] These all had with them their allies and other men similar to them, who were not inferior except that they were not given actual command, like Ḥujr b. ʿAdī[647] and Ibn Maḥdūj al-

641. The number had fallen out of the text even before IA's time.

642. Reading wa-kāna ʿalā ṭāʿatihi (Ibrāhīm and Addenda, DCXXXIII) for the text's wa-kāna ʿAlī ẓāʿinan: "So ʿAlī set off."

643. Al-jamāʿah. For this translation and "activists" for nuffār, see Hinds, "Kūfan Political Alignments," 361. Both groups were early comers to Kūfah.

644. Following Ibrāhīm and Addenda, DCXXXIII. The text has Saʿd.

645. Al-Qurashī (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 131, II, 436).

646. Probably Ibn Tammām from Hamdān (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 231, II, 596).

647. Ibn Ḥātim. He led the Kūfans against Muʿāwiyah.

Bakrī.[648] There was no other Kūfan of another opinion, and they hastened to war, all except a few. [3156]

When they dismounted at Dhū Qār ʿAlī called al-Qaʿqāʿ b. ʿAmr and sent him to the Baṣrans, saying, "Ibn al-Ḥanẓaliyyah! (al-Qaʿqāʿ was a Companion of the Prophet) Go and see these two men! Invite them to friendship and unity, and stress the evil of schism. What are you going to do about any proposal from the two of them on which you don't have my advice?" "We'll present them with your orders. If they propose something that we don't have your view on, we'll exert our own judgment and make our comments on the basis of what we hear and consider necessary." "You're the right man for the situation" replied ʿAlī.

So al-Qaʿqāʿ left and went to al-Baṣrah.[649] He first went to ʿĀ'ishah and greeted her: "Dear Mother! What compelled you to come to this city?" "My dear son! Iṣlāḥ between the Muslims." "Would you send for Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr," he asked, "so you can hear what I and the two of them have to say?" She did so, and they came. "I asked the Mother of the Faithful what compelled her to come to this region," said al-Qaʿqāʿ, "and she said 'Iṣlāḥ between the Muslims.' What do you two say? Do you share her opinion or not?" "We share it," the two replied. "So describe to me what this iṣlāḥ means. By Allāh! If we understand the same thing by it,[650] then we will certainly be reconciled, but, if we don't understand the same thing by it, then we will not." "Punishing the killers of ʿUthmān," the two replied. "Neglecting that would be neglect of the Qur'ān, but carrying it out would be giving life to the Qur'ān." "But you've already killed those killers of ʿUthmān from Baṣrah," said al-Qaʿqāʿ, "and before you killed them you were nearer to the right way than you are now. You killed 600 men bar one, and 6,000 became enraged for their sake and withdrew from your cause and deserted you! When you then searched for the one who escaped (meaning Ḥurqūṣ b. Zuhayr) 6,000 protected him and were ready [3157] to fight. So if you make an exception of him you'll be abandoning 648. Ḥudhayfah or Ḥassān? For Ibn Maḥdūj b. Bishr, see Caskel and Strenziok, I, 154.

649. Muir, 247; Abbott, Aishah, 155.

650. Ibrāhīm omits hu from the text's ʿarafnāhu.

your position,[651] and, if you fight them and those who have withdrawn from you[652] and the battle goes against you, then what you will have feared but drawn near to will be far worse, as far as I can see, than your worst fears. For you will have enraged the Muḍar and Rabīʿah of this region, such that they will gather against you in war and forsake you in support of these 6,000, just as those gathered to support the perpetrators of this huge crime and terrible sin." "So what do you suggest?" asked the Mother of the Faithful. "I say that the remedy for this situation is to quiet things down," he replied. "If it calms down, they[653] will tremble. So if you all give us allegiance then that will be a promising sign and tidings of mercy. It will cause the attainment of blood revenge for this man and well-being and safety for this community. But, if you refuse and insist strongly on your own opinion in this affair and on forcing it, then this will be an evil sign and the squandering of the blood revenge and cause Allāh to send instability through this community. So choose well-being, and you'll fare well by it and be reasons for good as you were in the past. Don't lay either us or yourselves open to disaster, lest it throw us all down. I swear to Allāh, I say this and call you to it in a state of fear that this won't end until Almighty and Glorious Allāh has taken what He wants from this community whose provisions[654] are diminishing with these events. The damage that has occurred from this affair is incalculable. It isn't like other situations. It [3158] isn't like a man killing another man or a group killing one man or even a whole tribe killing one man."[655] "Yes," they replied, "you've spoken well and you're absolutely right. So return! And if ʿAlī comes with a similar position to yours, then the affair will have resolved itself." So he returned to ʿAlī and told him what had happened, and he was pleased. So the armies were on the threshold of peace, some disliking it and others approving.

The Baṣran delegations came to ʿAlī while he was camped at 651. Of killing all of them.

652. The 6,000.
653. The killers of ʿUthmān, who will be seized and punished individually (Glossarium, CCXXIX).
654. Matāʿ: perhaps in the hereafter.
655. But the whole community.

Dhū Qār. Before al-Qaʿqāʿ had returned, those[656] of Tamīm and Bakr came to find out what their fellow tribesmen from al-Kūfah thought and why they had mobilized. They came to tell him that their position was iṣlāḥ and that they didn't entertain any idea of fighting. When they told their Kūfan clansmen the opinion that their Baṣran clansmen had sent them with,[657] the Kūfans replied to them with the same words and then took them in to ʿAlī and told him their news. ʿAlī then asked Jarīr b. Sharis about Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr. He told him everything about their situation in detail, and quoted:

Go tell Banū Bakr as a messenger—
because there is no way to Banū Kaʿb—
"The man of virtue and long forearms[658] will make your oppression that came from you return back to you."

ʿAlī added at that time:

Do you not know, Abū Simʿān, that we send back the chief like you with a headache?!
His mind becomes deranged from the war such that he stands and responds to callers who are not there.
All Bakr gathered and defended Khuzāʿah, but you, Surāqah, you have no defense!

Abū Jaʿfar [al-Ṭabarī] said, "Ziyād b. Ayyūb drew up a book for me containing reports from teachers from whom he said he had heard directly [and then written down]. Some he read to me, and others he did not. One of those he did not read to me but that I copied from his book goes as follows.[659] [3159]

According to [Ziyād b. Ayyūb—] Muṣʿab b. Salām al-Tamīmī—Muḥammad b. Sūqah—ʿĀṣim b. Kulayb al-Jarmī—his father: During the time of ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān I had a dream. I saw a man who was ruling the people while he was ill in bed, and a woman was by his head. The people were after him and hastened toward 656. Reading wufūd with Ibrāhīm for the text's wafd.

657. Iṣlāḥ.
658. I.e., good with the sword in battle.
659. Cf. Ibn ʿAbd Rabbihi, II, 278.

him,[660] and had she forbidden them they would have stopped. But she did not, so they seized and killed him. I used to recount this dream of mine to everyone, whether settled or nomad, and they were surprised and did not know what it meant.

Then when ʿUthmān was killed the news reached us as we were returning from a raid, and my companions said, "Your dream, Kulayb!" We then got to Baṣrah, and we had not been there long when someone said, "Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr are coming, and the Mother of the Faithful is with them!" This alarmed the people and they were surprised, but they were claiming to the people that they had only come out of anger over ʿUthmān and in penance over the way they had not supported him. The Mother of the Faithful spoke up: "We became angry at ʿUthmān on your behalf because of three things he did: giving command to youths, expropriating common property,[661] and beating with whip and stick. But we wouldn't be acting justly if we weren't angry at you on his account for three things that you perpetrated against him: the sanctity of the month,[662] city, and blood." The people replied, "But didn't you give allegiance to ʿAlī and agree to his command?" "We agreed," they replied, "with the sword at our necks." "Here is ʿAlī approaching you" someone said.

Our people said to me and two men with me, "Go and find ʿAlī and his men and ask them about all this. We're confused about [3160] it." So we set off. But as we neared the camp a handsome fellow on a mule was coming toward us. I asked my two companions, "Did you remember the woman I told you about, who was by the head of the ruler? She looked just like this man." He realized that we were discussing him so when he got up to us he said: "Stop! What did you say when you saw me?" We refused to say so he shouted at us, "By Allāh! You won't leave until you've told me!" At this we became frightened of him, so we told him. He then said as he went past us, "By Allāh! You saw something extraordinary." We asked the first person from the camp we came across, "Who was that?" "Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr," he replied, so we realized

660. Wa-yabhashūn ilayhi; cf. p. 3, above.

661. Mawqiʿ al-ghamāmah, lit. "the place of cloud," hence herbage; see Ibn Manẓūr, XV, 340.9ff. {iḥmā'}; Wellhausen, 160.

662. Dhū al-Ḥijjah.

that the woman was ʿĀ'ishah[663] and our dislike of what she was doing increased. When we reached ʿAlī and had greeted him, we asked him what was going on. "When the people rose against this man I kept away," he said. "Then they killed him and made me ruler against my will. But for anxiety for the religion I wouldn't have acceded to them. Then these two suddenly reneged, but I didn't let them get away with it and extracted promises from them before letting them go on the ʿumrah pilgrimage. They then came to their mother, the wife of the Messenger of Allāh, and they approved for her what they disapproved of for their own wives[664] and exposed her to things that were taboo to them and were no good. So I pursued them both to stop them ripping Islam apart and splitting the unity." Then his followers added: "By Allāh! We don't want to fight unless they do so first. Iṣlāḥ is all we've come out for." ʿAlī's followers then shouted at us, "Give allegiance! Give allegiance!" My two companions did so but not I. I held back and said, "My people sent me for a particular purpose, so I'm not going to do anything new until I return to them." "And if they don't do it?" asked ʿAlī. "Then neither will I," I replied. "Imagine they sent you out to scout," said ʿAlī, "and on returning you brought them news of pasture and water but they turned away to waterless, dry areas. What would you do?" "I'd leave them," I replied, "and go to the pasture and water without them." [3161] "Then stretch out your hand!" he replied. By Allāh! I could not resist, and I opened my hand and gave him allegiance. Afterward he used to say, "ʿAlī was one of the smartest of the Arabs." ʿAlī then asked, "What have you heard about Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr?" "As for al-Zubayr," I replied, "he says, 'We were forced to give allegiance,' and, as for Ṭalḥah he's keen to quote verses, and so he says:

Go tell Banū Bakr as a messenger—
    because there is no way to Banū Kaʿb—
"The man of virtue and long forearms will make your oppression that came from you return to you."

663. Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr's sister.

664. Cf. p. 62, above, p. 126, below. There are no illicit implications (Caetani, IX, 41, n. 1).

"It wasn't like that," said ʿAlī, "but:

Do you not know, Abū Simʿān, that we deafen the chief like you with a headache?!
His mind becomes deranged from the war such that he stands and responds to callers who are not there."

Then ʿAlī marched off until he set up camp on the outskirts of Baṣrah. Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr had had a trench dug. Our Baṣran companions asked us, "What did you hear [that] our Kūfan brothers want and say?" "They say, 'We've come for peace, and we don't want to fight,'" we replied. Suddenly while they were engaged in this way, not talking about anything other than peace, young boys emerged from the two armies, hurling insults at each other and then stones. They were followed by the slaves of the two armies, who were followed in turn by the foolhardy men. War broke out, forcing them[665] to take cover back in the trench. Fighting ensued there until they were forced to clear off[666] to the battlefield and ʿAlī's men went into the trench[667] and the others left. ʿAlī then called out aloud: "Don't pursue those who flee! Don't finish off the wounded! Don't go into any houses!" and he restrained his men. Then he sent a message to the others to come out and give allegiance, and he received allegiance under the banners. "Anyone who recognizes anything [belonging to him lying around]," said ʿAlī, "then let him take it!"[668] until nothing was left behind [3162] from the two armies. A group of young men from Qays[669] then came to him, and their spokesman said some words. "Where are your leaders?" asked ʿAlī. "They were hit under the eyes of the camel," said the spokesman and continued his speech. "This is the long-winded orator!" said ʿAlī.

The allegiance over, ʿAlī made ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās governor, but he wanted to stay [there himself] until matters became stabilized.

Al-Ashtar then told me[670] to go and buy him the most expen-

665. Kulayb's companions.
666. Reading ḥattā ajlaw ilā with Ibrāhīm (cf. Addenda, DCXXXIII) for the text's ḥattā aqbalā ilā.
667. Wellhausen, 160.
668. I.e., ʿAlī let the vanquished repossess their arms, etc.
669. Who had been fighting on ʿĀ'ishah's side.
670. Kulayb.

sive camel in Baṣrah. I did so, and he said, "Take it to ʿĀ'ishah, and give her my greetings!" I did that, too, but she cursed him and said "Return it to him!" I then told al-Ashtar, who said, "'ʿĀ'ishah is blaming me for letting her sister's son[671] escape!" Then he heard the news that ʿAlī had made Ibn ʿAbbās governor, and he was angry. "For what purpose did we kill the old man?" he asked. "For[672] Yemen is 'Ubaydallāh's, the Ḥijāz is Qutham's, al-Baṣrah is ʿAbdallāh's and al-Kūfah is ʿAlī's."[673] He called for his mount and rode back.[674] When ʿAlī heard of this, he announced that they were departing. He made good speed and caught up with him, but he did not let on that he had heard about it and asked: "Why did you set off? You're way ahead of us." ʿAlī had feared that if al-Ashtar were left to go like this he would cause the people to have seditious ideas.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: When the Baṣran delegations had come to the Kūfans[675] and al-Qaʿqāʿ had returned from the Mother of the Faithful and Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr with a similar view, ʿAlī gathered the people. He then stood on some sacks, praised Almighty and Glorious Allāh, and magnified Him and prayed for His blessing on the Prophet. He then mentioned the Jāhiliyyah and its misery and Islam and its happiness, and Allāh's grace toward the community in its unity in [recognizing] the first caliph after the Messenger of Allāh and the two[676] who came next. "Then there occurred this evil event brought upon this community by groups [3163] intent only on this world. They were jealous of those Allāh had given it to on account of virtue and wanted to make a complete turnaround. 'But Allāh attains His purpose'[677] and fulfills His will! Tomorrow, then, I'm setting off [toward al-Baṣrah], so all of you do likewise! All of you, that is, except anyone who helped the 671. Sarcastically referring to his fight with ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr (see pp. 153, 167, below).

672. Following Ibrāhīm, who has idh for the text's idhā, "if."

673. I.e., the nepotism carries on, but with Banū Hāshim rather than Umayyah.

674. Toward al-Kūfah or perhaps Medina.

675. Inserting ahl with Ibrāhīm and Addenda, DCXXXIII.

676. Ibrāhīm only has one.

677. Bālighun amrahu (Qur'ān 65:3), cited probably in the qirā'ah of Ibn ʿĀmir (cf. p. 109, below) or Abū ʿAmr, certainly not of Ḥafṣ, which has bālighu amrihi (Ibn al-Mujāhid, 639).

cause against ʿUthmān in any way at all; they will not set off tomorrow. Let the fools rely on themselves and do without me!"

A group then gathered,[678] among them ʿIlbāʾ b. al-Haytham,[679] ʿAdī b. Ḥātim,[680] Sālim b. Thaʿlabah al-ʿAbsī, Shurayḥ b. Awfā b. Ḍubayʿah,[681] al-Ashtar, and a number of others who had attacked ʿUthmān and approved of it. They were joined by the Egyptians, Ibn al-Sawdāʾ,[682] and Khālid b. Muljam. They conferred among themselves and asked, "What should we do? Here is ʿAlī. He understands the Book of Allāh more than those who seek ʿUthmān's killers[683] and is in the best position to act on the matter. He has stated his position and yet only they and a few others have rallied to him. So how will he react when he draws up to his opponents and they to him and they see how few we are compared to their great number? By Allāh! You will be wanted for retaliation, and you'll have no escape!" "We know Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr's position," replied al-Ashtar, "but ʿAlī's we've only discovered today.
[3164] Everyone's opinion about us, by Allāh! is the same, and if they and ʿAlī make amends we're dead men! So come on! let's rise up together against ʿAlī and unite him with ʿUthmān! A fitnah will then return in which all that will be wanted from us is to keep out of it." "This is a bad idea," said ʿAbdallāh b. al-Sawdāʾ. "You Kūfan killers of ʿUthmān at Dhū Qār, you number only 2,500 or 2,600 and Ibn al-Ḥanẓaliyyah[684] here and his men are 5,000, and they're longing to find a way of fighting you. You hardly have room to be offering advice!"[685]

"Let's go away from them and leave them," said ʿIlbāʾ b. al-

678. Cf. Lau, 108.
679. From Bakr b. Wāʾil (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 153, II, 354).
680. Companion of the Prophet, d. 68/687–88 (*EI*², s.v.).
681. Shurayḥ b. Awfā b. Yazīd al-ʿAbsī fell at Nahrawān (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 132, II, 533). Is there confusion with the Shurayḥ b. Ḍubayʿah of Qays b. Thaʿlabah of Bakr b. Wāʾil (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 155, II, 533)?
682. ʿAbdallāh b. Saba'.
683. The text is difficult, and, following Addenda, DCXXXIII, IA's version, 235, has been adopted here. Ibrāhīm inserts wa-aqrabu after bi-kitāb Allāh "he understands the Book of Allāh most and is closer than those who seek ʿUthmān's killers."
684. Al-Qaʿqāʿ b. ʿAmr.
685. Or "improve your position first!" (Ibrāhīm n., Lane, 1917c).

Haytham. "Then, if ʿAlī's side decreases, their enemy will have more power over them,[686] whereas, if they increase, they will be more likely to make peace to your disadvantage. So leave them! Go back and stay in some town until someone comes in whom you can find protection. Pull out from this army!" "This is also a bad idea," said ʿAbdallāh b. al-Sawdā'. "By Allāh! For you to be in a particular place[687] and not mixed in among innocent parties is just what the people want. If your suggestion came about, you would be easy prey." "By Allāh! I neither agree nor disagree," ʿAdī b. Ḥātim replied, "but I am surprised at those who express any hesitation about killing [ʿAlī]. But, given what has happened and the position [ʿAlī] has achieved among the people, we have an excellent supply of horses and weapons, so if you advance we will and if you hold back we will also." "Well said!" ʿAbdallāh b. al-Sawdā'. But Sālim b. Thaʿlabah said: "Some people do what they do out of desire for this world, but not me! By Allāh! If I meet [3165] them tomorrow I won't run home,[688] and if when I meet them in battle I stay alive let it be for no longer than the slaughtering of a camel already destined for slaughter. I swear by Allāh! You're afraid of swords like people whose affairs are only arranged by the sword." "Do you hear that?!" remarked ʿAbdallāh b. al-Sawdā', but Shurayḥ b. Awfā said: "Organize yourselves before you go out! Don't delay anything that you need to do quickly, and don't rush anything that you need to delay! The people have the worst opinion of us, and I've no idea what they might do tomorrow when they come together."

Then Ibn al-Sawdā' spoke up:[689] "Listen, men! Your strength lies in being linked with everyone else, so cultivate them. But then, when they meet tomorrow, get the fight going! Don't give them time to think; then those around you[690] will have no option but to defend themselves. Allāh will then divert ʿAlī and Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr and those who share their views from what you 686. And they will need us.

687. Cf. p. 27, above. Ibrāhīm suggests "of one opinion."
688. Or "I wouldn't go back on anything" if shay' (see Prym's n.) is read for baytī.
689. Cf. Lau, 108.
690. ʿAlī's army.

would hate to happen."[691] They thought this plan was best[692] and went their ways agreed on it. No one else knew about it.

The next morning found ʿAlī mounted and riding out with his army. When he reached ʿAbd al-Qays[693] he dismounted among them and those Kūfans who had come out. ʿAlī was in front.[694] Then he set off again until he dismounted at al-Zāwiyah,[695] where more men caught up with him,[696] for he had gone on ahead of them. When ʿAlī's plan reached the Baṣrans and ʿAlī had dismounted as just described, Abū al-Jarbā'[697] went up to al-Zubayr b. al-ʿAwwām and said, "The best plan is for you now to send a thousand horsemen to go against this man in the evening or[698] the morning before he meets up with his followers." "Abū al-[3166] Jarbā'," replied al-Zubayr, "we're familiar with the affairs of war, but they are fellow Muslims, and this is an unprecedented situation that has never before arisen. It's a situation in which those meeting Almighty and Glorious Allāh without an excuse now will find their excuse cut off on the Day of Resurrection also. Furthermore, their delegate[699] has left us with a kind of agreement, and I am hopeful that we'll achieve peace, so keep cheerful and patient."

Then Ṣabrah b. Shaymān came up and said: "Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr. Let us use this opportunity to kill this man![700] Strategy in war is better than brute force." "Ṣabrah," they replied, "we and they are Muslims and this is a situation that hasn't risen before today, that there should have been a Qur'ān revealed about it or a Sunnah established by the Messenger of God. No, it's something new. There are those who held that it shouldn't be set in mo-

691. Peace.

692. The text has "so understand this plan, and go away agreed!" as though Ibn al-Sawdā' were still speaking.

693. Near Dār al-Rizq (al-ʿAlī, 301; Massignon, 157).

694. The text is corrupt here, probably dittographic, but followed by Ibrāhīm. The translation follows Wellhausen, 160, and de Goeje (Addenda, DCXXXIII), who follows IA, 236.

695. It is not clear what this place was, but it was probably in northern Baṣrah near the road to Ābādān (al-ʿAlī, 290; Massignon, 157).

696. Following Ibrāhīm and text n. h.

697. Caskel and Strenziok, I, 82 or 189, II, 258.

698. Reading aw for wa.

699. Al-Qaʿqāʿ.

700. ʿAlī.

tion today—ʿAlī and his followers—but we said rather that we shouldn't leave it today or postpone it. ʿAlī said: 'What we're calling you to do—conceding to these regicides—is evil, but it's better than something yet more evil! It may seem like something unattainable, but it's about to become clear to us. The laws between Muslims entail choosing those of most general use and least damaging application.'"

Then Kaʿb b. Sūr came up and said: "What are you all waiting for? You've already made your way to their front lines, so cut off this head of their [forces]!" "Kaʿb" they replied, "this is a problem between us and our brothers, and it is far from clear. By Allāh! The Companions of Muḥammad have never taken a course of action since Almighty and Glorious Allāh sent His Prophet without knowing[701] where to put their feet, until this situation arose, [3167] but now they don't know whether they're coming or going. Today something might look good to us and bad to our brothers; tomorrow it will seem bad to us and good to them. We're producing arguments against them that they don't consider valid; then they produce similar ones.[702] We want peace if only they would respond to it and carry it out. Otherwise the final remedy is cauterization."[703]

Some Kūfan groups went up to ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib and questioned him why they were advancing against the other side. Among them was al-Aʿwar b. Bunān al-Minqarī, to whom ʿAlī replied: "For iṣlāḥ and extinguishing the fire of hatred. I hope Allāh will reunify this community by us and stop their warring, if they respond to me." "And if they don't respond to us?" "We'll leave them alone as long as they leave us alone." "And if they don't leave us alone?" "We'll defend ourselves against them." "Shall we then give them as good as they gave us?" "Yes," replied ʿAlī.

Then up stood Abū Salāmah al-Daʾalānī and asked, "Do you think these people have a case for seeking revenge for this blood, if their intentions are honest before Almighty and Glorious Allāh in so doing?" "Yes," replied ʿAlī. "So do you consider you have a 701. Reading ʿalimū after Wellhausen, 160, and Ibrāhīm for the text's ʿalimnā. De Goeje disagrees (Addenda, DCXXXIII).

702. Reading amthālihā with Ibrāhīm for the text's amthālinā.

703. I.e., war.

case for delaying retaliation?" "Yes," replied ʿAlī. "In situations that cannot be put right the ruling should be what is least damaging and of most general application." "So what will be our situation if we are afflicted tomorrow?" he asked. ʿAlī replied, "I hope that anyone who is killed, whether from us or from them, with a mind kept sincere to Allāh will be admitted by Allāh to paradise."[704]

Then up stood Mālik b. Ḥabīb[705] and asked, "What are you going to do when you meet these people?" "It's perfectly clear to [3168] us and them," replied ʿAlī, "that iṣlāḥ means stopping this business. If they then give us allegiance, then that will be iṣlāḥ; but, if both they and we insist on fighting, then it will be a split that won't be repaired." "And if we are afflicted tomorrow, then what will happen to those of us who get killed?" "Whoever desires Almighty and Glorious Allāh, then it will be his benefit and his salvation," replied ʿAlī and stood up and delivered a sermon to the people. He praised Allāh and magnified Him and said: "Men! Keep control of yourselves. Restrain yourselves from doing or saying anything against these people, for they're your brothers. Be patient over what happens to you, and beware of rushing into anything without our guidance. If you win arguments today you'll lose them tomorrow."[706]

ʿAlī then set off and advanced. He made his armed men and equipment that he had come with go forward until they were in sight of the other army. He then sent Ḥakīm b. Salāmah and Mālik b. Ḥabīb to them, saying, "If you still hold to what was agreed when you left al-Qaʿqāʿ b. ʿAmr, then desist and agree to our dismounting and negotiating the whole business."

At this al-Aḥnaf b. Qays came out to him with Banū Saʿd ready to fight—they were the ones who had protected Ḥurqūṣ b. Zuhayr and had decided against fighting ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib. "ʿAlī!" he said. "Our people are in al-Baṣrah claiming that if you overcome them tomorrow you'll kill their men and enslave their women." "I'm not a man to be feared so," replied ʿAlī. "Isn't that only allowed 704. Cf. Ibn Khaldūn, I, 440.

705. Al-Wālibī of Asad (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 52) or al-Ashjaʿī of Ghaṭafān (I, 135, II, 389).
706. In the hereafter.

with those who turn away and disbelieve? Haven't you paid attention to the words of Almighty and Glorious Allāh: 'You are not a ruler over them, except those who turn away and disbelieve'?[707] These are Muslims! Can you take care of your people for me?" "Yes, I can," replied al-Aḥnaf, "but you must choose one of two things. Either I join you, in which case it'll be just me on my own, or else I will [stay neutral and] hold back ten thousand swords from you." He then returned to his men and proposed that they abstain. "Tribesmen of Khindif!"[708] he began by saying, and a [3169] group responded to him. Then he called out, "Tribesmen of Tamīm!" and a group responded to him. Then he called out, "Tribesmen of Sa'd!" and every single Sa'dī responded to him. Then he withdrew with them and waited to see what the [remaining] forces would do. Then, when the battle took place and 'Alī was victorious, al-Aḥnaf's men came en masse and entered into allegiance to 'Alī, as everyone else had done.

What the narrators[709] transmit concerning al-Aḥnaf is different from Sayf's account from his teachers. What they transmit is as was told me by Ya'qūb b. Ibrāhīm—Ibn Idrīs—Ḥuṣayn—'Amr b. Ja'wān—al-Aḥnaf b. Qays: We came to Medina on our way to perform the ḥajj. We were at our ḥajj places and were putting down our baggage when up came a man and said, "They are worked up and have gathered in the mosque." So off we went, and there were the people gathered around a group in the center of the mosque. 'Alī was there, as were Ṭalḥah, al-Zubayr, and Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ. As we joined them 'Uthmān b. 'Affān arrived. "Here's 'Uthmān," someone said. "He's arrived." He was wearing a length of yellow cloth of his and had covered his head with it. "Is 'Alī here?" he asked. "Yes," they replied. "Is al-Zubayr here?" he asked. "Yes," they replied. "Is Ṭalḥah here?" he asked. "Yes," they replied. So 'Uthmān said: "I entreat you by Allāh! There is no deity but He! Did you know that the Messenger of God said, 'Whoever buys the enclosure of such and such a tribe Allāh will 707. Qur'ān 88:22–23. The text has bi-musayṭar, which is the qirā'ah of Ibn 'Āmir and a non-mainstream transmitter from al-Kisā'ī (Ibn Mujāhid, 682). Ibrāhīm has bi-muṣayṭar, which is the qirā'ah of the others.

708. A mostly western Arabian genealogical group, including Kinānah, Asad, Tamīm, Ribāb, and Ḍabbah (Caskel and Strenziok, II, 347).

709. Al-muḥaddithūn.

[3170] forgive him'? So I bought it for 20,000 or 25,000 dirhams. When I then came to the Prophet and said, 'Messenger of Allāh! I bought it,' he replied, 'Join it with our mosque, and the reward will be yours [in the Hereafter]!'" "Allāh be our witness! We certainly did know," they replied. He then mentioned other similar events. When I then met Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr I asked them: "Whom do you command and wish me to give allegiance to? It's obvious this man is going to be killed." "'Alī," they replied.[710] "You command and wish me to give allegiance to him?" "Yes!" So I set off and went to Mecca, and while we were there the news of ʿUthmān's murder reached us. ʿĀ'ishah, the Mother of the Faithful, was there, and when I met her I asked, "Whom do you command me to give allegiance to?" "'Alī," she replied. "You command and wish me to give allegiance to him?" "Yes!" I therefore returned to ʿAlī in Medina and gave him allegiance. I then returned to my people in Baṣrah, thinking the whole matter had been properly sorted out. But it was not long before someone came to me and said: "Here are ʿĀ'ishah and Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr. They have dismounted beside al-Khuraybah."[711] "What brings them?" I asked. "They have sent you a message calling you and asking your assistance in revenging ʿUthmān's blood," they replied. So I found myself in the most awful situation I had ever been in, and I said: "It would be extremely serious for me not to support these people, among whom are the Mother of the Faithful and the disciple of the Messenger of Allāh.[712] But it would also be extremely serious for me to fight a man who is the paternal first cousin of the Messenger of God and to whom they commanded me to give allegiance."

When I went to them they said: "We've come to find help to revenge the blood of ʿUthmān. He was unjustly killed." "Mother of the Faithful," I replied, "I entreat you by Allāh! Did I ask you, 'Whom do you command me to give allegiance to?' and you replied, 'To ʿAlī,' to which I replied, 'You command and wish me to give allegiance to him?' and you said, 'Yes'?" "I did," she replied, "but he made changes." "Zubayr, disciple of the Messenger of Allāh, and Ṭalḥah," I then said, "I entreat you both by Allāh! Did I ask you, 'Whom do you command me to give allegiance to?' and you replied, 'To ʿAlī,' to which I replied, 'You command and wish me to give allegiance to him?' and you said, 'Yes'?" "We did," they replied, "but he made changes." "By Allāh!" I replied: "I will not fight you while among you are the Mother of the Faithful and the [3171] disciple of the Messenger of Allāh. Nor will I fight a man who is the paternal first cousin of the Messenger of God and to whom you commanded me to give allegiance. So select for me one of three courses of action. Either leave open the bridge for me, and I'll move to the land of the Persians until Almighty and Glorious Allāh carries through His preordained command. Or I'll move to Mecca and stay there until Almighty and Glorious Allāh carries through His preordained command. Or I'll withdraw but stay nearby." "We'll discuss the matter and then send you word," they replied.

710. Ibrāhīm has "'Alī?"
711. Al-ʿAlī, 297; Massignon, 157.
712. Al-Zubayr.

They discussed it and said: "If we open the bridge for him and he goes and tells the Persians your news, this isn't a good idea. Make him stay here nearby where you can keep him under control[713] and see what he's doing." So he withdrew to al-Jalḥā', two parasangs[714] from al-Baṣrah, and about 6,000 did the same. Then the armies met. The first to be killed was Ṭalḥah, and then Kaʿb b. Sūr who was holding the Qur'ān copy and reminding these men and those,[715] and then other casualties. Al-Zubayr went to Safawān,[716] which is as far from al-Baṣrah as you are from al-Qādisiyyah,[717] and al-Naʿir,[718] a Mujāshiʿī tribesman met him and asked: "Where are you going, disciple of the Messenger of God? Come to me and you'll be under my protection,[719] and no one will get you." So al-Zubayr went with him. Someone came to al-Aḥnaf[720] and asked him, "Al-Zubayr was met in Safawān, so what are your

713. Lit., "tread on his ear hole."
714. Six to eight miles (*EI*², s.v. Farsakh).
715. That they should be seeking peace.
716. Al-ʿAlī, 281.
717. The name of several places in Iraq, the two most important of which are near al-Kūfah (*EI*², s.v.).
718. Mujāshiʿ is in Tamīm (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 61).
719. Fī dhimmatī. Cf. Ayoub.
720. Reading (fa-utiya) al-Aḥnafu for the text's al-Aḥnafa but not taking "news" to be understood (Addenda, DCXXXIII). Ibrāhīm inserts khabaruhu, "news about him reached al-Aḥnaf."

orders?" "He brought the Muslims together so that they were hitting each other's eyebrows with swords; then he retires into his house!" He was heard by ʿUmayr b. Jurmūz, Faḍālah b. Ḥābis, [3172] and Nufayʿ, so they rode off looking for him and found him with al-Naʿir. ʿUmayr b. Jurmūz, on a weak horse of his, came at [al-Zubayr] from behind and gave him a light stab, at which al-Zubayr, on a horse of his called 'the Veiled,' bore down upon him until, just when he thought he was about to kill him, ʿUmayr b. Jurmūz shouted, "Nāfiʿ! Faḍālah!" Whereupon they bore down on al-Zubayr and killed him.

According to Yaʿqūb b. Ibrāhīm—Muʿtamir b. Sulaymān—his father—Ḥuṣayn—ʿAmr b. Jaʾwān, a Tamīmī: I (Ḥuṣayn) asked ʿAmr, "What was the situation regarding al-Aḥnaf's neutrality?" He replied, "I heard al-Aḥnaf say, 'I came to Medina on my way to perform the ḥajj.' He then proceeded to tell the story more or less as above, may Allāh be praised for what He has decreed and judged!"

ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib Sends His Son al-Ḥasan and ʿAmmār b. Yāsir from Dhū Qār to Get the Kūfans to Mobilize with Him

According to ʿUmar b. Shabbah—Abū al-Ḥasan—Bashīr b. ʿĀṣim—Ibn Abī Laylā—his father: Hāshim b. ʿUtbah[721] went out to ʿAlī at al-Rabadhah and told him about Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr's arrival and Abū Mūsā's words. "I wanted to remove him from office," said ʿAlī, "but al-Ashtar asked me to let him stay." ʿAlī then sent Hāshim back to al-Kūfah and wrote a letter to Abū Mūsā: "I have sent Hāshim b. ʿUtbah to get those Muslims with you to come and join me. So make the people come! I appointed you over your charge only so that you might join in assisting me in upholding the truth." At this Abū Mūsā called al-Sāʾib b. Mālik al-Ashʿarī[722] and asked him, "What's your opinion?" "I think," he [3173] replied, "you should do what he said in his letter." "I disagree," said Abū Mūsā. Hāshim then wrote to ʿAlī, "I came to a man,

721. Al-Mirqal, who fell at Ṣiffīn (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 20, II, 280).
722. From his own tribe; d. 67/687 (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 273, II, 499).

fanatical and divisive, openly full of hatred and loathing." He sent this letter with al-Muhill b. Khalīfah al-Ṭā'ī.[723]

'Alī then sent his son al-Ḥasan and 'Ammār b. Yāsir to mobilize the men for him, and he sent Qaraẓah b. Ka'b al-Anṣārī[724] to be governor of al-Kūfah. He wrote a letter for him to take to Abū Mūsā: "After greetings. I had thought that your distance from[725] these events, in which Almighty and Glorious Allāh has not given you a part, would have stopped you from disobeying me. However, I have sent my son al-Ḥasan and 'Ammār b. Yāsir to mobilize the men, and I have sent Qaraẓah b. Ka'b al-Anṣārī to be governor of the garrison city.[726] So withdraw from our employment 'blamed and defeated.'[727] If you do not, then I have ordered him to oppose you. If you resist him and he overcomes you, I have ordered him to cut you to pieces."

When he delivered the letter to Abū Mūsā he withdrew. Al-Ḥasan and 'Ammār then entered the mosque. "Men," they said, "the Commander of the Faithful says: 'I have come out in this way either as an oppressor or oppressed. So by Almighty and Glorious Allāh I now remind any man who [wishes to] fulfill his duty toward Allāh that he must come forward. If I am oppressed, he must give me his assistance; if I am an oppressor, he must punish me.[728] By Allāh! Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr were the first to give me allegiance and the first to betray. Have I appropriated any money? Have I altered any judgment? So come forward. Enforce the good, forbid the bad!'"

According to 'Umar—Abū al-Ḥasan—Abū Mikhnaf—Jābir[729] —al-Sha'bī—Abū al-Ṭufayl:[730] 'Alī said, "There will come to 723. There was an al-Muhill b. al-Ash'ath al-Ṭā'ī (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 254, II, 425).

724. A companion of the Prophet (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 188, II, 466).

725. Reading bu'dak, following Wellhausen, 160, and Ibrāhīm for the text's tu'dhib.

726. Al-miṣr, i.e., al-Kūfah.

727. Qur'ān 17:18. A blatant implication that Abū Mūsā is going to burn in hell.

728. Glossarium, CVIII.

729. Ibn Yazīd al-Ju'fī, d. c. 128/746 (U. Sezgin, 133 ff.).

730. 'Āmir b. Wāthilah al-Kinānī. He fought with 'Alī at Ṣiffīn and died as the last surviving Companion of the Prophet in 110/728, aged over a hundred years (U. Zezgin, 134).

[3174] you[731] from al-Kūfah 12,001 men." So I sat on the hill at Dhū Qār and counted them and [sure enough] they numbered no more and no less.

According to ʿUmar—Abū al-Ḥasan—Bashīr b. ʿĀṣim—Ibn Abī Laylā—his father: Twelve thousand men joined up with ʿAlī, and they were organized into sevenths. Maʿqil b. Yasār al-Riyāḥī[732] was in charge of Quraysh, Kinānah, Asad, Tamīm, al-Ribāb, and Muzaynah. Saʿd b. Masʿūd al-Thaqafī was in charge of the seventh of Qays. Waʿlah b. Maḥdūj al-Dhuhlī[733] was in charge of the seventh of Bakr b. Wāʾil and Taghlib.[734] Ḥujr b. ʿAdī was in charge of the seventh of Madhḥij and al-Ashʿarīn. Mikhnaf b. Sulaym al-Azdī[735] was in charge of the seventh of Bajīlah, Anmār, Khathʿam, and al-Azd.

ʿAlī Sets Up Camp at al-Zāwiyah of al-Baṣrah

According to ʿUmar b. Shabbah—Abū al-Ḥasan—Maslamah b. Muḥārib—Qatādah: ʿAlī set up camp at al-Zāwiyah for a few days, and al-Aḥnaf sent a message to him: "If you wish I personally will join you, or if you wish I will prevent 4,000 swords[736] from attacking you." "How so, considering how you have promised neutrality to your followers?" came back ʿAlī's reply. "But to fight them is to fulfill my promise to Almighty and Glorious Allāh," replied al-Aḥnaf. So ʿAlī sent a message to him: "Prevent whomever you can from fighting [me]!" ʿAlī then left al-Zāwiyah, and Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr and ʿĀʾishah left al-Furḍah,[737] and they all met at the place where ʿUbaydallāh (or ʿAbdallāh) b. Ziyād's[738]

731. I.e., his forces.
732. Most probably of Muzaynah, the Companion of the Prophet, d. 60/680 (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 88, II, 399).
733. Probably Waʿlah b. al-Mujāhid al-Dhuhlī (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 152, II, 586). Ibrāhīm has Makhdūj here but Maḥduj in the next report.
734. Up to here all northern Arabs. From here all southern Arabs.
735. Head of a famous Kūfan Azd family and great-grandfather of Abū Mikhnaf, the historian (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 218, II, 407).
736. Cf. the 10,000, p. 109, above.
737. Massignon, 157.
738. Ibn Abīhi, governor of al-Baṣrah in the mid-50s/670s and later also of al-Kūfah, sent troops against Ḥusayn at Karbalāʾ in 61/680; he was killed in 67/686 (EI[1], s.v.).

castle was [later situated]. When the armies had gathered, Shaqīq b. Thawr[739] sent a message to ʿAmr b. Marjūm al-ʿAbdī:[740] "Advance! and lead us toward ʿAlī's army!" So they both advanced through the quarters of ʿAbd al-Qays and Bakr b. Wāʾil.[741] They then turned toward the army of the Commander of the Faithful. "Whoever these men are with," said the people, "has won." Shaqīq b. Thawr handed their banner to a mawlā of his called [3175] Rashrāshah. So Waʿlah b. Maḥdūj al-Dhuhlī sent him a message: "Nobility has perished! You have handed the honor of your tribe over to Rashrāshah!" "Mind your own business and we'll mind ours!" Shaqīq's reply came back. They remained three days, and no fighting occurred between them. ʿAlī continued to send messages to them, speak with them, and restrain them.

According to ʿUmar—Abū Bakr al-Hudhalī—Qatādah: ʿAlī left al-Zāwiyah, heading for Ṭalḥah, and al-Zubayr and ʿĀʾishah left al-Furḍah, heading for ʿAlī, and they all met at the place of the castle of ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād on Thursday, 14 Jumādā II 36/8 December 656.[742] "When the two armies came in sight of each other"[743] al-Zubayr rode out on a horse, heavily armed. "Here comes al-Zubayr!" ʿAlī was told. "If Allāh is to be called to mind,"[744] said ʿAlī, "then he's the more probable of the two to take heed."[745] Ṭalḥah also rode out. ʿAlī then went out to them, near enough for the necks of their mounts to cross each other. "By my life!" exclaimed ʿAlī. "You've prepared weapons and horses and men. If you have prepared an excuse before Allāh then fear Allāh,[746] may He be praised! 'Do not be[747] like the woman who undoes what 739. Of Bakr b. Wāʾil, leader in the conquests (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 153, II, 526).

740. Leader of ʿAbd al-Qays for ʿAlī (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 169, II, 179), for the text's and Ibrāhīm's Ibn Marḥūm.

741. Al-ʿAlī, 291; Massignon, 157.

742. Cf. p. 158, above, where al-Wāqidī dates it 10 Jumādā II.

743. Qur'ān 26:61, where Moses was fighting Pharaoh.

744. By quoting the Qur'ān, as in what follows.

745. Reading either yadhdhakkaru in the fifth stem, as in Qur'ān 80:4 ("Or take heed and benefit by it"), or yadhdhakiru in the eighth stem, with Nöldeke (Addenda, DCXXXIII) and Wellhausen, 160, meaning more or less the same. The text has yudhakkaru "be reminded," which Ibrāhīm emends to yadhkuruhu "to remember."

746. Because the excuse cannot be good.

747. Dual, rather than plural, as in the Qur'ān.

she has spun tightly into separate threads.'[748] Am I not brother in religion to you both, you holding my blood sacred and me yours?[749] Has a crime occurred allowing you to kill me?" "You incited the people against ʿUthmān," replied Ṭalḥah. "'On that Day Allāh will show them their true religion fully, and they will know that it is Allāh who is the plain truth,'"[750] quoted ʿAlī. "You, Ṭalḥah! You are seeking revenge for the blood of ʿUthmān! May Allāh curse ʿUthmān's killers![751] Al-Zubayr! do you remember [3176] the day you passed me in Banū Ghanm[752] territory with the Messenger of Allāh and he looked at me and laughed and I laughed with him, and you said, 'Ibn Abī Ṭālib is always proud!' and the Messenger of Allāh said to you, 'Quiet! He is not conceited. Believe me, you're going to fight him, and you'll be the aggressor'?" "O Allāh! I do, and had I remembered I wouldn't have come out like this. By Allāh! I will never fight you!" So ʿAlī left [them and returned] to his followers and said, "Al-Zubayr has just made a pledge to Allāh not to fight you." Al-Zubayr returned to ʿĀ'ishah and said to her, "This is the only important situation I've been in since being able to reason when I haven't known what I was doing." "What do you want to do?" she asked. "I want to leave them and go," he replied, but his son ʿAbdallāh said to him: "You've brought these two armies[753] face to face and they've set up their lines of battle against each other, and you want to leave them and go! You've caught sight of Ibn Abī Ṭālib's banners and realized that strong young men are carrying them." "I have sworn an oath not to fight him," he replied, and what his son said to him angered him. ʿAbdallāh said, "Redeem your oath and fight him!"

748. Qur'ān 16:92. The context concerns the importance of keeping oaths and that they should not be broken for political reasons.

749. Reading tuharrimāni . . . wa-uḥarrimu, following Ibrāhīm, for the text's tuḥramāni . . . wa-uḥramu "you're forbidden my blood, and I'm forbidden yours."

750. Qur'ān 24:25. While the immediate context in the Qur'ān refers to those who slander Muslim women and is interpreted as referring to ʿĀ'ishah, ʿAlī is saying that Allāh will punish Ṭalḥah for slandering him. The implicit reference to ʿĀ'ishah may be an ironic twist.

751. I.e., you; cf. the parallel passage, p. 126, below.

752. The name of a number of clans (Caskel and Strenziok, II, 272), perhaps Ghanm b. Dūdān of Asad in Mecca.

753. Al-ghārayn; see p. 118, below; Ibrāhīm 502, n. 2; Lane, 2308a. The reading al-ʿārrayn (Addenda, DCXXXIII) means "favor-seekers" or "guests" (Lane, 1991b).

So al-Zubayr called for a slave of his called Makḥūl and freed him.[754] ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Sulaymān al-Taymī[755] then said the verses

I have never seen, as I have today, a brother of brothers[756] more astonishing[757] than one redeeming his oaths
By freeing a slave, but in disobedience to the Merciful.[758]

One of their poets added the verses

He sets Makḥūl free to save his religion as an expiation to Allāh for his oath,
Perfidy[759] written all over his face!

Return to Sayf's account from Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah [3177]

ʿImrān b. Ḥuṣayn[760] sent a message to the people, urging them all to leave both the armies, as al-Aḥnaf had done. Among those to whom he sent a message were Banū ʿAdī, and his messenger approached until he called out at the door of their mosque, "Listen! Abū Nujayd ʿImrān b. Ḥuṣayn sends you his greetings. He says to you, 'I would far prefer to be [away] at the base of some mountain[761] among nanny goats with lopsided udders[762] and sheep, shearing their fleeces and drinking their milk, than to shoot one arrow at anyone from these two battle lines!'" With a single voice Banū ʿAdī all replied: "By Allāh! We are not going to leave the household of the Messenger of God (meaning the Mother of the Faithful) for anything!"

According to ʿAmr b. ʿAlī—Yazīd b. Zurayʿ—Abū Naʿāmah al-ʿAdawī—Ḥujayr b. al-Rabīʿ: ʿImrān b. Ḥuṣayn told me, "Go to 754. Cf. p. 126, below.

755. Following Ibrāhīm and Addenda, DCXXXIII, instead of the text's al-Tamīmī.
756. Al-Zubayr.
757. Reading aʿjaba (Addenda, DCXXXIII) for the text's aʿjabu.
758. A proper redeeming of an oath would have to be in obedience.
759. Because of his promises to Muḥammad and ʿAlī.
760. Of Khuzāʿah, a Compaion of the Prophet, d. 52/673 (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 197, II, 357).
761. Reading jabal ḥaḍan, following Nöldeke (Addenda, DCXXXIII) and Ibrāhīm.
762. Reading aʿnuz ḥudun (Lane, 591a,b), following Nöldeke (Addenda, DCXXXIII). According to Glossarium, CXCV, it may mean "very red/black nanny goats." The text and Ibrāhīm have aʿnuz khuḍr, "tawny nanny goats." Cf. also the next report.

your tribe, when they have all gathered together, and stand up among them and say: 'Imrān b. Ḥuṣayn, Companion of the Messenger of Allāh, has sent me to you to give you his greetings and ask for Allāh's mercy on you. He has sworn an oath by Allāh, apart from Whom there is no other god, that he would far prefer to be a mutilated Ethiopian slave pasturing nanny goats with lopsided udders[763] on some mountain top until the day he dies than for a single arrow to be shot between the two armies.'" The leaders of the tribe lifted their heads to him[764] and said, "We are never going to leave the household of the Messenger of God for anything!"

[3178] Return to Sayf's account from Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah

The Baṣrans were in factions: One sided with Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr, one with ʿAlī, and a third did not agree with fighting anyone from either side. ʿĀ'ishah came out from the house where she was staying and moved down to the mosque of al-Ḥuddān[765] in the Azd quarter—the battle took place in their compound. The chief of the Azd at that time was Ṣabrah b. Shaymān, and Kaʿb b. Sūr said to him: "When the armies see each other you won't be able to hold them back. It will be like torrents gushing forth. So obey me, and don't be there with them! Withdraw with your tribe! I fear that peace won't prevail. So keep behind this deluge, and leave these two armies of Muḍar and Rabīʿah. After all, they are two brothers.[766] If they make amends, then peace is what we've been wanting; if they fight, then we can be their judges tomorrow." Now Kaʿb had been a Christian in the Jāhiliyyah, so Ṣabrah said to him: "I fear there is some Christianity in you—are you telling me to abstain from iṣlāḥ between Muslims?! And to desert the Mother of the Faithful, Ṭalḥah, and al-Zubayr if they reject [ʿAlī's] peace offer?! And to leave seeking revenge for ʿUth-

763. Reading aʿnuzan ḥaḍaniyyāt, following Nöldeke (Addenda, DCXXXIII); Glossariium, CXCV, and Ibrāhīm. Cf. also the previous report. The text has aʿnuzan ḥaṣīnāt, "inaccessible?/pregnant? nanny goats."

764. Signifying readiness to reply after listening.

765. Massignon, 157.

766. They should make peace. They shared an eponymous "father," Nizār, as opposed to the Yamanīs here being addressed.

mān?! By Allāh! I'd never do such a thing!" So the Yamanīs[767] agreed to be present at the battle.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Ḍurays al-Bajalī—Ibn Yaʿmar: When al-Aḥnaf b. Qays returned from being with ʿAlī he was met by Hilāl b. Wakīʿ b. Mālik b. ʿAmr,[768] who asked him, "What's your decision?" "To withdraw. What's yours?" "To protect the Mother of the Faithful. Are you going to leave us and you're our chief?" "I will be your chief only tomorrow when you are killed and I remain," replied al-Aḥnaf. "You're saying all this, and you're our elder!" said Hilāl. Al-Aḥnaf replied, "I'm the elder who is disobeyed, and you're the youth who is obeyed." Banū Saʿd then followed al-Aḥnaf, and he withdrew with [3179] them to Wādī al-Sibāʿ.[769] Banū Ḥanẓalah followed Hilāl, and Banū ʿAmr[770] agreed with Abū al-Jarbāʾ and fought.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad—Abū ʿUthmān: When al-Aḥnaf came, he called out, "Tribesmen of Udd,[771] withdraw from this business, and leave these two armies to be quick or slow!"[772] But al-Minjāb b. Rāshid[773] called out: "Tribesmen of al-Ribāb,[774] don't withdraw! Witness this business, and take it on yourselves to be the quick ones!" So they separated. Then al-Aḥnaf called out, "Tribesmen of Tamīm, withdraw from this business, and leave these two armies to be quick or slow!" But Abū al-Jarbāʾ (who belonged to Banū Ghaylān[775] b. Mālik b. ʿAmr b. Tamīm) got up and called out: "Tribesmen of ʿAmr, don't withdraw from this business! Take it on yourselves to be the quick ones!" Abū al-Jarbāʾ was leading Banū ʿAmr b. Ta-

767. Following the lead of Azd, Ṣabrah's people.

768. From the same tribe.

769. Five miles from Baṣrah on the Mecca road (Yāqūt, V, 343).

770. These three groups were all part of Tamīm.

771. Reading yā la-Udd following Ibrāhīm, who notes that this is Udd b. Ṭābikhah (see Caskel and Strenziok, I, 59). He was a major eponym for northern Arabs, comprising, among others, all the tribes and men in this khabar. Prym notes that the text's yā la-Zayd is incorrect; for the emendation yā la-Wudd, see Addenda, DCXXXIII.

772. Glossarium, CDLXI.

773. Of Ḍabbah; see Caskel and Strenziok, I, 90, II, 408.

774. Part of Udd; see Caskel and Strenziok, I, 85–87.

775. For the text's 'Uthmān, see Caskel and Strenziok, II, 203. Abū al-Jarbāʾ was ʿĀṣim b. Dulaf (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 82, II, 203).

mīm, and al-Minjāb b. Rāshid was leading Banū Ḍabbah.[776] Then, when al-Aḥnaf called out, "Tribesmen of Zayd Manāh,[777] withdraw from this business, and leave these two armies to be quick or slow!" Hilāl b. Wakīʿ replied, "Don't withdraw from this business!" and called out, "Tribesmen of Ḥanẓalah,[778] take it on yourselves to be the quick ones!" Hilāl was leading Ḥanẓalah. Banū Saʿd[779] did obey al-Aḥnaf and withdrew to Wādī al-Sibāʿ.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: Mujāshiʿ b. Masʿūd al-Sulamī[780] led Hawāzin,[781] Banū Sulaym,[782] and al-Aʿjaz. Zufar b. al-Ḥārith[783] led ʿĀmir.[784] Aʿṣur b. al-Nuʿmān al-Bāhilī led Ghaṭafān.[785] Mālik b. Mismaʿ[786] led Bakr b. Wāʾil. The whole of ʿAbd al-Qays withdrew to ʿAlī, except for one man who stayed back. There were those who stayed back from Bakr b. Wāʾil, those that withdrew equaling those that stayed. They were led by Sinān.

[3180] Al-Azd had three leaders: Ṣabrah b. Shaymān,[787] Masʿūd,[788] and Ziyād b. ʿAmr.[789] Al-Shawādhib had two leaders. Al-Khirrīt b. Rāshid[790] led Muḍar. Al-Ruʿbī (nicknamed) al-Jarmī[791] led Quḍāʿah and its followers, and Dhū al-Ājurah al-Ḥimyarī[792] led the rest of Yaman.

---

776. Caskel and Strenziok, I, 89 ff.

777. Who included Ḥanẓalah and Saʿd; see Caskel and Strenziok, I, 59.

778. Caskel and Strenziok, I, 59.

779. Caskel and Strenziok, I, 75. Al-Aḥnaf belonged to the ʿAmr branch; see Caskel and Strenziok, I, 76.

780. Caskel and Strenziok, II, 419.

781. All tribes in this paragraph are northern.

782. Caskel and Strenziok, I, 122 ff.

783. Of Banū ʿĀmir; he fought with Muʿāwiyah at Ṣiffīn (Caskel, pl. 96 no. 609).

784. Caskel and Strenziok, I, 93 ff.

785. Caskel and Strenziok, I, 127 ff.

786. A prominent Qays and Bakr leader (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 155, II, 391; Pellat, 33, 152, 196).

787. Al-Ḥuddānī (on ʿĀʾishah's side); see Caskel and Strenziok, I, 216, II, 534. All tribes and identified men in this paragraph were southern Arabs, apart from Khirrīt.

788. Ibn ʿAmr al-Qamar; see Caskel and Strenziok, I, 213, II, 402.

789. Caskel and Strenziok, I, 203, II, 606.

790. Chief of the Banū Nājiyah. He fought with ʿAlī again at Ṣiffīn but later broke with him, so ʿAlī sent after him, and he was killed (*EI*², s.v.). He belonged to ʿAbd al-Bayt b. al-Ḥārith (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 29, II, 347, 123). See also I, 3418 ff.

791. Jarm b. Rabbān were reckoned among Quḍāʿah; see Caskel and Strenziok, I, 327, II, 259.

792. Dhū al-ʿAshīrah b. Dallāl; see Caskel and Strenziok, I, 278, II, 236?

Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr came out and took up a position with the army at al-Zābūqah,[793] in the location of Qaryat al-Arzāq. Then the whole of Muḍar took up a position there, and they were in no doubt that peace would prevail. The whole of Rabīʿah took up a position above them, and they were in no doubt that peace would prevail. The whole of Yaman took up a position below them, and they also were in no doubt that peace would prevail. ʿĀʾishah was in al-Ḥuddān; the army, 30,000 strong, was at al-Zābūqah, led by those just mentioned. They sent Ḥakīm[794] [b. Salāmah] and Mālik [b. Ḥabīb] back to ʿAlī with the message "We stand by what we agreed to when we left al-Qaʿqāʿ,[795] so come forward!"[796] The two of them left and came to ʿAlī with the message, so he mounted and [went and] took up a position opposite them. The tribes took up positions opposite their own tribes, Muḍar facing Muḍar, Rabīʿah facing Rabīʿah, and Yaman facing Yaman,[797] and they were in no doubt that peace would prevail. Some stood opposite others, and some went across to others, and all they talked about and intended was peace.

The Commander of the Faithful had come out with his 20,000 followers. The Kūfans were led by the same men who had come with them to Dhū Qār. ʿAbd al-Qays had three leaders: Jadhīmah[798] and Bakr were led by Ibn al-Jārūd,[799] al-ʿUmūr were led by ʿAbdallāh b. al-Sawdāʾ, and Ahl Hajar were led by Ibn al-Ashajj.[800] Bakr b. Wāʾil from the Baṣrans were led by Ibn al-Ḥārith b. Nahār, and the Zuṭṭ and Sayābijah were led by Danūr b. ʿAlī. [3181] ʿAlī had come to Dhū Qār with 10,000 and a further 10,000 had joined him.

According to ʿUmar b. Shabbah—Abū al-Ḥasan—Bashīr b.

793. Al-ʿAlī, 292; Massignon, 157.

794. For the text's Ḥukaym, see p. 13, above; Addenda, DCXXXIV; Wellhausen, 160, and Ibrāhīm.

795. Following Ibrāhīm's vocalization.

796. To make peace.

797. Cf. Muir, 249: "The Beni Ar-Rabiʿa of Al-Kufa fought against the Beni Ar-Rabiʿa of Al-Basra, the Beni Modar of the one against the Beni Modar of the other." Muḍar and Rabīʿah were reckoned as constituting the northern Arabs, Yamaniyyah the southern.

798. Caskel, pl. 169.

799. Probably al-Mundhir b. Bishr, governor of Iṣṭakhr for ʿAlī, d. 61/680–81; see Caskel and Strenziok, I, 169, II, 429.

800. The son of al-Mundhir b. al-Ḥārith al-Ashajj? See Caskel and Strenziok, I, 169, II, 429. Therefore amend Ahl Hajar to Ahl ʿAṣar?

ʿĀṣim—Fiṭr b. Khalīfah—Mundhir al-Thawrī—Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah: We set off from Medina with 700 men, and 7,000[801] joined us from Kūfah. A further 2,000 sided with us from[802] round about Baṣrah, most of them Bakr b. Wā'il; some say 6,000.

Return to Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah's account

When everyone had taken up position and was calm, ʿAlī, Ṭalḥah, and al-Zubayr came out, and they stood facing one another. They discussed their differences and realized that peace and cessation of hostilities were the only appropriate course of action, as they saw that authority had begun to disintegrate and that it might not be regained. So they dispersed from that place on that understanding. ʿAlī returning to his camp, Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr to theirs.

The Battle

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: At dusk ʿAlī sent ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās to Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr, and at the same time they sent Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah to ʿAlī with the advice that each side should talk with its followers, and they agreed. So that evening—in Jumādā II—Ṭalḥah and al-[3182] Zubayr sent a message to the chiefs of their followers, and ʿAlī did so to his, apart from those who had rebelled against ʿUthmān. So when they retired to bed there was peace. They slept that night as they never had before, because they were free from what they were on the point of and because they had withdrawn from the demands and plans that some of them had been making.[803]

But those who had stirred up the question of ʿUthmān spent the worst night of their lives, for they were on the verge of destruction.[804] All night they were busy in discussion until they decided secretly to open hostilities. They kept it secret for fear that their evil machinations would be found out. Before dawn the next day

801. Cf. Conrad.
802. Ibrāhīm has man for the text's min.
803. Lau, 108.
804. Peace would lead to their being brought to justice.

they got up, unnoticed by those nearby, and slipped out on their mission in the dark. Their Muḍar went to[805] their Muḍar, their Rabīʿah to their Rabīʿah, their Yamaniyyah to their Yamaniyyah and began using their weapons [against them]. So the Baṣrans rose up, and so did each fighting group against those of their fellows who had launched a surprise attack against them.[806]

Al-Zubayr and Ṭalḥah then came out with the chiefs of Muḍar and sent ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥārith b. Hishām[807] to lead the right flank (who were Rabīʿah) and sent ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAttāb b. Asīd[808] to the left flank, themselves remaining in the center, and asked,[809] "What is all this?" "The Kūfans came upon us at night" was the reply. At this they said, "We knew that ʿAlī wouldn't stop until he had spilled blood and desecrated what is sacred and that he would never come to an agreement with us." The two of them then returned with the Baṣrans, who repelled those Kūfans[810] [who had launched the surprise attack] and forced them back to their camp. ʿAlī and the Kūfans heard the noise. A man had been placed[811] near ʿAlī to tell him what they wanted him to hear. So when he asked, "What's going on?" this man replied: "A force of theirs made a surprise attack on us at night, [3183] but we sent them back to where they came from. We then found them ready for battle, and they began attacking, so everyone rose up to fight." ʿAlī then said to the commander of the right wing of his army, "Engage the right flank!" and to the commander of the left wing: "Engage the left flank! I knew[812] that Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr wouldn't stop until they had spilled blood and desecrated what is sacred and that they would never come to an agreement with us and that the Saba'iyyah would not cease causing trou-

805. Caetani, IX, 178.

806. Bahatūhum, mistranslated by Lau (108) as "had lied to them."

807. From Quraysh; see Caskel and Strenziok, I, 23, II, 129.

808. From Quraysh; killed in the Battle of the Camel; see Caskel and Strenziok, I, 8, II, 128.

809. Qālā. Ibrāhīm's qāla is a misprint.

810. Following IA, 232.

811. By the attackers. According to IA, 232, by the Saba'iyyah, and to Caetani, IX, 179, by ʿUthmān's murderers. That the troublemakers were the Saba'iyyah is not specified in this report from Sayf until ʿAlī's remark, which looks like an interpolation; see note 813.

812. Following the text's ʿalimtu for Ibrāhīm's ʿalimta.

ble."[813] ʿAlī then shouted out to the people: "Hold back! It's nothing!"

Now it had been their unanimous decision regarding this fitnah not to be the first aggressor. In that way, they could produce proof and demand rights against the others. [They agreed that] they would not kill anyone running away, nor would they finish off any wounded, nor would they pursue. This was some of what the two sides decided upon and then proclaimed publicly.[814]

According to Al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah and Abū ʿAmr: Kaʿb b. Sūr came up to ʿĀ'ishah and said: "Do something [to save the situation], for the troops are intent on fighting! May Allāh give you success in restoring peace!" So she mounted, and they covered her howdah with protective armor; then they sent her camel named ʿAskar, forward. Yaʿlā b. Umayyah, who had bought it for 200 dinars,[815] had lifted her up on to it. When she emerged from the houses she could hear a commotion, so she halted and soon heard an even louder commotion. "What is it?" she asked, and they replied, "It is the clamor of the army." "For good or for bad?" she asked. "For bad." "Whichever of the parties this clamor comes from," she said, "they will be defeated." By Allāh! She was still standing when [3184] defeat surprised her. Al-Zubayr headed off in the direction he happened to be facing and took the road to Wādī al-Sibāʿ. As for Ṭalḥah, an arrow from an unknown archer[816] pinned his knee to the side of his horse. When his boot filled with blood and he became drowsy,[817] he said to his ghulām: "Get up behind me on the horse. Hold on to me tightly, and find me a place where I can get off." So they went to al-Baṣrah, and he represented his and al-Zubayr's case in the following poem:

Events have hit and killed me [with their arrow], while I, on shooting my arrow, have missed them.

---

813. This last phrase appears to have been tagged on (a little awkwardly) to ʿAlī's criticism of Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr, or perhaps it means "so long as the Saba'iyyah keep causing trouble."

814. Caetani, IX, 179.

815. Caskel and Strenziok, I, 67, II, 590.

816. See pp. 127, 150, below.

817. Lane, 343c.

I was lost when I pursued a share[818] out of a foolishness I committed, having lost my good sense.
I was like al-Kusaʿī[819] in my regret when, against my better judgment, I bought the approval of Banū Sahm.[820]
I obeyed them by separating from Āl Laʾy,[821] who then threw my meat and blood to the wild animals.

Another Account of the Battle of the Camel

According to Abū Jaʿfar [al-Ṭabarī]: Others have given accounts of this battle and of al-Zubayr and how he left his post that day, which differ from Sayf's account from his two informants. Some of them gave the account of that which Aḥmad b. Zuhayr (—his father Abū Khaythamah—Wahb b. Jarīr b. Ḥāzim—his father—Yūnus b. Yazīd al-Aylī—al-Zuhrī) told me[822] in an account of the story of ʿAlī, Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr, and ʿĀʾishah, which we are in the process of relating: The news, that is, of the seventy who were killed with al-ʿAbdī[823] at al-Baṣrah, reached ʿAlī, so he advanced [3185] with 12,000 men and came to al-Baṣrah and said:

How deeply I mourn for Rabīʿah,[824]
Rabīʿah who always heard [me] and obeyed.
This tradition of theirs[825] was what caused this disaster.

When the [forces] confronted each other ʿAlī went out on his horse and called out to al-Zubayr, and the two of them confronted each other. ʿAlī asked al-Zubayr, "What has brought you [to this]?"

---

818. A pun on the word sahm, which also means "arrow," as in the previous line.

819. Who regretted the harm he did to himself through his own stupidity (Thaʿālibi, s.v. nadāmat al-Kusaʿā; Fretag, II, 776).

820. I.e., Banū Umayyah. A further pun on the word.

821. I.e., Banū Hāshim.

822. I.e., Abū Jaʿfar al-Ṭabarī.

823. Al-Ḥakīm b. Jabalah.

824. ʿAbd al-Qays was part of Rabīʿah. Cf. p. 86, above.

825. Reading sunnatuhā with Ibrāhīm, i.e., a tradition of obedience to ʿAlī. De Goeje suggests nubbiʾtuhā "I have been given the news that they have had a disaster" (Addenda, DCXXXIV).

"You," he replied. "I don't find you[826] suitable for this leadership or more entitled to it than we." "After ʿUthmān," replied ʿAlī, "it is certainly not you who are suitable for it. We considered you one of Banū ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib[827] until your son,[828] the son of evil, reached maturity and created a division between us and you." ʿAlī then said how bad the evil he had done was and mentioned how the Prophet had passed by the two of them and had said to ʿAlī: "What did the son of your father's sister[829] say? He will fight you, being the aggressor." Al-Zubayr then left him, saying, "I will not fight you." He returned to his son ʿAbdallāh and said, "I have no firm conviction about this war." "When you set out you did have," replied his son, "but you saw the banners of Ibn Abī Ṭālib and you realized that that meant death, so you lost heart." These words angered him so that he shook with rage and said angrily: "Woe betide you! I have sworn him an oath not to fight him." "Expiate your oath by freeing your ghulām Sarjis," his son replied. So he freed him, and he joined the ranks alongside them. ʿAlī had said to al-Zubayr: "Are you asking me for compensation for the blood of ʿUthmān, when it was you who killed him? I ask Allāh in His power right now to give a hateful punishment[830] to he among us who was the severest in opposing ʿUthmān." ʿAlī said to Ṭalḥah: "You have brought the Messenger of Allāh's wife to make her fight while you hide your wife at home.[831] Didn't you give me allegiance?" "I did," he replied, "but with the sword at my neck."

[3186] ʿAlī then said to those around him:[832] "Which of you will hold up this copy of the Qur'ān and what is in it before them? Should his hand be cut off, he will then take it with his other one; if that is cut off, he will take it with his teeth." A young boy[833] said, "I will." ʿAlī put this to everyone around him, but none volunteered

826. Reading lā arāka for the text's lā urāka.

827. Ṣafiyyah, al-Zubayr's mother, was the daughter of ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib, the grandfather of the Prophet and ʿAlī.

828. ʿAbdallāh, who became anticaliph during Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah's rule.

829. Ṣafiyyah.

830. E.g., be killed.

831. Cf. pp. 62, 101, above.

832. For this motif, see Nöldeke, Geschichte, 126; Addenda, DCXXXIV; Noth, Quellenkristische Studien, 154. Cf. also p. 129, below.

833. Called Muslim on p. 130, below.

except the boy, so ʿAlī said to him, "Hold this up before them and say, 'Every word in this shall judge between you and us, and I beg of you for Allāh's sake to stop shedding our blood and yours.'" But, with the copy of the Qur'ān in his hand, the boy was attacked. His hands were cut off, so he took it in his teeth until he was killed. ʿAlī then said, "Battle is now justified, so fight them!"

Seventy[834] men were killed that day, each holding in turn the nose rein of ʿĀ'ishah's camel. After the camel was hamstrung and the force was routed, an arrow hit Ṭalḥah and killed him. Some say that it was fired by Marwān b. al-Ḥakam.[835] At one stage Ibn al-Zubayr had taken hold of the camel's nose rein and ʿĀ'ishah had said, "Who is this?" When he told her she said, "Weep for the bereavement of Asmā'!"[836] Indeed he did get wounded and threw himself down among the other wounded and was pulled out and recovered from his wound.

Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr carried ʿĀ'ishah[837] away and erected a large tent over her. ʿAlī came and stood in front of her and said: "You roused the people, and they became excited.[838] You stirred up discord among them such that some killed others," and he went on at length. ʿĀ'ishah replied: "Ibn Abī Ṭālib! You have gained your victory. Give me an honorable pardon.[839] You have put your forces to the test very well today." ʿAlī then let her go free and sent a group of men and women with her, equipped her, and ordered her to be given 12,000 dirhams.[840] ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar thought that was too little and brought out a huge sum for her, [3187] saying, "If the Commander of the Faithful does not authorize it, then I will pay it myself."

It was alleged that al-Zubayr was killed by Ibn Jurmūz and that he was standing by the door of the Commander of the Faithful and said to the doorkeeper, "Ask leave for the killer of al-Zubayr to 834. Cf. Conrad.

835. See Hinds, "Murder," 469 n. 3.

836. Her sister and Ibn al-Zubayr's mother; see p. 55, above. I.e., "you are also going to get killed."

837. His sister.

838. Istafzazti . . . fazzū. IA has istanfarti . . . farrū, "You mobilized the people and they rushed to fight."

839. Lane, 1306b.

840. Caetani, IX, 137.

enter." ʿAlī said, "Let him in and give him the good news that he is going to hell."[841]

According to Muḥammad b. ʿUmārah—ʿUbaydallāh b. Mūsā—Fuḍayl—Sufyān b. ʿUqbah—Qurrah b. al-Ḥārith: I was siding with al-Aḥnaf b. Qays, and Jawn b. Qatādah, my father's brother's son, was siding with al-Zubayr b. al-ʿAwwām, and Jawn told me: While they were hailing al-Zubayr as amir a horseman came riding up and greeted him as amir also. After al-Zubayr had returned the greeting, the man said, "That force of ʿAlī has reached such and such a place, and of the armies that have come against you I've never seen one with shabbier weapons and smaller numbers and more fearful." Then he left. Another horseman then came and greeted him as amir. After al-Zubayr had returned the greeting the man said, "The force has reached such and such a place, and they have heard of the numbers, equipment, and arms that Almighty and Glorious Allāh has amassed for you, and Allāh has put fear in their hearts, so they have turned back in retreat." "That's enough from you just now," said al-Zubayr. "By Allāh! If all Ibn Abī Ṭālib could find was ʿarfaj he would walk against us holding it."[842] Then he left. A third horseman came as the horses were on the point of emerging from the dust cloud, and greeted him as amir. After al-Zubayr had returned the greeting, the man [3188] said, "That force has come out against you, and I met ʿAmmār b. Yāsir among them and talked with him." "He's not on their side!" exclaimed al-Zubayr. "Yes he is. By Allāh! He is on their side," replied the horseman. "I swear Allāh would not have put him on their side," said al-Zubayr. "I swear Allāh has put him on their side." "I swear Allāh would not have put him on their side."[843] Seeing the man contradict him al-Zubayr said to one of his followers: "Mount! See whether he's speaking the truth!" So he mounted with him, and they set off, and I watched them until they stopped for a short while next to the cavalry. Then they returned to us, and al-Zubayr said to this man, "Well?" "He spoke

841. See p. 159, below.

842. ʿArfaj is a small shrub the size of a sitting man, with many soft shoots but no leaves (Ibn Manẓūr, III, 147f.), i.e., ʿAlī is unbeatable; he does not even need weapons.

843. Al-Zubayr's anxiety is because he had been present when the Prophet predicted that oppressors would kill ʿAmmār.

the truth," he replied, and al-Zubayr exclaimed, "It feels as though my nose has been cut off!" or "It feels as though my back has been cut in two!" [Muḥammad b. ʿUmārah—ʿUbaydallāh [b. Mūsā]—Fuḍayl: I do not know which he actually said.] He began to tremble such that his weapon shook, and Jawn said: "May my mother be bereaved of me! This is the man[844] I wanted to die with or live with. I swear by He Who holds my soul in His hand that this fear I see that has taken hold of him is [only] because of something he heard or saw from the Messenger of God."

While these men were thus occupied [al-Zubayr] turned to go, mounted, and left. Jawn did the same[845] and caught up with al-Aḥnaf. Two horsemen then appeared and came to al-Aḥnaf and his companions, dismounted, and urgently demanded his attention. They conferred secretly with him for an hour and then departed. ʿAmr b. Jurmūz[846] then came to al-Aḥnaf and said, "I caught up with al-Zubayr in Wādī al-Sibāʿ and killed him." Jawn used to say, "I swear by He Who holds my soul in His hand, al-Aḥnaf was the one who planned to kill al-Zubayr."

According to ʿUmar b. Shabbah—Abū al-Ḥasan [al-Madāʾinī]—Bashīr[847] b. ʿĀṣim—al-Ḥajjāj b. Arṭāh—ʿAmmār b. Muʿāwiyah al-Duhnī—[Duhn being] a branch of Aḥmas Bajīlah:[848] On the day of the Battle of the Camel ʿAlī took a copy of the Qur'ān and took it around his companions, asking, "Who will face death and take this copy of the Qur'ān to call them to what it contains?" A Kūfan youth came forward wearing a padded white tunic[849] and said, "I will." But ʿAlī ignored him. ʿAlī asked again, "Who will face death and take this copy of the Qur'ān to call them to what it contains?" The youth said, "I will." But ʿAlī again ignored him. ʿAlī asked a third time, "Who will face death and take this copy of the Qur'ān to call them to what it contains?" The youth again said, "I will," so ʿAlī handed it to him. He then called them, but they cut off his right hand. So he took it with his left and called them, and they [3189]

844. Al-Zubayr.
845. Having decided that al-Zubayr was a lost cause.
846. ʿUmayr on p. 112, above.
847. Caetani, IX, 139, has Bishr.
848. Caskel, pl. 223.
849. Qabāʾ; Lane, Supp. 2984. Similar to a qafṭān; Dozy, 352–62.

cut that off as well. So he held it to his chest, with the blood flowing down over his tunic, and he was killed. ʿAlī then said, "Fighting them is now lawful." Among the youth's mother's verses in mourning were

O Allāh! Muslim[850] called them, reciting the Book of Allāh without fearing them.
Their mother[851] was standing looking on,
not restraining them as they plotted folly together.[852]
Their beards are dyed with clots of blood.

According to ʿUmar b. Shabbah—Abū al-Ḥasan [al-Madāʾinī]—Abū Mikhnaf—Jābir—al-Shaʿbī: The right flank of the army of the Commander of the Faithful attacked the Baṣran left flank and fought, and the enemy troops took refuge with ʿĀʾishah, most of them being Ḍabbah and Azd. The fighting lasted from late morning until nearly midafternoon; some say until nearer sunset.[853] When they were routed an Azd tribesman called out, "Turn!" But Muḥammad b. ʿAlī[854] struck him and cut his hand off, so the man called out: "Men of Azd! Flee!" A large number of Azd were killed, and they cried out [as they fled], "We follow the way[855] of ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib." A man from Banū Layth[856] later said:

[3190] Ask about us on the day when we met the Azd, when the horses were running yellow and red—
We sliced their livers and forearms.
May they be far away in their [foolish] opinion and be distant!

According to ʿUmar b. Shabbah—Abū al-Ḥasan [al-Madāʾinī]—Jaʿfar b. Sulaymān—Mālik b. Dīnār: ʿAmmār attacked al-Zubayr on the day of the Battle of the Camel and had begun to drive a spear at him when he said, "Do you want to kill me?" "No! Leave!" he said.

850. Ibn ʿAbdallāh (see p. 152, below), rather than "a Muslim" (Caetani, IX, 139).
851. ʿĀʾishah.
852. IA: "ordering them to kill and not restraining them."
853. See Lane, 1271, 906.
854. Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah.
855. Dīn.
856. A follower of ʿAlī.

According to ʿĀmir b. Ḥafṣ: On the day of the Battle of the Camel ʿAmmār approached and drove the spear at al-Zubayr, who said, "Are you going to kill me, Abū al-Yaqẓān?" "No, Abū ʿAbdallāh," he replied.

Return to Sayf's account

According to Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: When the army was routed at the height of the morning al-Zubayr called out to them: "Al-Zubayr is over here! Come to me!" A mawlā of his was with him calling out, "Are you running away from the disciple of the Messenger of God?!" But then al-Zubayr set off toward Wādī al-Sibāʿ, pursued by some horsemen. The armies did not notice him, busy in combat with each other, so when he saw the horsemen after him he turned and attacked them and split them up. They charged again, but when they recognized him they said: "It's al-Zubayr! Let him be!" A group including ʿIlbāʾ b. al-Haytham . . .[857] and al-Qaʿqāʿ with a group then passed Ṭalḥah, who was saying: "To me, servants of Allāh! Hold fast! Hold fast!" But he[858] said to him, "Abū Muḥammad, you're wounded and cannot achieve what you want, so go back to the tents!" Then he said, "Ghulām, take me [into the city], and find me a place [to rest]!" So he was taken to al-Baṣrah, accompanied by a ghulām and two men. The fight went on after he had left, and in the rout the men retreated toward al-Baṣrah. But when they saw that the camel had been encircled by Muḍar[859] they rallied and reformed as a center [of the army],[860] as they had been when they [first] engaged in battle, and returned [3191] to fight anew, while Rabīʿah of al-Baṣrah held their ground, some as a right flank, some as a left. "Kaʿb! Leave the camel, and go forward holding the Book of Almighty and Glorious Allāh, and call them to it!" said ʿĀ'ishah and thrust the Qur'ān copy at him. Then up came the forces headed by the Saba'iyyah, fearing that peace would be made, and Kaʿb met them with the Qur'ān copy. ʿAlī was behind them, restraining them, but they insisted on advancing, and then when Kaʿb called them they all shot [their ar-

857. There is a lacuna in the text here; supply "approached"?
858. Perhaps the ghulām, who may have appeared in the lacuna.
859. I.e., to protect ʿĀ'ishah.
860. Muir, 249; Caetani, IX, 180; cf. p. 151, below.

rows] at him at the same time[861] and killed him. They then shot at ʿĀ'ishah in her howdah, and she started calling out: "My sons! [Remember] the recompense [of Allāh]![862] The recompense!" She raised her voice very loud, "Allāh! Allāh! Remember Almighty and Glorious Allāh and the reckoning!" But they insisted on advancing. So the next thing she did when they insisted was to cry out: "You men! Curse the killers of ʿUthmān and their various supporters!" She began to imprecate [them], and the people of Baṣrah filled the air with the noise of imprecation. ʿAlī heard the imprecation and asked, "What's all that shouting?" "It's ʿĀ'ishah imprecating the killers of ʿUthmān and their various supporters," they replied, "and [her army] imprecating them with her." So ʿAlī also began to imprecate: "O Allāh! Curse the killers of ʿUthmān and their various supporters!"

She then sent a message to ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAttāb and ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥārith: "Keep up your positions!" She then urged her people to fight when she saw that ʿAlī's army wanted only her and were not holding back from [her] men. Then Muḍar of al-Baṣrah advanced and attacked Muḍar of al-Kūfah, so that ʿAlī became hard pressed and pushed on the nape of [his son] Muḥammad's neck and told him, "Attack!" But he shrank back, so ʿAlī stretched out his hand to the banner to take it from him. Then [Muḥammad] attacked, so [ʿAlī] left the banner in [Muḥammad's] hand. Muḍar of al-Kūfah then attacked. Swords were clashing in front of the camel, and the [battle] grew hot, while the outer [3192] flanks stayed as they were, accomplishing nothing. Now ʿAlī had tribes with him other than Muḍar. Zayd b. Ṣūḥān[863] was from one of these, and a man from his tribe said to him: "Go back to your tribe! What's this situation got to do with you? Don't you see that Muḍar [of al-Baṣrah] are over against you and that the camel is before your very eyes and that death is this side of it?!" "Death is better than life; death is what I want," he replied. So he was shot and his brother Sayḥān[864] also. Ṣaʿṣaʿah[865] was brought away

861. Reading rishqan with Ibrāhīm (cf. Lane, 1090b) for the text's rashqan. Cf. p. 152, below.
862. Baqiyyat Allāh (Qur'ān 11:87; Lane, 238c).
863. From ʿAbd al-Qays; see Caskel and Strenziok, I, 170, II, 603.
864. Caskel and Strenziok, I, 170, II, 502.
865. Another brother; see Caskel and Strenziok, I, 170, II, 538.

wounded. The battle raged fiercely, and when ʿAlī saw this he sent word to Yaman and Rabīʿah: "Join those next to you!"[866]

A tribesman from ʿAbd al-Qays stood forward and said, "We are calling you to the Book of Almighty and Glorious Allāh." "And how can someone call us to the Book of Allāh," they[867] replied, "who doesn't carry out the punishments of Allāh (may He be praised!) and who killed the one who called for Allāh, Kaʿb b. Sūr?" At this Rabīʿah all shot [their arrows] at him at the same time and killed him. Muslim b. ʿAbdallāh al-ʿIjlī then stood where he had been, and they all shot [their arrows] at him at the same time and killed him. Yaman of al-Kūfah then called Yaman of al-Baṣrah, but they shot [arrows] at them.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: The first engagement raged fiercely until midday. During it Ṭalḥah was wounded and al-Zubayr was lost. When the others then gathered round ʿĀ'ishah, and the Kūfans were insisting on fighting, with ʿĀ'ishah as their only target, she urged on her own men, and they fought on until they called out to one another and made a truce. But they returned to fighting in the afternoon. This was Thursday[868] in Jumādā II. They fought the early part of the day with Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr and the middle part with [3193] ʿĀ'ishah. The fighters advanced against each other, and Yaman of al-Baṣrah routed Yaman of al-Kūfah and Rabīʿah of al-Baṣrah routed Rabīʿah of al-Kūfah. ʿAlī then rushed with Muḍar of al-Kūfah against Muḍar of al-Baṣrah and said: "Death has no escape. It catches up with the fleer and does not abandon the one who holds his ground!"

According to ʿUmar—Abū al-Ḥasan—Abū ʿAbdallāh al-Qurashī—Yūnus b. Arqam—ʿAlī b. ʿAmr al-Kindī—Zayd b. Ḥisās[869]—Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah: My father thrust the banner at me on the Day of the Camel and said, "Advance!" So I did until I could find no way forward except against a spear. "Advance!" he

866. Iǰtamiʿū ʿalā man yalīkum: perhaps "Fight together against those facing you!" or "Gather behind one leader!"

867. On ʿĀ'ishah's side.

868. This is at least a month different from the date given on pp. 76 and 81, above.

869. Ibn Jassās or Ḥassān (Addenda, DCXXXIV) or Ḥashās (Caskel, I, 185, II, 601)?

said, "you without a mother!" But I drew back and said, "I find no way forward except against the head of a spear." So another person took hold of the banner from me—I don't know who he was—and I looked up and there was my father in front of me, saying:

You are the one whom my good will has tempted [to take more].[870]
O ʿAysha![871] the people around you are actually enemies.
Giving in is better than to have one's sons fighting.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: The two flanks fought a fierce fight as they advanced against each other, as had happened with the two centers. The Yamanīs fought from both sides, and ten of them from al-Kūfah were killed by the banner of the Commander of the Faithful—every time a man took it he was killed—five of these were from Hamdān[872] and five from the rest of Yaman. When Yazīd b. Qays[873] saw this, he took it and held it tightly in his hand, saying:

[3194] Soul of mine! you have lived and have become rich for a long while. The length you have remained is enough for you today!
Will you always be seeking[874] long life?

In fact, he was quoting this from an earlier poet. Nimrān b. Abī Nimrān al-Hamdānī then said:

I bared my blade into the tribesmen from Azd.[875]
I struck into their old men and beardless youths,
All of them with long forearms[876] and eager to fight.

Then Rabīʿah of al-Kūfah advanced, and among them killed round the banner of the left flank was Zayd. Then Ṣaʿṣaʿah was thrown 870. Reading al-ʿutbā for al-ḥusnā, following Nöldeke (Addenda, DCXXXIV).

871. I.e., ʿĀʾishah.
872. A southern Arab tribe (*EI*², q.v.).
873. Ibn Tammām of Hamdān, ʿAlī's governor of Iṣfahān and al-Rayy and involved in the murder of ʿUthmān; see Caskel and Strenziok, I, 231, II, 596.
874. Following the text's aṭalbu (=aṭalabu) ṭūlī'l-ʿumri for Ibrāhīm's aṭlabu ṭūla'l-ʿumri.
875. Defending ʿĀʾishah. See these verses again on p. 144, below.
876. I.e., good with swords.

down, then Sayḥān, then ʿAbdallāh b. Raqabah[877] b. al-Mughīrah. Abū ʿUbaydah b. Rāshid b. Sulmā[878] said as he was thrown down: "O Allāh! You led us out of error, You rescued us from ignorance, You afflicted us with fitnah, and we became confused and in doubt." Then he was killed. Then al-Ḥuṣayn b. Maʿbad b. al-Nuʿmān was thrown down, too, and he handed the banner to his son Maʿbad, as he began to say: "Maʿbad! Take her young camel near her,[879] and she'll become affectionate,"[880] and it remained firm in his grip.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: When the armored warriors of Muḍar of al-Baṣrah and Muḍar of al-Kūfah saw that no one was giving in, they called out among the armies of ʿĀ'ishah and ʿAlī: "Men! Attack the extremities when your endurance is running out and when victory is elusive!" So they began stabbing extremities—arms and legs. No battle has ever been seen before or after, or been heard of, in which [3195] there were more cut-off arms and legs whose owners were not known than this one. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAttāb lost a hand that day before he was killed, and, when a fighter from this group or that lost any extremity, he would fight like a martyr until he was killed.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Ṣaʿb b. ʿAṭiyyah b. Bilāl—his father: The situation got very bad, so the Kūfan right flank retreated to the center and stayed there. The Baṣran left flank stayed close to their center and prevented the Kūfan right flank from penetrating there, but they came very close. The same thing happened with the Kūfan left flank and the Baṣran right flank. ʿĀ'ishah then asked the man on her left, "Who are these?" "Your sons al-Azd," replied Ṣabrah b. Shaymān. "Tribesmen of Ghassān!"[881] she called out, "we used to hear tell of your prowess with the sword; keep it up today!" and she quoted the verses 877. For the text's Ruqayyah (Addenda, DCXXXIV). Probably Ibn Khawṭaʿah, rather than Ibn al-Mughīrah; see p. 142, below, as also for the others that follows.

878. Or Rāshid; see p. 143, below.
879. War.
880. I.e., fight hard, and the battle will go in your favor.
881. Southern Arabian confederation (Caskel and Strenziok, II, 35, 273).

The Ghassānī protectors fought with their swords, as did Hinb[882] and Aws[883] and Shabīb.[884]

She then asked the man on her right, "Who are these?" "Bakr b. Wā'il," they replied. She said, "It was of you the poet said:

They came at us with swords and armor as though they were, judging from their impenetrable strength, Bakr b. Wā'il.

It's only ʿAbd al-Qays in front of you!" So they fought their fiercest engagement[885] until then. Then she went up to the squadron in front of her and asked, "Who are these?" "Banū Nājiyah,"[886] they replied. "Bravo! Bravo! Abṭaḥiyyah[887] swords and Qurashī swords!" said she. And they clashed swords in a way anyone would want to avoid. Then Banū Ḍabbah circled round, [3196] [protecting] her, and she said, "Go to it! The choicest coalition[888] [has come]!" Then, when they became thinned out,[889] Banū ʿAdī joined them and many people were around ʿĀ'ishah, and she asked, "Who are you?" "Banū ʿAdī," they replied. "We've come to join our brothers." "The head of the camel remained steady," she said, "until Banū Ḍabbah were killed around me." So Banū Adī kept the camel's head upright and fought in such a way—not trying to make excuses or turning aside when losing the ends of limbs—until, when this increased and became widespread in both camps together, [the enemy forces] went for the camel, saying, "The enemy will not be removed unless it's killed," and ʿAlī's two flanks then shifted and joined the center. The Baṣrans did the same, and the fighters were filled with hatred toward one another. Then they all came together in their two centers, and Ibn Yathribī took hold of the camel's head and said the following rajaz verses, claiming that he had killed 'Ilbā' b. al-Haytham, Zayd b. Ṣūhān, and Hind b. ʿAmr:

882. Southern Arabian tribe (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 328, II, 283).
883. Southern Arabian tribe (Caskel and Strenziok, II, 35, 214).
884. Southern Arabian tribe (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 202, II, 522).
885. Reading qitāl (Addenda, DCXXXIV) for the text's al-qitāl.
886. From Quraysh.
887. From Mecca.
888. Jamrat al-jamarāt, i.e., Banū Ḍabbah b. Udd, Banū al-Ḥārith b. Ka'b, and Banū Numayr b. ʿĀmir; see Lane, 453b; Caskel and Strenziok, I, 247.
889. Through being killed.

For those that don't know me, I am Ibn Yathribī,
the killer of 'Ilbā' and of Hind al-Jamalī,
And of a son of Ṣūḥān, who followed the way of 'Alī.[890]

'Ammār then called out to him:[891] "By my life! You've taken refuge in a secure stronghold, and there's no way to get at you. If you're speaking truthfully, come out from this squadron, and come near me!" So Ibn Yathribī left the halter in the hand of a Banū 'Adī tribesman and moved into a position between 'Ā'ishah's army and 'Alī's. The people then thronged round 'Ammār until he approached Ibn Yathribī. 'Ammār warded him off with his shield, and Ibn Yathribī struck 'Ammār. His sword got embedded in the [3197] shield, and he tried to pull it out but could not. 'Ammār then went out against him, completely out of control. He stooped down and cut off Ibn Yathribī's legs, and he[892] fell down on his backside. His companions put him on a horse, and he was later carried off the battlefield near death; he was brought to 'Alī, who ordered his head to be cut off. When Ibn Yathribī was wounded that 'Adawī tribesman left the halter and came out to fight, calling out, "Who will come out to fight?" 'Ammār held back, but Rabī'ah al-'Uqaylī[893] appeared in front of him. (The 'Adawī tribesman's name was 'Amrah b. Bajrah.[894]) Rabī'ah had the strongest voice in the army, and he declaimed the verses

O Mother of ours! the most refractory[895] mother we know!
A mother [normally] feeds a son and shows him mercy.
Have you not seen how many a brave is being wounded, his hand and wrist made lonely?

Then they clashed, and each one of them wounded his opponent, and they both died.

'Aṭiyyah b. Bilāl continued: At the end of the day a man called al-Ḥārith of Banū Ḍabbah joined us and took the place of the 'Adawī, and we have never, ever seen a stronger man than he, and he began to recite the verses 890. 'Alā dīn 'Alī. See p. 154, below.

891. Ibn Yathribī.
892. Ibn Yathribī.
893. Caskel and Strenziok, I, 102?
894. Following Ibrāhīm; the text has no diacritics, except on the final letter.
895. See p. 141, below, for a variant of these verses.

We, Banū[896] Ḍabbah, are the allies of the camel;
we lament the death of Ibn ʿAffān with tips of spears.
[3198] Death is sweeter to us than honey!
Send back our chief[897] to us, and that will be enough.[898]

According to ʿUmar b. Shabbah—Abū[899] al-Ḥasan—al-Mufaḍḍal b. Muḥammad—ʿAdī b. Abī ʿAdī—Abū Rajāʾ al-ʿUṭāridī: I was watching a man on the Day of the Camel. He was turning his sword this way and that in his hand, as though it were a toy,[900] reciting all the while:

We, Banū Ḍabbah, are the allies of the camel;
we take the field against death whenever death dismounts.
Death, we want it more than honey!
We lament the death of Ibn ʿAffān with tips of spears.
Send back our chief to us, and that will be enough.

According to ʿUmar—Abū al-Ḥasan—al-Mufaḍḍal al-Ḍabbī: The man was Wasīm b. ʿAmr b. Ḍirār al-Ḍabbī.

According to ʿUmar—Abū al-Ḥasan—al-Hudhalī: ʿAmr b. Yathribī was urging on his tribe on the Day of the Camel. They took their turns holding the nose rope and said the rajaz verses

We, Banū Ḍabbah, will not flee until we see [our own] skulls tumble
And boiling red blood tumbling from them.

Mother of ours, ʿAysha! Do not fear!
All your sons are heroes brave.[901]
Mother of ours, wife of the Prophet, wife of the blessed and the guided!

This continued until forty men had been killed holding the nose rope. ʿĀʾishah said, "My camel remained steady until I no longer

---

896. Banū in the text, banī in Ibrāhīm (see his note), as also in following occurrences.

897. ʿUthmān.

898. Ibn Manẓūr, XIII, 48.17. An impossible demand meaning therefore "fight to the end!" These verses come again on p. 153, below.

899. Following Addenda, DCXXXIV.

900. Mikhrāq—either a wooden or plaited-rag sword (Lane, 729c).

901. Cf. p. 149, below.

heard the cries of Banū Ḍabbah." On that day ʿAmr b. Yathribī killed ʿIlbāʾ b. al-Haytham al-Sadūsī, Hind b. ʿAmr al-Jamalī, and Zayd b. Ṣūḥān, while reciting these rajaz verses: [3199]

I strike out at them but I do not see[902] Abū Ḥasan.[903]
This is the biggest grief that could be!
We are setting the leadership the way we fix a nose rein.[904]

Al-Hudhalī, however, maintained that this poem was recited at the Battle of Ṣiffīn.[905] ʿAmmār then confronted ʿAmr b. Yathribī. ʿAmmār was then ninety years old and was wearing a fur garment with a rope of palm fiber tied around his waist. ʿAmr b. Yathribī rushed toward him, but [ʿAmmār] turned his leather shield toward him, and [ʿAmr] drove into it with his sword, and the people shot at him until he was knocked down, while reciting:

If you kill me, I am still Ibn Yathribī,
the killer of ʿIlbāʾ and Hind al-Jamalī,
And then of Ibn Ṣūḥān, whose cause was the way of ʿAlī.

He was taken prisoner and then brought to ʿAlī. "Spare me!" he asked. "After those three whom you advanced against with your sword," replied ʿAlī, "and struck their faces with it?" So ʿAlī ordered him to be killed.

According to ʿUmar—Abū al-Ḥasan—Abū Mikhnaf—Isḥāq b. Rāshid—ʿAbbād b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr—his father: I came out of the day of the Camel with thirty-seven wounds from blows and stabs. I never saw anything like the Day of the Camel. Not a single one of us fled; we were as solid as rock.[906] All who took hold of the camel's nose rein were killed. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAttāb took it and was killed; al-Aswad b. Abī al-Bakhtarī took it and was thrown to the ground; then I came and took hold of the nose rein. "Who are you?" asked ʿĀʾishah. "ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr," I

902. Reading arā with Ibrāhīm and Nöldeke [Addenda, DCXXXIV] for the text's urā.
903. ʿAlī was perhaps in the fray elsewhere.
904. "We are doing our best to control the situation." This line also occurs on p. 16, above.
905. EI[1], s.v.
906. Lit., "like the black mountain."

replied. "Weep for the bereavement of Asmā'!"[907] exclaimed [3200] ʿĀ'ishah. At this point al-Ashtar passed me. I recognized him, so I got hold of him round the chest, and we fell down together. "Kill me and Mālik!" I called out to those around. Men from both armies came and fought on behalf of each of us. When we stopped fighting, the nose rein was no longer being held. "Hamstring the camel!"[908] cried out ʿAlī. "If it's hamstrung they'll disperse." So a man struck it, and it fell, and I have never heard a sound more noisy than the bellowing of that camel. ʿAlī then ordered Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr to set up a tent over ʿĀ'ishah. "See if anything has hit her," he said, so Muḥammad put his head in. "Damn you! Who are you?" she cried. "The member of your family you hate most!" "Ibn al-Khathʿamiyyah?"[909] "That's right." "You're more precious to me than my father and my mother," she replied. "Praise to Allāh, Who has spared you!"

According to Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm b. Ḥabīb b. al-Shahīd—Abū Bakr b. ʿAyyāsh—ʿAlqamah: I said to al-Ashtar, "But you were very much against the killing of ʿUthmān, so what made you come out to al-Baṣrah?" "These men gave allegiance to him and then reneged, and it was Ibn al-Zubayr who forced ʿĀ'ishah to come out. So I was praying to Almighty and Glorious Allāh to make me meet him to fight. He did meet me, and we fought hand to hand. But I was not satisfied simply with the strength of my arm. So I stood up in the stirrup, struck him on his head, and threw him down." We[910] asked, "So it was he who said, 'Kill me and Mālik!'" "No. I didn't leave him needing anything more done to him. The one you mean is ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAttāb b. Asīd. He met me, and we each hit the other. He knocked me down, and I knocked him down, so he began saying, 'Kill me and Mālik!' But they didn't know who Mālik was.[911] Had they known they would have killed me."

Abū Bakr b. ʿAyyāsh said: "Here is your documentary evidence

907. See p. 127, above.

908. Cf. Abbot, "Women," 263.

909. Al-Khathʿamiyyah is Asmā' bt. ʿUmays of Khathʿam, Abū Bakr's third wife (*EI*², s.v. Abū Bakr). ʿAlī married her when Abū Bakr died, which is perhaps part of the reason why Muḥammad was "most hated." ʿĀ'ishah's mother was Umm Rūmān bint ʿĀmir of Kināmah. The mother of Asmā' (al-Zubayr's wife) was Qutaylah bt. ʿAbd al-ʿUzzā of ʿĀmir, and Umm Kulthūm's mother was Ḥabībah bt. Khārijah of al-Ḥārith b. al-Khazraj.

910. ʿAlqamah and others.

911. He was always known as al-Ashtar.

for this story.[912] Al-Mughīrah told me it, from[913] Ibrāhīm from ʿAlqamah, who said, 'I said to al-Ashtar' and so on."

According to ʿAbdallāh b. Aḥmad—his father—Sulaymān—ʿAbdallāh—Ṭalḥah b. al-Nadr—ʿUthmān b. Sulaymān—ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr: A young man stood in front of us and said, "Beware of these two men!"[914] He then mentioned him[915] [that] the characteristic trait of al-Ashtar was that one of his feet was exposed because of a pain he felt in it. "So when we met up," he continued, "al-Ashtar said, 'When [ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr] came at me he leveled his spear at my foot, so I said: "This man is stupid. What could he achieve from me even if he cut it right off? Aren't I going to kill him?"[916] But when [ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr] got near me he grabbed [his] spear with both hands and searched out my face with it. I said, "He's some opponent!"'" [3201]

According to ʿUmar b. Shabbah—Abū al-Ḥasan—Abū Mikhnaf—Ibn ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Jundab—his father—his grandfather: ʿAmr b. al-Ashraf[917] took hold of the camel's nose rein, and no one came near him without being struck by his sword, until al-Ḥārith b. Zuhayr al-Azdī[918] approached, saying the verses

O Mother of ours! O best Mother we know!
Do you not see how many a brave is being wounded,
His head and wrist made lonely?[919]

They exchanged a couple of blows and I saw them both thrashing the ground with their legs[920] until they died. Later I (Jundab) went to visit ʿĀ'ishah in Medina. "Who are you?" she asked. "An Azdī 912. Hādhā kitābuka shāhiduhu.

913. ʿAn—following Ibrāhīm and Addenda, DCXXXIII, and ignoring Prym's suggestion in his n. c to substitute ibn for ʿan, i.e., al-Mughīrah ibn Ibrāhīm. According to Ibrāhīm's index, the missing links between Ibn ʿAyyāsh and ʿAlqamah (see the isnād at the beginning of the preceding paragraph) are al-Mughīrah b. Miqsam and Ibrāhīm al-Nakhaʿī.

914. Al-Ashtar and ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr, who were both renowned for their strength.

915. The text of this report is difficult, perhaps corrupt, in places. Here it is most probably referring to al-Ashtar.

916. Ibrāhīm's paragraph break here is not helpful.

917. Al-ʿAtakī al-Azdī—his tribe had not yet emigrated to al-Baṣrah (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 203, II, 171).

918. Of the Kabīr branch (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 218, II, 315).

919. See p. 137, above, for a variant of these verses.

920. Having been wounded and knocked over.

tribesman living in Kūfah." "Were you present with us on the Day of the Camel?" "Yes." "For us or against us?" "Against," I replied. "Do you know then who it was who said: 'Mother of ours! O best Mother we know?'" "I do," I replied. "It was my paternal cousin," and she wept so bitterly I thought she was not going to stop.

According to ʿUmar—Abū al-Ḥasan—Abū Laylā[921]—Dīnār b. al-ʿAyzār—al-Ashtar: When I met ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAttāb b. [3202] Asīd I met the strongest and most cunning of men. I got hold of him round the neck, and we fell to the ground together, and he called out to those around, "Kill me and Mālik!"

According to ʿUmar—Abū al-Ḥasan—Ibn Abī Laylā—Dīnār b. al-ʿAyzār—al-Ashtar: I saw ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥakīm b. Ḥizām[922] with the banner of Quraysh, and ʿAdī b. Ḥātim al-Ṭāʾī attacking each other like two male camels. So [ʿAdī and I] took turns against him and killed him. ʿAbdallāh, that is, after he had stabbed ʿAdī and put out his eye.

According to ʿUmar—Abū al-Ḥasan—Abū Mikhnaf—his paternal uncle, Muḥammad b. Mikhnaf[923]—a number of the elders of the tribe, all of whom had been at the Battle of the Camel: The banner of the Kūfan Azd[924] was held by Mikhnaf b. Sulaym,[925] but he was killed that day. So from his close family al-Ṣaqʿab[926] and his brother ʿAbdallāh b. Sulaym took hold of it, but they killed him too. So al-ʿAlāʾ b. ʿUrwah took it, and victory came while it was in his hand.

The banner of the Kūfan ʿAbd al-Qays was held by al-Qāsim b. Muslim, but he was killed, as were Zayd b. Ṣūḥān and Sayḥān b. Ṣūḥān with him. A number of others of them took the banner and were killed too, among them ʿAbdallāh b. Raqabah[927] and 921. Following Ibrāhīm for the text's Ibn Abī Laylā; cf. the isnād on p. 144, below.

---

922. Al-Qurashī (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 19, II, 111).

923. Ibn Sulaym (see note 925), born perhaps in 19/640 (U. Sezgin, 225).

924. On ʿAlī's side.

925. Of the Thaʿlabah branch (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 218, II, 407). Contrary to his death, reported here, he is said to have held their banner at Ṣiffīn also and was appointed governor of Isfahan and Hamadhān by ʿAlī (U. Sezgin, 225 n. 128; Hinds, "Banners," 42).

926. Ibn Sulaym, his brother (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 218, II, 538).

927. For the text's Ruqayyah. Ibn Khawṭaʿah (Addenda, DCXXXIV); cf. p. 135, above; Caskel and Strenziok, I, 170, II, 117.

Rāshid.[928] Then Munqidh b. al-Nuʿmān[929] took hold of it and passed it to his son, Murrah b. Munqidh,[930] and the battle finished while it was in his hand.

The banner of the Kūfan Bakr b. Wāʾil was with Banū Dhuhl, and was held by al-Ḥārith b. Ḥassān b. Ḥawṭ[931] al-Dhuhlī, and Abū al-ʿArfāʾ al-Raqāshī said, "Take care of yourself and your tribe!" But he advanced and said: "Tribesmen of Bakr b. Wāʾil! Nobody had the standing with the Messenger of God that your [3203] companion[932] had, so support him!" So he[933] advanced and was killed, as were his son and five of his brothers. Bishr b. Ḥassān b. Ḥawṭ[934] said these verses to him that day as he was fighting:

I am Ibn Ḥassān b. Ḥawṭ,[935] and my father was the messenger of all Bakr to the Prophet.[936]

His son recited:

I announce and lament the death of chief al-Ḥārith b. Ḥassān to the clans of Dhuhl and Shaybān!

A tribesman from Dhuhl then recited:

You announce to us the death of the best man from ʿAdnān;[937]
[he was glorious when there was] stabbing and confronting opponents.

Men were killed from Banū Maḥdūj who were prominent among the Kūfans, and thirty-five were killed from Banū Dhuhl. One tribesman said to his brother as he fought: "Brother of mine! How superb our fighting would be if we were in the right." "We are in the right!" he replied. "Others have wandered right and left, but we've maintained our loyalty to our Prophet's household."[938] The 928. Or Abū ʿUbaydah b. Rāshid; see p. 135, above.

929. See p. 135, above.
930. See p. 135, above.
931. For the text's Khūṭ (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 154, II, 307).
932. I.e., ʿAlī.
933. Al-Ḥārith.
934. For the text's Khūṭ, al-Ḥārith's brother (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 154).
935. For the text's Khūṭ.
936. At the time of the wufūd; see Watt, 141.
937. The northern Arabs.
938. Ahl bayt nabiyyinā.

two of them fought to the death. The Baṣran ʿAbd al-Qays—who were with ʿAlī—were headed by ʿAmr b. Marḥūm. Bakr b. Wā'il were headed by Shaqīq b. Thawr, and their banner was held by Rashrāshah, his mawlā. The Baṣran Azd—who were with ʿĀ'ishah—were headed by ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Jusham b. Abī Ḥunayn al-Ḥamāmī. So ʿĀmir b. Ḥafṣ told me, but others say it was Ṣabrah b. Shaymān al-Ḥuddānī.[939] Their banner was held by [3204] ʿAmr b. al-Ashraf al-ʿAtakī, who was killed and along with him thirteen men from his close family.

According to ʿUmar—Abū al-Ḥasan—Abū Laylā—Abū ʿUkkāshah al-Hamdānī—Rifāʿah al-Bajalī—Abū al-Bakhtarī al-Ṭā'ī: Ḍabbah and Azd circled around ʿĀ'ishah on the Day of the Camel. Some Azdī tribesmen were picking up the dung of her camel, breaking it up, smelling it, and saying, "The dung of our mother's camel smells of musk!" At the same time a man[940] from ʿAlī's companions was fighting, reciting as he did so:

I bared my blade [and thrust it] into the tribesmen from Azd.
I struck into their old men and beardless youths,
All of them with long forearms and eager to fight.

Waves of men jostled each other, and then someone yelled, "Hamstring the camel!" So Bujayr b. Duljah from the Kūfan Ḍabbah struck it. "Why did you hamstring it?" he was asked. "I saw my tribe[941] being killed, and I feared they would all perish. I hoped by hamstringing it that at least some of them would remain alive."

According to ʿUmar—Abū al-Ḥasan—al-Ṣalt b. Dīnār: A tribesman from Banū ʿUqayl went up to the dead Kaʿb b. Sūr.[942] He thrust the butt of his spear into his eyes, jerked it round, and said, "I've never seen property produce better cash than you!"[943]

According to ʿUmar—Abū al-Ḥasan—ʿAwānah: They fought all day until nightfall on the Day of the Camel, and someone[944] said the verses

---

939. See p. 120, above.
940. Nimrān, according to p. 134, above.
941. I.e., the Baṣran branch.
942. Shot as he tried to get the two sides to make peace (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 211, II, 366; p. 132, above).
943. He was a valuable asset and good to get rid of.
944. On ʿĀ'ishah's side.

The sword healed us of Zayd and Hind[945] completely and of the two eyes of ʿAdī.
We kept fighting them all day until nightfall with sturdy spears and sharp swords.

Ibn al-Ṣāmit said the verses [3205]

Go off Ḍabbah! for the land is wide to your left. Death lurks in the valley, [namely, we,]
A fighting force like the rays of the rising sun, a force with a torrent that flows with force.
So we will stand up to you[946] in every battle, holding Mashrafiyyah swords, striking and not weakening.

According to al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad—Rawḥ b. ʿUbādah—Rawḥ—Abū Rajāʾ: I saw a man whose ear had been cut off. "Have you always been like that, or were you wounded by something?" I asked. "Let me tell you," he replied. "As I was walking among the corpses on the day of the Battle of the Camel, I came upon a man thrashing [the ground with] his leg and reciting:

Our mother brought us to drink at the pool of death,
and we did not leave until our thirst was quenched.
When we obeyed Quraysh our senses had gone awry, and our support for the Ḥijāzīs caused us pain."[947]

I said: "'ʿAbdallāh! Say, 'There is no god but Allāh!'"[948] "Come nearer, and dictate [it] to me; my ear's blocked," he replied. I went nearer, and he asked me, "Who are you?" A tribesman from al-Kūfah," I replied, at which he jumped on me and cut off my ear, as you see, and said, "When you meet your mother, tell her that ʿUmayr b. al-Ahlab al-Ḍabbī did this to you."

According to ʿUmar—Abū al-Ḥasan—al-Mufaḍḍal the great narrator and ʿĀmir b. Ḥafṣ and ʿAbd al-Majīd al-Asadī: ʿUmayr b. al-Ahlab al-Ḍabbī was wounded on the Day of the Camel. One of ʿAlī's men passed by him as he lay among the wounded. ʿUmayr said to him, "Come over here!" and when he did so 945. I.e., killed them.

946. Nuqīmu lakum "we will wait for you" (Glossarium, CDXL).
947. Reading ʿanāʾu (Addenda, DCXXXIV).
948. Before you die.

he cut off his ear. ʿUmayr b. al-Ahlab recited the verses

Our mother brought us to drink at the pool of death,
and we did not leave until our thirst was quenched.
It would have been better if Ibn Ḍabbah's[949] support for his mother and her allies[950] had been found elsewhere and done without.[951] [3206] It was bad luck when we obeyed Banū Taym b. Murrah.[952]
What are Taym but slaves, male and female?![953]

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Miqdām al-Ḥārithī:[954] There was a man from our tribe called Hānī' b. Khaṭṭāb. He had been among those who attacked ʿUthmān but was not at the Battle of the Camel. When he heard the rajaz poem on the lips of the people back in al-Kūfah, the one that goes

We, Banū Ḍabbah, are the allies of the camel,[955]

he riposted with the verses

The chief of Madhḥij and Hamdān refused to return Naʿthal[956] to how he was,
A new creation after that of the Merciful.[957]

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Ṣaʿb b. ʿAṭiyyah—his father: On that day Abū al-Jarbā'[958] began reciting rajaz verses:

Are you listening to ʿAlī and obeying [him] before tasting the edge of the Mashrafī sword

---

949. I.e., his own.
950. Shīʿatahā.
951. Disregarding Wellhausen's emendation of waghanā'u to waʿanā'u (Addenda, DCXXXIV).
952. I.e., Ṭalḥah.
953. Taym means servant (EI[1], s.v.).
954. Probably Ibn Rabīʿah, the Kūfan notable (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 230, II, 408).
955. See p. 138, above, where one of the verses says ruddū ʿalaynā shaykhanā "Make ʿUthmān come back to us!"
956. I.e., ʿUthmān.
957. I.e., Banū Ḍabbah's request was impossible, so it was pointless to fight.
958. A member of ʿĀ'ishah's army. It is as though in these verses he is sending a message to everyone in ʿAlī's army.

And forsaking the wives of the Prophet who are in the right?
I know a people I do not care about![959]

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: The Mother of the Faithful was encircled by courageous and clearsighted Muḍarī clansmen.[960] No one would take hold of the rein unless he was holding the banner and the flag and was unwilling to give it up. Nor would anyone take hold of it unless he was well known among those encircling the camel and could state his genealogy to her, "I'm so-and-so, son of so-and-so." By Allāh! They would [then] fight fiercely in its defense, and death could not be brought to it except with great endeavor and difficulty. Every follower of ʿAlī who tried to reach it was either killed or fled and did not return. When the center of ʿAlī's army became mixed with the flanks, ʿAdī b. Ḥātim came and attacked it, but his eye was gouged out, so he shrank back. Then al-Ashtar came and ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAttāb b. Asīd tried to push him away—he was badly cut and weak with loss of blood—but al-Ashtar grabbed him round his chest and threw him off his mount onto the ground. But he jerked around beneath him and managed to run away half dead. [3207]

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Hishām b. ʿUrwah—his father: No one would come and take hold of the rein unless he said, "I'm so-and-so, son of so-and-so, Mother of the Faithful." So when ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr came up but said nothing she asked, "Who are you?" "I'm ʿAbdallāh, your sister's son." "Weep for the bereavement of Asmāʾ" replied ʿĀʾishah, meaning her sister. Al-Ashtar and ʿAdī b. Ḥātim reached the camel, so ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥakīm b. Ḥizām[961] came out against al-Ashtar, who advanced toward him. They each struck the other but al-Ashtar killed [ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥakīm], so ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr advanced toward him, but al-Ashtar dealt him a blow on the head and severely wounded him. ʿAbdallāh then hit al-Ashtar lightly; each grabbed the other round the chest, and they fell to the ground fighting. "Kill me and Mālik!" exclaimed ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr.

959. Yours. This is a threat.
960. Afnāʾ, perhaps "splinter groups" (Hinds, "Murder," 452).
961. Caskel and Strenziok, I, 19, II, 111.

Mālik used to say later, "Not for red camels[962] would I have wanted him to say, 'And al-Ashtar.'" Then some of ʿAlī's followers and some of ʿĀ'ishah's rushed toward them and the two men separated; each side saved its man from his opponent.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Ṣaʿb b. ʿAṭiyyah—his father: Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah then came up and took hold of the camel's nose rein. "Dear Mother!" he said. "Give 3208] me your order!" "I order you," she replied, "to be like the best son of Adam if you're spared." So he took hold of the nose rein. Then whenever anyone attacked him he would attack them, quoting the Qur'ān "Ḥā' mīm! They will not be given victory by Allāh!"[963] A number of men then gathered and attacked him, each of them claiming to have killed him—al-Mukaʿbir al-Asadī, al-Mukaʿbir al-Ḍabbī, Muʿāwiyah b. Shaddād al-ʿAbsī, and ʿAffān b. al-Ashqar al-Naṣrī. One of them thrust him through with a spear, and his killer said these verses about it:

He was disheveled through spending nights reciting verses from his Lord.
By all appearances he had done little harm and was a good Muslim.
I ripped the neck opening of his shirt with a spear, and he fell down, dying, his hands and face thrown to the ground.
He was reminding me of the verse ḥā' mīm while the spear was driving.
Why did he not recite ḥā' mīm before coming out to fight?!
[He fought me] over nothing, except that he was not a follower of ʿAlī. Those who do not follow the right regret it.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Ṣaʿb b. ʿAṭiyyah—his father: On that day al-Qaʿqāʿ b. ʿAmr said, provoking al-Ashtar, "Are you going to attack again?" But he made no reply, so he said: "Al-Ashtar! Some of us know how to fight others

962. I.e., the best camels (Wensinck, I, 513b)—similar to our saying "Not for all the tea in China."

963. Qur'ān 41:1, 41:16. By implication the enemies of ʿĀ'ishah are being likened to ʿĀd, whom Allāh destroyed.

better than you." So al-Qaʿqāʿ attacked. The rein was being held by Zufar b. al-Ḥārith,[964] who was the last to take his turn with the rein. No, by Allāh! Every single elder from Banū ʿĀmir was struck down that day in front of the camel. Among those killed on that day was Rabīʿah,[965] the grandfather of Isḥāq b. Muslim, while Zufar[966] recited the rajaz verses:

O Mother of ours, ʿAysha! Do not fear!
All your sons are heroes brave.[967]
No one among us is anxious[968] or [over]cautious. [3209]

Al-Qaʿqāʿ replied with the rajaz verses

If we come to drink at a stagnant pool we clean it up,[969] but others are unable to drink the water we protect.[970]

In fact, he was quoting these verses.

According to al-Sarī [in writing]—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: One of the last to fight on that Day was Zufar b. al-Ḥārith. Al-Qaʿqāʿ marched toward him. Around the camel no fully grown ʿĀmirī[971] tribesman remained without being struck down; they hastened to meet death.

Al-Qaʿqāʿ said: "Bujayr b. Duljah![972] Shout to your tribesmen [in ʿĀ'ishah's army] that they should hamstring the camel before they get struck down and the Mother of the Faithful gets struck down!" So he called out" "Tribesmen of Ḍabbah! ʿAmr b. Duljah![973] Call me to come to you!" So ʿAmr called to him. "Am I safe to go and return?" asked [Bujayr]. "You are," replied [ʿAmr]. So [Bujayr] cut the camel's leg right off, and [the camel] threw itself down on its side and growled. Al-Qaʿqāʿ called out to those 964. Fought at Ṣiffīn under Muʿāwiyah (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 96, II, 609).

965. Ibn ʿĀṣim (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 102, II, 477).
966. Zufar belonged to Banū ʿĀmir (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 96).
967. Cf. p. 138, above.
968. Wahhām—or "Thinks too much and becomes afraid" (Prym, Glossarium, DLXVIII). IA has bi-wahwāhin "weak-spirited."
969. However bitter the battle, we fight and win; cf. Ibn Manẓūr, V, 222.
970. They are unable to fight us.
971. Zufar belonged to Banū ʿĀmir (see previous khabar). Fully grown means over forty.
972. A relative of al-Qaʿqāʿ.
973. His cousin on ʿĀ'ishah's side.

next to [the camel], "You won't be attacked." Then he and Zufar joined in cutting the camel's girth. The two of them then lifted the howdah off and put it down and took up [protective] positions around it.[974] Those soldiers of ʿĀ'ishah behind that position fled.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Ṣaʿb b. ʿAṭiyyah—his father: In the evening, when ʿAlī had arrived, the camel and those around it had been surrounded, Bujayr b. Duljah had hamstrung it and said, "You won't be attacked," the soldiers stopped fighting. When evening came and fighting had completely stopped, ʿAlī said the following verses about it:

[3210] I complain to You about my sorrows, those obvious and those hidden, and about a group who have drawn a curtain over my sight.
I have killed their Muḍar with my Muḍar.
I have healed my own wounds, but I have killed my people.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Ismāʿīl b. Abī Khālid—Ḥakīm b. Jābir: Ṭalḥah said that day: "O Allāh! Give ʿUthmān what he wants from me [for my former sins]!" Then, as his horse was standing still, an arrow from an unknown archer[975] pinned his knee to the saddle. He kept his position, and his boot filled with blood. But when he became drowsy he said to his mawlā: "Get up behind me on the horse, and find me a place where no one knows me. I've never seen an old man lose so much blood as today."[976] So his mawlā mounted and held him tightly and said, "The enemy is catching up with us." He finally brought him to one of the ruined houses of Baṣrah and put him down in its shade. He died in that ruin and was buried in the quarter of Banū Saʿd.[977]

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Bakhtarī al-ʿAbdī—his father: Rabīʿah fought with ʿAlī on the Day of the Camel, comprising a third of the Kūfans. The Muslims split into two[978] on the Day. They were lined up Muḍar opposite Muḍar, 974. Taking the camel and the howdah, surrounding ʿĀ'ishah protectively, and saying "You won't be attacked" all mean that the battle has been won and is over.

975. Cf. p. 124, above.
976. IA has "as I have today."
977. To the east of al-Baṣrah? (Massignon, 157).
978. Reading wa-nuṣṣifa for the text's wa-niṣfa.

Rabīʿah opposite Rabīʿah, and Yaman opposite Yaman.

"Commander of the Faithful! Allow us to stand against Muḍar," requested Banū Ṣūḥān,[979] and ʿAlī let them. Then Zayd [b. Ṣūḥān] went forward. Someone said to him: "What makes you stand over against the camel and Muḍar? Death is next to you and opposite you. Withdraw to us!" "It's death we want!" he replied, and that Day they were struck down, although Ṣaʿṣaʿah.[980] escaped from among them.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Ṣaʿb b. ʿAṭiyyah: A man on our side called al-Ḥārith said that day: "Tribesmen of Muḍar! For what are you killing each other? You're rushing we don't know where, except that we'll be judged there. No one will stand in for you!"

According to ʿAbdallāh b. Aḥmad—his father—Sulaymān—ʿAbdallāh b. al-Mubārak—Jarīr—al-Zubayr b. al-Khirrīt[981]—a sheikh from al-Ḥaramayn[982] called Abū Jubayr: On the Day of the Camel I passed Kaʿb b. Sūr as he was taking hold of the nose rein of ʿĀ'ishah's camel, and he said, "Abū Jubayr! By Allāh! The verses a woman once said [to her son] apply to me: [3211]

My dear son, do not go away, and do not fight!"

According to al-Zubayr b. al-Khirrīt: ʿAlī passed by his corpse, stood over him, and said: "By Allāh! Well I know, you are steadfast for truth, judging justly," and he praised him for these and other things.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Ibn Ṣaʿṣaʿah al-Muzanī or Ṣaʿṣaʿah—ʿAmr b. Jaʾwān—Jarīr b. Ashras:[983] Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr's action was at the height of the morning of that day, and then their army fled. ʿĀ'ishah was therefore looking for peace, but the army surprised her by returning, and Muḍar protected her all around.[984] So the army stood for battle, and 979. From ʿAbd al-Qays, who belonged to Rabīʿah (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 170).

980. Zayd b. Ṣūḥān's brother (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 170, II, 538).
981. Following Addenda, DCXXXIV, and Ibrāhīm, for the text's al-Ḥurayth.
982. The two sacred enclaves, Mecca and Medina, following Addenda, DCXXXIV, for the text's al-Ḥarāmayn.
983. Perhaps Ibn Sharis, as p. 99, above (Addenda, DCXXXIV).
984. Cf. p. 131, above.

ʿĀ'ishah's action was in the middle of the day. Now ʿAlī. . . .[985] Kaʿb b. Sūr took ʿĀ'ishah's Qur'ān copy[986] and rushed out between the two lines, imploring them by Almighty and Glorious Allāh to stop the bloodshed. He was handed his armor, but he threw it [3212] down at his feet. His shield was brought, but he pushed it away. So they all shot [their arrows] at him at the same time[987] and killed him. They did not give him time to think, and suddenly they intensified their attack against them and fought more closely. From both Baṣrans[988] and Kūfans he was the first to be killed in front of ʿĀ'ishah.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Makhlad b. Kathīr—his father: We sent Muslim b. ʿAbdallāh[989] to call our brothers[990] to stop, but they all shot [their arrows] at him and killed him, as the center of the army did to Kaʿb. So he was the first to be killed in front of the Commander of the Faithful and ʿĀ'ishah. The mother of Muslim said the following verses mourning him:[991]

O Allāh! Muslim went to them, submitting to death when he called them
To the Book of Allāh without fearing them.
They smeared him with blood when he went to them,
And their mother[992] was standing, looking on,
not restraining them as they plotted folly together.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Ṣaʿb b. Ḥakīm b. Sharīk—his father—his grandfather: By the evening of the Day of the Camel the two flanks of the Kūfan army had been routed and then had merged with the center. Now Ibn Yathribī had been qāḍī of al-Baṣrah before Kaʿb b. Sūr, and he, ʿAbdallāh, 985. Lacuna in the text. Prym suggests inserting "was behind them" as on p. 131, above.

986. Omitting wa-ʿAlī from Ibrāhīm.
987. Reading rishqan with Ibrāhīm (cf. Lane, 1090b) for the text's rashqan, as on p. 132, above.
988. Ibrāhīm omits the Baṣrans.
989. Probably Ibn Ḥiyay/Ḥuyayy, from ʿAlaqat Bajīlah (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 222, II, 436). The authority for the variant account, p. 129, above, was from Aḥmas Bajīlah.
990. On the other side.
991. Cf. p. 130, above.
992. ʿĀ'ishah.

and his brother ʿAmr were with them on the Day of the Camel. He was on horseback, standing in front of the camel. "Where is a man to attack the camel?" asked ʿAlī. Hind b. ʿAmr al-Murādī responded, but Ibn Yathribī intercepted him. So they exchanged blows, and Ibn Yathribī killed him. Then Sayḥān b. Ṣūḥān attacked, but Ibn Yathribī intercepted him. So they exchanged blows, and Ibn Yathribī killed him. Then ʿIlbāʾ b. al-Haytham attacked, but Ibn Yathribī intercepted him and killed him. Then Ṣaʿṣaʿah attacked, and [Ibn Yathribī] struck him. So Ibn Yathribī killed three, finishing them off in the battle—ʿIlbāʾ, Hind, and Sayḥān. Ṣaʿṣaʿah and Zayd were taken away wounded—one[993] died, and the other survived. [3213]

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—ʿAmr b. Muḥammad—al-Shaʿbī: On the day of the Camel seventy[994] tribesmen from Quraysh took hold of the nose rein, and each one was killed as he held it. Al-Ashtar attacked, so ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr intercepted him, and they exchanged blows. Al-Ashtar struck him down and made for him, but ʿAbdallāh leaped on him, grabbed him round the chest, and fell down with him to the ground, saying, "Kill me and Mālik!" The people did not know him as Mālik. Had he said, "and al-Ashtar," and had a million lives not one of them would have been spared. He carried on, struggling to get out of ʿAbdallāh's grip, until he managed to escape.

Whenever someone attacked the camel and escaped, he did not make a second attempt. Both Marwān and ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr were wounded that day.

According to ʿAbdallāh b. Aḥmad—his paternal uncle—Sulaymān—ʿAbdallāh—Jarīr b. Ḥāzim—Muḥammad b. Abī Yaʿqūb and Ibn ʿAwn—Abū Rajāʾ: ʿAmr b. Yathribī al-Ḍabbī, the brother of ʿAmīrah[995] the qāḍī, recited the following verses that day:

We, Banū Ḍabbah, are the allies of the camel, we take the field against death whenever death dismounts.[996]

993. Zayd.
994. Cf. Conrad.
995. As vocalized by Prym. Perhaps ʿUmayrah?
996. See p. 138, above.

Ibn ʿAwn added the verses (not in Ibn Abī Yaʿqūb's version):

Killing is sweeter to us than honey!
We lament the death of Ibn ʿAffān with the tips of spears.
Send back our chief to us, and that will be enough.

[3214] According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Dāwūd b. Abī Hind—an elder from Banū Ḍabbah: Ibn Yathribī said some rajaz verses that day:

For those that don't know me, I am Ibn Yathribī,
the killer of 'Ilbā' and Hind al-Jamalī
And of a son of Ṣūḥān, who followed the way of ʿAlī.[997]

"Who'll come and fight?" Ibn Yathribī called out. A man went out, but he killed him. Another came out, and he killed him too. He then said some more rajaz verses:

I kill them, and I can see ʿAlī,
[so that] if I wished I could thrust an ʿUmrī[998] spear into his mouth!

Then ʿAmmār b. Yāsir came out against him—and he was the weakest who had done so.[999] As ʿAmmār stood forward, the men said, "We belong to Allāh, and to him we return."[1000] I also said about ʿAmmār because of his weakness: "By Allāh! This man will be joining those who preceded him!" He was slender and thin-legged, and he was carrying a sword of which the shoulder belt was too short for him[1001] and of which the hilt [therefore] was near his armpit. Ibn Yathribī struck him with his sword, but it became embedded in his leather shield. So ʿAmmār struck him and injured him. ʿAlī's companions then threw stones at Ibn Yathribī and heavily wounded him, and he was carried off badly injured.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Ḥammād al-Burjumī—Khārijah b. al-Ṣalt: On the Day of the Camel when al-Ḍabbī recited:

---

997. ʿAlā dīn ʿAlī. See the same verses on p. 137, above.
998. Glossarium, CCCLXXVII. Ibrāhīm has ʿAmrī.
999. He was very old.
1000. Qurʾān 2:156. Said on the death of someone.
1001. Reading tashiffu [ʿanhu] (Addenda, DCXXXIV and Ibrāhīm) for the text's bi-shiqqihi "by his side."

We, the Banū Ḍabbah, are the allies of the Camel;
we lament the death of Ibn ʿAffān with the tips of spears.
Send back our chief to us, and that will be enough.

ʿUmayr b. Abī al-Ḥārith recited in reply:

How can we send back your chief when his bones have become old?[1002]
We struck his chest until he fell.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Ṣaʿb b. Ḥakīm—his father—his grandfather: A tribesman from Banū Ḍabbah hamstrung the camel. He was called Ibn Duljah, ʿAmr or Bujayr. Al-Ḥārith b. Qays, one of ʿĀ'ishah's followers, said the following verses about this: [3215]

We struck his leg so he fell down dead from one hit during the surge that was decisive.
If we had not been created for the sake of [protecting] the Prophet's household and his wife's sanctity, they would have divided us among themselves very quickly.

They were falsely attributed to ʿAlī's follower al-Muthannnā b. Makhramah.[1003]

The Severity of the Battle on the Day of the Camel and the Account of Aʿyan b. Ḍubayʿah's[1004] Looking into the Howdah

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad b. Nuwayrah—Abū ʿUthmān—al-Qaʿqāʿ: The way the center of the army fought on the Day of the Camel was more like the Battle of Ṣiffīn than anything I have seen. I saw us defending ourselves against them with the points of our spears and leaning against the butts of our spears. They were doing likewise, so that had the men walked on them they would have supported them.[1005]

1002. I.e., he has died, as Ibrāhīm notes.
1003. Al-Muthannā b. Mukharrabah? (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 168, II, 438).
1004. Al-Mujāshiʿī.
1005. Like a bridge.

According to ʿĪsā b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Marwazī—al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥusayn al-ʿUranī—Yaḥyā b. Yaʿlā al-Aslamī—Sulaymān b. Qarm[1006]—al-Aʿmash[1007]—ʿAbdallāh b. Sinān al-Kāhilī: On the Day of the Camel we shot arrows at each other until there were no more to shoot, and we stabbed each other with spears until they were enmeshed in our chests and theirs. Had horses been made to walk over them they could have. Then ʿAlī called out, "Use swords, sons of the Muhājirūn!" The old man[1008] said, "I never entered Dār al-Walīd[1009] without remembering that day."

[3216] According to ʿAbd al-Aʿlā b. Wāṣil—Abū Fuqaym—Fiṭr—Abū Bashīr: I was with my mawlā at the time of the Camel, and since then I have never passed Dār al-Walīd and heard the sounds of the washermen beating[1010] without remembering how they fought.

According to ʿĪsā b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Marwazī—al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥusayn—Yaḥyā b. Yaʿlā—ʿAbd al-Malik b. Muslim—ʿĪsā b. Ḥiṭṭān: The army made a retreat; then we returned, and ʿĀ'ishah was [seated] on a red camel in a red howdah, which I could describe only as a hedgehog because of the arrows.

According to ʿAbdallāh b. Aḥmad—his father—Sulaymān—ʿAbdallāh—Ibn ʿAwn—Abū Rajā: Some people were recalling the Day of the Camel. It's as if I can see ʿĀ'ishah's howdah now. It was as though it was a hedgehog from the arrows that had been shot into it. "Did you fight that day?" I asked Abū Rajā'. "By Allāh!" he replied. "I fired arrows, and I don't know what effect they had."

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad b. Rāshid al-Sulamī—Maysarah Abū Jamīlah: After the Camel had been hamstrung Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr and ʿAmmār b. Yāsir came to ʿĀ'ishah and cut the saddle girth. They lifted off the howdah and put it to one side until ʿAlī had given them further instructions about it. "Take her into al-Baṣrah!" he told the two of 1006. Prym notes that this name is also spelled Qadam and Qazam.

---

1007. If this is the famous al-Aʿmash, then it is Abū Muḥammad Sulaymān b. Mihrān, traditionist and Qur'ān reader, b.c. 60/679–80, d. probably 148/765 (*EI*², s.v.).

1008. Presumably ʿAbdallāh b. Sinān.

1009. In the market of al-Kūfah (Caetani, IX, 147).

1010. They beat the clothes with wood against wood; Ibn Manẓūr, V, 415; cf. Muir, 249 n. 1.

them, and they took it into the house of ʿAbdallāh b. Khalaf al-Khuzāʿī.[1011]

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: ʿAlī ordered a group of men to carry the howdah out from the dead bodies. Al-Qaʿqāʿ and Zufar b. al-Ḥārith had already removed it from the back of the camel and put it down at its side. Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr then came up to it with a group of men, [3217] and he put his hand in. "Who's this?" said ʿĀ'ishah. "Your dutiful brother," he replied. "Undutiful!"[1012] "How do you feel about your sons' beating today, Mother?" asked ʿAmmār b. Yāsir. "Who are you?" asked ʿĀ'ishah. "Your dutiful son, ʿAmmār,"[1013] he replied. "I'm no mother of yours!" "You are, even though you loathe the idea." "You're boasting that you're victorious and doing just what you reproved [others for doing]. By Allāh! This is totally wrong! Those who do this sort of thing are never victorious." They then brought her out in her howdah from the corpses and put her down away from everyone. It was as though her howdah was sprouting[1014] suckers from the arrows stuck in it. Aʿyan b. Ḍubayʿah al-Mujāshiʿī[1015] then came up to look down into the howdah, and she exclaimed: "Clear off! Allāh curse you!" "By Allāh!" he replied. "I can see little rosy!"[1016] "May Allāh disgrace you![1017] May He cut off your hand! May He expose your genitals!"[1018] He was indeed killed in al-Baṣrah, and stripped, his hand was cut off, and he was thrown naked into one of the ruins in the Azd 1011. A prominent Baṣran, killed on the side of ʿAlī at the Battle of the Camel (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 196, II, 112).

---

1012. Akhūk . . . ʿaqūq. Muḥammad was being sarcastic.

1013. ʿAmmār al-bārr.

1014. Reading muqaṣṣib (Addenda, DCXXXIV) for the text's muqaḍḍab "pruned."

1015. Of Tamīm and a friend of ʿAlī's (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 61, II, 217).

1016. Ḥumayrā', a term of endearment to a wife. The Prophet is said to have called ʿĀ'ishah so.

1017. Hatak Allāhu sitrak. The translation (cf. Lane, 1304c) refers to the next sentence's triple fulfillment of the curse; however, it could refer back to Aʿyan's looking into the howdah and mean, "May Allāh rip down your curtain!" i.e., and expose the women of your family, although this is not fulfilled in what follows.

1018. A Muslim woman could hardly say anything nearer the bone. It could be translated more mildly "and show up your deficiency," but this would not fit what follows.

quarter. ʿAlī then came to her and exclaimed: "O Mother! May Allāh forgive us and you!" "May He forgive us and you!" she replied.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Ṣaʿb b. Ḥakīm b. Sharīk—his father—his grandfather: Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr arrived with ʿAmmār, and cut the thongs of the girth from the howdah, and the two of them then lifted it off. When they had put it down, Muḥammad put in his hand and said, "Your brother Muḥammad!" "The most blameworthy!"[1019] she replied. "Dear sister, have you been hit?" he asked. "That's no business of yours!" she replied. "Whose is it then? Those who've gone astray?"[1020] "No, those who guide right."[1021] ʿAlī then arrived. "How are you, Mother?" he asked her. "Fine." "May Allāh forgive you!" he said. "And you," she replied.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad
[3218] and Ṭalḥah: When it was nearly the end of the night Muḥammad took ʿĀ'ishah out to al-Baṣrah to stay in the house of ʿAbdallāh b. Khalaf al-Khuzāʿī as a guest of Ṣafiyyah bt. al-Ḥārith b. Ṭalḥah b. Abī Ṭalḥah b. ʿAbd al-ʿUzzā b. ʿUthmān b. ʿAbd al-Dār,[1022] the mother of Ṭalḥah al-Ṭalaḥāt b. ʿAbdallāh b. Khalaf.[1023]

According to al-Wāqidī, the battle took place on Thursday 10 Jumādā II 36 (December 4, 656).[1024]

The Killing of al-Zubayr b. al-ʿAwwām

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Walīd b. ʿAbdallāh—his father: When Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr's army was routed on the Day of the Camel, al-Zubayr left. He passed the army of al-Aḥnaf, who, when he saw him and was told who he was, remarked: "By Allāh! He's been forced to do this"[1025] and 1019. Mudhammam, the opposite of Muḥammad. Cf. p. 37, above.

---

1020. Sarcastic criticism of Ṭalḥah and al-Zubayr.

1021. ʿĀ'ishah ripostes that Muḥammad has gone astray.

1022. His Qurashī wife (Caskel and Strenziok, II, 555).

1023. Called so because of all the Ṭalḥahs on his mother's side; later governor of Sijistan (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 196, II, 555).

1024. Caetani, IX, 131. According to Caetani, IX, 2, this 10 Jumādā II was a Sunday. See p. 115, above, where the date is given as Thursday, 14 Jumādā II.

1025. Reading bi-khiyār, following Ibrāhīm and closer to the ms. for the text's anḥiyāz, perhaps "What's this? Desertion?"

asked his men, "Who'll keep us informed about him?" "I will," replied ʿAmr b. Jurmūz to his companions, and he followed him. When he caught up with him al-Zubayr looked at him furiously and asked, "Why are you here?" "That's just what I wanted to ask you,"[1026] he replied. A ghulām of al-Zubayr's who was with him, called ʿAṭiyyah, said, "He's armed!" "Why be frightened by [such] a man?" replied al-Zubayr. It was time for prayer, so Ibn Jurmūz said, "Let's do the prayer!" Al-Zubayr also said, "Let's do the prayer!" So they dismounted. Ibn Jurmūz stood behind him and then stabbed him from behind through the neck opening of his armored coat and killed him. He then took his horse, his signet ring, and his weapons and returned to the army with the news, leaving the ghulām, who buried him in Wādī al-Sibāʿ.[1027]

"By Allāh! I don't know whether what you've done is good or bad," said al-Aḥnaf and went down to ʿAlī, Ibn Jurmūz accompanying him. They went up to him and told him the news. He asked for al-Zubayr's sword and said, "A sword that many times dispelled distress from the face of the Messenger of God!"[1028] and sent it to ʿĀ'ishah.[1029] Then he turned to al-Aḥnaf and said, "You held out [on me]!" "I thought that I was doing everything right," he replied, "and that what happened coincided with your orders, Commander of the Faithful. So be lenient! You've come a long way, and you'll need me in the future more than you have done in the past. So acknowledge the good I've done, and recognize my sincere devotion for the sake of the future, and don't say things like that,[1030] for I'll always give you my sincere support." [3219]

Those Routed on the Day of the Camel Who Hid and Went off into the Surrounding Towns

According to al-Sarī [in writing]—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: At the height of the morning of the rout al-Zubayr went off on foot toward Medina, but he was killed by Ibn Jurmūz. ʿUtbah b. Abī Sufyān and the two sons of al-Ḥakam, ʿAbd al-

1026. Or "I just wanted to ask you [how you were/what you were doing.]"
1027. Presumably in the modern area of Baṣrah called al-Zubayr.
1028. E.g., at Uḥud and Ḥunayn.
1029. Sister of Ṣafiyyah, al-Zubayr's wife.
1030. "You thought this was a good opportunity to impress me."

Raḥmān and Yaḥyā, also left for the surrounding area on the day of the rout, their heads badly wounded.[1031] They met ʿIṣmah b. Ubayr al-Taymī, who asked, "Are you looking for protection?"[1032] "Who are you?" they replied. "ʿIṣmah b. Ubayr." So they said, "Yes, we are." "You may have my protection for twelve months." So he took them and guarded them and looked after them until they recovered. "Choose the area you most prefer," he then said, "and I'll take you there." "Syria," they replied. So with 400 riders from Taym al-Ribāb he escorted them until they had entered well into Kalb territory at Dūmah. "You've now fulfilled your obligation to yourself and to them," said the Kalbīs. "You've carried out your duty, so return!" So he did. A poet composed a verse about this:

[3220] When the spears were being aimed Ibn Ubayr was loyal to Āl Abī al-ʿĀṣ. His loyalty was memorable.

As for Ibn ʿĀmir,[1033] he also left wounded in the head, and a man from Banū Ḥurqūs[1034] called Murayy[1035] met him and offered to give him protection. He accepted, so he gave him protection, and he stayed with him. "Which territory would you most prefer?" he then asked. "Damascus," he replied. So with riders from Banū Ḥurqūṣ he escorted him until they got him to Damascus.

Ḥārithah b. Badr,[1036] who had been on ʿĀ'ishah's side and whose son or brother, Zirāʿ (or in another copy, Dirāʿ[1037]) had been hit in the battle, said the verses

Some news has reached me that Ibn ʿĀmir has made his camel kneel and thrown down his ropes[1038] in Damascus.

Marwān b. al-Ḥakam took refuge on the day of the rout with a family from ʿAnazah. "Inform Mālik b. Mismaʿ where I am," he

---

1031. For this translation of shujjijū, see "until they recovered," below. Ibrāhīm, 535 n., glosses it "to cross the desert."

1032. *EI*², s.v. Djiwār.

1033. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĀmir b. Kurayz.

1034. Of Ṭayyi'? Cf. Caskel and Strenziok, I, 249.

1035. Following Wellhausen, 160; cf. Addenda, DCXXXIV.

1036. Caskel and Strenziok, I, 71, II, 316.

1037. A marginal gloss crept into the text, as Prym notes. Ḥārithah's brother's name was Dhirāʿ (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 71, II, 316).

1038. Settled.

asked them, so they went to Mālik and told him where he was. Mālik asked his brother Muqātil, "How shall we deal with this man who has sent us a message saying where he is?" "Send my brother's son, and give him protection," he replied, "and then seek assurance of protection for him from ʿAlī. If he gives him it, then that's what we want. If he doesn't, then we'll come out with him and with our swords. If he obstructs, then we'll fight on his behalf with our swords. We'll either come through or perish honorably." He had previously asked the opinion of others in his family on this same question that he was asking Muqātil, but they had told him not to [protect Marwān], but he took the advice of his brother and not theirs. He therefore sent a message to [3221] Marwān and put him up in his house, determining to defend him if forced to do so, saying, "Death for protection is loyalty." Marwān's descendants remembered this of them later, and they benefited by it from them, and the Marwānids honored them because of it.

ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr took refuge in the house of a man from al-Azd called Wazīr and said, "Go to the Mother of the Faithful and tell her where I am, but make sure Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr[1039] doesn't find out!" So he went to ʿĀ'ishah and told her. "Bring Muḥammad to me!" she said. "Mother of the Faithful!" replied Wazīr. "ʿAbdallāh has forbidden me to let Muḥammad know." But she sent a message to Muḥammad: "Go with this man, and bring me your sister's son!" So he set off with the Azdī and went with him to Ibn al-Zubayr. "By Allāh!" [the Azdī] said. "I've brought you what you didn't want, but the Mother of the Faithful was insistent." Muḥammad and ʿAbdallāh then came out, abusing each other. Muḥammad was mentioning ʿUthmān and abusing him, and ʿAbdallāh was abusing Muḥammad, until they reached ʿĀ'ishah at ʿAbdallāh b. Khalaf's house. ʿAbdallāh b. Khalaf was on ʿĀ'ishah's side before the Day of the Camel; his brother ʿUthmān was killed with ʿAlī. ʿĀ'ishah sent out [men] to look for the wounded, and she had a number of them stay [where she was]. One of those she did this with was Marwān. They stayed in rooms in the house.

1039. Who had been given charge of ʿĀ'ishah by ʿAlī.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: While ʿAlī was in his camp tribal leaders came to visit ʿĀ'ishah. One of the first to do so was al-Qaʿqāʿ b. ʿAmr. She said to him when he had greeted her: "I saw two men battling in front of me yesterday, and they recited such-and-such rajaz verses. Of the two, do you know who was the Kūfan, from your side?" "Yes," he [3222] replied, "the one who said, 'The most refractory mother we know.'[1040] By Allāh! He was lying; you're the most dutiful mother we know, but you weren't obeyed." "By Allāh!" she said. "Had I but died two decades before this day!" Al-Qaʿqāʿ then left and went to ʿAlī and told him that ʿĀ'ishah had questioned him. "Alas for you!" said ʿAlī. "Who are the two men?" "The other one was Abu Hālah,[1041] who said:

So that I could see his companion ʿAlī."

"By Allāh!" said ʿAlī. "Had I but died two decades before this day!" Their response was thus exactly the same.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: Those of the wounded who were able to get up again stole away in the middle of the night into al-Baṣrah. ʿĀ'ishah asked about a number of people on that day, both allies and opponents, as people came to visit her while she was in the house of ʿAbdallāh b. Khalaf. Whenever she was told of the death of one of them, she said, "May Allāh be merciful to him!" "Why do you say this?" asked one of her followers. "It's what the Messenger of God used to say. 'So-and-so is in paradise; so-and-so is in paradise,'" she replied. That day ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib said, "I fervently hope that there is not one of these who has purified himself whom Allāh has not taken into paradise."

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—ʿAṭiyyah—Abū Ayyūb—ʿAlī: No verse of the Qur'ān was revealed to the Prophet that gave him more joy than Almighty and Glorious Allāh's words: "Whatever calamity afflicts you you have earned, but He forgives much."[1042] The Prophet said: "Whatever a Muslim suffers in this world by way of calamity to himself is in payment 1040. Rabīʿah al-ʿUqaylī; see p. 137, above.

1041. ʿAlī's man in the fight.
1042. Qur'ān 42:30.

for a wrongdoing, but what Almighty and Glorious Allāh forgives is more. So whatever afflicts him in this world deletes his wrongdoing and is a forgiveness for him. It will not be counted against him in punishment on the Day of Resurrection. What Almighty and Glorious Allāh has forgiven him in this world He has forgiven forever. Allāh is far above going back on His forgiveness." [3223]

ʿAlī's Grief over Those Killed at the Battle of the Camel, Their Burial, and His Gathering What Was in the Camp and Its Despatch to al-Baṣrah

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib remained in his camp for three days and did not enter al-Baṣrah while the people were sent out to their dead. They went out to them and buried them, and ʿAlī went around with them among the bodies. When Kaʿb b. Sūr was brought to him, he said, "You told me it was only fools who had joined up with them, and here you see the learned man." He then came upon ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAttāb and said, "And here is the chief of them!"[1043] (The [informant] they were going around with says, "This[1044] means they had all agreed on him and approved that he should lead their prayer.")

Whenever ʿAlī passed a man with some good points he would say, "There were those who claimed that only the riffraff came out against us, but here is a strenuously devout Muslim." He prayed over both their Baṣran and their Kūfan dead, and he prayed over the Quraysh of both camps. They were both Medinans and Meccans. ʿAlī then buried the severed limbs in a huge grave and collected everything that was left in the camp. He sent it to the mosque in al-Baṣrah, saying: "Whoever recognizes anything [of his own] should take it, except any weapon that was in the stores with the mark of the government[1045] on it. For indeed,[1046] there is still [there] what [the government] has not yet recognized [as belonging to it, so] take that property belonging to Almighty and [3224]

1043. Yaʿsūb al-qawm.
1044. Yaʿsūb al-qawm.
1045. Sulṭān.
1046. Reading la-mā with the ms. and Addenda, DCXXXIV for the text's mimmā.

Glorious Allāh that they had collected in order to fight you with. A Muslim is not entitled to the property of any deceased Muslim, and they had taken possession of those weapons without their being given them as booty[1047] by the government."

The Number of Fatalities at the Battle of the Camel

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: Those killed at the Battle of the Camel around the camel numbered 10,000, half from ʿAlī's followers and half from ʿĀ'ishah's. Two thousand Azdīs fell plus 500 from the rest of al-Yaman. Two thousand from Muḍar fell plus 500 from Qays, 500 from Tamīm, 1,000 from Banū Ḍabbah, and 500 from Bakr b. Wā'il.

It was said that in the first battle 5,000 Baṣrans were killed and a further 5,000 in the second battle, totaling 10,000 Baṣran fatalities and 5,000 Kūfans.

Seventy elders of Banū ʿAdī were killed that day, all of whom were well versed in the Qur'ān. Youths and men who were not so well versed in the Qur'ān were also killed. ʿĀ'ishah said, "I was still hoping for victory until I heard the voices of Banū ʿAdī subside."

ʿAlī's Visit to ʿĀ'ishah and the Punishment He Ordered for Those Who Offended Her

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: On Monday ʿAlī entered al-Baṣrah, went to the mosque, and prayed there. Then he went into al-Baṣrah itself, and the people came to him. Later he went to ʿĀ'ishah on his shemule. When he arrived at the house of ʿAbdallāh b. Khalaf—the [3225] largest house in al-Baṣrah—he found the women weeping with ʿĀ'ishah over the two sons of Khalaf, ʿAbdallāh and ʿUthmān.[1048] Ṣafiyyah bint al-Ḥārith[1049] had veiled her face and was weeping, 1047. Tanafful; Maqrīzī and Ibrāhīm have tanfīl (Addenda, DCXXXV), but this would not alter the sense.

1048. Fought on ʿAlī's side in the Battle of the Camel (Caskel and Strenziok, I, 196, II, 579).

1049. Wife of ʿAbdallāh b. Khalaf.

but when she saw him she said: "ʿAlī! Killer of loved ones! Splitter of groups! May Allāh make your sons fatherless, as you have done to the sons of ʿAbdallāh!" He made her no reply and remained silent until he went into ʿĀ'ishah, greeted her, sat down next to her, and said, "Ṣafiyyah just met me with some harsh words, but up until today I haven't seen her since she was a little girl." Then, as ʿAlī left, Ṣafiyyah turned to him and repeated what she had said to him, so he halted his she-mule and said, "In truth, I had a mind," and he pointed to the doors of the house, "to open this door and kill those inside, and then this one and kill those inside, and then this one and kill those inside." Some of the wounded had taken refuge with ʿĀ'ishah, and ʿAlī had been told that they were with her there, but he pretended not to know. [At this, Ṣafiyyah] fell silent, and ʿAlī left. "By Allāh!" said an Azdī. "This woman[1050] won't get away from us!" But ʿAlī got angry. "Silence!" he said. "Don't any of you dishonor women! Don't force your way into any house! Don't stir up discord with any woman by hurting her, even if they shout abuse at your womenfolk and call your leaders and your honest men fools. They are weak. We have been commanded to hold back from them, [even if] they are polytheists.[1051] A man who recompenses a woman by beating her will have his descendants after him reproached for it. So let me not hear of anyone that he has confronted a woman. I will punish him as the most wicked of people." ʿAlī then left and was met by a man who said: "Commander of the Faithful! Two men I had met previously stood up at the door and were offensive to someone whose abuse [of you] is more painful to you than that of [3226] Ṣafiyyah." "Alas! Do you mean ʿĀ'ishah?" "Yes," he replied, "two of their men stood at the door of the house. One of them recited

May you, our mother, be repaid for [what you did to] us in disobedience!

And the other recited:

Mother of ours! Repent, for you have made a mistake."

So [ʿAlī] sent al-Qaʿqāʿ b. ʿAmr to the door, and he sent those 1050. Ṣafiyyah.

1051. IA substitutes "Muslims."

guarding it to get control of the two men. "I'm going to cut off their heads!" said al-Qaʿqāʿ but then added, "I will punish them very severely [instead]." So he gave them each a hundred lashes and had their tunics stripped off them.

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Ḥārith b. Ḥaṣīrah—Abū al-Kunūd: They were two Azdīs from al-Kūfah called ʿIjl and Saʿd, sons of ʿAbdallāh.

The Baṣrans' Allegiance to ʿAlī and His Division of the Contents of the Treasury among Them

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: Al-Aḥnaf gave allegiance in the evening because he had been absent, he and Banū Saʿd. Then they all entered al-Baṣrah, and the Baṣrans gave allegiance under their banners. ʿAlī gave allegiance to the Baṣrans, even the wounded and those who had sought protection. But when Marwān returned [to Medi-[3227] na][1052] he went and joined Muʿāwiyah. But others said, "He stayed in Medina until Ṣiffīn was over."

When ʿAlī had completed the allegiance with the Baṣrans, he investigated the treasury and found more than 600,000 dirhams. So he divided it up among those who had fought with him,[1053] 500 dirhams going to each of them, saying, "You'll get the same again on top of your wages if Almighty and Glorious Allāh lets you conquer Syria." The Saba'iyyah murmured against this and secretly criticized ʿAlī.

ʿAlī's Conduct toward Those Who Fought Him on the Day of the Camel

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad b. Rāshid—his father: It was part of ʿAlī's practice not to kill those who fled or to finish off the wounded or to dishonor women, or to take money. So on that day some men asked, "What allows us to kill them but forbids us their money?" "Those who fought you 1052. He was one who had sought protection.

1053. Ibrāhīm, following Maqrīzī (Addenda, DCXXXV), adds "at the battle."

are like you," replied ʿAlī. "Those who make peace with us are one with us, and we are one with them, but, for those who persist until they get struck by us, I fight them to the death. You are in no need of their fifth."[1054] It was on that day the Khawārij[1055] began talking among themselves.

Al-Ashtar Sends ʿĀ'ishah a He-Camel He Had Bought for Her and Her Exit from al-Baṣrah to Mecca

According to Abū Kurayb Muḥammad b. al-ʿAlā'—Yaḥyā b. Ādam—Abū Bakr b. ʿAyyāsh—ʿĀṣim b. Kulayb—his father: When they had finished on the Day of the Camel al-Ashtar ordered me to go and buy him a he-camel for 700 dirhams from a man from Mahrah.[1056] "Take it to ʿĀ'ishah," said al-Ashtar, "and tell her, 'Al-Ashtar Mālik b. al-Ḥārith has sent it to you, and he says, "This is to take the place of your camel."'" So I took it to her and said, [3228] "Mālik sends you greetings, and says that this camel is in place of your camel." "May Allāh not give him peace! For he has killed the chief of the Arabs (by which she meant Ibn Ṭalḥah) and committed crimes against my sister's son." So I took it back to al-Ashtar and informed him, at which he uncovered two hirsute forearms and said, "They wanted to kill me, so what else could I do?"

According to al-Sarī (in writing)—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: ʿĀ'ishah headed for Mecca, taking the road[1057] from al-Baṣrah. Marwān and al-Aswad b. Abī al-Bakhtarī left the road and went to Medina. ʿĀ'ishah stayed in Mecca until the ḥajj[1058] and then returned to Medina.

1054. The fifth was reserved for Allāh, His Messenger, relatives, orphans, the poor, and travelers (Qur'ān 8:42).

1055. Seceders from ʿAlī's cause, principally after the Battle of Ṣiffīn; see *EI*², s.v. Khāridjites.

1056. In the southeastern Arabian peninsula, famed for its camels.

1057. Reading fa-kāna wajhuhā. Prym's fa-kāna wajjahahā has no explicit subject, but could be ʿAlī—"so he sent her away [from al-Baṣrah]." The text may be corrupt, and, like IA, 258, Prym's proposed reconstruction, "ʿĀ'ishah left al-Baṣrah and headed toward Mecca," corresponds with the translation above.

1058. A little over seven months later, if the end of Rabīʿ II is taken as the date of the battle, and five or six if Jumādā II is taken; see pp. 81, 133, above.

What ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib Wrote about the Victory to His Governor of al-Kūfah

